nolds, Mr. Langton, Marchese Gherardi of Lombardy, and Mr. John Spottiswoode the younger, of Spottiswoode<sup>3</sup>, the solicitor. At this time fears of an invasion were circulated; to obviate which Mr. Spottiswoode observed, that Mr. Fraser, the engineer, who had lately come from Dunkirk, said, that the French had the same fears of us. JOHNSON. "It is thus that mutual cowardice keeps us in peace. Were one half of mankind brave, and one half cowards, the brave would be always beating the cowards. Were all brave, they would lead a very uneasy life; all would be continually fighting: but being all cowards, we go on very well."

We talked of drinking wine. JOHNSON. "I require wine only when I am alone. I have then often wished for it, and often taken it." SPOTTISWOODE. "What, by way of a companion, Sir?" JOHNSON. "To get rid of myself, to send myself away. Wine gives great pleasure; and every pleasure is of itself a good. It is a good, unless counterbalanced by evil. A man may have a strong reason not to drink wine; and that may be greater than the pleasure. Wine makes a man better pleased with himself. I do not say that it makes him more pleasing to others. Sometimes it does. But the danger is, that while a man grows better pleased with himself, he may be growing less pleasing to others.<sup>4</sup> Wine gives a man nothing. It neither gives him knowledge nor wit; it only animates a man, and enables him to bring out what a dread of the company has repressed. It only puts in motion what has been locked up in frost. But this may be good, or it may be bad." SPOTTISWOODE. "So, Sir, wine is a key which opens a box; but this box may be either full or empty?" JOHNSON. "Nay, Sir, conversation is the key: wine is a picklock, which forces open the box, and injures it. A man should cultivate his mind so as to have that confidence and readiness without wine, which wine gives." BOSWELL. "The great difficulty of resisting wine is from benevolence. For instance, a good worthy man asks you to taste his wine, which he has had twenty years in his cellar." JOHNSON. "Sir, all this notion about benevolence arises from a man's imagining himself to be of more importance to others than he really is. They don't care a farthing whether he drinks wine or not."

<sup>1</sup> In general his wigs were very shabby, and their fore parts were burned away by the near approach of the candle, which his short-sightedness rendered necessary in reading. At Streatham, Mr. Thrale's butler always kept a better wig in his own hands, with which he met Johnson at the parlour-door, when the bell had called him down to dinner; and this ludicrous ceremony was performed every day. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> Here he either was mistaken, or had a different notion of an extensive sale from what is generally entertained: for the fact is, that four thousand copies of that excellent work were sold very quickly. A new edition has been printed since his death, besides that in the collection of his works. — BOSWELL. Another edition has been printed since Mr. Boswell wrote the above, besides repeated editions in the general collection of his works during the last twenty years. — MALONE, 1804. Hannah More says, that "Cadell the publisher told her, that he had sold 4000 the first week." — Life, vol. 1, p. 39. This enormous sale at first, made Johnson think perhaps the subsequent sale scanty. — CROKER, 1835.

<sup>3</sup> In the phrasology of Scotland, I should have said, "Mr. John Spottiswoode, the younger, of that ilk." Johnson knew that sense of the word very well, and has thus explained it in his "Dictionary" — voc. Ilk. "It also signifies the same; as, Macintosh of that ilk, denotes a gentleman whose surname and the title of his estate are the same." — BOSWELL. Johnson derives it from the Saxon; but is it not rather an abbreviation of the Latin — illic, that place? Mr. Spottiswoode married the daughter of Mr. William Strahan, and was the father of the present Spottiswoode of that ilk, and of the printer of this work. Ante, p. 438, n. 3. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>4</sup> It is observed in "Waller's Life," in the "Biographia Britannica," that he drank only water; and that while he sat in a company who were drinking wine, "he had the dexterity to accommodate his discourse to the pitch of theirs as it sunk." If excess in drinking be meant, the remark is acutely just. — But surely a moderate use of wine gives a gaiety of spirits which water-drinkers know not. — BOSWELL.

SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS. "Yes, they do for the time." JOHNSON. "For the time! If they care this minute, they forget it the next. And as for the good worthy man, how do you know he is good and worthy? No good and worthy man will insist upon another man's drinking wine. As to the wine twenty years in the cellar,—of ten men, three say this, merely because they must say something; three are telling a lie, when they say they have had the wine twenty years; three would rather save the wine; one, perhaps, cares. I allow it is something to please one's company; and people are always pleased with those who partake pleasure with them. But after a man has brought himself to relinquish the great personal pleasure which arises from drinking wine, any other consideration is a trifle. To please others by drinking wine, is something only, if there be nothing against it. I should, however, be sorry to offend worthy men:—

'Curst be the verse, how well soe'er it flow,
That tends to make one worthy man my foe.'

BOSWELL. "Curst be the spring, the water." JOHNSON. "But let us consider what a sad thing it would be, if we were obliged to drink or do any thing else that may happen to be agreeable to the company where we are." LANGTON. "By the same rule, you must join with a gang of cut-purses." JOHNSON. "Yes, Sir; but yet we must do justice to wine: we must allow it the power it possesses. To make a man pleased with himself, let me tell you, is doing a very great thing;—

'Si patriæ volumnus, si nobis vivere cari.'

I was at this time myself a water-drinker, upon trial, by Johnson's commendation. JOHNSON. "Boswell is a bolder combatant than Sir Joshua: he argues for wine without the help of wine; but Sir Joshua with it." SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS. "But to please one's company is a strong motive." JOHNSON (who, from drinking only water, supposed every body who drank wine to be elevated). "I won't argue any more with you, Sir. You are too far gone." SIR JOSHUA. "I should have thought so indeed, Sir, had I made such a speech as you have now done." JOHNSON (drawing himself in, and, I really thought, blushing). "Nay, don't be angry. I did not mean to offend you." SIR JOSHUA. "At first the taste of wine was disagreeable to me; but I brought myself to drink it, that I might be like other people. The pleasure of drinking wine is so connected with pleasing your company, that altogether there is something of social goodness in it." JOHNSON. "Sir, this is only saying the same thing over again." SIR JOSHUA. "No, this is new." JOHNSON. "You put it in new words, but it is an old thought. This is one of the disadvantages of wine, it makes a man mistake words for thoughts." BOSWELL. "I think it is a new thought; at least, it is in a new attitude." JOHNSON. "Nay, Sir, it is only in a new coat; or an old coat with a new facing." Then, laughing heartily: "It is the old dog in the new doublet. An extraordinary instance, however, may occur, where a man's patron will do nothing for him, unless he will drink: there may be a good reason for drinking."

I mentioned a nobleman, who I believed was really uneasy if his company would not drink hard. JOHNSON. "That is from having had people about him whom he has been accustomed to command." BOSWELL. "Supposing I should be tête-à-tête with him at table?" JOHNSON. "Sir, there is no more reason for your drinking with him, than his being sober with you." BOSWELL. "Why, that is true; for it would do him less hurt to be sober, than it would do me to get drunk." JOHNSON. "Yes, Sir; and from what I have heard of him, one would not wish to sacrifice himself to such a man. If he must always have somebody to drink with him, he should buy a slave, and then he would be sure to have it. They who submit to drink as another pleases, make themselves his slaves." BOSWELL. "But, Sir, you will surely make allowance for the duty of hospitality. A gentleman who loves drinking, comes to visit me." JOHNSON. "Sir, a man knows whom he visits; he comes to the table of a sober man." BOSWELL. "But, Sir, you and I should not have been so well received in the Highlands and Hebrides, if I had not drunk with our worthy friends. Had I drunk water only as you did, they would not have been so cordial." JOHNSON. "Sir William Temple mentions, that in his travels through the Netherlands he had two or three gentlemen with him; and when a bumper was necessary, he put it on them. Were I to travel again through the islands, I would have Sir Joshua with me to take the bumpers." BOSWELL. "But, Sir, let me put a case. Suppose Sir Joshua should take a jaunt into Scotland; he does me the honour to pay me a visit at my house in the country; I am overjoyed at seeing him; we are quite by ourselves: shall I unsociably and churlishly let him sit drinking by himself? No, no, my dear Sir Joshua, you shall not be treated so; I will take a bottle with you."

The celebrated Mrs. Rudd<sup>2</sup> being mentioned: JOHNSON. "Fifteen years ago, I should have gone to see her." SPORTISWOODE. "Because she was fifteen years younger?" JOHNSON. "No, Sir; but now they have a trick of putting every thing into the newspapers."

He begged of General Paoli to repeat one of the introductory stanzas of the first book of <sup>1</sup> "If we would live within our proper sphere, Dear to ourselves, and to our country dear."

—Francis.—C.

<sup>2</sup> See anté, p. 518. n. 2.—C.

Tasso's "Jerusalem," which he did; and then Johnson found fault with the simile of sweetening the edges of a cup for a child<sup>1</sup>, being transferred from Lucretius into an epic poem. The General said he did not imagine Homer's poetry was so ancient as is supposed, because he ascribes to a Greek colony circumstances of refinement not found in Greece itself at a later period, when Thucydides wrote.<sup>2</sup> JOHNSON. "I recollect but one passage quoted by Thucydides from Homer, which is not to be found in our copies of Homer's works; I am for the antiquity of Homer, and think that a Grecian colony, by being nearer Persia, might be more refined than the mother country."

On Wednesday, April 29., I dined with him at Mr. Allan Ramsay's, where were Lord Binning, Dr. Robertson the historian, Sir Joshua Reynolds, and the Honourable Mrs. Boscawen<sup>3</sup>, widow of the Admiral, and mother of the present Viscount Falmouth; of whom, if it be not presumptuous in me to praise her, I would say, that her manners are the most agreeable, and her conversation the best, of any lady with whom I ever had the happiness to be acquainted. Before Johnson came, we talked a good deal of him. Ramsay said, he had always found him a very polite man, and that he treated him with great respect, which he did very sincerely. I said, I worshipped him. ROBERTSON. "But some of you spoil him: you should not worship him; you should worship no man." BOSWELL. "I cannot help worshipping him, he is so much superior to other men." ROBERTSON. "In criticism, and in wit and conversation, he is, no doubt, very excellent; but in other respects he is not above other men: he will believe any thing, and will strenuously defend the most minute circumstance connected with the church of England." BOSWELL. "Believe me, Doctor, you are much mistaken as to this; for when you talk with him calmly in private, he is very liberal in his way of thinking." ROBERTSON. "He and I have been always very gracious: the first time I met him was one evening at Strahan's, when he had just had an unlucky altercation with Adam Smith<sup>4</sup>, to whom he had been so rough, that Strahan, after Smith was gone, had remonstrated with him, and told him that I was coming soon, and that he was uneasy to think that he might behave in the same manner to me. 'No, no, Sir (said Johnson), I warrant you, Robertson and I shall do very well.' Accordingly he was gentle and good-humoured and courteous with me, the whole evening and he has been so upon every occasion that we have met since. I have often said (laughing), that I have been in a great measure indebted to Smith for my good reception. BOSWELL. "His power of reasoning is very strong, and he has a peculiar art of drawing characters, which is as rare as good portrait painting." SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS. "He is undoubtedly admirable in this; but, in order to mark the characters which he draws, he overcharges them, and gives people more than they really have, whether of good or bad."

No sooner did he, of whom we had been thus talking so easily, arrive, than we were all quiet as a school upon the entrance of the head master; and we very soon sat down to a table covered with such a variety of good things, and contributed not a little to dispose him to be pleased.

RAMSAY. "I am old enough<sup>5</sup> to have been a contemporary of Pope. His poetry was highly admired in his life-time, more a great deal than after his death." JOHNSON. "Sir it has not been less admired since his death: no authors ever had so much fame in their own life-time as Pope and Voltaire; and Pope's poetry has been as much admired since his death as during his life: it has only not been as much talked of; but that is owing to its being now more distant, and people having other writings to talk of. Virgil is less talked of than Pope, and Homer is less talked of than Virgil; but they are not less admired. We must read what the world reads at the present time. It has been maintained that this superfluity, this teeming of the press in modern times, is prejudicial to good literature, because it obliges us to read so much of what is of inferior value, in order to be in the fashion so that better works are neglected for want of time, because a man will have more gratification of his vanity in conversation, from having read modern books, than from having read the best works of antiquity. But it must be considered, that we have now more knowledge generally diffused: all our ladies read now which is a great extension. Modern writers are the moons of literature; they shine with reflected light, with light borrowed from the ancients. Greece appears to me to be the fountain of knowledge; Rome of elegance." RAMSAY. "I suppose Homer's 'Iliad' to be a collection of pieces which had been written before his time. I should like to see a tra-

<sup>1</sup> The passages are in the Jerusalem, canto i. st. 3., and in Lucretius, l. 935., and again, iv. 12. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> The quotations in the third book of Thucydides are not from the Iliad or Odyssey, but from the Hymn to Apollo, attributed to Homer. It is, as Lord Aberdeen observes to me, remarkable that the most judicious of the Greek historians should have quoted this hymn, not only without expressing any doubt of its authenticity, but as historical proof, — more especially as in the first book of his History there is great evidence of a real spirit of inquiry, and of something like the philosophical criticism of modern times." — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>3</sup> Frances, daughter of William Evelyn Glanville, Esq. married, in 1742, to Admiral Boscawen. She died in 1750. This excellent and highly-gifted lady makes a considerable figure in the correspondence of Mrs. Montagu, Mrs. Carter, and Hannah More. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> This, probably, was the scene, the exaggeration or representation of which may have given rise to Professor Miller's scandalous anecdote. See antiq. p. 293. n. 1. — CROKER.

<sup>5</sup> Mr. Ramsay was at least 31 (antiq. p. 575. n. 3) at Pope's death. — CROKER.

lation of it in poetical prose, like the book of Ruth or Job." ROBERTSON. "Would you, Dr. Johnson, who are a master of the English language, but try your hand upon a part of it?" JOHNSON. "Sir, you would not read it without the pleasure of verse."<sup>1</sup>

We talked of antiquarian researches. JOHNSON. "All that is really known of the ancient state of Britain is contained in a few pages. We can know no more than what the old writers have told us; yet what large books have we upon it, the whole of which, excepting such parts as are taken from those old writers, is all a dream, such as Whitaker's 'Manchester.' I have heard Henry's 'History of Britain' well spoken of; I am told it is carried on in separate divisions, as the civil, the military, the religious history. I wish much to have one branch well done, and that is the history of manners, of common life." ROBERTSON. "Henry should have applied his attention to that alone, which is enough for any man; and he might have found a great deal scattered in various books, had he read solely with that view. Henry erred in not selling his first volume at a moderate price to the booksellers, that they might have pushed him on till he had got reputation. I sold my 'History of Scotland at a moderate price, as a work by which the booksellers might either gain or not; and Cadell has told me, that Millar and he have got six thousand pounds by it. I afterwards received a much higher price for my writings. An author should sell his first work for what the booksellers will give, till it shall appear whether he is an author of merit, or, which is the same thing as to purchase-money, an author who pleases the public."

Dr. Robertson expatiated on the character of a certain nobleman [Lord Clive]; that he was one of the strongest-minded men that ever lived; that he would sit in company quite sluggish, while there was nothing to call forth his intellectual vigour; but the moment that any important subject was started, for instance, how this country is to be defended against a French invasion, he would rouse himself, and show his extraordinary talents, with the most powerful ability and animation. JOHNSON. "Yet this man cut his own throat. The true strong and sound mind is the mind that can embrace equally great things and small. Now, I am told the King of Prussia will say to a servant, 'Bring me a bottle of such a wine, which came in such a year; it lies in such a corner of the cellars.' I would have a man great in great things, and elegant in little things." He said to me afterwards, when we were by ourselves, "Robertson was in a mighty romantic humour; he talked of one whom he did not know; but I downed him with the King of Prussia." "Yes, Sir," said I, "you threw a bottle at his head."

An ingenious gentleman was mentioned, concerning whom both Robertson and Ramsay agreed that he had a constant firmness of mind; for, after a laborious day, and amidst a multiplicity of cares and anxieties, he would sit down with his sisters, and be quite cheerful and good-humoured. Such a disposition, it was observed, was the happy gift of nature. JOHNSON. "I do not think so: a man has from nature a certain portion of mind; the use he makes of it depends upon his own free will. That a man has always the same firmness of mind, I do not say: because every man feels his mind less firm at one time than another; but I think, a man's being in a good or bad humour depends upon his will."<sup>2</sup> I, however, could not help thinking that a man's humour is often uncontrollable by his will.

Johnson harangued against drinking wine. "A man," said he, "may choose whether he will have abstemiousness and knowledge, or claret and ignorance." Dr. Robertson (who is very companionable) was beginning to dissent as to the proscription of claret. JOHNSON (with a placid smile). "Nay, Sir, you shall not differ with me; as I have said that the man is most perfect who takes in the most things, I am for knowledge and claret." ROBERTSON (holding a glass of generous claret in his hand). "Sir, I can only drink your health." JOHNSON. "Sir, I should be sorry if you should be ever in such a state as to be able to do nothing more." ROBERTSON. "Dr. Johnson, allow me to say, that in one respect I have the advantage of you: when you were in Scotland you would not come to hear any of our preachers; whereas, when I am here, I attend your public worship without scruple, and, indeed, with great satisfaction." JOHNSON. "Why, Sir, that is not so extraordinary: the King of Siam sent ambassadors to Louis the Fourteenth, but Louis the Fourteenth sent none to the King of Siam."<sup>3</sup>

Here my friend for once discovered a want of knowledge or forgetfulness; for Louis the Fourteenth did send an embassy to the King of Siam<sup>4</sup>, and the Abbé Choisi, who was em-

<sup>1</sup> This experiment, which Madame Dacler made in vain, has since been tried in our own language, by the editor of "Osian;" and we must either think very meanly of his abilities, or allow that Dr. Johnson was in the right. And Mr. Cowper, a man of real genius, has miserably failed in his blank verse translation.—BOSWELL. It is the fashion to call Swepser's a miserable failure, and by the side of Pope's sweetness and brilliancy it undoubtedly seems deficient in both euphony and splendour. Like an engraving, or sepia sketch of a fine picture, the outline is exact, but the charm of the colouring is absent. It is, however, the nearest portrait we have of Homer, and the more one reads it, the better it seems.—CROKER, 1835.

<sup>2</sup> I know not that there is on record a more striking instance of the contrary of this proposition than Johnson himself—much of whose "bad humour" was undoubtedly constitutional.—CROKER, 1847.

<sup>3</sup> Mrs. Piozzi confidently mentions this as having passed in Scotland.—Anecdotes, p. 62.—BOSWELL. Johnson himself told her the story, but whether it had happened in London or in Edinburgh, he probably did not state; nor does it in the least degree signify.—CROKER, 1847.

<sup>4</sup> The Abbé de Choisi was sent by Louis XIV. on an embassy to the King of Siam in 1683, with a view, it has been said, to convert the king of the country to Christianity.—MALONE. The Chevalier de Chamont was the ambassador:

ployed in it, published an account of it in two volumes.

Next day, Thursday, April 30.<sup>1</sup>, I found him at home by himself. JOHNSON. "Well, Sir, Ramsay gave us a splendid dinner. I love Ramsay. You will not find a man in whose conversation there is more instruction, more information, and more elegance, than in Ramsay's. BOSWELL. "What I admire in Ramsay, is his continuing to be so young." JOHNSON. "Why, yes, Sir, it is to be admired. I value myself upon this, that there is nothing of the old man in my conversation. I am now sixty-eight, and I have no more of it than at twenty-eight." BOSWELL. "But, Sir, would not you wish to know old age? He who is never an old man, does not know the whole of human life; for old age is one of the divisions of it." JOHNSON. "Nay, Sir, what talk is this?" BOSWELL. "I mean, Sir, the Sphinx's description of it:—morning, noon, and night. I would know night, as well as morning and noon." JOHNSON. "What, Sir, would you know what it is to feel the evils of old age? Would you have the gout? Would you have decrepitude?" Seeing him heated, I would not argue any farther; but I was confident that I was in the right. I would, in due time, be a Nestor, an elder of the people; and there should be some difference between the conversation of twenty-eight and sixty-eight.<sup>2</sup> A grave picture should not be gay. There is a serene, solemn, placid old age. JOHNSON. "Mrs. Thrale's mother said of me what flattered me much. A clergyman was complaining of want of society in the country where he lived; and said, 'They talk of runts (that is, young cows).'<sup>3</sup> 'Sir (said Mrs. Salusbury), Mr. Johnson would learn to talk of runts;' meaning that I was a man who would make the most of my situation, whatever I was." He added, "I think myself a very polite man."

On Saturday, May 2., I dined with him at Sir Joshua Reynolds's, where there was a very large company, and a great deal of conversation; but, owing to some circumstance which I cannot now recollect, I have no record of any part of it, except that there were several people there by no means of the Johnsonian school; so that less attention was paid to him than usual, which put him out of humour: and upon some imaginary offence<sup>4</sup> from me, he attacked me with such rudeness, that I was vexed and angry, because it gave those persons an opportunity of enlarging upon his supposed ferocity, and ill treatment of his best friends. I was so much hurt, and had my pride so much roused, that I kept away from him for a week; and, perhaps, might have kept away much longer, nay, gone to Scotland without seeing him again, had not we fortunately met and been reconciled. To such unhappy chances are human friendships liable.

On Friday, May 8., I dined with him at Mr. Langton's. I was reserved and silent, which I suppose he perceived, and might recollect the cause. After dinner, when Mr. Langton was called out of the room, and we were by ourselves, he drew his chair near to mine, and said, in a tone of conciliating courtesy, "Well, how have you done?" BOSWELL. "Sir, you have made me very uneasy by your behaviour to me when we were last at Sir Joshua Reynolds's. You know, my dear Sir, no man has a greater respect and affection for you, or would sooner go to the end of the world to serve you. Now, to treat me so—." He insisted that I had interrupted, which I assured him was not the case; and proceeded—"But why treat me so before people who neither love you nor me?" JOHNSON. "Well, I am sorry for it. I'll make it up to you twenty different ways, as you please." BOSWELL. "I said today to Sir Joshua, when he observed that you tossed me sometimes, I don't care how often or how high he tosses me, when only friends are present, for then I fall upon soft ground; but I do not like falling on stones, which is the case when enemies are present. I think this a pretty good image, Sir." JOHNSON. "Sir, it is one of the happiest I have ever heard."<sup>5</sup>

The truth is, there was no venom in the wounds which he inflicted at any time, unless they were irritated by some malignant infusor the Abbé de Choisi was, as Boswell correctly states, only "employed in it," and it was in return of this mission that the King of Spain sent his embassy to Louis.—CROKER.

<sup>1</sup> Dr. Johnson's own account of his dinner engagements this week shows a more extensive dining out than Boswell mentions, or perhaps was fully aware of.

"April 30, 1778. Since I was fetched away from Streatham, the Journal [of engagements] stands thus: Saturday [2d of May], Sir Joshua; Sunday, Mr. Hoole; Monday, Lord Lucan; Tuesday, Gen. Paoli; Wednesday, Mr. Ramsay; Thursday, Old Bailey; Friday, Club; Saturday, Sir Joshua; Sunday, Lady Lucan. Monday, pray let it be Streatham, and very early; do, now, let it be very early; for I may be carried away—just like Ganymede of Troy. Do, now, let me know whether you will send for me—early—on Monday. But take some care, or your letter will not come till Tuesday."

—Letters. The dinner at the Old Bailey is one given during the Sessions to the judges, counsel, and a few guests. The venerable Mr. Clarke, Chamberlain of London, who died in 1831, in his ninety-third year, told me that he remembered having taken Johnson to this dinner, he being then sheriff. The judges were Blackstone and Eyre. Mr. Justice Blackstone conversed with Johnson on the subject of their absent friend, Sir Robert Chambers.—CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> Johnson clearly meant (what the author has often elsewhere mentioned), that he had none of the listlessness of old age; that he had the same activity and energy of mind, as formerly; not that a man of sixty-eight might dance in a public assembly with as much propriety as he could at twenty-eight. His conversation being the product of much various knowledge, great acuteness, and extraordinary wit, was equally well suited to every period of life; and as in his youth it probably did not exhibit any unbecoming levity, so certain in his later years it was totally free from the garulity and querulousness of old age.—MALONE.

<sup>3</sup> Such is the signification of this word in Scotland, and it should seem, in Wales. (See Skinner in v.) But the heifer of Scotland and Wales, when brought to England, being always smaller than those of this country, the word runt has acquired a secondary sense, and generally signifies a heifer diminutive in size, small beyond the ordinary growth of the animal; and in this sense alone the word is acknowledged by Dr. Johnson in his Dictionary.—MALONE.

<sup>4</sup> Lord Wellesley had heard [that this quarrel was about the "place in the Duciad"]—see anté, p. 203.; but that was several years earlier; this affair was something more serious.—CROKER.

<sup>5</sup> The simplicity with which Boswell repeats this flattery, without seeing that it was only a peccé-àffring, and a clumsy one too, is very characteristic and amusing.—CROKER.

by other hands. We were instantly as cordial again as ever, and joined in hearty laugh at some ludicrous but innocent peculiarities of one of our friends. BOSWELL. "Do you think, Sir, it is always culpable to laugh at a man to his face?" JOHNSON. "Why, Sir, that depends upon the man and the thing. If it is a slight man, and a slight thing, you may; for you take nothing valuable from him."

He said, "I read yesterday Dr. Blair's sermon on devotion, from the text, 'Cornelius, a devout man.' His doctrine is the best limited, the best expressed: there is the most warmth without fanaticism, the most rational transport. There is one part of it which I disapprove, and I'd have him correct it; which is, that 'he who does not feel joy in religion is far from the kingdom of heaven!' There are many good men whose fear of God predominates over their love. It may discourage. It was rashly said.<sup>1</sup> A noble sermon it is indeed. I wish Blair would come over to the church of England."

When Mr. Langton returned to us, the "flow of talk went on." An eminent author<sup>2</sup> being mentioned: JOHNSON. "He is not a pleasant man. His conversation is neither instructive nor brilliant. He does not talk as if impelled by any fulness of knowledge or vivacity of imagination. His conversation is like that of any other sensible man. He talks with no wish either to inform or to hear, but only because he thinks it does not become [Dr. Robertson] to sit in a company and say nothing."

Mr. Langton having repeated the anecdote of Addison<sup>3</sup> having distinguished between his powers in conversation and in writing, by saying, "I have only ninepence in my pocket; but I can draw for a thousand pounds;"—JOHNSON. "He had not that retort ready, Sir; he had prepared it beforehand." LANGTON (turning to me). "A fine surmise. Set a thief to catch a thief."

Johnson called the East Indians barbarians. BOSWELL. "You will except the Chinese, Sir?" JOHNSON. "No, Sir." BOSWELL. "Have they not arts?" JOHNSON. "They have pottery." BOSWELL. "What do you say to the written characters of their language?" JOHNSON. "Sir, they have not an alphabet. They have not been able to form what all other nations have formed." BOSWELL. "There is more learning in their language than in any other, from the immense number of their characters." JOHNSON. "It is only more difficult from its rudeness; as there is more labour in hewing down a tree with a stone than with an axe."

He said, "I have been reading Lord Kames's 'Sketches of the History of Man.' In treating of severity of punishment, he mentions that of Madame Laponehin, in Russia, but he does not give it fairly; for I have looked at Chappe D'Auteroche<sup>4</sup>, from whom he has taken it. He stops where it is said that the spectators thought her innocent, and leaves out what follows,—that she nevertheless was guilty. Now this is being as culpable as one can conceive, to misrepresent fact in a book; and for what motive?<sup>5</sup> It is like one of those lies which people tell, one cannot see why. The woman's life was spared; and no punishment was too great for the favourite of an empress, who had conspired to dethrone her mistress." BOSWELL. "He was only giving a picture of the lady in her sufferings." JOHNSON. "Nay, don't endeavour to palliate this. Guilt is a principal feature in the picture. Kames is puzzled with a question that puzzled me when I was a very young man. Why is it that the interest of money is lower, when money is plentiful; for five pounds has the same proportion of value to a hundred pounds when money is plentiful, as when it is scarce? A lady explained it to me. It is (said she) because when money is plentiful there are so many more who have money to lend, that they bid down one another. Many have then a hundred pounds; and one says—Take mine rather than another's, and you shall have it at four per cent." BOSWELL. "Does Lord Kames decide the question?" JOHNSON. "I think he leaves it as he found it."<sup>6</sup> BOSWELL. "This must have been an extraordinary lady who instructed you, Sir. May I ask who she was?" JOHNSON. "Molly Aston<sup>7</sup>, Sir, the sister of <sup>1</sup> The passage referred to is, "Of what nature must that man's religion be, who professes to worship God and to believe in Christ, and yet raises his thoughts towards God and his Saviour without any warmth of gratitude or love? This is not the man whom you would choose for your bosom friend, or whose heart you would expect to answer with reciprocal warmth to yours; such a person must as yet be far from the kingdom of heaven."—Blair's Sermons, vol. i. p. 261. Dr. Johnson's remark is certainly just; and it may be, moreover, observed that, from Blair's expressions, and his reverence to human friendships and affections, he might be understood to mean, that unless we feel the same kind of warmth and affection towards God that we do towards the objects of human love, we are far from the kingdom of heaven—a doctrine which would countenance fanaticism, and which every sober-minded Christian feels to be a mere play on words; for the love of God and the love of one's wife or friend are certainly not the same passion.—CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> No doubt Dr. Robertson.—CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> Which Johnson repeated, with a slight variation, in his Life of Addison.—CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> "Journey into Siberia, made by order of the King of France; published in 1768."—CROKER.

<sup>5</sup> The passage is to be found in b. i. sk. 5. The suppression was very blameable, but not quite to the degree that Johnson represents it, for Lord Kames did not profess to discuss the guilt or innocence of the party, but instanced the punishment as an example of unjustifiable barbarity, even if she were guilty.—CROKER.

<sup>6</sup> Here I think the censure is quite unjust; Lord Kames gives in the clearest terms the same explanation: "Many lenders and few borrowers produce high interest; many lenders and few borrowers produce a low interest." b. i. s. 3.—CROKER.

<sup>7</sup> Johnson had an extraordinary admiration of this lady, notwithstanding she was a violent whig. In answer to her high-flown speeches for liberty, he addressed to her the following epigram, of which I presume to offer a translation.

"Liber ut esse velim, suasisti pulchra Maria, Ut maneam liber—pulchra Maria, vale!"

Adieu, Maria! since you'd have me free:
For, who beholds thy charms, a slave must be.

A correspondent of The Gentleman's Magazine, who subscribes himself SCIOLUS, to whom I am indebted for those ladies with whom you dined at Lichfield. — I shall be at home to-morrow." BOSWELL. "Then let us dine by ourselves at the Mitre, to keep up the old custom — 'custom of the manor,' custom of the Mitre." JOHNSON. "Sir, so it shall be."

On Saturday, May 9th, we fulfilled our purpose of dining by ourselves at the Mitre, according to the old custom. There was, on these occasions, a little circumstance of kind attention to Mrs. Williams, which must not be omitted. Before coming out, and leaving her to dine alone, he gave her her choice of a chicken, a sweetbread, or any other little nice thing, which was carefully sent to her from the tavern ready drest.

Our conversation to-day, I know not how, turned, I think, for the only time at any length, during our long acquaintance, upon the sensual intercourse between the sexes, the delight of which he ascribed chiefly to imagination. "Were it not for imagination, Sir," said he, "a man would be as happy in the arms of a chambermaid as of a duchess. But such is the adventitious charm of fancy, that we find men who have violated the best principles of society, and ruined their fame and their fortune, that they might possess a woman of rank." It would not be proper to record the particulars of such a conversation in moments of unreserved frankness, when nobody was present on whom it could have any hurtful effect. That subject, when philosophically treated, may surely employ the mind in a curious discussion, and as innocently as anatomy; provided that those who do treat it keep clear of inflammatory incentives.

"From grave to gay, from lively to severe," — we were soon engaged in very different speculation; humbly and reverently considering and wondering at the universal mystery of all things, as our imperfect faculties can now judge of them. "There are," said he, "innumerable questions to which the inquisitive mind can in this state receive no answer: Why do you and I exist? Why was this world created? Since it was to be created, why was it not created sooner?"

On Sunday, May 10th, I supped with him at several excellent remarks, observes, "The turn of Dr. Johnson's lines to Miss Aston, whose wile principles he had been combating, appears to me to be taken from an ingenious epigram in the 'Menagiana,' vol. iii. p. 376. edit. 1716, on a young lady who appeared at a masquerade, habillée en Jesuite, during the fierce contentions of the followers of the Molinos and Jansenius concerning free-will:

"On s'étonne ici que Caliste
Ait pris l'habit de Moliniste.
Puisque cette jeune beauté
Ote a chacun sa liberté
N'est-ce pas une Janseniste?" — BOSWELL.

See anté, p. 40., where I have ventured to anticipate Boswell by a more literal translation of the epigram.

"Molly," said Dr. Johnson to Mrs. Thrale, "was a beauty and a scholar, and a wit and a whig; and she talked all in praise of liberty: and so I made that epigram upon her. She was the loveliest creature I ever saw!"

"His wife," he added, "was a little jealous of this attachment, and happening one day, when walking in the country,

Mr. Hoole's, with Sir Joshua Reynolds. I have neglected the memorial of this evening, so as to remember no more of it than two particulars: one, that he strenuously opposed an argument by Sir Joshua, that virtue was preferable to vice, considering this life only; and that a man would be virtuous were it only to preserve his character: and that he expressed much wonder at the curious formation of the bat, a mouse with wings; saying, that it was almost as strange a thing in physiology, as if the fabulous dragon could be seen.

On Tuesday, May 12th, I waited on the Earl of Marchmont, to know if his lordship would favour Dr. Johnson with information concerning Pope, whose Life he was about to write. Johnson had not flattered himself with the hopes of receiving any civility from this nobleman; for he said to me, when I mentioned Lord Marchmont as one who could tell him a great deal about Pope, — "Sir, he will tell me nothing." I had the honour of being known to his lordship, and applied to him of myself, without being commissioned by Johnson. His lordship behaved in the most polite and obliging manner, promised to tell all he recollected about Pope, and was so very courteous as to say, "Tell Dr. Johnson I have a great respect for him, and am ready to show it in any way I can. I am to be in the city to-morrow, and will call at his house as I return." His lordship however asked, "Will he write the 'Lives of the Poets' impartially? He was the first that brought Whig and Tory into a dictionary. And what do you think of the definition of Exeise? Do you know the history of his aversion to the word transpire?" Then taking down the folio Dictionary, he showed it with this censure on its secondary sense. "To escape from secrecy to notice; a sense lately innovated from France, without necessity."<sup>2</sup> "The truth was, Lord Bolingbroke, who left the Jacobites, first used it; therefore it was to be condemned. He should have shown what word would do for it, if it was unnecessary." I afterwards put the question to Johnson: "Why, Sir," said he, "get abroad." BOSWELL. "That, Sir, is using two words." JOHNSON. "Sir, there is no end to to meet a fortune-telling gipsy, Mrs. Johnson made the wench look at his hand, but soon repented her curiosity; for says the gipsy, "your heart is divided, Sir, between a Betty and a Molly: Betty loves you best, but you take most delight in Molly's company: when I turned about to laugh, I saw my wife was crying. Pretty charmer! she had no reason!" Anecdotes. — CROKER.

<sup>1</sup> Johnson was under an engagement to dine with Sir Joshua on this day, but was no doubt induced to break it off to please Boswell after their quarrel, which perhaps had prevented Boswell being invited to Sir Joshua's. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>2</sup> The figurative use of transpire seems indicated in the World of Words, a dictionary published by Phillips, Milton nephew, 100 years before. Johnson's awkward substitute "get abroad" does not seem to express exactly the same meaning: a secret may get abroad by design, by accident, by breach of confidence; but it is said to transpire when it becomes known by small indirect circumstances — by symptoms — by whispers. Transpire has now got into vulgar and improper use, for happening or occurring. — CROKER.

this. You may as well insist to have a word for old age." BOSWELL. "Well, Sir, senectus." JOHNSON. "Nay, Sir, to insist always that there should be one word to express a thing in English, because there is one in another language<sup>1</sup>, is to change the language."

I availed myself of this opportunity to hear from his lordship many particulars both of Pope and Lord Bolingbroke, which I have in writing.

I proposed to Lord Marchmont, that he should revise Johnson's Life of Pope: "So," said his lordship, "you would put me in a dangerous situation. You know he knocked down Osborne, the bookseller."<sup>2</sup>

Elated with the success of my spontaneous exertion to procure material and respectable aid to Johnson for his very favourite work, "the Lives of the Poets," I hastened down to Mr. Thrale's, at Streatham, where he now was, that I might insure his being at home next day; and after dinner, when I thought he would receive the good news in the best humour, I announced it eagerly: "I have been at work for you to-day, Sir. I have been with Lord Marchmont. He bade me tell you he has a great respect for you, and will call on you to-morrow at one o'clock, and communicate all he knows about Pope." Here I paused, in full expectation that he would be pleased with this intelligence, would praise my active merit, and would be alert to embrace such an offer from a nobleman. But whether I had shown an over exultation, which provoked his spleen; or whether he was seized with a suspicion that I had obtruded him on Lord Marchmont, and humbled him too much, or whether there was any thing more than an unlucky fit of ill humour, I know not; but to my surprise the result was, — JOHNSON. "I shall not be in town to-morrow. I don't care to know about Pope." MRS. THRALE (surprised, as I was, and a little angry). "I suppose, Sir, Mr. Boswell thought, that as you are to write Pope's Life, you would wish to know about him." JOHNSON. "Wish! why yes. If it rained knowledge, I'd hold out my hand; but I would not give myself the trouble to go in quest of it." There was no arguing with him at the moment. Some time afterwards he said, "Lord Marchmont will call on me, and then I shall call on Lord Marchmont." Mrs. Thrale was uneasy at this unaccountable<sup>3</sup> caprice; and told me, that if I did not take care to bring about a meeting between Lord Marchmont and him, it would never take place, which would be a great pity. I sent a card to his lordship, to be left at Johnson's house, acquainting him, that Dr. Johnson could not be in town next day, but would do himself the honour of waiting on him at another time. I give this account fairly, as a specimen of that unhappy temper with which this great and good man had occasionally to struggle, from something morbid in his constitution. Let the most censorious of my readers suppose himself to have a violent fit of the toothache, or to have received a severe stroke on the shin-bone, and when in such a state to be asked a question; and if he has any candour, he will not be surprised at the answers which Johnson sometimes gave in moments of irritation, which, let me assure them, is exquisitely painful. But it must not be erroneously supposed that he was, in the smallest degree, careless concerning any work which he undertook, or that he was generally thus peevish. It will be seen that in the following year he had a very agreeable interview with Lord Marchmont at his lordship's house; and this very afternoon he soon forgot any fretfulness, and fell into conversation as usual.

I mentioned a reflection having been thrown out against four peers for having presumed to rise in opposition to the opinion of the twelve judges, in a cause in the House of Lords<sup>4</sup>, as if that were indecent. JOHNSON. "Sir, there is no ground for censure. The peers are judges themselves: and supposing them really to be of a different opinion, they might from duty be in opposition to the judges who were there only to be consulted."

In this observation I fully concurred with him; for, unquestionably, all the peers are vested with the highest judicial powers; and when they are confident that they understand a cause, are not obliged, nay, ought not to acquiesce in the opinion of the ordinary law judges, or even in that of those who from their studies and experience are called the law lords. I consider the peers in general as I do a jury, who ought to listen with respectful attention to the sages of the law; but if, after hearing them, they have a firm opinion of their own, are bound, as honest men, to decide accordingly. Nor is it so difficult for them to understand even law questions as is generally thought, provided they will bestow sufficient attention upon them. This observation was made by my honoured relation the late Lord Cathcart, who had spent his life in camps and courts; yet assured me, that he could form a clear opinion upon most of the causes that came before the House of Lords, "as they were so well enucleated in the Cases."

<sup>1</sup> This is not just. Lord Marchmont and Boswell argued for having one word for one idea, and when the idea is a simple one, common to all mankind, like old age, the language — and I know no other than the English — which has no single expression for it, is, so far, imperfect. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>2</sup> See ante, p. 46. — C.

<sup>3</sup> Not quite so unaccountable as Mr. Boswell seems to think. His intervention in this affair, unsolicited and unauthorised, exhibits the bustling vanity of his own character, and Johnson was unwilling to be dragged before Lord Marchmont by so headlong a master of the ceremonies. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> The occasion was Mr. Horne's writ of error. See ante, p. 602. n. 3. The four peers were the Duke of Richmond, and the Earls of Eppingham, Abingdon, and Harcourt. — C., 1835. There has been a more recent and important case, that of the Queen v. O'Connell, &c., Sept. 1844, in which the lay peers, as they are called, declined (I think wrongly) to vote, even though the judges were divided. — CROKER, 1847.

Mrs. Thrale told us, that a curious clergyman of our acquaintance had discovered a licentious stanza, which Pope had originally in his "Universal Prayer," before the stanza, —

"What conscience dictates to be done,
Or warns us not to do," &c.

It was this: —

"Can sins of moment claim the rod
Of everlasting fires?
And that offend great Nature's God
Which Nature's self inspires?"

and that Dr. Johnson observed, it had been borrowed from Guarini.<sup>1</sup> There are, indeed, in Pastor Fido, many such flimsy superficial reasonings as that in the last two lines of this stanza.

BOSWELL. "In that stanza of Pope's, 'rod of fires' is certainly a bad metaphor." MRS. THRALE. "And 'sins of moment' is a faulty expression; for its true import is momentous, which cannot be intended." JOHNSON. "It must have been written 'of moments.' Of moment, is momentous; of moments, momentary. I warrant you, however, Pope wrote this stanza, and some friend struck it out. Boileau wrote some such thing, and Arnaud struck it out, saying, 'Vous gagnerez deux ou trois impies, et perdrez je ne sçais combien d'honnêtes gens.' These fellows want to say a daring thing, and don't know how to go about it. Mere poets know no more of fundamental principles than —." Here he was interrupted somehow. MRS. THRALE mentioned Dryden. JOHNSON. "He puzzled himself about predestination. How foolish was it in Pope to give all his friendship to lords, who thought they honoured him by being with him; and to choose such lords as Burlington, and Cobham, and Bolingbroke! Bathurst was negative, a pleasing man; and I have heard no ill of Marchmont. And then always saying, 'I do not value you for being a lord;' which was a sure proof that he did. I never say I do not value Boswell more for being born to an estate, because I do not care."<sup>1</sup> BOSWELL. "Nor for being a Scotchman?" "Nay, Sir, I do value you more for being a Scotchman. You are a Scotchman without the faults of Scotchmen. You would not have been so valuable as you are had you not been a Scotchman."

Talking of divorcees, I asked if Othello's doctrine was not plausible: —

"He that is robb'd, not wanting what is stolen, Let him not know 't, and he's not robb'd at all."

Dr. Johnson and Mrs. Thrale joined against this. JOHNSON. "Ask any man if he'd wish not to know of such an injury." BOSWELL. "Would you tell your friend to make him unhappy?" JOHNSON. "Perhaps, Sir, I should not; but that would be from prudence on my own account. A man would tell his father."

BOSWELL. "Yes; because he would not have spurious children to get any share of the family inheritance." MRS. THRALE. "Or he would tell his brother." BOSWELL. "Certainly his elder brother." JOHNSON. "You would tell your friend of a woman's infamy, to prevent his marrying a prostitute: there is the same reason to tell him of his wife's infidelity when he is married, to prevent the consequences of imposition. It is a breach of confidence not to tell a friend." BOSWELL. "Would you tell Mr. —?" (naming a gentleman<sup>2</sup> who assuredly was not in the least danger of such a miserable disgrace, though married to a fine woman.) JOHNSON. "No, Sir; because it would do no good: he is so sluggish, he'd never go to parliament and get through a divorcee."

He said of one of our friends, "He [Mr. Langton] is ruining himself without pleasure. A man who loses at play, or who runs out his fortune at court, makes his estate less, in hopes of making it bigger (I am sure of this word, which was often used by him): but it is a sad thing to pass through the quagmire of parsimony to the gulf of ruin. To pass over the flowery path of extravagance is very well."

Amongst the numerous prints pasted on the walls of the dining-room at Streatham was Hogarth's "Modern Midnight Conversation." I asked him what he knew of Parson Ford, who made a conspicuous figure in the riotous group.<sup>3</sup> JOHNSON. "Sir, he was my acquaintance and relation, my mother's nephew. He had purchased a living in the country, but not simoniacally. I never saw him but in the country. I have been told he was a man of great parts; very profligate, but I never heard he was impious." BOSWELL. "Was there not a story of his ghost having appeared?" JOHNSON. "Sir, it was believed. A waiter at the Hummums, in which house Ford died, had been absent for some time, and returned, not knowing that Ford was dead. Going down to the cellar, according to the story, he met him; going down again, he met him a second time. When he came up, he asked some of the people of the house what Ford could be doing there. They told him Ford was dead. The waiter took a fever, in which he lay for some time. When he recovered, he said he had a message to deliver to some women from Ford; but he was not to tell what, or to whom. He walked out; he was followed; but somewhere about St. Paul's they lost him. He came back, and said he had delivered the message, and the women exclaimed, 'Then we are all undone!' Dr Pellet, who was not a credulous man, inquired into the truth of this story, and he said the evidence was irresistible. My wife went to the Hummums; (it is a place where people get themselves cupped).<sup>1</sup> I believe she went with intention to hear about this story of Ford. At first they were unwilling to tell her; but, after they had talked to her, she came away satisfied that it was true. To be sure, the man had a fever; and this vision may have been the beginning of it. But if the message to the women, and their behaviour upon it, were true as related, there was something supernatural. That rests upon his word<sup>2</sup>; and there it remains."

<sup>1</sup> I, on the contrary, believe that Boswell's station in life had a greater influence with Johnson than he supposed. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>2</sup> I fear it will be but too evident at whose expense Mr. Boswell chose to make so offensive an hypothesis. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> The acquiescence of Johnson, on this occasion, seems to authenticate the fact, that Ford was Hogarth's riotous parson. See ante, p. 9. n. 6. — CROKER. Cornelius Ford was eldest son of Johnson's eldest uncle, Joseph Ford. He had an uncle also named Cornelius. — J. M.

After Mrs. Thrale was gone to bed, Johnson and I sat up late. We resumed Sir Joshua Reynolds's argument on the preceding Sunday, that a man would be virtuous, though he had no other motive than to preserve his character.

JOHNSON. "Sir, it is not true; for, as to this world, vice does not hurt a man's character."

BOSWELL. "Yes, Sir, debauching a friend's wife will." JOHNSON. "No, Sir. Who thinks the worse of [Beauclerk, p. 260.] for it?"

BOSWELL. "Lord [Bolingbroke] was not his friend." JOHNSON. "That is only a circumstance, Sir; a slight distinction. He could not get into the house but by Lord [Bolingbroke.] A man is chosen knight of the shire not the less for having debauched ladies."

BOSWELL. "What, Sir, if he debauched the ladies of gentlemen in the county, will not there be a general resentment against him?"

JOHNSON. "No, Sir. He will lose those particular gentlemen; but the rest will not trouble their heads about it" (warnily).

BOSWELL. "Well, Sir, I cannot think so." JOHNSON. "Nay, Sir, there is no talking with a man who will dispute what every body knows (angrily).

Don't you know this?" BOSWELL. "No, Sir; and I wish to think better of your country than you represent it. I knew in Scotland a gentleman obliged to leave it for debauching a lady; and in one of our counties an earl's brother lost his election because he had debauched the lady of another earl in that county, and destroyed the peace of a noble family."

Still he would not yield. He proceeded: "Will you not allow, Sir, that vice does not hurt a man's character so as to obstruct his prosperity in life, when you know that [Lord Clive, p. 609.] was loaded with wealth and honours? a man who had acquired his fortune by such crimes, that his consciousness of them impelled him to cut his own throat."

BOSWELL. "You will recollect, Sir, that Dr. Robertson said he cut his throat because he was weary of still life; little things not being sufficient to move his great mind." JOHNSON (very angry). "Nay, Sir, what stuff is this! You had no more this opinion after Robertson said it than before. I know nothing more offensive than repeating what one knows to be foolish things, by way of continuing a dispute, to see what a man will answer,—to make him your butt!" (angrier still.) BOSWELL. "My dear Sir, I had no such intention as you seem to suspect; I had not indeed. Might not this nobleman have felt every thing 'weary, stale, flat, and unprofitable,' as Hamlet says?" JOHNSON. "Nay, if you are to bring in gabble, I'll talk no more. I will not, upon my honour." My readers will decide upon this dispute.

CHAPTER LXVII.

1778—1779.

Lord Kames. — Sir George Villiers's Ghost. — Innate Virtue. — Native Modesty. — Foreign Travel. — Lord Charlemont. — Country Life. — Manners of the Great. — Horne's "Letter to Dr. Mead." — Dr. Mead. — Russelas and Candide. — Francis's Horace. — Modern Books of Travels. — Lord Chatham. — Vows. — Education. — Milton's "Tractate." — Locke. — Visit to Warley Camp. — Dr. Burney. — Sir Joshua Reynolds's "Discourses." — Publication of the "Lives of the Poets." — Death of Garrick. — Correspondence.

NEXT morning [13th May,] I stated to Mrs. Thrale at breakfast, before he came down, the dispute of last night as to the influence of character upon success in life. She said he was certainly wrong; and told me that a baronet lost an election in Wales because he had debauched the sister of a gentleman in the county, whom he made one of his daughters invite as her companion at his seat in the country, when his lady and his other children were in London. But she would not encounter Johnson upon the subject.

I staid all this day with him at Streatham. He talked a great deal in very good humour.

Looking at Messrs. Dilly's splendid edition of Lord Chesterfield's miscellaneous works, he laughed, and said, "Here are now two speeches ascribed to him, both of which were written by me: and the best of it is, they have found out that one is like Demosthenes, and the other like Cicero." [p. 45. n. 2.]

<sup>1</sup> Baths are called Hummums in the East, and thence these hotels in Covent Garden where there were hot water and vapour baths, were called by that name. — CROKER, 1817.

<sup>2</sup> Why should it? The women might have been examined. And who were they who satisfied Mrs. Johnson; and of what was she satisfied? And be it observed, Ford died in 1731, and Mrs. Johnson did not come to London for more than seven years later,—so that whatever she heard could not be very fresh in the recollection of the parties. It seems altogether a foolish story. — CROKER, 1847.

He censured Lord Kames's "Sketches of the History of Man," for misrepresenting Clarendon's account of the appearance of Sir George Villiers's ghost, as if Clarendon were weakly credulous; when the truth is, that Clarendon only says, that the story was upon a better foundation of credit than usually such discourses are founded upon; nay, speaks thus of the person who was reported to have seen the vision, "the poor man, if he had been at all waking;" which Lord Kames has omitted.<sup>1</sup> He added, "In this book it is maintained that virtue is natural to man, and that if we would but consult our own hearts we should be virtuous. Now, after consulting our own hearts all we can, and with all the helps we have, we find how few of us are virtuous. This is saying a thing which all mankind know not to be true." BOSWELL. "Is not modesty natural?"

JOHNSON. "I cannot say, Sir, as we find no people quite in a state of nature; but, I think, the more they are taught, the more modest they are. The French are a gross, ill-bred, untaught people; a lady there will spit on the floor and rub it with her foot. What I gained by being in France was, learning to be better satisfied with my own country. Time may be employed to more advantage from nineteen to twenty-four, almost in any way than in travelling. When you set travelling against mere negation, against doing nothing, it is better to be sure; but how much more would a young man improve were he to study during those years! Indeed, if a young man is wild, and must run after women and bad company, it is better this should be done abroad, as, on his return, he can break off such connections, and begin at home a new man, with a character to form, and acquaintance to make. How little does travelling supply to the conversation of any man who has travelled! how little to Beauclerk!" BOSWELL. "What say you to Lord [Charlemont]?" JOHNSON. "I never but once heard him talk of what he had seen, and that was of a large serpent in one of the pyramids of Egypt." BOSWELL. "Well, I happened to hear him tell the same thing, which made me mention him."<sup>2</sup>

I talked of a country life. JOHNSON. "Were I to live in the country, I would not devote myself to the acquisition of popularity; I would live in a much better way, much more happily; I would have my time at my own command." BOSWELL. "But, Sir, is it not a sad thing to be at a distance from all our literary friends?" JOHNSON. "Sir, you will by-and-by have enough of this conversation, which now delights you so much."

As he was a zealous friend of subordination, he was at all times watchful to repress the vulgar cant against the manners of the great. "High people, Sir," said he, "are the best: take a hundred ladies of quality, you'll find them better wives, better mothers, more willing to sacrifice their own pleasure to their children, than a hundred other women. Tradeswomen (I mean the wives of tradesmen) in the city, who are worth from ten to fifteen thousand pounds, are the worst creatures upon the earth, grossly ignorant, and thinking viciousness fashionable. Farmers, I think, are often worthless fellows. Few lords will cheat; and, if they do, they'll be ashamed of it: farmers cheat, and are not ashamed of it: they have all the sensual vices too of the nobility, with cheating into the bargain. There is as much fornication and adultery amongst farmers as amongst noblemen." BOSWELL. "The notion of the world, Sir, however, is, that the morals of women of quality are worse than those in lower stations." JOHNSON. "Yes, Sir; the licentiousness of one woman of quality makes more noise than that of a number of women in lower stations: then, Sir, you are to consider the malignity of women in the city against women of quality, which will make them believe any thing of them, such as that they call their coachmen to bed. No, Sir; so far as I have observed, the higher in rank, the richer ladies are, they are the better instructed, and the more virtuous."

This year the Reverend Mr. Horne published his "Letter to Mr. Dunning on the English Particel." Johnson read it; and though not treated in it with sufficient respect, he had candour enough to say to Mr. Seward, "Were I to make a new edition of my Dictionary, I would adopt several<sup>3</sup> of Mr. Horne's etymologies. I hope they did not put the dog in the pillory for his libel; he has too much literature for that."<sup>4</sup>

On Saturday, May 16., I dined with him at Mr. Beauclerk's with Mr. Langton, Mr. Steevens, Dr. Higgins, and some others. I regret very feelingly every instance of my remissness in recording his memorabilia; I am afraid it is the condition of humanity (as Mr. Windham, of Norfolk, once observed to me, after having made an admirable speech in the House of Commons, which was highly applauded, but which he afterwards perceived might have been better), "that we are more

<sup>1</sup> This suppression is particularly blameable, because the question was as to the extent of Clarendon's credulity; and Lord Kames gives his own summary of the story with marks of quotation, as if he were copying Clarendon exactly. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> James, first earl. His lordship was, to the last, in the habit of telling this story rather too often. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> In Mr. Horne Tooke's enlargement of that "Letter," which he has since published with the title of "Etymologiae, or, The Diversions of Purley," he mentions this compliment, as if Dr. Johnson, instead of several of his etymologies, had said all. His recollection having thus magnified it, shows how ambitious he was of the approbation of so great a man. — BOSWELL. The occasion of Horne's letter was his disputing the construction put by the judges of the Court of King's Bench on some words in his indictment. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>4</sup> This is another instance of Johnson's contradictory opinions — antè, p. 602. — for which I can more easily account, than for his continued ignorance of Horne Tooke's sentence. — CROKER.

uneasy from thinking of our wants, than happy in thinking of our acquisitions."<sup>1</sup> This is an unreasonable mode of disturbing our tranquillity, and should be corrected: let me then comfort myself with the large treasure of Johnson's conversation which I have preserved for my own enjoyment and that of the world; and let me exhibit what I have upon each occasion, whether more or less, whether a balse, or only a few sparks of a diamond.

He said, "Dr. Mead lived more in the broad sunshine of life than almost any man."<sup>2</sup>

The disaster of General Burgoyne's army<sup>3</sup> was then the common topic of conversation. It was asked why piling their arms was insisted upon as a matter of such consequence, when it seemed to be a circumstance so inconsiderable in itself. JOHNSON. "Why, Sir, a French author says, 'Il y a beaucoup de puérilités dans la guerre.' All distinctions are trivials, because great things can seldom occur, and those distinctions are settled by custom. A savage would as willingly have his meat sent to him in the kitchen, as eat it at the table here: as men become civilised, various modes of denoting honourable preference are invented."

He this day made the observations upon the similarity between "Rasselas" and "Candide;" which I have inserted in its proper place [p. 115.], when considering his admirable philosophical romance. He said, "Candide," he thought, had more power in it than any thing that Voltaire had written.

He said, "The lyrical part of Horace never can be perfectly translated; so much of the excellence is in the numbers and expression. Francis has done it the best. I'll take his, five out of six, against them all."

On Sunday, May 17, I presented to him Mr. Fullarton, of Fullarton, who has since distinguished himself so much in India<sup>4</sup>, to whom he naturally talked of travels, as Mr. Brydone accompanied him in his tour to Sicily and Malta. He said, "The information which we have from modern travellers is much more authentic than what we had from ancient travellers; ancient travellers guessed, modern travellers measure. The Swiss admit that there is but one error in Stanyan.<sup>5</sup> If Brydone were more attentive to his Bible, he would be a good traveller." [p. 491.]

He said, "Lord Chatham was a Dictator;

he possessed the power of putting the state in motion: now there is no power, all order is relaxed." BOSWELL. "Is there no hope of a change to the better?" JOHNSON. "Why, yes, Sir, when we are weary of this relaxation. So the city of London will appoint its mayors again by seniority." BOSWELL. "But is not that taking a mere chance for having a good or a bad mayor?" JOHNSON. "Yes, Sir; but the evil of competition is greater than that of the worst mayor that can come; besides, there is no more reason to suppose that the choice of a rabble will be right, than that chance will be right."

On Tuesday, May 19, I was to set out for Scotland in the evening. He was engaged to dine with me at Mr. Dilly's. I waited upon him to remind him of his appointment and attend him thither; he gave me some salutary counsel, and recommended vigorous resolution against any deviation from moral duty. BOSWELL. "But you would not have me to bind myself by a solemn obligation?" JOHNSON (much agitated). "What! a vow!—O, no, Sir; a vow is a horrible thing! it is a snare for sin. The man who cannot go to heaven without a vow, may go —" Here, standing erect in the middle of his library, and rolling grand, his pause was truly a curious compound of the solemn and the ludicrous; he half-whistled in his usual way when pleasant, and he paused as if checked by religious awe. Methought he would have added, to hell, but was restrained. I humoured the dilemma. "What, Sir!" said I, "In calum jussuris ibit?" alluding to his imitation of it,—

"And bid him go to hell, to hell he goes."

I had mentioned to him a slight fault in his noble "Imitation of the Tenth Satire of Juvenal," a too near recurrence of the verb spread in his description of the young enthusiast at college:—

"Through all his veins the fever of renown

Spreads from the strong contagion of the gown;

O'er Bodley's dome his future labours spread,

And Bacon's mansion trembles o'er his head."

He had desired me to change spreads to burns; but for perfect authenticity, I now had it done with his own hand.<sup>6</sup> I thought this alteration not only cured the fault, but was <sup>1</sup> Mr. Windham's MS. Journal, which I have seen, exhibits instances of a morbid, self-tormenting hypochondriacism, of which those who knew him only in society could have no idea.—CROKER, 1847. Its publication (1865) has confirmed Mr. Croker's opinion.—J. M.

<sup>2</sup> Dr. Richard Mead was born in 1673, and died in 1754. His collection of books, pictures, and coins (which sold for upwards of 16,000*l.*), was, during his life, most liberally open to public curiosity. He was much visited by the literati and foreigners, and did certainly live in the "sunshine of life."—CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> Its surrender at Saratoga, October, 1777.—CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> In 1787, Mr. Fullarton published a "View of the English Interests in India."—WRIGHT.

<sup>5</sup> Temple Stanyan, Esq., at one time minister to the Porte, author of an "Account of Switzerland," 1714, and of a better known "History of Greece." He died 1752.—CROKER, 1835.

<sup>6</sup> The slip of paper on which he made the correction is deposited by me in the noble library to which it relates, and to which I have presented other pieces of his handwriting.—BOSWELL.

The passage in the first, and in some other editions, stands as follows:—

"When first the college rolls receive his name,

The young enthusiast quits his ease for fame:

Resistless burns the fever of renown,

Caught from the strong contagion of the gown;

O'er Bodley's dome his future labours spread,

And Bacon's mansion trembles o'er his head."

Johnson, no doubt, in amending the second awkward couplet, inadvertently inserted spreads instead of burns. The true reading ought to be introduced in any new edition of the poem, which it has not been in any that I have ever seen. Even the Oxford edition (1825) notices the error and the correction, but, strange to say, does not amend the text.—CROKER.

more poetical, as it might carry an allusion to the shirt by which Hercules was inflamed.

We had a quiet, comfortable meeting at Mr. Dilly's; nobody there but ourselves. Mr. Dilly mentioned somebody having wished that Milton's "Tractate on Education" should be printed along with his Poems in the edition of the English Poets then going on. JOHNSON. "It would be breaking in upon the plan; but would be of no great consequence. So far as it would be any thing, it would be wrong. Education in England has been in danger of being hurt by two of its greatest men, Milton and Locke. Milton's plan is impracticable, and I suppose has never been tried. Locke's, I fancy, has been tried often enough, but is very imperfect; it gives too much to one side, and too little to the other; it gives too little to literature.—I shall do what I can for Dr. Watts; but my materials are very scanty. His poems are by no means his best works; I cannot praise his poetry itself highly, but I can praise its design."

My illustrious friend and I parted with assurances of affectionate regard.

I wrote to him on the 25th of May, from Thorpe, in Yorkshire, one of the seats of Mr. Bosville, [p. 523.] and gave him an account of my having passed a day at Lincoln, unexpectedly, and therefore without having any letters of introduction; but that I had been honoured with civilities from the Reverend Mr. Simpson, an acquaintance of his, and Captain Broadley, of the Lincolnshire militia; but more particularly from the Reverend Dr. Gordon, the chancellor, who first received me with great politeness as a stranger, and, when I informed him who I was, entertained me at his house with the most flattering attention. I also expressed the pleasure with which I had found that our worthy friend, Langton, was highly esteemed in his own county town.

BOSWELL TO JOHNSON.

"Edinburgh, June 18. 1778.

"MY DEAR SIR, — * * * Since my return to Scotland, I have been again at Lanark, and have had more conversation with Thomson's sister. It is strange that Murdoch, who was his intimate friend, should have mistaken his mother's maiden name, which he says was Hume, whereas Hume was the name of his grandmother by the mother's side. His mother's name was Beatrix Trotter<sup>1</sup>, a daughter of Mr. Trotter of Fogo, a small proprietor of land. Thomson had one brother, whom he had with him in England as his amanuensis; but he was seized with a consumption, and having returned to Scotland, to try what his native air would do for him, died young. He had three sisters: one married to Mr. Bell, minister of the parish of Strathaven; one to Mr. Craig, father of the ingenious architect, who gave the plan of the New Town of Edinburgh; and one to Mr. Thomson, master of the grammar-school at Lanark. He was of a humane and benevolent disposition; not only sent valuable presents to his sisters, but a yearly allowance in money, and was always wishing to have it in his power to do them more good. Lord Lyttelton's observation, that 'he loathed much to write,' was very true. His letters to his sister, Mrs. Thomson, were not frequent; and in one of them he says, 'All my friends who know me, know how backward I am to write letters; and never impute the negligence of my hand to the coldness of my heart.' I send you a copy of the last letter which she had from him; she never heard that he had any intention of going into holy orders. From this late interview with his sister, I think much more favourably of him, as I hope you will. I am eager to see more of your Prefaces to the Poets: I solace myself with the few proof-sheets which I have.

"I send another parcel of Lord Hailes's 'Annals,' which you will please to return to me as soon as you conveniently can. He says, 'he wishes you would cut a little deeper; but he may be proud that there is so little occasion to use the critical knife. I ever am, my dear Sir, &c.,

"JAMES BOSWELL."

Mr. Langton has been pleased, at my request, to favour me with some particulars of Dr. Johnson's visit to Warley Camp, where this gentleman was at the time stationed as a captain in the Lincolnshire militia. I shall give them in his own words in a letter to me.

"It was in the summer of the year 1778, that he complied with my invitation to come down to the camp at Warley, and he staid with me about a week; the scene appeared, notwithstanding a great degree of ill health that he seemed to labour under, to interest and amuse him, as agreeing with the disposition that I believe you know he constantly manifested towards inquiring into subjects of the military kind. He sat, with a patient degree of attention, to observe the proceedings of a regimental court-martial, that happened to be called in the time of his stay with us; and one night, as late as at eleven o'clock, he accompanied the major of the regiment in going what are styled the rounds, where he might observe the forms of visiting the guards, for the seeing that they and their sentries are ready in their duty on their several posts. He took occasion to converse at times on military topics, once in particular, that I see the mention of, in your 'Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides,' which lies open before me, (p. 303.), as to gunpowder; which he spoke of to the same effect, in part, that you relate.

"On one occasion, when the regiment were going through their exercise, he went quite close to the men at one of the extremities of it, and watched all their practices attentively; and, when he came away, his remark was, 'The men indeed do load their muskets and fire with wonderful celerity.' He was likewise particular in requiring to know what was the weight of the musket balls in use, and within what distance they might be expected to take effect when fired off.

"In walking among the tents, and observing the difference between those of the officers and private men, he said, that the superiority of accommodation of the better conditions of life, to that of the inferior ones, was never exhibited to him in so distinct a view. The civilities paid to him in the camp were, from the gentlemen of the Lincolnshire regiment, one of the officers of which accommodated him with a tent in which he slept; and from General Hall, who very courteously invited him to dine with him, where he appeared to be very well pleased with his entertainment and the civilities he received on the part of the General<sup>1</sup>; the attention likewise of the General's aide-de-camp, Captain Smith, seemed to be very welcome to him, as appeared by their engaging in a great deal of discourse together. The gentlemen of the East-York regiment likewise, on being informed of his coming, solicited his company at dinner; but by that time he had fixed his departure, so that he could not comply with the invitation."

<sup>1</sup> Dr. Johnson was by no means attentive to minute accuracy in his "Lives of the Poets;" for, notwithstanding my having detected this mistake, he continued it. — BOSWELL.

JOHNSON TO BOSWELL.

"London, July 3. 1778.

"SIR, — I have received two letters from you, of which the second complains of the neglect shown to the first. You must not tie your friends to such punctual correspondence. You have all possible assurances of my affection and esteem; and there ought to be no need of reiterated professions. When it may happen that I can give you either counsel or comfort, I hope it will never happen to me that I should neglect you; but you must not think me criminal or cold, if I say nothing when I have nothing to say.

"You are now happy enough. Mrs. Boswell is recovered; and I congratulate you upon the probability of her long life. If general approbation will add any thing to your enjoyment, I can tell you that I have heard you mentioned as a man whom every body likes. I think life has little more to give.

"[Langton] has gone to his regiment. He has laid down his coach, and talks of making more contractions of his expense: how he will succeed, I know not. It is difficult to reform a household gradually; it may be done better by a system totally new. I am afraid he has always something to hide. When we pressed him to go to [Langton], he objected the necessity of attending his navigation<sup>2</sup>; yet he could talk of going to Aberdeen<sup>3</sup>, a place not much nearer his navigation. I believe he cannot bear the thought of living at [Langton] in a state of diminution, and of appearing among the gentlemen of the neighbourhood shorn of his beams. This is natural, but it is cowardly. What I told him of the increasing expense of a growing family, seems to have struck him. He certainly had gone on with very confused views, and we have, I think, shown him that he is wrong; though, with the common deficiency of advisers, we have not shown him how to do right.

"I wish you would a little correct or restrain your imagination, and imagine that happiness, such as life admits, may be had at other places as well as London. Without affecting Stoicism, it may be said, that it is our business to exempt ourselves as much as we can from the power of external things.

There is but one solid basis of happiness; and that is, the reasonable hope of a happy futurity. This may be had everywhere.

"I do not blame your preference to London to other places, for it is really to be preferred, if the choice is free; but few have the choice of their place, or their manner of life; and mere pleasure ought not to be the prime motive of action.

"Mrs. Thrale, poor thing, has a daughter. Mr. Thrale dislikes the times, like the rest of us. Mrs. Williams is sick; Mrs. Desmoulius is poor. I have miserable nights. Nobody is well but Mr. Levett. I am, dear Sir, your most, &c.,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

In the course of this year there was a difference between him and his friend Mr. Strahan; the particulars of which it is unnecessary to relate. Their reconciliation was communicated to me in a letter from Mr. Strahan in the following words: —

"The notes I showed you that past between him and me were dated in March last. The matter lay dormant till 27th July, when he wrote to me as follows: —

JOHNSON TO STRAHAN.

"SIR, — It would be very foolish for us to continue strangers any longer. You can never by persistency make wrong right. If I resented too acrimoniously, I resented only to yourself. Nobody ever saw or heard what I wrote. You saw that my anger was over; for in a day or two I came to your house. I have given you a longer time; and I hope you have made so good use of it, as to be no longer on evil terms with, Sir, yours, &c.,

SAM. JOHNSON.

"On this I called upon him: and he has since dined with me."

After this time, the same friendship as formerly continued between Dr. Johnson and Mr. Strahan. My friend mentioned to me a little circumstance of his attention, which, though we may smile at it, must be allowed to have its foundations in a nice and true knowledge of human life. "When I write to Scotland," said he, "I employ Strahan to frank my letters, that he may have the consequence of appearing a parliament-man among his countrymen."

JOHNSON TO MRS. THRALE.

(Extracts.)

"Oct. 15. 1778. — As to Dr. Collier's<sup>4</sup> epitaph, Nollekens has had it so long, that I have forgotten how long. You never had it. There is a print of Mrs. Montague, and I shall think myself very ill rewarded for my love and admiration, if she does not give me one; she will give it nobody in whom it will excite more respectful sentiments. But I never could get any thing from her but by <sup>1</sup> When I one day at court expressed to General Hall my sense of the honour he had done my friend, he politely answered, "Sir, I did myself honour." — BOSWELL.

<sup>2</sup> The Wey canal, from Guildford to Weybridge, in which he had a considerable share, which his family still possess. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> His lady and family, it appears, were in Scotland at this period. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> Dr. Collier of the Commons, an early friend of Mrs. Thrale's, who died 23d May, 1177. — CROKER.

pushing a face; and so, if you please, you may tell her.

"When I called the other day at Burney's, I found only the young ones at home; at last came the doctor and madam, from a dinner in the country, to tell how they had been robbed as they returned. The doctor saved his purse, but gave them three guineas and some silver, of which they returned him three-and-sixpence, unasked, to pay the turnpike.

"I have sat twice to Sir Joshua, and he seems to like his own performance. He has projected another, in which I am to be busy; but we can think on it at leisure."<sup>1</sup>

"Mrs. Williams is come home better, and the habitation is all concord and harmony; only Mr. Levett harbours discontent. With Dr. Lawrence's consent, I have for the two last nights taken musk; the first night was a worse night than common, the second, a better; but not so much better as that I dare ascribe any virtue to the medicine. I took a scruple each time."

"Oct. 31. 1778. — Sir Joshua has finished his picture, and it seems to please every body; but I shall wait to see how it pleases you. To-day Mrs. Williams and Mrs. Desmoulins had a scold, and Williams was going away; but I bid her not turn tail, and she came back, and rather got the upper hand."

We surely cannot but admire the benevolent exertions of this great and good man, especially when we consider how grievously he was afflicted with bad health, and how uncomfortable his home was made by the perpetual jarring of those whom he charitably accommodated under his roof. He has sometimes suffered me to talk jestfully of his group of females, and call them his Seraglio. He thus mentions them, together with honest Levett, in one of his letters to Mrs. Thrale: "Williams hates every body; Levett hates Desmoulins, and does not love Williams; Desmoulins hates them both; Poll<sup>2</sup> loves none of them."

<sup>1</sup> I suppose the first is the Thrale picture — now Sir Robert Peel's; the second was probably either that in which he is reading, or the other in which he holds a pen — neither of them at all comparable to the former — perhaps Sir Joshua's very finest head. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>2</sup> Miss Carmichael. — BOSWELL. I have not learned how this lady was connected with Dr. Johnson. It would seem from Madam D'Arbly's account that she was invited to enliven the gloom of Bolt Court, but did not in that respect answer Johnson's expectations. It was no doubt his domestic experience which prompted his complimentary exclamation to Hannah More and her four sisters, "What! five women lie happily together!" — More's Life, v. i. p. 67. Hawkins draws, as is his wont, a very gloomy picture of this society. — "His inmates were enemies to his peace, and occasioned him great disquiet; the jealousy that subsisted among them rendered his dwelling irksome to him, and he seldom approached it, after an evening's conversation abroad, but with the dread of finding it a scene of discord, and of having his ears filled with the complaints of Mrs. Williams, of Frank's neglect of his duty, and inattention to the interests of his master, and of Frank against Mrs. Williams, for the authority she assumed over him, and exercised with an unwarrantable severity. Even those intruders who had taken shelter under his roof, and who, in his absence from home, brought thither their children, found cause to murmur; "their provision of food was scanty, or their dinners ill dressed;" all which he chose to endure, rather than put an end to their clamours by riding his home of such thankless and troublesome guests. Nay, so insensible was he of the ingratitude of those whom he suffered thus to hang upon him, and among whom he may be said to have

JOHNSON TO CAPTAIN LANGTON<sup>3</sup>,

Warley Camp.

"Oct. 31. 1778.

"DEAR SIR, — When I recollect how long ago I was received with so much kindness at Warley Common, I am ashamed that I have not made some inquiries after my friends.

"Pray how many sheep-stealers did you convict? and how did you punish them? When are you to be cantoned in better habitations? The air grows cold, and the ground damp. Longer stay in the camp cannot be without much danger to the health of the common men, if even the officers can escape.

"You see that Dr. Percy is now dean of Carlisle; above five hundred a year, with a power of presenting himself to some good living. He is provided for. The session of the Club is to commence with that of the parliament. Mr. Banks<sup>4</sup> desires to be admitted; he will be a very honourable accession.

"Did the king please you?<sup>5</sup> The Coxhead men, I think, have some reason to complain.<sup>6</sup> Reynolds says your camp is better than theirs. I hope you find yourself able to encounter this weather. Take care of your own health; and, as you can, of your men. Be pleased to make my compliments to all the gentlemen whose notice I have had, and whose kindness I have experienced. I am, dear Sir, &c., SAM. JOHNSON."

I wrote to him on the 18th of August, the 18th of September, and the 6th of November; informing him of my having had another son born, whom I had called James<sup>7</sup>; that I had passed some time at Auchinleck; that the Countess of Loudoun, now in her ninety-ninth year, was as fresh as when he saw her, and remembered him with respect; and that his mother by adoption, the Countess of Eglington, had said to me, "Tell Mr. Johnson, I love him exceedingly;" that I had again suffered much from bad spirits; and that as it divided an income which was little more than sufficient for his own support, that he would submit to reproach and personal affront from some of them; even Levett would sometimes insult him, and Mrs. Williams, in her paroxysms of rage, has been known to drive him from her presence." And Johnson himself writes to Mrs. Thrale, Oct. 16. 1779: "Mrs. Williams is not yet returned; but discontent reigns in my humble habitation as in the palaces of monarchs. Mr. Levett and Mrs. Desmoulins have vowed eternal hate. Levett is the more insidious, and wants me to turn her out." — CROKER, 1831—47.

<sup>3</sup> Dr. Johnson here addresses his worthy friend, Bennet Langton, Esq., by his title as Captain of Lincolnshire Militia, in which he has since been most deservedly raised to the rank of Major. — BOSWELL.

<sup>4</sup> Afterwards the right honourable Sir Joseph Banks, K.B., so long president of the Royal Society. — CROKER.

<sup>5</sup> His Majesty and the Queen visited Warley Camp on the 20th October. — CROKER.

<sup>6</sup> Of the king's not visiting that camp as well as Warley; which, however, he did, on the 3d November. — CROKER.

<sup>7</sup> This was the gentleman who contributed a few notes to this work. He was of Brazenose College, and a Vinerian Fellow, and died in February 1822, at his chambers, in the Temple. — Hall. I knew him, and tried once to persuade him to edit this work, but he died soon after, having just completed a new edition of Malone's Shakespeare. He was very convivial; and in other respects like his father — though altogether on a smaller scale. There is an account of him in the Edin. Ann. Reg. for 1822, written by our common friend, Mr. Markland. — CROKER, 1831—47.

was very long since I heard from him, I was not a little uneasy.

The continuance of his regard for his friend, Dr. Burney, appears from the following letters: —

JOHNSON TO DR. WHEELER<sup>1</sup>,

Oxford.

“London, Nov. 2. 1778.

“DEAR SIR, — Dr. Burney, who brings this paper, is engaged in a History of Music; and having been told by Dr. Markham of some MSS. relating to his subject, which are in the library of your college, is desirous to examine them. He is my friend; and therefore I take the liberty of entreating your favour and assistance in his inquiry; and can assure you, with great confidence, that if you knew him, he would not want any intervention solicitation to obtain the kindness of one who loves learning and virtue as you love them.

“I have been flattering myself all the summer with the hope of paying my annual visit to my friends; but something has obstructed me: I still hope not to be long without seeing you. I should be glad of a little literary talk; and glad to show you, by the frequency of my visits, how eagerly I love it, when you talk it. I am, dear Sir, &c.,

“SAM. JOHNSON.”

JOHNSON TO DR. EDWARDS<sup>2</sup>,

Oxford.

“London, Nov. 2. 1778.

“SIR, — The bearer, Dr. Burney, has had some account of a Welsh manuscript in the Bodleian library, from which he hopes to gain some materials for his History of Music; but, being ignorant of the language, is at a loss where to find assistance. I make no doubt but you, Sir, can help him through his difficulties, and therefore take the liberty of recommending him to your favour, as I am sure you will find him a man worthy of every civility that can be shown, and every benefit that can be conferred.

“But we must not let Welsh drive us from Greek. What comes of Xenophon?<sup>3</sup> If you do not like the trouble of publishing the book, do not let your commentaries be lost; contrive that they may be published somewhere. I am, Sir, &c.,

“SAM. JOHNSON.”

These letters procured Dr. Burney great kindness and friendly offices from both of these gentlemen, not only on that occasion, but in future visits to the university. The same year Dr. Johnson not only wrote to Joseph Warton in favour of Dr. Burney's youngest son, who was to be placed in the college of Winchester, but accompanied him when he went thither.

JOHNSON TO BOSWELL.

“Nov. 21. 1778.

“DEAR SIR, — It is indeed a long time since I wrote, and I think you have some reason to complain; however, you must not let small things disturb you, when you have such a fine addition to your happiness as a new boy, and I hope your lady's health restored by bringing him. It seems very probable that a little care will now restore her, if any remains of her complaints are left.

“You seem, if I understand your letter, to be gaining ground at Auchinleck; an incident that would give me great delight.

“When any fit of anxiety, or gloominess, or perversion of mind lays hold upon you, make it a rule not to publish it by complaints, but exert your whole care to hide it; by endeavouring to hide it, you will drive it away. Be always busy.

“The Club is to meet with the parliament; we talk of electing Banks, the traveller; he will be a reputable member. Langton has been encamped with his company of militia on Warley Common; I spent five days amongst them; he signalled himself as a diligent officer, and has very high respect in the regiment. He presided when I was there at a court-martial; he is now quartered in Hertfordshire; his lady and little ones are in Scotland. Paoli came to the camp, and commended the soldiers.

“Of myself I have no great matters to say: my health is not restored; my nights are restless and tedious. The best night that I have had these twenty years was at Fort Augustus.

“I hope soon to send you a few Lives to read. I am, dear Sir, your most affectionate,

“SAM. JOHNSON.”

About this time the Reverend Mr. John Hussey, who had been some time in trade, and was then a clergyman of the church of England, being about to undertake a journey to Aleppo, and other parts of the East, which he accomplished, Dr. Johnson (who had long been in habits of intimacy with him) honoured him with the following letter: —

JOHNSON TO HUSSEY.

“Dec. 29. 1778.

“DEAR SIR, — I have sent you the ‘Grammar,’ and have left you two books more, by which I hope to be remembered: write my name in them; we may, perhaps, see each other no more: you part with my good wishes, nor do I despair of seeing you return. Let no opportunities of vice corrupt you; let no bad example seduce you; let the blindness of Mahometans confirm you in Christianity. God bless you. I am, dear Sir, your affectionate humble servant,

SAM. JOHNSON.”

Johnson this year expressed great satisfaction at the publication of the first volume of “Discourses to the Royal Academy,” by Sir

<sup>1</sup> Benjamin Wheeler was entered at Trinity College, November 12. 1751. In 1776 he was appointed Regius Professor of Divinity and Canon of Christ-Church. — Hall. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> Edward Edwards entered at Jesus College, 1743, at 17; M.A. 1749; B.D. 1756; and D.D. 1760. — Hall. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> Dr. Edwards was preparing an edition of Xenophon's Memorabilia, which, however, he did not live to complete. — CROKER. It was published in 1785, with a preface by Dr. Owen. — WRIGHT.

Joshua Reynolds, whom he always considered as one of his literary school. Much praise indeed is due to those excellent Discourses, which are so universally admired, and for which the author received from the Empress of Russia a gold snuff-box, adorned with her profile in bas relief, set in diamonds; and containing, what is infinitely more valuable, a slip of paper, on which are written, with her imperial majesty's own hand, the following words:—"Pour le Chevalier Reynolds, en témoignage du contentement que j'ai ressentie à la lecture de ses excellens Discours sur la Peinture."

This year, Johnson gave the world a luminous proof that the vigour of his mind in all its faculties, whether memory, judgment, or imagination, was not in the least abated; for this year came out the first four volumes of his "Prefaces, biographical and critical, to the most eminent of the English Poets*," published by the booksellers of London. The remaining volumes came out in the year 1780. The poets were selected by the several booksellers who had the honorary copyright, which is still preserved among them by mutual compact, notwithstanding the decision of the House of Lords against the perpetuity of literary property. We have his own authority<sup>1</sup>, that by his recommendation the poems of Blackmore, Watts, Pomfret, and Yalden, were added to the collection. Of this work I shall speak more particularly hereafter.

[JOHNSON TO MRS. ASTON.]

" Bolt Court, Fleet Street, Jan. 2. 1779.

" DEAR MADAM, — Now the new year is come, of which I wish you and dear Mrs. Gastrell many and many returns, it is fit that I give you some account of the year past. In the beginning of it I had a difficulty of breathing, and other illness, from which, however, I by degrees recovered, and from which I am now tolerably free. In the spring and summer I flattered myself that I should come to Lichfield, and forebore to write till I could tell of my intentions with some certainty, and one thing or other making the journey always improper, as I did not come, I omitted to write, till at last I grew afraid of hearing ill news. But the other day Mr. Prujean<sup>2</sup> called and left word, that you, dear Madam, are grown better; and I know not when I heard any thing that pleased me so much. I shall now long more and more to see Lichfield, and partake the happiness of your recovery.

" Now you begin to mend, you have great encouragement to take care of yourself. Do not omit any thing that can conduce to your health, and when I come, I shall hope to enjoy with you, and dearest Mrs. Gastrell, many pleasing hours. Do not be angry at my long omission to write, but let me hear how you both do, for you will write to nobody, to whom your welfare will give more pleasure, than to, dearest Madam, your most humble servant,

SAM. JOHNSON."

— Pembroke MS.

JOHNSON TO MRS. PORTER.

" Bolt Court, Fleet Street, Jan. 2. 1779.

" DEAREST LOVE, — Though I have so long omitted to write, I will omit it no longer. I hope the new year finds you not worse than you have formerly been; and I wish that many years may pass over you without bringing either pain or discontent. For my part, I think my health, though not good, yet rather better than when I left you.

" My purpose was to have paid you my annual visit in the summer, but it happened otherwise, not by any journey another way, for I have never been many miles from London, but by such hindrances as it is hard to bring to any account.

" Do not follow my bad example, but write to me soon again, and let me know of you what you have to tell; I hope it is all good.

" Please to make my compliments to Mrs. Cobb, Mrs. Adey, and Miss Adey, and all the ladies and gentlemen that frequent your mansion.

" If you want any books, or any thing else that I can send you, let me know. I am, dear Madam, your most humble servant,

SAM. JOHNSON.]"

— Pearson MSS.

On the 22d of January, I wrote to him on several topics, and mentioned, that as he had been so good as to permit me to have the proof sheets of his "Lives of the Poets," I had written to his servant, Francis, to take care of them for me.

[BOSWELL TO JOHNSON.]

" Edinburgh, Feb. 2. 1779.

" MY DEAR SIR, — Garrick's death is a striking event; not that we should be surprised with the death of any man who has lived sixty-two years<sup>3</sup>; but because there was a vivacity in our late celebrated friend, which drove away the thoughts of death from any association with him. I am sure you will be tenderly affected with his departure; and I would wish to hear from you upon the subject. I was obliged to him in my days of effervescence in London, when poor Derrick was my governor; and since that time I received many civilities from him. Do you remember how pleasing it was, when I received a letter from him at Inverary, upon our first return to civilised living after our Hebridean journey? I shall always remember him with affection as well as admiration.

" On Saturday last, being the 30th of January, I drank coffee and old port, and had solemn conversation with the Reverend Mr. Falconer, a nonjuring bishop, a very learned and worthy man. He gave two toasts, which you will believe I drank with cordiality, — Dr. Samuel Johnson and Flora Macdonald. I sat about four hours with him, and it was really as if I had been living in the last cen-

<sup>1</sup> Life of Watts. — BOSWELL.

<sup>2</sup> He married the youngest of the Misses Aston. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> On Mr. Garrick's monument in Lichfield Cathedral, he is said to have died, "aged 64 years." But it is a mistake, and Mr. Boswell is perfectly correct. Garrick was baptized at Hereford, February 28. 1716–17, and died at his house in London, January 20. 1779. The inaccuracy of lapidary inscriptions is well known. — MALONE. The inscription as it now exists in Lichfield Cathedral has 63 years. — CROKER.

tury. The episcopal church of Scotland, though faithful to the royal house of Stuart, has never accepted of any congé d'élire since the revolution; it is the only true episcopal church in Scotland, as it has its own succession of bishops. For as to the episcopal clergy, who take the oaths to the present government, they indeed follow the rites of the church of England, but, as Bishop Falconer observed, 'they are not episcopals; for they are under no bishop, as a bishop cannot have authority beyond his diocese.' This venerable gentleman did me the honour to dine with me yesterday, and he laid his hands upon the heads of my little ones. We had a good deal of curious literary conversation, particularly about Mr. Thomas Ruddiman, with whom he lived in great friendship.

"Any fresh instance of the uncertainty of life makes one embrace more closely a valuable friend. My dear and much respected Sir, may God preserve you long in this world while I am in it. I am ever, your much obliged, and affectionate humble servant,
JAMES BOSWELL."

JOHNSON TO MISS REYNOLDS.

"Feb. 15. 1779.

"DEAREST MADAM,—I have never deserved to be treated as you treat me. When you employed me before, I undertook your affair and succeeded, but then I succeeded by choosing a proper time, and a proper time I will try to choose again.

"I have about a week's work to do, and then I shall come to live in town, and will first wait on you in Dover-street. You are not to think that I neglect you, for your nieces will tell you how rarely they have seen me. I will wait on you as soon as I can, and yet you must resolve to talk things over without anger, and you must leave me to catch opportunities; and be assured, dearest dear, that I should have very little enjoyment of that day in which I had neglected any opportunity of doing good to you. I am, dearest Madam, your humble servant,
SAM. JOHNSON."

—Reyn. MSS.

[JOHNSON TO MRS. PORTER.

"Bolt Court, Fleet Street, March 4. 1779.

"MY DEAR LOVE,—Since I heard from you, I sent you a little print, and two barrels of oysters, and I shall have some little books to send you soon. I have seen Mr. Pearson, and am pleased to find that he has got a living. I was hurried when he was with me, but had time to hear that my friends were all well.

"Poor Mrs. Adey was, I think, a good woman, and therefore her death is less to be lamented; but it is not pleasant to think how uncertain it is, that, when friends part, they will ever meet again. My old complaint of flatulence, and tight and short breath, oppress me heavily. My nights are very restless. I think of consulting the doctor to-morrow.

"This has been a mild winter, for which I hope you have been the better. Take what care you can of yourself, and do not forget to drink. I was somehow or other hindered from coming into the country last summer, but I think of coming this year. I am, dear love, your most humble servant,

—Pearson MSS. "SAM. JOHNSON."]

[JOHNSON TO MRS. ASTON.

"Bolt Court, Fleet Street, March 4. 1779.

"DEAR MADAM,—Mrs. Gastrell and you are very often in my thoughts, though I do not write so often as might be expected from so much love and so much respect. I please myself with thinking that I shall see you again, and shall find you better. But futurity is uncertain: poor David [Garrick] had doubtless many futurities in his head, which death has intercepted—a death, I believe, totally unexpected: he did not in his last hour seem to think his life in danger.

"My old complaints hang heavy on me, and my nights are very uncomfortable and unquiet; and sleepless nights make heavy days. I think to go to my physician, and try what can be done. For why should not I grow better as well as you?

"Now you are better, pray, dearest Madam, take care of yourself. I hope to come this summer and watch you. It will be a very pleasant journey if I can find you and dear Mrs. Gastrell well. I sent you two barrels of oysters; if you would wish for more, please to send your commands to, Madam, your most humble servant,
—Pembroke MSS.

"SAM. JOHNSON."]

JOHNSON TO MRS. THRALE.

March 10. 1779.

"I got my Lives, not yet quite printed, put neatly together, and sent them to the king; what he says of them I know not. If the king is a Whig, he will not like them: but is any king a Whig?"<sup>2</sup>

CHAPTER LXVIII.

1779.

Tasker's "Ode." — Man of the World. — "Vicar of Wakefield." — Junius's Letters. — Parental Authority. — London. — "Government of the Tongue." — Good Friday. — Easter Day. — Eel-skinning. — Claret, Port, Brandy. — Shakspeare's Witches. — Lochmond. — Liberty. — Huckman. — Johnson and Topham Beauclerk. — Mallet. — Friendship. — Eulogy on Garrick. — "Art of getting drunk." — Empirics. — Parental Affection. — Lord Marchmont. — Pope. — Parnell's "Hermit." — Correspondence.

On the 23d of February I had written to him again, complaining of his silence, as I had heard

<sup>1</sup> This seems to allude to some favour (probably a pecuniary one) which Johnson was to solicit from Sir Joshua for Miss Reynolds. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> King George IV. told me of his having once made a somewhat similar observation to Mr. Fox, who in their earlier days happened to propose something that would be "worthy of a Whig Prince." "Yes," replied the Prince, who did not like the proposition, "but do you think that there will ever be a Whig King?" — CROKER, 1847.

he was ill, and had written to Mr. Thrale for information concerning him: and I announced my intention of soon being again in London.

JOHNSON TO BOSWELL.

“March 13. 1779.

“DEAR SIR,—Why should you take such delight to make a bustle, to write to Mr. Thrale that I am negligent, and to Francis to do what is so very unnecessary? Thrale, you may be sure, cared not about it; and I shall spare Francis the trouble, by ordering a set both of the Lives and Poets to dear Mrs. Boswell<sup>1</sup>, in acknowledgment of her marmalade. Persuade her to accept them, and accept them kindly. If I thought she would receive them scornfully, I would send them to Miss Boswell, who, I hope, has yet none of her mamma's ill-will to me.

“I would send sets of Lives, four volumes, to some other friends, to Lord Hailes first. His second volume lies by my bed-side; a book surely of great labour, and to every just thinker of great delight. Write me word to whom I shall send besides. Would it please Lord Auchinleck? Mrs. Thrale waits in the coach. I am, dear Sir, &c.,

“S.A.M. JOHNSON.”

This letter crossed me on the road to London, where I arrived on Monday, March 15., and next morning, at a late hour, found Dr. Johnson sitting over his tea, attended by Mrs. Desmoulins, Mr. Levett, and a clergyman, who had come to submit some poetical pieces to his revision. It is wonderful what a number and variety of writers, some of them even unknown to him, prevailed on his good-nature to look over their works, and suggest corrections and improvements. My arrival interrupted, for a little while, the important business of this true representative of Bayes; upon its being resumed, I found that the subject under immediate consideration was a translation, yet in manuscript, of the “Carmen Seculare” of Horace, which had this year been set to music, and performed as a public entertainment in London, for the joint benefit of Monsieur Philidor<sup>2</sup> and Signor Baretti. When Johnson had done reading, the author asked him bluntly, “If upon the whole it was a good translation?” Johnson, whose regard for truth was uncommonly strict, seemed to be puzzled for a moment what answer to make, as he certainly could not honestly commend the performance: with exquisite address he evaded the question thus: “Sir, I do not say that it may not be made a very good translation.” Here nothing whatever in favour of the performance was affirmed, and yet the writer was not shocked. A printed “Ode to the Warlike Genius of Britain” came next in review. The bard<sup>3</sup> was a lank bony figure, with short black hair; he was writhing himself in agitation, while Johnson read, and, showing his teeth in a grin of earnestness, exclaimed in broken sentences, and in a keen sharp tone, “Is that poetry, Sir? — Is it Pindar?” JOHNSON. “Why, Sir, there is here a great deal of what is called poetry.” Then, turning to me, the poet cried, “My muse has not been long upon the town, and (pointing to the Ode) it trembles under the hand of the great critic.” Johnson, in a tone of displeasure, asked him, “Why do you praise Anson?” I did not trouble him by asking his reason for this question.<sup>4</sup> He proceeded: — “Here is an error, Sir: you have made Genius feminine.” “Palpable, Sir (cried the enthusiast); I know it. But (in a lower tone) it was to pay a compliment to the Duchess of Devonshire, with which her grace was pleased. She is walking across Coxheath in the military uniform, and I suppose her to be the Genius of Britain.” JOHNSON. “Sir, you are giving a reason for it; but that will not make it right. You may have a reason why two and two should make five; but they will still make but four.”

Although I was several times with him in the course of the following days, such it seems were my occupations, or such my negligence, that I have preserved no memorial of his conversation till Friday, March 26., when I visited him. He said he expected to be attacked on account of his “Lives of the Poets.” “However,” said he, “I would rather be attacked than unnoticed. For the worst thing you can do to an author is to be silent as to his works. An assault upon a town is a bad thing; but starving it is still worse; an assault may be unsuccessful, you may have more men killed than you kill; but if you starve the town, you are sure of victory.”

Talking of a friend<sup>5</sup> of ours associating with persons of very discordant principles and characters; I said he was a very universal man, quite a man of the world. JOHNSON. “Yes, Sir; but one may be so much a man of the world, as to be nothing in the world. I remember a passage in Goldsmith's ‘Vicar of Wakefield,’ which he was afterwards fool

<sup>1</sup> He sent a set elegantly bound and gilt, which was received as a very handsome present. — BOSWELL.

<sup>2</sup> Andrew Philidor, a musician and chess player of eminence. In 1777, he published “Analyse du Jeu des Echecs.”

<sup>3</sup> This was a Mr. Tasker. Mr. D'Israeli informed me that this portrait is so accurately drawn, that being, some years after the publication of this work, at a watering-place on the coast of Devon, he was visited by Mr. Tasker, whose name, however, he did not then know, but was so struck with his resemblance to Boswell's picture, that he asked him whether he had not had an interview with Dr. Johnson, and it appeared that he was indeed the author of “The Warlike Genius of Britain.” — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> He disliked Lord Anson, first as a whig, and also perhaps from local politics, as the Ansons have had a strong party interest in Lichfield. “On one occasion,” says Mrs. Piozzi, “he visited Lord Anson's seat, and although, as he confessed, ‘well received and kindly treated, he, with the true gratitude of a wit, ridiculed the master of the house before he had left it an hour.’” In the grounds there is a Temple of the Winds, on which he made the following epigram:

“Gratum animum laudo; Qui debuit omnia ventis, Quam bene ventorum surgere templa jubet!”

I praise the grateful mind which thus bestows
A temple on the winds by which he rose. — CROKER.

<sup>5</sup> Probably Sir Joshua Reynolds. See ant., pp. 243. and 550, n. 4. — CROKER.

enough to expunge. "I do not love a man who is zealous for nothing." BOSWELL. "That was a fine passage." JOHNSON. "Yes, Sir: there was another fine passage too, which he struck out: 'When I was a young man, being anxious to distinguish myself, I was perpetually starting new propositions. But I soon gave this over; for I found that generally what was new was false.'" I said I did not like to sit with people of whom I had not a good opinion. JOHNSON. "But you must not indulge your delicacy too much, or you will be a tête-à-tête man all your life."

JOHNSON TO MRS. TIRALE.

March 18. 1779.

"On Monday I came late to Mrs. Vesey. Mrs. Montagu was there; I called for the print<sup>2</sup>, and got good words. The evening was not brilliant, but I had thanks for my company. The night was troublesome. On Tuesday I fasted, and went to the doctor: he ordered bleeding. On Wednesday I had the tea-pot, fasted, and was blooded. Wednesday night was better. To-day I have dined at Mr. Strahan's, at Islington, with his new wife. To-night there will be opium; to-morrow the tea-pot; then heigh for Saturday. I wish the doctor would bleed me again. Yet every body that I meet says that I look better than when I was last met."

During my stay in London this spring, I find I was unaccountably negligent in preserving Johnson's sayings, more so than at any time when I was happy enough to have an opportunity of hearing his wisdom and wit. There is no help for it now. I must content myself with presenting such scraps as I have. But I am nevertheless ashamed and vexed to think how much has been lost. It is not that there was a bad crop this year, but that I was not sufficiently careful in gathering it in. I therefore, in some instances, can only exhibit a few detached fragments.

Talking of the wonderful concealment of the author of the celebrated letters signed Junius, he said, "I should have believed Burke to be Junius, because I know no man but Burke who is capable of writing these letters; but Burke spontaneously denied it to me. The case would have been different, had I asked him if he was the author; a man so questioned, as to an anonymous publication, may think he has a right to deny it."

He observed that his old friend, Mr. Sheridan, had been honoured with extraordinary attention in his own country, by having had an exception made in his favour in an Irish act of parliament concerning insolvent debtors.<sup>3</sup> "Thus to be singled out," said he, "by a legislature, as an object of public consideration and kindness, is a proof of no common merit."

At Streatham, on Monday, March 29., at breakfast, he maintained that a father had no right to control the inclinations of his daughter in marriage.

On Wednesday, March 31., when I visited him, and confessed an excess of which I had very seldom been guilty,—that I had spent a whole night in playing at cards, and that I could not look back on it with satisfaction,—instead of a harsh animadversion, he mildly said, "Alas, Sir, on how few things can we look back with satisfaction!"

On Thursday, April 1., he commended one of the Dukes of Devonshire for a dogged veracity" [p. 557.] He said, too, "London is nothing to some people; but to a man whose pleasure is intellectual, London is the place. And there is no place where economy can be so well practised as in London: more can be had here for the money, even by ladies, than any where else. You cannot play tricks with your fortune in a small place; you must make an uniform appearance. Here a lady may have well-furnished apartments, and elegant dress, without any meat in her kitchen."

I was amused by considering with how much ease and coolness he could write or talk to a friend, exhorting him not to suppose that happiness was not to be found as well in other places as in London; when he himself was at all times sensible of its being, comparatively speaking, a heaven upon earth. The truth is, that by those who from sagacity, attention, and experience, have learnt the full advantage of London, its pre-eminence over every other place, not only for variety of enjoyment, but for comfort, will be felt with a philosophical exultation. The freedom from remark and petty censure, with which life may be passed there, is a circumstance which a man who knows the teasing restraint of a narrow circle

<sup>1</sup> Dr. Burney, in a note introduced in a former page, (150. n.) has mentioned this circumstance concerning Goldsmith, as communicated to him by Dr. Johnson, not recollecting that it occurred here. His remark, however, is not wholly superfluous, as it ascertains that the words which Goldsmith had put into the mouth of a fictitious character in the "Vicar of Wakefield," and which, as we learn from Dr. Johnson, he afterwards expunged, related, like many other passages in his novel, to himself.—MALONE. But, in truth, it was not truck out—at least the same sentiment is to be found in the ovel, c. 20.—CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> Mrs. Montagu's portrait. Mrs. Vesey was an Irish lady, wife of the Right Honourable Agmondisham Vesey (ante, p. 298.), whose ambition was to unite the fashionable and literary world at her evening assemblies, in Bolton Row and Marges Street. She was the beloved friend of Mrs. Montagu and Mrs. Carter, in whose correspondence she is called the

Sylph. She seems always to have been eccentric, and was some years before her death in a melancholy state.—CROKER, 1847.

<sup>3</sup> Johnson had been misinformed. Mr. Whyte (p. 131. n. 4.) tells us in his Miscellanea Nova, of the personal civility with which some members of a committee of the Irish House of Commons on a bill for the relief of insolvent debtors treated Mr. Sheridan and Mr. Whyte, who appeared on his behalf, but there is no exception in the act. Sheridan's name is one of some hundreds, and has no distinction whatsoever. The favour he sought was, to be included in the act without being in actual custody, as he was resident in France; this he obtained, but not specially, for one hundred and twenty other persons in similar circumstances are also included. See Schedule to Irish Statute, 5 G. 3. c. 23.—CROKER.

must relish highly. Mr. Burke, whose orderly and amiable domestic habits might make the eye of observation less irksome to him than to most men, said once very pleasantly, in my hearing, "Though I have the honour to represent Bristol, I should not like to live there; I should be obliged to be so much upon my good behaviour." In London, a man may live in splendid society at one time, and in frugal retirement at another, without animadversion. There, and there alone, a man's own house is truly his castle, in which he can be in perfect safety from intrusion whenever he pleases. I never shall forget how well this was expressed to me one day by Mr. Meynell: "The chief advantage of London," said he, "is, that a man is always so near his burrow."

He said of one of his old acquaintances<sup>1</sup>, "He is very fit for a travelling governor. He knows French very well. He is a man of good principles; and there would be no danger that a young gentleman should catch his manner; for it is so very bad, that it must be avoided. In that respect he would be like the drunken Helot."

A gentleman has informed me, that Johnson said of the same person, "Sir, he has the most inverted understanding of any man whom I have ever known."

On Friday, April 2., being Good Friday, I visited him in the morning as usual; and finding that we insensibly fell into a train of ridicule upon the foibles of one of our friends, a very worthy man, I, by way of a check, quoted some good admonition from "The Government of the Tongue," that very pious book. It happened also remarkably enough, that the subject of the sermon preached to us to-day by Dr. Burrows, the rector of St. Clement Danes, was the certainty that at the last day we must give an account of the deeds done in the body;<sup>2</sup> and amongst various acts of culpability he mentioned evil-speaking. As we were moving slowly along in the crowd from church, Johnson jogged my elbow, and said, "Did you attend to the sermon?" "Yes, Sir," said I; "it was very applicable to us." He, however, stood upon the defensive. "Why, Sir, the sense of ridicule is given us, and may be lawfully used.<sup>3</sup> The author of 'The Government of the Tongue' would have us treat all men alike."

In the interval between morning and evening service, he endeavoured to employ himself earnestly in devotional exercise; and, as he has mentioned in his "Prayers and Meditations," gave me "Les Pensées de Paschal," that I might not interrupt him. I preserve the book with reverence. His presenting it to me is marked upon it with his own hand, and I have found in it a truly divine unction. We went to church again in the afternoon.

On Saturday, April 3., I visited him at night, and found him sitting in Mrs. Williams's room, with her, and one who he afterwards told me was a natural son<sup>3</sup> of the second Lord Southwell. The table had a singular appearance, being covered with a heterogeneous assemblage of oysters and porter for his company, and tea for himself. I mentioned my having heard an eminent physician, who was himself a Christian, argue in favour of universal toleration, and maintain, that no man could be hurt by another man's differing from him in opinion. JOHNSON. "Sir, you are to a certain degree hurt by knowing that even one man does not believe."

[ "April 2. — Good Friday. — I am now to review<sup>4</sup> the last year, and find little but dismal vacuity, neither business nor pleasure; much intended, and little done. My health is much broken; my nights afford me little rest. I have tried opium, but its help is counterbalanced with great disturbance; it prevents the spasms, but it hinders sleep. O God, have mercy on me!

"Last week I published (the first part of) the Lives of the Poets, written, I hope, in such a manner as may tend to the promotion of piety.

"In this last year I have made little acquisition; I have scarcely read any thing. I maintain Mrs. Desmoulins and her daughter. Other good of myself I know not where to find, except a little charity. But I am now in my seventieth year; what can be done ought not to be delayed.

"April 3. 1779, 11 P.M. — Easter-eve. — This is the time of my annual review, and annual resolution. The review is comfortless; little done. Part of the Life of Dryden and the Life of Milton have been written; but my mind has neither been improved nor enlarged. I have read little, almost nothing. And I am not conscious that I have gained any good, or quitted any evil habits.

"April 4. 1779, Easter-day. — I rose about half an hour after nine, transcribed the prayer written last night; and by neglecting to count time sat too long at breakfast, so that I came to church at the first lesson. I attended the Litany pretty well; but in the pew could not hear the communion service, and missed the prayer for the church militant. Before I went to the altar, I prayed the occasional prayer. At the altar I commended my  $\Theta$   $\Phi$ <sup>5</sup>, and again prayed the prayer; I then prayed the col-

<sup>1</sup> Probably Mr. Elphinstone, the schoolmaster at Kensington, and translator of Martial, pp. 65. n. 1. & 237. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> This would be exceedingly dangerous as a general position; but it surely is not sound even as to ridicule. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>3</sup> Mauritius Lowe, the painter. See anté, p. 605. n. 5, and post, 9th Sept., 1780, and 12th April, 1783. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> Dr. Johnson's annual review of his conduct appears to have been this year more detailed and severe than usual, and as it contains some particulars of his life at this period, I retain it in the text. — CROKER.

<sup>5</sup> These letters (which Dr. Strahan seems not to have understood, p. 192.) probably mean  $\Theta\eta\tau\alpha\ \Phi\iota\lambda\alpha\iota$ , 'departed friends.' — C., 1831.

Mr. Macaulay objected — in a style of equal courtesy and scholarship — to my conjecture of  $\Theta\eta\tau\alpha\iota$  in the sense of mortui, dead. I may be allowed to say that I knew as well as he that its general sense was mortalis, mortal, and had so translated it, anté, p. 91. n. 1, but I found the other sense in an almost identical passage of Euripides, τεσσαυ θυητων, "dead children." — Supplices, v. 275. This sad blunder Mr. Macaulay, in republishing his Essay, endeavoured to repair by alleging that this passage was "notoriously corrupt:" to which I rejoice, that though two or three modern editors have attempted amendments, the old reading was that of Johnson's own edition, and indeed of every edition that has ever been published up to his time, as it still is of most lects, and again my own prayer by memory. I left out a clause. I then received, I hope with earnestness; and while others received, sat down; but thinking that posture, though usual, improper, I rose and stood. I prayed again, in the pew, but with what prayer I have forgotten. When I used the occasional prayer at the altar, I added a general purpose, — To avoid idleness. I gave two shillings to the plate.

"Before I went I used, I think, my prayer, and endeavoured to calm my mind. After my return I used it again, and the collect for the day. Lord have mercy upon me! I have for some nights called Francis to prayers, and last night discoursed with him on the sacrament." Pr. and Med., p. 171—175.]

On Easter-day, after solemn service at St. Paul's, I dined with him. Mr. Allen, the printer, was also his guest. He was uncommonly silent; and I have not written down any thing, except a single curious fact, which, having the sanction of his inflexible veracity, may be received as a striking instance of human insensibility and inconsideration. As he was passing by a fishmonger who was skinning an eel alive, he heard him "curse it, because it would not lie still."

On Wednesday, April 7., I dined with him at Sir Joshua Reynolds's. I have not marked what company was there. Johnson harangued upon the qualities of different liquors; and poke with great contempt of claret, as so weak, that "a man would be drowned by it before it made him drunk." He was persuaded to drink one glass of it, that he might judge, not from recollection, which might be dim, but from immediate sensation. He shook his head, and said, "Poor stuff! No, Sir, claret is the quor for boys; port for men; but he who spires to be a hero (smiling) must drink brandy. In the first place, the flavour of brandy is most grateful to the palate; and then brandy will do soonest for a man what drinking any do for him. There are, indeed, few who are able to drink brandy. That is a power rather to be wished for than attained. And yet," proceeded he, "as in all pleasure hope is a considerable part, I know not but fruition comes so quick by brandy. Florence wine I think is the worst; it is wine only to the eye; it is fine neither while you are drinking it, nor after you have drunk it; it neither pleases the taste, nor exhilarates the spirits." I reminded him how heartily he and I used to drink wine together, when we were first acquainted; and how I used to have a head-ache after sitting up with him. He did not like to have this recalled; or, perhaps, thinking that I boasted improperly, resolved to have a witty stroke at me: "Nay, Sir, it was not the wine that made your head ache, but the sense that I put into it." BOSWELL. "What, Sir! will sense make the head ache?" JOHNSON. "Yes, Sir (with a smile), when it is not used to it." No man who has a true relish of pleasantry could be offended at this; especially if Johnson in a long intimacy had given him repeated proofs of his regard and good estimation. I used to say that as he had given me a thousand pounds in praise, he had a good right now and then to take a guinea from me.

On Thursday, April 8., I dined with him at Mr. Allan Ramsay's, with Lord Graham<sup>1</sup> and some other company. We talked of Shakspeare's witches. JOHNSON. "They are beings of his own creation<sup>2</sup>; they are a compound of malignity and meanness, without any abilities; and are quite different from the Italian magician. King James says in his 'Dæmonology,' 'Magicians command the devils; witches are their servants.' The Italian magicians are elegant beings." RAMSAY. "Opera witches, not Drury Lane witches." Johnson observed, that abilities might be employed in a narrow sphere, as in getting money, which he said he believed no man could do without vigorous parts, though concentrated to a point. RAMSAY. "Yes, like a strong horse in a mill; he pulls better."

Lord Graham, while he praised the beauty of Lochlomond, on the banks of which is his family seat, complained of the climate, and said he could not bear it. JOHNSON. "Nay, my lord, don't talk so: you may bear it well enough. Your ancestors have borne it more years than I can tell." This was a handsome compliment to the antiquity of the house of Montrose. His Lordship told me afterwards that he had only affected to complain of the climate, lest, if he had spoken as favourably of his country as he really thought, Dr. Johnson might have attacked it. Johnson was very courteous to Lady Margaret Macdonald. "Madam," said he, "when I was in the Isle of Skye [antè, p. 354.] I heard of the people running to take the stones off the road, lest Lady Margaret's horse should stumble."

modern editions, even those of Oxford, 1811, and Glasgow, 1821; and those that question the reading are not themselves read as to what should be substituted. But what can Mr. Scudal say to another passage in the Hercules Furcns, where there is no doubt of either text or meaning: —

Εἰ τις θόγγον ἐισαχέσεται
Θνητῶν παρ' Ἄϊδου. v. 491.

If one should hear a voice of the dead in Hades.

her instances might be cited, but I am not disputing the general meaning; it is enough for the justification of my conjecture to have shown parallel passages in the Greek tragedians, with whom Johnson was most familiar, and which I have little doubt were in his recollection. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>1</sup> The third Duke of Montrose, born in 1755. He succeeded to the dukedom in 1790, and died Dec. 30, 1836. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> I think there must have been some mistake in Boswell's note. Shakspeare adopted the vulgar idea of witches that prevailed in his day, and so Johnson himself states the matter, in his own notes on Macbeth. It is worth remarking that Buchanan gives the Weird Sisters, who appeared to Macbeth, an air of dignity that would have suited a Greek tragedy. "Macbethus quâdam nocte visus esse sibi tres feminas Jornâ augustiore quam humanâ vidisse, quarum una Angustia thaurum — altera Moravia — tertia Regem cum salutasset." Macbeth, one night, fancied he saw three women of a form more august than human, one of whom hailed him, Thane of Angus, the second of Moray, and the third King! — Hist. Scot. l. 7. — CROKER, 1847.

Lord Graham commended Dr. Drummond at Naples [anté, p. 523. n. 1] as a man of extraordinary talents; and added, that he had a great love of liberty. JOHNSON. "He is young, my lord (looking to his lordship with an arch smile); all boys love liberty, till experience convinces them they are not so fit to govern themselves as they imagined.<sup>1</sup> We are all agreed as to our own liberty; we would have as much of it as we can get; but we are not agreed as to the liberty of others: for in proportion as we take, others must lose. I believe we hardly wish that the mob should have liberty to govern us. When that was the case sometime ago, no man was at liberty not to have candles in his windows." RAMSAY. "The result is, that order is better than confusion." JOHNSON. "The result is, that order cannot be had but by subordination."

On Friday, April 16., I had been present at the trial of the unfortunate Mr. Hackman, who, in a fit of frantic jealous love, had shot Miss Ray, the favourite of a nobleman.<sup>2</sup> Johnson, in whose company I dined to-day with some other friends, was much interested by my account of what passed, and particularly with his prayer for the mercy of Heaven. He said, in a solemn fervid tone, "I hope he shall find mercy."

This day<sup>3</sup> a violent altercation arose between Johnson and Beauclerk, which having made much noise at the time, I think it proper, in order to prevent any future misrepresentation, to give a minute account of it.

In talking of Hackman, Johnson argued, as Judge Blackstone had done, that his being furnished with two pistols was a proof that he meant to shoot two persons. Mr. Beauclerk said, "No; for that every wise man who intended to shoot himself took two pistols, that he might be sure of doing it at once. Lord ———'s cook shot himself with one pistol, and lived ten days in great agony. Mr. ———<sup>4</sup>, who loved buttered muffins, but durst not eat them because they disagreed with his stomach, resolved to shoot himself; and then he eat three buttered muffins for breakfast, before shooting himself, knowing that he should not be troubled with indigestion; he had two charged pistols; one was found lying charged upon the table by him, after he had shot himself with the other." — "Well," said Johnson, with an air of triumph, "you see here one pistol was sufficient." Beauclerk replied smartly, "Because it happened to kill him." And either then or a very little afterwards, being piqued at Johnson's triumphant remark, added, "This is what you don't know, and I do." There was then a cessation of the dispute; and some minutes intervened, during which, dinner and the glass went on cheerfully; when Johnson suddenly and abruptly exclaimed, "Mr. Beauclerk, how came you to talk so petulantly to me, as 'This is what you don't know, but what I know?' One thing I know which you don't seem to know, that you are very uncivil." BEAUCLERK. "Because you began by being uncivil (which you always are)." The words in parentheses were, I believe, not heard by Dr. Johnson. Here again there was a cessation of arms. Johnson told me, that the reason why he waited at first some time without taking any notice of what Mr. Beauclerk said, was because he was thinking whether he should resent it. But when he considered that there were present a young lord and an eminent traveller, two men of the world, with whom he had never dined before, he was apprehensive that they might think they had a right to take such liberties with him as Beauclerk did, and therefore resolved he would not let it pass; adding, "that he would not appear a coward." A little while after this, the conversation turned on the violence of Hackman's temper. Johnson then said, "It was his business to command his temper, as my friend, Mr. Beauclerk, should have done some time ago." BEAUCLERK. "I should learn of you, Sir." JOHNSON. "Sir, you have given me opportunities enough of learning, when I have been in your company. No man loves to be treated with contempt." BEAUCLERK (with a polite inclination towards Johnson). "Sir, you have known me twenty years, and however I may have treated others, you may be sure I could never treat you with contempt." JOHNSON. "Sir, you have said more than was necessary." Thus it ended; and Beauclerk's coach not having come for him till very late, Dr. Johnson and another gentleman sat with him a long time after the rest of the company were gone; and he and I dined at Beauclerk's on the Saturday se'nnight following.

After this tempest had subsided, I recollect the following particulars of his conversation:

"I am always for getting a boy forward in his learning; for that is a sure good. I would let him at first read any English book which happens to engage his attention; because you have done a great deal, when you have brought him to have entertainment from a book. He'll get better books afterwards."

"Mallet, I believe, never wrote a single line of his projected life of the Duke of Marlborough. He groped for materials, and thought of it, till he had exhausted his mind. Thus

<sup>1</sup> His lordship was twenty-four. Lord Graham soon after allied himself with Mr. Pitt, and was a steady Tory to his death. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> John, sixth Earl of Sandwich, at this time first Lord of the Admiralty. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> At the Club. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> It was thought that Mr. Damer (whose suicide is recorded in the Gentleman's Magazine for 1776, p. 383.) was here meant; but I have since ascertained that it was Johnson's old friend, Mr. Fitzherbert, who terminated his own life January 2. 1772 (see ante, p. 255. n. 4.). This correction so far important, that perhaps Mr. Beauclerk's levity mentioning an event which was probably very painful to Johnson, may have disposed him to the subsequent, and, in such case, excusable asperity. — CROKER, 1835.

sometimes happens that men entangle themselves in their own schemes."

"To be contradicted in order to force you to talk is mighty displeasing. You shine, indeed; but it is by being ground."

Of a gentleman who made some figure among the literati of his time [Mr. Fitzherbert], he said, "What eminence he had was by a felicity of manner: he had no more earning than what he could not help."

On Saturday, April 24, I dined with him at Mr. Beauclerk's, with Sir Joshua Reynolds, Mr. Jones (afterwards Sir William), Mr. Langton, Mr. Steevens, Mr. Paradise, and Dr. Higgs. I mentioned that Mr. Wilkes had attacked Garrick to me, as a man who had no friend. JOHNSON. "I believe he is right, Sir. Οι φίλοι, ου φίλος—He had friends, but no friend.<sup>1</sup> Garrick was so diffused, he had no man to whom he wished to unbosom himself. He found people always ready to applaud him, and that always for the same thing: so he saw life with great uniformity." I took upon me, for once, to fight with Goliath's weapons, and play the sophist.—"Garrick did not need a friend, as he got from every body all he wanted. What is a friend? One who supports you, and comforts you, while others do not. Friendship, you know, Sir, is the cordial drop, 'to make the nauseous draught of life go down:' but if the draught be not nauseous, if it be all sweet, there is no occasion for that drop." JOHNSON. "Many men would not be content to live so. I hope I should not. They would wish to have an intimate friend, with whom they might compare minds, and cherish private virtues." One of the company mentioned Lord Chesterfield, a man who had no friend. JOHNSON. "There were more materials to make friendship in Garrick, had he not been so diffused." OSWELL. "Garrick was pure gold, but beat it to thin leaf. Lord Chesterfield was useful."<sup>2</sup> JOHNSON. "Garrick was a very good man, the cheerfullest man of his age; a decent liver in a profession which is supposed to give indulgence to licentiousness; and a man who gave away freely money acquired by himself. He began the world with a great hunger for money; the son of a half-pay officer, bred in a family whose study was to take four-pence do as much as others made four-pence-halfpenny do. But when he had got money, he was very liberal." I presumed to animadvert on his eulogy on Garrick, in his "Lives of the Poets." "You say, Sir, his death eclipsed the gaiety of nations." JOHNSON. "I could not have said more or less. It is the truth; eclipsed, not extinguished; and his death did eclipse; it was like a storm." BOSWELL. "But why nations? Did his gaiety extend further than his own nation?" JOHNSON. "Why, Sir, some exaggeration must be allowed. Besides, nations may be said, if we allow the Scotch to be a nation, and to have gaiety—which they have not. You are an exception, though. Come, gentlemen, let us candidly admit that there is one Scotchman who is cheerful." BEAUCLERK. "But he is a very unnatural Scotchman." I, however, continued to think the compliment to Garrick hyperbolically untrue. His acting had ceased some time before his death; at any rate, he had acted in Ireland but a short time, at an early period of his life, and never in Scotland. I objected, also, to what appears an anti-climax of praise, when contrasted with the preceding panegyric—"and diminished the public stock of harmless pleasure!" "Is not harmless pleasure very tame?" JOHNSON. "Nay, Sir, harmless pleasure is the highest praise. Pleasure is a word of dubious import; pleasure is in general dangerous, and pernicious to virtue; to be able, therefore, to furnish pleasure that is harmless, pleasure pure and unalloyed, is as great a power as man can possess." This was, perhaps, as ingenious a defence as could be made; still, however, I was not satisfied.<sup>3</sup>

A celebrated wit<sup>4</sup> being mentioned, he said, "One may say of him, as was said of a French wit, Il n'a de l'esprit que contre Dieu. I have been several times in company with him, but never perceived any strong power of wit. He produces a general effect by various means; he has a cheerful countenance and a gay voice. Besides, his trade is wit. It would be as wild in him to come into company without merriment, as for a highwayman to take the road without his pistols."

Talking of the effects of drinking, he said, "Drinking may be practised with great prudence; a man who exposes himself when he is intoxicated has not the art of getting drunk; a sober man who happens occasionally to get drunk, readily enough goes into a new company, which a man who has been drinking should never do. Such a man will undertake any thing; he is without skill in inebriation.

<sup>1</sup> See anté, p. 64. and 593. n. 1. — C.

<sup>2</sup> Boswell did not here mean (as it has been sometimes understood) to call Lord Chesterfield's talents and accretions insol; the allusion was to the pretence—the usual profession—of friendship, with which Johnson reproached Lord Chesterfield, and which Boswell, to please the doctor, thus repeats. — CROKER, 1835.

<sup>3</sup> Most readers will agree with Boswell, that this eulogium is not very happily expressed; yet Mrs. Garrick had inscribed on the cenotaph erected to Garrick's memory in Lichfield Cathedral—no doubt out of respect to Johnson, and as giving an opportunity of recording the friendship between them. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>4</sup> Horace Walpole and George Selwyn have been both suggested to me as here meant; but I find no trace of Selwyn in Johnson's circle, and I doubt as to Walpole—because I think he was too well bred to offend a mixed company by anything like habitual impiety; and certainly it cannot be said that he had no wit but in that line. I take this opportunity of observing on Mrs. Piozzi's story of "a dead wit," anté, p. 272. n. 5., that Mr. Malone, who asserted that Mr. Gibbon (who survived Johnson) was meant, believed that Mrs. Piozzi had represented the person as dead, either by the habitual inaccuracy of which he unjustly accused her, or as a blind; but I confess that on a fuller consideration I believe Mrs. Piozzi's statement, and am further satisfied that neither Hume nor Gibbon could be meant by her description of "a celebrated wit." — CROKER, 1847.

I used to slink home when I had drunk too much. A man accustomed to self-examination will be conscious when he is drunk, though an habitual drunkard will not be conscious of it. I knew a physician<sup>1</sup>, who for twenty years was not sober; yet in a pamphlet, which he wrote upon fevers, he appealed to Garrick and me for his vindication from a charge of drunkenness. A bookseller<sup>2</sup> (naming him), who got a large fortune by trade, was so habitually and equally drunk, that his most intimate friends never perceived that he was more sober at one time than another."

Talking of celebrated and successful irregular practisers in physic, he said, "Taylor<sup>3</sup> was the most ignorant man I ever knew, but sprightly; Ward<sup>4</sup>, the dullest. Taylor challenged me once to talk Latin with him," laughing. "I quoted some of Horace, which he took to be a part of my own speech. He said a few words well enough." BEAUCLERK. "I remember, Sir, you said, that Taylor was an instance how far impudence could carry ignorance." Mr. Beauclerk was very entertaining this day, and told us a number of short stories in a lively elegant manner, and with that air of the world which has I know not what impressive effect, as if there were something more than is expressed, or than perhaps we could perfectly understand. As Johnson and I accompanied Sir Joshua Reynolds in his coach, Johnson said, "There is in Beauclerk a predominance over his company, that one does not like. But he is a man who has lived so much in the world, that he has a short story on every occasion: he is always ready to talk, and is never exhausted."

Johnson and I passed the evening at Miss Reynolds's, Sir Joshua's sister. I mentioned that an eminent friend<sup>5</sup> of ours, talking of the common remark, that affection descends, said, that "this was wisely<sup>6</sup> contrived for the preservation of mankind; for which it was not so necessary that there should be affection from children to parents, as from parents to children; nay, there would be no harm in that view, though children should at a certain age eat their parents." JOHNSON. "But, Sir, if this were known generally to be the case, parents would not have affection for children." BOSWELL. "True, Sir; for it is in expectation of a return that parents are so attentive to their children; and I know a very pretty instance of a little girl of whom her father<sup>7</sup> was very fond, who once, when he was in a melancholy fit, and had gone to bed, persuaded him to rise in good humour by saying, 'My dear papa, please to get up, and let me help you on with your clothes, that I may learn to do it when you are an old man.'

Soon after this time a little incident occurred, which I will not suppress, because I am desirous that my work should be, as much as is consistent with the strictest truth, an antidote to the false and injurious notions of his character, which have been given by others, and therefore I infuse every drop of genuine sweetness into my biographical cup.

BOSWELL TO JOHNSON.

"South Audley Street<sup>8</sup>, Monday, April 26.

"MY DEAR SIR, — I am in great pain with an inflamed foot, and obliged to keep my bed, so am prevented from having the pleasure to dine at Mr. Ramsay's to-day, which is very hard; and my spirits are sadly sunk. Will you be so friendly as to come and sit an hour with me in the evening? I am ever yours, &c., JAMES BOSWELL."

JOHNSON TO BOSWELL.

"Harley Street,<sup>9</sup>

"MR. JOHNSON laments the absence of Mr. Boswell, and will come to him."

He came to me in the evening, and brought Sir Joshua Reynolds. I need scarcely say, that their conversation, while they sat by my bedside, was the most pleasing opiate to pain that could have been administered.

Johnson being now better disposed to obtain information concerning Pope than he was last year [p. 613.], sent by me to my Lord Marchmont a present of those volumes of his "Lives of the Poets" which were at this time published, with a request to have permission to wait on him; and his lordship, who had called on him twice, obligingly appointed Saturday, the 1st of May, for receiving us.

On that morning Johnson came to me from Streatham, and after drinking chocolate a General Paoli's in South Audley Street, w. proceeded to Lord Marchmont's in Curzon Street. His lordship met us at the door of his library, and with great politeness said to Johnson, "I am not going to make an encomium upon myself, by telling you the high respect I have for you, Sir." Johnson was exceedingly courteous; and the interview, which lasted about two hours, during which the ear communicated his anecdotes of Pope, was agreeable as I could have wished.<sup>10</sup> When I came out, I said to Johnson, "that, consideri

<sup>1</sup> Dr. James, the inventor of the celebrated fever powders. — WRIGHT.

<sup>2</sup> This was Andrew Millar, of whom, when talking one day of the patronage the great sometimes affect to give to literature and literary men, Johnson said, "Andrew Millar is the Mecenas of the age." — Havok. Apoph. p. 200. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> The Chevalier Taylor, the celebrated oculist. — MALONE.

<sup>4</sup> Dr. Joshua Ward, the celebrated quack, first began to practise physic about the year 1733, and combated, for some time, the united efforts of wit, learning, argument, and ridicule. He died in 1761. — WRIGHT.

<sup>5</sup> Probably Mr. Burke. — CROKER.

<sup>6</sup> Wisely and mercifully: wisely, to ensure the preservation and education of children; and mercifully, to render afflictive the loss of parents, which, in the course of nature children must suffer. — CROKER.

<sup>7</sup> Mr. Boswell himself. — CROKER.

<sup>8</sup> The residence of General Paoli. — CROKER.

<sup>9</sup> Allan Ramsay's residence, No. 67. Harley Street, w. his son, Colonel John Ramsay, occupied in 1800. — P. C. NINGHAM.

<sup>10</sup> His first question, as he told Sir J. Hawkins, was, "W

his lordship's civility, I should have been vexed if he had again failed to come." "Sir," said he, "I would rather have given twenty pounds than not have come." I accompanied him to Streatham, where we dined, and returned to town in the evening.

On Monday, May 3, I dined with him at Mr. Dilly's. I pressed him this day for his opinion on the passage in Parnell, concerning which I had in vain questioned him in several letters, and at length obtained it in due form of law.

"CASE FOR DR. JOHNSON'S OPINION;

"May 3. 1779.

"Parnell, in his 'Hermit,' has the following passage:—

'To clear this doubt, to know the world by sight,
To find if books and swains report it right
(For yet by swains alone the world he knew, Whose feet came wand'ring o'er the nightly dew).'

"Is there not a contradiction in its being first supposed that the Hermit knew both what books and swains reported of the world; yet afterwards said, that he knew it by swains alone?"

"I think it an inaccuracy. He mentions two instructors in the first line, and says he had only one in the next."<sup>1</sup>

This evening I set out for Scotland.

[JOHNSON TO MRS. ASTON.

"May 4. 1779.

"DEAR MADAM,—When I sent you the little books, I was not sure that you were well enough to take the trouble of reading them, but have lately heard from Mr. Greeves that you are much recovered. I hope you will gain more and more strength, and live many and many years, and I shall come again to Stowhill, and live as I used to do, with you and dear Mrs. Gastrell.

"I am not well; my nights are very troublesome, and my breath is short; but I know not that it grows much worse. I wish to see you. Mrs. Harvey has just sent to me to dine with her, and I have promised to wait on her to-morrow.

"Mr. Green comes home loaded with curiosities<sup>2</sup>, and will be able to give his friends new entertainment. When I come, it will be great entertainment to me if I can find you and Mrs. Gastrell well, and willing to receive me. I am, dearest Madam, &c.,

SAM. JOHNSON." ]
— Pemb. MSS.

[JOHNSON TO MRS. PORTER.

"May 4. 1779.

"DEAR MADAM,—Mr. Green has informed me that you are much better; I hope I need not tell you that I am glad of it. I cannot boast of being much better; my old nocturnal complaint still pursues me, and my respiration is difficult, though much easier than when I left you the summer before last. Mr. and Mrs. Thrane are well; Miss has been a little indisposed, but she is got well again. They have, since the loss of their boy, had two daughters; but they seem likely to want a son.

"I hope you had some books which I sent you. I was sorry for poor Mrs. Adey's death, and am afraid you will be sometimes solitary; but endeavour, whether alone or in company, to keep yourself cheerful. My friends likewise die very fast; but such is the state of man. I am, dear Love, your, &c.,
SAM. JOHNSON." ]
— Pemb. MSS.

He had, before I left London, resumed the conversation concerning the appearance of a ghost at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, which Mr. John Wesley believed, but to which Johnson did not give credit. I was, however, desirous to examine the question closely, and at the same time wished to be made acquainted with Mr. John Wesley; for though I differed from him in some points, I admired his various talents, and loved his pious zeal. At my request, therefore, Dr. Johnson gave me a letter of introduction to him.

JOHNSON TO JOHN WESLEY.

"May 5. 1779.

"SIR,—Mr. Boswell, a gentleman who has been long known to me, is desirous of being known to you, and has asked this recommendation, which I give him with great willingness, because I think it very much to be wished that worthy and religious men should be acquainted with each other. I am, Sir, &c.,
SAM. JOHNSON."

Mr. Wesley being in the course of his ministry at Edinburgh, I presented this letter to kind of a man was Mr. Pope in his conversation?" His lordship answered, "That if the conversation did not take something of a lively or epigrammatic turn, he fell asleep, or, perhaps, pretended to be so." — CROKER.

<sup>1</sup> "I do not," says Mr. Malone, "see any difficulty in this passage, and wonder that Dr. Johnson should have acknowledged it to be inaccurate. The Hermit, it should be observed, had no actual experience of the world whatsoever: all his knowledge concerning it had been obtained in two ways; from books, and from the relations of those country swains who had seen a little of it. The plain meaning, therefore, is, "To clear his doubts concerning Providence, and to obtain some knowledge of the world by actual experience; to see whether the accounts furnished by books, or by the oral communications of swains, were just representations of it; [I say swains,] for his oral or vivâ voce information had been obtained from that part of mankind alone, &c. The word alone here does not relate to the whole of the preceding line, as has been supposed, but, by a common licence, to the words, of all mankind, which are understood, and of which it is restrictive." Mr. Malone, it must be owned, has shown much critical ingenuity in his explanation of this passage. His interpretation, however, seems to me much too reconcile. The meaning of the passage may be certain enough; but surely the expression is confused, and one part of it contradictory to the other. — BOSWELL.

It is odd enough that these critics did not think it worth their while to consult the original for the exact words on which they were exercising their ingenuity. Parnell's words are not, "if books and swains," but, "if books or swains," which might mean, not that books and swains agreed, but that they differed, and that the Hermit's doubt was excited by the difference between his instructors. There is, no doubt, a clumsy ambiguity in the expression, but the meaning obviously is that, of men, he knew swains only. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> Mr. Green, it will be recollected, had a museum at Lichfield. — CROKER.

him, and was very politely received. I begged to have it returned to me, which was accordingly done. His state of the evidence as to the ghost did not satisfy me.<sup>1</sup>

[JOHNSON TO MRS. THRALE.

(Extracts.)

Lichfield, May 29. 1779. — "I have now been here a week, and will try to give you my journal, or such parts of it as are fit, in my mind, for communication.

"On Friday, We set out about twelve, and lay at Daventry.

"On Saturday, We dined with Rann at Coventry. He intercepted us at the town's end. I saw Tom Johnson, who had hardly life to know that I was with him. I hear he is since dead. In the evening I came to Lucy, and walked to Stowhill. Mrs. Aston was gone, or going to bed. I did not see her.

"Sunday. — After dinner I went to Stowhill, and was very kindly received. At night I saw my old friend Brodthurst — you know him — the play-fellow of my infancy, and gave him a guinea.

"Monday. — Dr. Taylor came, and we went with Mrs. Cobb to Greenhill Bower. I had not seen it, perhaps, for fifty years. It is much degenerated. Every thing grows old.

"Tuesday. — I dined, I think, with Lucy both Monday and Tuesday.

"Wednesday, Thursday. — I had a few visits, from Peter Garrick among the rest, and dined at Stowhill. My breath very short.

"Friday. — I dined at Stowhill.

"Saturday. — Mrs. Aston took me out in her chaise, and was very kind. I dined with Mrs. Cobb, and came to Lucy, with whom I found, as I had done the first day, Lady Smith and Miss Vyse."

Ashbourne, June 14. 1779. — "Your account of Mr. Thrale's illness<sup>2</sup> is very terrible; but when I remember that he seems to have it peculiar to his constitution — that whatever distemper he has, he always has his head affected — I am less frightened. The seizure was, I think, not apoplectical, but hysterical, and therefore not dangerous to life. I would have you, however, consult such physicians as you think you can best trust. Bromfield seems to have done well, and, by his practice, seems not to suspect an apoplexy. That is a solid and fundamental comfort. I remember Dr. Marsigli, an Italian physician, whose seizure was more violent than Mr. Thrale's, for he fell down helpless; but his case was not considered as of much danger, and he went safe home, and is now a professor at Padua. His fit was considered as only hysterical."

Ashbourne, June 17. 1779. — "It is certain that your first letter did not alarm me in proportion to the danger, for indeed it did not describe the danger as it was. I am glad that you have Heberden: and hope his restoratives and his preservatives will both be effectual. In the preservatives, dear Mr. Thrale must concur; yet what can he reform? or what can he add to his regularity and temperance? He can only sleep less. We will do, however, all we can. I go to Lichfield to-morrow, with intent to hasten to Streatham.

"Both Mrs. Aston and Dr. Taylor have had strokes of the palsy. The lady was sixty-eight, and at that age has gained ground upon it; the doctor is, you know, not young, and he is quite well, only suspicious of every sensation in the pectant arm. I hope my dear master's case is yet slighter, and that, as his age is less, his recovery will be more perfect. Let him keep his thoughts diverted, and his mind easy."<sup>3</sup>

— Letters.

JOHNSON TO THRALE.

"Lichfield, June 23. 1779.

"DEAR SIR, — To show you how well I think of your health, I have sent you an hundred pounds to keep for me. It will come within one day of quarter-day, and that day you must give me. I came by it in a very uncommon manner<sup>4</sup>, and would not confound it with the rest.

"My wicked mistress talks as if she thought it possible for me to be indifferent or negligent about your health or hers. If I could have done any good, I had not delayed an hour to come to you, and I will come very soon to try if my advice can be of any use, or my company of any entertainment.<sup>5</sup>

"What can be done, you must do for yourself. Do not let any uneasy thought settle in your mind. Cheerfulness and exercise are your great remedies. Nothing is for the present worth your anxiety. Vivere lati is one of the great rules of health. I believe it will be good to ride often, but never to weariness; for weariness is itself a temporary resolution of the nerves, and is therefore to be avoided. Labour is exercise continued to fatigue; exercise is labour used only while it produces pleasure.

"Above all, keep your mind quiet. Do not think with earnestness even of your health, but think on such things as may please without too much agitation; among which, I hope, is, dear Sir, your, &c.,
SAM. JOHNSON."

— Letters.

JOHNSON TO MISS REYNOLDS.

"London, June 27. 1779.

"DEAR MADAM, — I have sent what I can for your German friend. At this time it is very difficult to get any money, and I cannot give much.<sup>6</sup> I am, Madam, your most affectionate and most humble servant,
SAM. JOHNSON."

— Reyn. MSS.]

<sup>1</sup> Dr. Johnson made this year his annual excursion into the midland counties, of which he, as usual, gave Mrs. Thrale an account in several letters; but his visit was shortened by the alarming illness of Mr. Thrale. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> A serious apoplectic attack, which was the precursor of another of the same nature, which terminated his existence in the course of the ensuing year. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> To assist in keeping the patient's mind easy, he considerably wrote him the next letter. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>4</sup> Was it from the Minister for his recent pamphlet? — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>5</sup> He came to town soon after this letter, as appears by his next letter. — CROKER.

<sup>6</sup> It is due to the memory of Dr. Johnson's inexhaustible charity to insert this otherwise insignificant note. When he says that he cannot give much, let it be recollected, that his only fixed income was his pension of 300*l.* a year, and that he had four or five cleemosynary inmates in his house. — CROKER.

CHAPTER LXIX.

1779.

Experiments on the Constancy of Friends. — Colonel James Stuart. — Choice of Guardians. — Adventurers to the East Indies. — Poor of London. — Pope's "Essay on Man." — Lord Bolingbroke. Johnson's Residences in London. — Conjugal Infidelity. — Roman Catholics. — Helps to the Study of Greek. — Middlesex Election. — House of Commons. — Right of Expulsion. — George Whitefield. — Philip Astley. — Keeping Company with Infidels. — Irish Union. — Vulgar Prosperity. — "The Ambassador says well." — Correspondence.

I DID not write to Johnson, as usual, upon my return to my family; but tried how he would be affected by my silence. Mr. Dilly sent me a copy of a note which he received from him on the 13th of July, in these words:—

JOHNSON TO DILLY.

"STR,— Since Mr. Boswell's departure, I have never heard from him. Please to send word what you know of him, and whether you have sent my books to his lady. I am, &c.,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

My readers will not doubt that his solicitude about me was very flattering.

JOHNSON TO BOSWELL.

"July 13. 1779.

"DEAR SIR,— What can possibly have happened, that keeps us two such strangers to each other? I expected to have heard from you when you came home; I expected afterwards. I went into the country and returned; and yet there is no letter from Mr. Boswell. No ill, I hope, has happened; and if ill should happen, why should it be concealed from him who loves you? Is it a fit of humour, that has disposed you to try who can hold out longest without writing? If it be, you have the victory. But I am afraid of something bad; set me free from my suspicions.

"My thoughts are at present employed in guessing the reason of your silence: you must not expect that I should tell you any thing, if I had any thing to tell. Write, pray write to me, and let me know what is or what has been the cause of this long interruption. I am, dear Sir, your most affectionate humble servant,

SAM. JOHNSON."

BOSWELL TO JOHNSON.

"Edinburgh, July 17. 1779.

"MY DEAR SIR,— What may be justly denominated a supine indolence of mind has been my state of existence since I last returned to Scotland. In a livelier state I had often suffered severely from long intervals of silence on your part; and I had even been chid by you for expressing my uneasiness. I was willing to take advantage of my insensibility, and while I could bear the experiment, to try whether your affection for me would, after an unusual silence on my part, make you write first. This afternoon I have had a very high satisfaction by receiving your kind letter of inquiry, for which I most gratefully thank you. I am doubtful if it was right to make the experiment; though I have gained by it. I was beginning to grow tender, and to upbraid myself, especially after having dreamt two nights ago that I was with you. I, and my wife, and my four children, are all well. I would not delay one post to answer your letter; but as it is late, I have not time to do more. You shall soon hear from me, upon many and various particulars; and I shall never again put you to any test. I am, with veneration, my dear Sir, your,

JAMES BOSWELL."

On the 22d of July, I wrote to him again; and gave him an account of my last interview with my worthy friend, Mr. Edward Dilly, at his brother's house at Southill in Bedfordshire, where he died soon after I parted from him, leaving me a very kind remembrance of his regard.

I informed him that Lord Hailes, who had promised to furnish him with some anecdotes for his "Lives of the Poets," had sent me three instances of Prior's borrowing from Gombauld, in Recueil des Poètes, tome 3. Epigram "To John I owed great obligation," p. 25. "To the Duke of Noailles," p. 32. "Sauntering Jack and idle Joan," p. 35.

My letter was a pretty long one, and contained a variety of particulars; but he, it should seem, had not attended to it; for his next to me was as follows:—

JOHNSON TO BOSWELL.

"Streatham, Sept. 9. 1779.

"MY DEAR SIR,— Are you playing the same trick again, and trying who can keep silence longest? Remember that all tricks are either knavish or childish; and that it is as foolish to make experiments upon the constancy of a friend, as upon the chastity of a wife.

"What can be the cause of this second fit of silence, I cannot conjecture; but after one trick, I will not be cheated by another, nor will harass my thoughts with conjectures about the motives of a man who, probably, acts only by caprice. I therefore suppose you are well, and that Mrs. Boswell is well too, and that the fine summer has restored Lord Auchinleck. I am much better than you left me; I think I am better than when I was in Scotland.

"I forgot whether I informed you that poor Thrale has been in great danger. Mrs. Thrale likewise has miscarried, and been much indisposed. Every body else is well. Langton is in camp. I intend to put Lord Hailes's description of Dryden<sup>1</sup> into another edition, and, as I know his accuracy, wish he would consider the dates, which I could not always settle to my own mind.

"Mr. Thrale goes to Brightelmstone, about Michaelmas, to be jolly and ride a-hunting. I shall go to town, or perhaps to Oxford. Exercise and gaiety, or rather carelessness, will, I hope, dissipate all remains of his malady; and I likewise hope, by the change of place<sup>1</sup>, to find some opportunities of growing yet better myself. I am, dear Sir, your, &c.,

<sup>1</sup> Which I communicated to him from his Lordship, but it has not yet been published. I have a copy of it. — BOSWELL. The few notices concerning Dryden, which Lord Hailes had collected, Mr. Boswell afterwards gave me. — MALONE.

SAM. JOHNSON."

[“ September, 1779.

“ On the 17th, Mr. Chamier took me away with him from Streatham. I left the servants a guinea for my health, and was content enough to escape into a house where my birth-day, not being known, could not be mentioned. I sat up till midnight was past, and the day of a new year—a very awful day—began. I prayed to God, who had safely brought me to the beginning of another year, but could not perfectly recollect the prayer, and supplied it. Such desecutions of memory I have always had. When I arose on the 18th, I think I prayed again, then walked with my friend into his grounds. When I came back, after some time passed in the library, finding myself oppressed by sleepiness, I retired to my chamber, where by lying down, and a short imperfect slumber, I was refreshed, and prayed as the night before. I then dined and trifled in the parlour and library, and was freed from a scruple about Horace. At last I went to bed, having first composed a prayer.

19th, Sunday. — I went to church and attended the service. I found at church a time to use my prayer, ‘ O Lord, have mercy, &c.’”<sup>2</sup> — Prayers and Med., p. 222.]

My readers will not be displeas'd at being told every slight circumstance of the manner in which Dr. Johnson contriv'd to amuse his solitary hours. He sometimes employ'd himself in chemistry, sometimes in watering and pruning a vine, sometimes in small experiments, at which those who may smile should recollect that there are moments which admit of being soothed only by trifles.<sup>3</sup>

On the 20th of September I defend'd myself against his suspicion of me, which I did not deserve; and add'd, “ Pray let us write frequently. A whim strikes me, that we should send off a sheet once a week, like a stage-coach, whether it be full or not; nay, though it should be empty. The very sight of your handwriting would comfort me; and were a sheet to be thus sent regularly, we should much oftener convey something, were it only a few kind words.

My friend, Colonel James Stuart<sup>4</sup>, second son of the Earl of Bute, who had distinguished himself as a good officer of the Bedfordshire militia, had taken a public-spirited resolution to serve his country in its difficulties, by raising a regular regiment, and taking the command of it himself. This, in the heir of the immense property of Wortley, was highly honourable. Having been in Scotland recruiting, he obligingly asked me to accompany him to Leeds, then the head-quarters of his corps; from thence to London for a short time, and afterwards to other places to which the regiment might be ordered. Such an offer, at a time of the year when I had full leisure, was very pleasing; especially as I was to accompany a man of sterling good sense, information, discernment, and conviviality, and was to have a second crop, in one year, of London and Johnson. Of this I inform'd my illustrious friend in characteristical warm terms in a letter dated the 30th of September, from Leeds.

On Monday, October 4., I call'd at his house before he was up. He sent for me to his bedside, and express'd his satisfaction at this incidental meeting, with as much vivacity as if he had been in the gaiety of youth. He call'd briskly, “ Frank, go and get coffee, and let us breakfast in splendour.”

During this visit to London, I had several interviews with him, which it is unnecessary to distinguish particularly. I consult'd him as to the appointment of guardians to my children in case of my death. “ Sir,” said he, “ do not appoint a number of guardians. When there are many, they trust one to another, and the business is neglected. I would advise you to choose only one: let him be a man of respectable character, who, for his own credit, will do what is right; let him be a rich man, so that he may be under no temptation to take advantage; and let him be a man of business, who is used to conduct affairs with ability and expertness, to whom, therefore, the execution of the trust will not be burthensome.”

[JOHNSON TO MRS. THRALE.

“ Oct. 8. 1779. — On Sunday the gout left my ankles, and I went very commodiously to church.

<sup>1</sup> It appears by the extract from his Prayers and Meditations, that he went for a few days with his friend Antony Chamier, (aut., 521. n. 3.) to his villa, near Epsom: I could “ to escape to a house where his birthday (18th Sept.) could not be mention'd. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>2</sup> I do not find any prayer in the printed collection beginning with these precise words. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>3</sup> In one of his manuscript Diaries, there is the following entry, which marks his curious minute attention: — “ July 25. 1768. — I shaved my nail by accident in wetting the knife, about an eighth of an inch from the bottom, and about a fourth from the top. This I measure that I may know the growth of nails; the whole is about five eighths of an inch.” Another of the same kind appears August 7. 1779: “ Partem brachii dextri carpo proximam et cutem pectoris circa manillum dextram rasi, ut notum fieret quanto temporis pili renouentur.” And, “ August 15. 1783: — I cut from the vine forty-one leaves, which weigh'd five ounces and a half, and eight scruples: I lay them upon my bookcase, to see what weight they will lose by drying.” — BOSWELL. “ Dr. Johnson was always exceedingly fond of chemistry; and we made up a sort of laboratory at Streatham one summer, and divert'd ourselves with drawing essences and colouring liquors. But the danger in which Mr. Thrale found his friend one day, when I had driven to London, and he had got the children and servants assembled round him to see some experiments performed, put an end to all our entertainment; as Mr. Thrale was perswaded that his short sight would have occasion'd his destruction in a moment by bringing him close to a fierce and violent flame. Indeed, it was a perpetual miracle that he did not set himself on fire reading aloud, as was his constant custom, which quite unable even to keep clear of mischief with our best help; and accordingly the foretops of all his wigs were burn'd by the candle down to the very network. Future experiments in chemistry, however, were too dangerous, and Mr. Thrale insist'd that we should do no more towards finding the philosopher's stone.” — Piozzi. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> Colonel Stuart assum'd successively the names of Wortley and Mackenzie, but was best known as Mr. Stuart Wortley. He was the father of the first Lord Wharfedale, and died in 1814. We cannot but smile at Boswell's hyperbolical applause of his friend's heroism. — CROKER.

On Monday night I felt my feet uneasy. On Tuesday I was quite lame: that night I took an opiate, having first taken physic and fasted. Towards morning on Wednesday the pain remitted. Bozzy came to me, and much talk we had. I fasted another day; and on Wednesday night could walk tolerably. On Thursday, finding myself mending, I ventured on my dinner, which I think has a little interrupted my convalescence. To-day I have again taken physic, and eaten only some stewed apples. I hope to starve it away. It is no worse than it was at Brightielmstone.]"

—Letters.

On Sunday, October 10., we dined together at Mr. Strahan's. The conversation having turned on the prevailing practice of going to the East Indies in quest of wealth;—JOHNSON. "A man had better have ten thousand pounds at the end of ten years passed in England, than twenty thousand pounds at the end of ten years passed in India, because you must compute what you give for money; and the man who has lived ten years in India has given up ten years of social comfort, and all those advantages which arise from living in England. The ingenious Mr. Brown, distinguished by the name of Capability Brown<sup>1</sup>, told me, that he was once at the seat of Lord Clive, who had returned from India with great wealth; and that he showed him at the door of his bed-chamber a large chest, which he said he had once had full of gold; upon which Brown observed, 'I am glad you can bear it so near your bed-chamber.'"<sup>2</sup>

We talked of the state of the poor in London. JOHNSON. "Saunders Welch, the justice, who was once high-constable of Holborn, and had the best opportunities of knowing the state of the poor, told me, that I underrated the number, when I computed that twenty a week, that is, above a thousand a year, died of hunger; not absolutely of immediate hunger, but of the wasting and other diseases which are the consequences of hunger. This happens only in so large a place as London, where people are not known. What we are told about the great sums got by begging is not true: the trade is overstocked. And, you may depend upon it, there are many who cannot get work. A particular kind of manufacture fails: those who have been used to work at it can, for some time, work at nothing else. You meet a man begging; you charge him with idleness: he says, 'I am willing to labour. Will you give me work?'—'I cannot.'—'Why, then, you have no right to charge me with idleness.'"

<sup>1</sup> Lancelot Brown, Esq., the celebrated landscape gardener, who acquired his cognomen from his habit of saying that the place he came to advise upon had "capabilities."—CROKER, 1847.

<sup>2</sup> See ante, pp. 609—615, the circumstances that gave point to Brown's remark.—CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> The Rev. Dr. Law, Bishop of Carlisle, in the preface to his valuable edition of Archbishop King's "Essay on the Origin of Evil," mentions that the principles maintained in it had been adopted by Pope in his "Essay on Man;" and adds, "The fact, notwithstanding such denial (Bishop Warburton's), might have been strictly verified by an unexceptionable testi-

We left Mr. Strahan's at seven, as Johnson had said he intended to go to evening prayers. As we walked alone, he complained of a little gout in his toe, and said, "I sha'n't go to prayers to-night: I shall go to-morrow: whenever I miss church on a Sunday, I resolve to go another day. But I do not always do it."<sup>3</sup> This was a fair exhibition of that vibration between pious resolutions and indolence, which many of us have too often experienced.

I went home with him, and we had a long quiet conversation.

I read him a letter from Dr. Hugh Blair concerning Pope (in writing whose life he was now employed), which I shall insert as a literary curiosity.<sup>3</sup>

DR. BLAIR TO BOSWELL.

"Broughton Park, Sept. 21. 1779.

"DEAR SIR, — In the year 1763, being at London, I was carried by Dr. John Blair, Prebendary of Westminster, to dine at old Lord Bathurst's, where we found the late Mr. Mallet, Sir James Porter, who had been ambassador at Constantinople, the late Dr. Macaulay, and two or three more. The conversation turning on Mr. Pope, Lord Bathurst told us, that the 'Essay on Man' was originally composed by Lord Bolingbroke in prose, and that Mr. Pope did no more than put it into verse: that he had read Lord Bolingbroke's manuscript in his own handwriting; and remembered well, that he was at a loss whether most to admire the elegance of Lord Bolingbroke's prose, or the beauty of Mr. Pope's verse. When Lord Bathurst told this, Mr. Mallet bade me attend, and remember this remarkable piece of information; as, by the course of nature, I might survive his lordship, and be a witness of his having said so. The conversation was indeed too remarkable to be forgotten. A few days after, meeting with you, who were then also at London, you will remember that I mentioned to you what had passed on this subject, as I was much struck with this anecdote. But what ascertains my recollection of it, beyond doubt, is, that being accustomed to keep a journal of what passed when I was at London, which I wrote out every evening, I find the particulars of the above information, just as I have now given them, distinctly marked; and am thence enabled to fix this conversation to have passed on Friday, the 22d of April, 1763.

"I remember also distinctly (though I have not for this the authority of my journal), that, the conversation going on concerning Mr. Pope, I took notice of a report which had been sometimes propagated that he did not understand Greek. Lord Bathurst said to me that he knew that to be false; for that part of the Iliad was translated by Mr.

mony, viz. that of the late Lord Bathurst, who saw the very same system of the τὰ βέλγεια (taken from the Archbishop) in Lord Bolingbroke's own hand, lying before Mr. Pope, while he was composing his Essay." This is respectable evidence; but that of Dr. Blair is more direct from the fountain-head, as well as more full. Let me add to it that of Dr. Joseph Warton: "The late Lord Bathurst repeatedly assured me that he had read the whole scheme of the 'Essay on Man,' in the handwriting of Bolingbroke, and drawn up in a series of propositions, which Pope was to versify and illustrate." Essay on the Genius and Writings of Pope, vol. ii. p. 62.—BOSWELL.

Pope in his house in the country; and that in the morning when they assembled at breakfast, Mr. Pope used frequently to repeat, with great rapture, the Greek lines which he had been translating, and then to give them his version of them, and to compare them together.

‘If these circumstances can be of any use to Dr. Johnson, you have my full liberty to give them to him. I beg you will, at the same time, present to him my most respectful compliments, with best wishes for his success and fame in all his literary undertakings. I am, with great respect, my dearest Sir your most affectionate and obliged humble servant,

HUGH BLAIR”

JOHNSON. “Depend upon it, Sir, this is too strongly stated. Pope may have had from Bolingbroke the philosophic stamina of his Essay; and admitting this to be true, Lord Bathurst did not intentionally falsify.<sup>1</sup> But the thing is not true in the latitude that Blair seems to imagine; we are sure that the poetical imagery, which makes a great part of the poem, was Pope's own. It is amazing, Sir, what deviations there are from precise truth, in the account which is given of almost every thing. I told Mrs. Thrale, ‘You have so little anxiety about truth, that you never tax your memory with the exact thing.’ Now what is the use of the memory to truth, if one is careless of exactness? Lord Hailes's ‘Annals of Scotland’ are very exact; but they contain mere dry particulars. They are to be considered as a Dictionary. You know such things are there, and may be looked at when you please. Robertson paints; but the misfortune is, you are sure he does not know the people whom he paints; so you cannot suppose a likeness. Characters should never be given by an historian, unless he knew the people whom he describes, or copies from those who knew them.”

BOSWELL. “Why, Sir, do people play this trick which I observe now, when I look at your grate, putting the shovel against it to make the fire burn?” JOHNSON. “They play the trick, but it does not make the fire burn.<sup>2</sup> There is a better (setting the poker perpendicularly up at right angles with the grate). In days of superstition they thought, as it made a cross with the bars, it would drive away the witch.”

BOSWELL. “By associating with you, Sir, I am always getting an accession of wisdom. But perhaps a man, after knowing his own character—the limited strength of his own mind—should not be desirous of having too much wisdom, considering, quid valeant humeri, how little he can carry.” JOHNSON. “Sir, be as wise as you can; let a man be aliis latus, sapiens sibi :

‘Though pleased to see the dolphins play,
I mind my compass and my way.’<sup>3</sup>

You may be wise in your study in the morning, and gay in company at a tavern in the evening. Every man is to take care of his own wisdom and his own virtue, without minding too much what others think.”

He said, “Dodsley first mentioned to me the scheme of an English Dictionary; but I had long thought of it.” BOSWELL. “You did not know what you were undertaking.” JOHNSON. “Yes, Sir, I knew very well what I was undertaking, and very well how to do it, and have done it very well.” BOSWELL. “An excellent climax! and it has availed you. In your preface you say, ‘What would it avail me in this gloom of solitude?’ You have been agreeably mistaken.”

In his life of Milton, he observes, “I cannot but remark a kind of respect, perhaps unconsciously, paid to this great man by his biographers: every house in which he resided is historically mentioned, as if it were an injury to neglect naming any place that he honoured by his presence.” I had, before I read this observation, been desirous of showing that respect to Johnson, by various inquiries. Finding him this evening in a very good humour, I prevailed on him to give me an exact list of his places of residence, since he entered the metropolis as an author, which I subjoin in a note.<sup>4</sup>

I mentioned to him a dispute between a friend of mine and his lady, concerning conjugal infidelity, which my friend had maintained was by no means so bad in the husband as in the wife. JOHNSON. “Your friend was in the right, Sir. Between a man and his Maker it is a different question: but between a man and his wife, a husband's infidelity is nothing. They are connected by children, by fortune, by serious considerations of community. Wise married women don't trouble themselves about infidelity in their husbands.” BOSWELL. “To be sure there is a great difference between the offence of infidelity in a man and that of his wife.” JOHNSON. “The difference is boundless. The man imposes no bastards upon his wife.”<sup>5</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Perhaps what Lord Bathurst saw was a series of Metaphysical MSS., mentioned by Bolingbroke in his postscript to Pope's letter to Swift, 15th Sept. 1734; but these were at that date still incomplete, and the first part of the “Essay on Man” had been published early in 1733, and the last part in January, 1734. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>2</sup> It certainly does make the fire burn: by repelling the air, it throws a blast on the fire, and so performs the part in some degree of a blower or bellows. — KEARNEY. Dr. Kearney's observation applies only to the shovel, and even so, very imperfectly; but by those who have faith in the experiment, the poker is supposed to be equally efficacious. After all, it is possible that there may be some magnetic or electrical influence which, in the progress of science, may be explained; and what has been thought a vulgar trick, may be proved to be a philosophical expedient. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> “The S,leen,” a poem [by Matthew Green]. — BOSWELL.

<sup>4</sup> Which the reader has already seen transferred to p. 30. — CROKER.

<sup>5</sup> See also anté, p. 192. This however seems too narrow an illustration of a “boundless difference.” The introduction of a bastard into a family, though a great injustice and a great crime, is only one consequence (and that an occasional and accidental one) of a greater crime and a more afflictive injustice. The precaution of Julia, alluded to anté, p. 192, did not render her innocent. In a moral and in a religious view, the guilt is no doubt equal in man or woman; but have not both Dr. Johnson and Mr. Boswell overlooked, on this occasion,

Here it may be questioned, whether Johnson was entirely in the right. I suppose it will not be controverted, that the difference in the degree of criminality is very great, on account of consequences: but still it may be maintained, that, independent of moral obligation, infidelity is by no means a light offence in a husband; because it must hurt a delicate attachment, in which a mutual constancy is implied, with such refined sentiments as Massinger has exhibited in his play of "The Picture." Johnson probably at another time would have admitted this opinion. And let it be kept in remembrance, that he was very careful not to give any encouragement to irregular conduct. A gentleman, not adverting to the distinction made by him upon this subject, supposed a case of singular perverseness in a wife, and heedlessly said, "That then he thought a husband might do as he pleased with a safe conscience." JOHNSON. "Nay, Sir, this is wild indeed (smiling); you must consider that fornication is a crime in a single man, and you cannot have more liberty by being married."

He this evening expressed himself strongly against the Roman Catholics, observing, "In every thing in which they differ from us, they are wrong." He was even against the invocation of saints; in short, he was in the humour of opposition.

Having regretted to him that I had learnt little Greek, as is too generally the case in Scotland; that I had for a long time hardly applied at all to the study of that noble language, and that I was desirous of being told by him what method to follow; he recommended as easy helps, Sylvanus's "First Book of the Iliad;" Dawson's "Lexicon to the Greek New Testament;" and "Hesiod," with "Pasorie's Lexicon" at the end of it.

JOHNSON TO MRS. THRALE.

"London, Oct. 11. 1779.

"I do not see why you should trouble yourself with physicians while Mr. Thrale grows better. Company and bustle will, I hope, complete his cure. Let him gallop over the Downs in the morning, call his friends about him to dinner, and frisk in the rooms at night, and outrun time and outface misfortune. Notwithstanding all authorities against bleeding, Mr. Thrale bled himself well ten days ago.

"You will lead a jolly life, and perhaps think little of me; but I have been invited twice to Mrs. Vesey's conversation, but have not gone. The gout that was in my ankles, when Queeny criticised my gait, passed into my toe, but I have hunted it, and starved it, and it makes no figure. It has drawn some attention, for Lord and Lady Luceau sent to inquire after me. This is all the news that I have to tell you. Yesterday I dined with Mr. Strahan, and Boswell was there. We shall be both to-morrow at Mr. Ramsay's."

On Tuesday, October 12., I dined with him at Mr. Ramsay's, with Lord Newhaven<sup>1</sup>, and some other company, none of whom I recollect, but a beautiful Miss Graham<sup>2</sup>, a relation [niece] of his Lordship's, who asked Dr. Johnson to hob or nob with her. He was flattered by such pleasing attention, and politely told her, he never drank wine; but if she would drink a glass of water, he was much at her service. She accepted. "Oho, Sir!" said Lord Newhaven, "you are caught." JOHNSON. "Nay, I do not see how I am caught; but if I am caught, I don't want to get free again. If I am caught, I hope to be kept." Then, when the two glasses of water were brought, smiling placidly to the young lady, he said, "Madam, let us reciprocate."

Lord Newhaven and Johnson carried on an argument for some time concerning the Middlesex election. Johnson said, "Parliament may be considered as bound by law, as a man is bound where there is nobody to tie the knot. As it is clear that the House of Commons may expel, and expel again and again, why not allow of the power to incapacitate for that parliament, rather than have a perpetual contest kept up between parliament and the people?" Lord Newhaven took the opposite side; but respectfully said, "I speak with great deference to you, Dr. Johnson; I speak to be instructed." This had its full effect on my friend. He bowed his head almost as low as the table to a complimenting nobleman, and called out, "My lord, my lord, I do not desire all this ceremony; let us tell our minds to one another quietly." After the debate was over, he said, "I have got lights on the subject to-day, which I had not before." This was a great deal from him, especially as he had written a pamphlet upon it.

He observed, "The House of Commons was originally not a privilege of the people, but a check, for the crown, on the House of Lords.

sion, a social view of this subject, and which is, perhaps, the true reason of the greater indulgence which is generally afforded to the infidelity of the man — I mean the effect on the personal character of the different sexes. The crime does not seem to alter or debase the qualities of the man, in any essential degree; but when the superior purity and delicacy of the woman is once contaminated, it is destroyed — facilis descensus Averni — she generally falls into utter degradation; and thence, probably, it is that society makes a distinction conformable to its own interests — it connives at the offence of men, because men are not much deteriorated as members of general society by the offence, and it is severe against the offence of women, because women, as members of society, are utterly ruined by it. This view of the subject will be illustrated by a converse proposition — for instance: the world thinks not the worse, nay rather the better, of a woman for wanting courage; but such a defect in a man is wholly unpardonable, because, as Johnson wisely and wittily said, "he who has not the virtue of courage has no security for any other virtue." Society, therefore, requires chastity from women as it does courage from men. See Montesquieu, Esprit des Loix, b. vii. ch. 8., where he proceeds on the principle, that chastity is, in the female character, the foundation and guardian of every other virtue, and the very basis of society. — CROKER.

<sup>1</sup> William Mayne, Esq. was created a Baronet in 1763; a privy counsellor in Ireland in 1766; and in 1776 advanced to the Irish peerage by the title of Baron Newhaven. He took a busy part in the intrigues, jobs, and squabbles which constituted the Irish politics of his day. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> Now the lady of Sir Henry Dashwood, Bart. — BOSWELL. To whom she was married in July 1780. — CROKER.

I remember, Henry VIII. wanted them to do something; they hesitated in the morning, but did it in the afternoon. He told them, 'It is well you did; or half your heads should have been upon Temple Bar.'<sup>1</sup> But the House of Commons is now no longer under the power of the crown, and therefore must be bribed." He added, "I have no delight in talking of public affairs."

Of his fellow collegian<sup>2</sup>, the celebrated Mr. George Whitefield, he said, "Whitefield never drew as much attention as a mountebank does: he did not draw attention by doing better than others, but by doing what was strange. Were Astley<sup>3</sup> to preach a sermon standing upon his head on a horse's back, he would collect a multitude to hear him; but no wise man would say he had made a better sermon for that. I never treated Whitefield's ministry with contempt; I believe he did good. He had devoted himself to the lower classes of mankind, and among them he was of use. But when familiarity and noise claim the praise due to knowledge, art, and elegance, we must beat down such pretensions."<sup>4</sup>

What I have preserved of his conversation during the remainder of my stay in London at this time is only what follows:—I told him that when I objected to keeping company with a notorious infidel, a celebrated friend<sup>5</sup> of ours said to me, "I do not think that men who live laxly in the world, as you and I do, can with propriety assume such an authority: Dr. Johnson may, who is uniformly exemplary in his conduct. But it is not very consistent to shun an infidel to-day, and get drunk to-morrow." JOHNSON. "Nay, Sir, this is sad reasoning. Because a man cannot be right in all things, is he to be right in nothing? Because a man sometimes gets drunk, is he therefore to steal? This doctrine would very soon bring a man to the gallows."

After all, however, it is a difficult question how far sincere Christians should associate with the avowed enemies of religion; for, in the first place, almost every man's mind may be more or less "corrupted by evil communications;" secondly, the world may very naturally suppose that they are not really in earnest in religion, who can easily bear its opponents; and thirdly, if the profane find themselves quite well received by the pious, one of the checks upon an open declaration of their infidelity, and one of the probable chances of obliging them seriously to reflect, which their being shunned would do, is removed.

He, I know not why, showed upon all occasions an aversion to go to Ireland, where I proposed to him that we should make a tour. JOHNSON. "It is the last place that I should wish to travel." BOSWELL. "Should you not like to see Dublin, Sir?" JOHNSON. "No, Sir; Dublin is only a worse capital." BOSWELL. "Is not the Giant's Causeway worth seeing?" JOHNSON. "Worth seeing? yes; but not worth going to see."

Yet he had a kindness for the Irish nation; and thus generously expressed himself to a gentleman from that country, on the subject of an union which artful politicians have often had in view: "Do not make an union with us, Sir. We should unite with you only to rob you. We should have robbed the Scotch, if they had had any thing of which we could have robbed them."

Of an acquaintance of ours, whose manners and every thing about him, though expensive, were coarse, he said, "Sir, you see in him vulgar prosperity."

A foreign minister of no very high talents, who had been in his company for a considerable time quite overlooked, happened luckily to mention that he had read some of his "Rambler" in Italian, and admired it much. This pleased him greatly; he observed that the title had been translated Il Genio errante, though I have been told it was rendered more ludicrously Il Vagabondo; and finding that this minister gave such a proof of his taste, he was all attention to him, and on the first remark which he made, however simple, exclaimed, "The ambassador says well; his Excellency observes —;" and then he expanded and enriched the little that had been said in so strong a manner, that it appeared something of consequence. This was exceedingly entertaining to the company who were present, and many a time afterwards it furnished a pleasant topic of merriment. "The ambassador says well" became a laughable term of applause when no mighty matter had been expressed.

<sup>1</sup> Johnson's memory was here guilty of an anachronism. Heals were, as Mr. P. Cunningham informs me, first placed on Temple Bar in William III.'s time. The anecdote told by Collins in his Peagee, tit. Manchester, on the doubtful authority of family papers, says only, that Henry threatened to take off the head of the Speaker, Sir Edward Montagu, if the money bill, then objected to (1523), did not pass.—CROKER, 1847.

<sup>2</sup> George Whitefield, or Whitefield, did not enter at Pembroke College before November 1732, more than twelve months after Johnson's name was off the books, and nearly three years after he had ceased to be resident at Oxford; so that, strictly speaking, they were not fellow collegians, though they were both of the same college.—Hall.—CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> Philip Astley, a celebrated horse-rider, who first exhibited equestrian pantomimes, in which his son (who survived his father but a short time) rode with great grace and agility. Astley had at once theatres in Paris, London, and

Dublin, and migrated with his actors, biped and quadruped, from one to the other. Both father and son were remarkably handsome, the elder of large proportions, but perfect symmetry.—CROKER. The remains of both father and son are deposited in the cemetery of Père la Chaise, near Paris.—WAGNER.

<sup>4</sup> "On Tuesday I dined with Ramsay, and on Thursday (14th) with Paoli. Buzzy says he never saw me so well."—CROKER, Oct. 16, 1779.—CROKER.

<sup>5</sup> The "celebrated friend" was no doubt Mr. Burke, and his advice, so far from being "sad reasoning," seems very sensible and just. Before you take upon yourself to be a  censor morum, you should, at least, reform your own flagrant irregularities. And we know, when Boswell consulted Johnson about refusing to do law business of a Sunday, he advised him to comply with the practice of the world, till he should become so considerable as to be authorised to set an example.—CROKER, 1835.

[JOHNSON TO MISS REYNOLDS.

"Oct. 19. 1779.

"DEAREST MADAM, — You are extremely kind in taking so much trouble. My foot is almost well; and one of my first visits will certainly be to Dover Street.<sup>1</sup> You will do me a great favour if you will buy for me the prints of Mr. Burke, Mr. Dyer, and Dr. Goldsmith, as you know good impressions. If any of your own pictures are engraved, buy them for me. I am fitting up a little room with prints. I am your, &c.,
— Reyn. MSS. "SAM. JOHNSON."]

I left London on Monday, October 18., and accompanied Colonel Stuart to Chester, where his regiment was to lie for some time.

BOSWELL TO JOHNSON.

"Chester, Oct. 20. 1779.

"MY DEAR SIR, — It was not till one o'clock on Monday morning that Colonel Stuart and I left London; for we chose to bid a cordial adieu to Lord Mountstuart, who was to set out on that day on his embassy to Turin. We drove on excellently, and reached Lichfield in good time enough that night. The colonel had heard so preferable a character of the George, that he would not put up at the Three Crowns, so that I did not see our host, Wilkins. We found at the George as good accommodation as we could wish to have, and I fully enjoyed the comfortable thought that I was in Lichfield again. Next morning it rained very hard; and as I had much to do in a little time, I ordered a post-chaise, and between eight and nine sallied forth to make a round of visits. I first went to Mr. Green, hoping to have had him to accompany me to all my other friends; but he was engaged to attend the Bishop of Sodor and Man, who was then lying at Lichfield very ill of the gout. Having taken a hasty glance at the additions to Green's museum, from which it was not easy to break away, I next went to the Friary, where I at first occasioned some tumult in the ladies, who were not prepared to receive company so early; but my name, which has by wonderful felicity come to be closely associated with yours, soon made all easy; and Mrs. Cobb<sup>2</sup> and Miss Adey re-assumed their seats at the breakfast-table, which they had quitted with some precipitation. They received me with the kindness of an old acquaintance; and, after we had joined in a cordial chorus to your praise, Mrs. Cobb gave me the high satisfaction of hearing that you said, 'Boswell is a man who I believe never left a house without leaving a wish for his return.' And she afterwards added, that she bid you tell me, that if ever I came to Lichfield, she hoped I would take a bed at the Friary. From thence I drove to Peter Garrick's, where I also found a very flattering welcome. He appeared to me to enjoy his usual cheerfulness; and he very kindly asked me to come when I could, and pass a week with him. From Mr. Garrick's I went to the Palace to wait on Mr. Seward. I was first entertained by his lady and daughter, he himself being in bed with a cold, according to his valetudinary custom. But he desired to see me; and I found him dressed in his black gown, with a white flannel night-gown above it; so that he looked like a Dominican friar. He was good-humoured and polite; and under his roof too my reception was very pleasing. I then proceeded to Stowhill, and first paid my respects to Mrs. Gastrell, whose conversation I was not willing to quit. But my sand-glass was now beginning to run low, as I could not trespass too long on the Colonel's kindness, who obligingly waited for me; so I hastened to Mrs. Aston's, whom I found much better than I feared I should; and there I met [Mr. Prujean, p. 237.] a brother-in-law of these ladies, who talked much of you, and very well too, as it appeared to me. It then only remained to visit Mrs. Lucy Porter, which I did, I really believe, with sincere satisfaction on both sides. I am sure I was glad to see her again; and as I take her to be very honest, I trust she was glad to see me again, for she expressed herself so that I could not doubt of her being in earnest. What a great keystone of kindness, my dear Sir, were you that morning! for we were all held together by our common attachment to you. I cannot say that I ever passed two hours with more self-complacency than I did those two at Lichfield. Let me not entertain any suspicion that this is idle vanity. Will not you confirm me in my persuasion, that he who finds himself so regarded has just reason to be happy?

"We got to Chester about midnight on Tuesday; and here again I am in a state of much enjoyment. Colonel Stuart and his officers treat me with all the civility I could wish; and I play my part admirably. Latus alii, sapiens sibi, the classical sentence which you, I imagine, invented the other day, is exemplified in my present existence. The Bishop<sup>3</sup>, to whom I had the honour to be known several years ago, shows me much attention; and I am edified by his conversation. I must not omit to tell you, that his Lordship admires, very highly, your prefaces to the Poets. I am daily obtaining an extension of agreeable acquaintance, so that I am kept in animated variety; and the study of the place itself, by the assistance of books and of the Bishop, is sufficient occupation. Chester pleases my fancy more than any town I ever saw. But I will not enter upon it at all in this letter.

"How long I shall stay here I cannot yet say. I told a very pleasing young lady<sup>4</sup>, niece to one of the prebendaries at whose house I saw her, 'I have come to Chester. Madam, I cannot tell how; and far less can I tell how I am to get away from it.' Do not think me too juvenile. I beg it of you, my dear Sir, to favour me with a letter while I am here, and add to the happiness of a happy friend, who is ever with affectionate veneration, most sincerely yours,
JAMES BOSWELL.

"If you do not write directly, so as to catch me here, I shall be disappointed. Two lines from you will keep my lamp burning bright."

<sup>1</sup> Where Miss Reynolds lived. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> Mrs. Cobb was the daughter of Mr. Hammond, an apothecary and the widow of a mercer, who had retired from business, and resided at the Friary. Miss Adey was her niece, daughter of the town-clerk of Lichfield: she married William Sneyd, Esq., of Belmont House, near Cheadle, and died 1829, æt. 87. — Harwood. (See anté, p. 5, and 6. — where this note might have been better placed.) — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> Doctor Porteus, afterwards Bishop of London; in which see he died, May 14. 1808, in his seventy-eighth year. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> Miss Letitia Barnston. — BOSWELL.

[JOHNSON TO MRS. ASTON.

" Bolt Court, Oct. 25. 1779.

" DEAREST MADAM, — Mrs. Gastrell is so kind as to write to me, and yet I always write to you; but I consider what is written to either as written to both. Public affairs do not seem to promise much amendment, and the nation is now full of distress. What will be the event of things none can tell. We may still hope for better times.

" My health, which I began to recover when I was in the country, continues still in a good state: it costs me, indeed, some physic, and something of abstinence, but it pays the cost. I wish, dear Madam, I could hear a little of your improvements.

" Here is no news. The talk of the invasion seems to be over. But a very turbulent session of parliament is expected; though turbulence is not likely to do any good. Those are happiest who are out of the noise and tumult. There will be no great violence of faction at Stowhill; and that it may be free from that and all other inconvenience and disturbance is the sincere wish of all your friends. I am, dear Madam, your, &c.,

— Pemb. MSS. " SAM. JOHNSON." ]

JOHNSON TO BOSWELL.

" London, Oct. 27. 1779.

" DEAR SIR, — Why should you importune me so earnestly to write? Of what importance can it be to hear of distant friends, to a man who finds himself welcome wherever he goes, and makes new friends faster than he can want them? If to the delight of such universal kindness of reception any thing can be added by knowing that you retain my good-will, you may indulge yourself in the full enjoyment of that small addition.

" I am glad that you made the round of Lichfield with so much success. The oftener you are seen, the more you will be liked. It was pleasing to me to read that Mrs. Aston was so well, and that Lucy Porter was so glad to see you.

" In the place where you now are, there is much to be observed; and you will easily procure yourself skilful directors. But what will you do to keep away the black dog<sup>1</sup> that worries you at home? If you would, in compliance with your father's advice, inquire into the old tenures and old charters of Scotland, you would certainly open to yourself many striking scenes of the manners of the middle ages. The feudal system, in a country half-barbarous, is naturally productive of great anomalies in civil life. The knowledge of past times is naturally growing less in all cases not of public record; and the past time of Scotland is so unlike the present, that it is already difficult for a Scotchman to image the economy of his grandfather. Do not be tardy nor negligent; but gather up eagerly what can yet be found.<sup>2</sup>

" We have, I think, once talked of another project, a history of the late insurrection in Scotland, with all its incidents. Many falsehoods are passing into uncontradicted history. Voltaire, who loved a striking story, has told what he could not find to be true.

" You may make collections for either of these projects, or for both, as opportunities occur, and digest your materials at leisure. The great direction which Burton has left to men disordered like you is this, Be not solitary, be not idle: which I would thus modify: — If you are idle, be not solitary; if you are solitary, be not idle.

" There is a letter for you from your humble servant,
SAM. JOHNSON."

[JOHNSON TO MRS. ASTON.

" Bolt Court, Nov. 5. 1779.

" DEAREST MADAM, — Having had the pleasure of hearing from Mr. Boswell that he found you better than he expected, I will not forbear to tell you how much I was delighted with the news. May your health increase and increase till you are as well as you can wish yourself, or I can wish you!

" My friends tell me that my health improves too. It is certain that I use both physic and abstinence; and my endeavours have been blessed with more success than at my age I could reasonably hope. I please myself with the thoughts of visiting you next year in so robust a state, that I shall not be afraid of the hill between Mrs. Gastrell's house and yours, nor think it necessary to rest myself between Stowhill and Lucy Porter's.

" Of public affairs I can give you no very comfortable account. The invasion has vanished for the present, as I expected. I never believed that any invasion was intended.

" But whatever we have escaped, we have done nothing, nor are likely to do better another year. We, however, who have no part of the nation's welfare intrusted to our management, have nothing to do but to serve God, and leave the world submissively in his hands.

" All trade is dead, and pleasure is scarce alive. Nothing almost is purchased but such things as the buyer cannot do without; so that a general sluggishness and general discontent are spread over the town. All the trades of luxury and elegance are nearly at a stand. What the parliament, when it meets, will do, and indeed what it ought to do, is very difficult to say.

" Pray set Mrs. Gastrell, who is a dear good lady, to write to me from time to time; for I have great delight in hearing from you, especially when I hear any good news of your health. I am, dear Madam, your most humble servant,

— Pemb. MSS. " SAM. JOHNSON." ]

BOSWELL TO JOHNSON.

" Carlisle, Nov. 7. 1779.

" MY DEAR SIR, — That I should importune you to write to me at Chester is not wonderful, when you consider what an avidity I have for delight; and that the amor of pleasure, like the amor nummi, increases in proportion with the quantity which we possess of it. Your letter, so publish. I have some hereditary claim to be an antiquary; not only from my father, but as being descended, by the mother's side, from the able and learned Sir John Skene, whose merit bids defiance to all the attempts which have been made to lessen his fame. — BOSWELL.

<sup>1</sup> This was a familiar phrase at Streatham to express hypochondriacal anxieties of mind. It is frequently used in the correspondence between Johnson and Mrs. Thrale. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> I have a valuable collection made by my father, which, with some additions and illustrations of my own, I intend to full of polite kindness and masterly counsel, came like a large treasure upon me, while already glittering with riches. I was quite enchanted at Chester, so that I could with difficulty quit it. But the enchantment was the reverse of that of Circé; for so far was there from being any thing sensual in it, that I was all mind. I do not mean all reason only; for my fancy was kept finely in play. And why not? If you please, I will send you a copy or an abridgment of my Chester journal, which is truly a log-book of felicity.

"The Bishop [Porteus] treated me with a kindness which was very flattering. I told him that you regretted you had seen so little of Chester. His Lordship bade me tell you, that he should be glad to show you more of it. I am proud to find the friendship with which you honour me is known in so many places.

"I arrived here late last night. Our friend the Dean [Percy] has been gone from hence some months; but I am told at my inn, that he is very populus (popular). However, I found Mr. Law, the Archdeacon, son to the Bishop<sup>1</sup>, and with him have breakfasted and dined very agreeably. I got acquainted with him at the assizes here, about a year and a half ago. He is a man of great variety of knowledge, uncommon genius, and, I believe, sincere religion. I received the holy sacrament in the cathedral in the morning, this being the first Sunday in the month; and was at prayers there in the evening. It is divinely cheering to me to think that there is a cathedral so near Auchinleck; and I now leave Old England in such a state of mind as I am thankful to God for granting me.

"The black dog that worries me at home I cannot but dread; yet, as I have been for some time past in a military train, I trust I shall repulse him. To hear from you will animate me like the sound of a trumpet; I therefore hope, that soon after my return to the northern field, I shall receive a few lines from you.

"Colonel Stuart did me the honour to escort me in his carriage to show me Liverpool, and from hence back again to Warrington, where we parted.<sup>2</sup> In justice to my valuable wife, I must inform you he wrote to me, that as I was so happy, she would not be so selfish as to wish me to return sooner than business absolutely required my presence. She bade my clerk write to me a post or two after to the same purpose, by commission from her; and his day a kind letter from her met me at the post-office here, acquainting me that she and the little ones were well, and expressing all their wishes for my return home. I am, more and more, my dear Sir, your affectionate and obliged humble servant,

"JAMES BOSWELL."

JOHNSON TO BOSWELL.

"London, Nov. 13. 1779.

"DEAR SIR, — Your last letter was not only kind, but fond. But I wish you to get rid of all intellectual excesses, and neither to exalt your pleasures, nor aggravate your vexations, beyond their real and natural state. Why should you not be as happy at Edinburgh as at Chester? In culpa est animus, qui se non effugit usquam.<sup>3</sup> Please yourself with your wife and children, and studies, and practice.

"I have sent a petition<sup>4</sup> from Lucy Porter, with which I leave it to your discretion whether it is proper to comply. Return me her letter, which I have sent, that you may know the whole case, and not be seduced to any thing that you may afterwards repent. Miss Doxy perhaps you know to be Mr. Garrick's niece.

"If Dean Percy can be popular at Carlisle, he may be very happy. He has in his disposal two livings, each equal or almost equal in value to the deanery; he may take one himself, and give the other to his son.

"How near is the cathedral to Auchinleck, that you are so much delighted with it? It is, I suppose, at least an hundred and fifty miles off. However, if you are pleased, it is so far well. Let me know what reception you have from your father, and the state of his health. Please him as much as you can, and add no pain to his last years.

"Of our friends here I can recollect nothing to tell you. I have neither seen nor heard of Langton. Beauclerk is just returned from Bright-helmstone, I am told, much better. Mr. Thrale and his family are still there; and his health is said to be visibly improved. He has not bathed, but hunted. At Bolt Court there is much malignity, but of late little open hostility. I have had a cold, but it is gone. Make my compliments to Mrs. Boswell, &c. I am, &c., SAM. JOHNSON."

On November 22. and December 21. I wrote to him from Edinburgh, giving a very favourable report of the family of Miss Doxy's lover; — that after a good deal of inquiry I had discovered the sister of Mr. Francis Stewart, one of his amanuenses when writing his Dictionary; — that I had, as desired by him, paid her a guinea for an old pocket-book of her brother's, which he had retained; — and that the good woman, who was in very moderate circumstances, but contented and placid, wondered at his scrupulous and liberal honesty, and received the guinea as if sent her by Providence<sup>5</sup>; — that I had repeatedly begged of him to keep his promise to send me his letter to Lord Ches-

<sup>1</sup> Dr. Edmond Law, master of St. Peter's College, Cambridge, Bishop of Carlisle, in which see he died in 1787. He was the father, and the archdeacon (afterwards Bishop of Lophin) the brother of the first Lord Ellenborough. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> His regiment was afterwards ordered to Jamaica, where he accompanied it, and almost lost his life by the climate. This impartial order I should think a sufficient refutation of the idle rumour that "there was still something behind the throne greater than the throne itself." — BOSWELL. As if Lord Bute's influence could have prevented his son's regiment going to Jamaica! — but Lord Bute's influence with the King was a bugbear of faction, which lasted near twenty years, after — not merely his power, but — even his name, had ceased to exist. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>3</sup>

— The mind
Is faulty that ne'er leaves itself behind.
Hor. Ep. i. 14. 13. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> Requesting me to inquire concerning the family of a gentleman who was then paying his addresses to Miss Doxy. — BOSWELL.

<sup>5</sup> This affair of Francis Stewart and the pocket-book, which Boswell quite mistook, was, I believe, mysteriously connected with some important detail of Johnson's former history. See Johnson's letter of the 27th Feb. 1784; and the General Appendix, where I have collected all the information I can find on the subject. — CROKER, 1847.

terfield; and that this memento, like Delenda est Carthago, must be in every letter that I should write to him, till I had obtained my object.

[JOHNSON TO MRS. THRALE.

(Extract.)

"London, Oct. 25. 1779.

"On Saturday I walked to Dover Street [Miss Reynolds's] and back. Yesterday I dined with Sir Joshua. There was Mr. Eliot<sup>1</sup> of Cornwall, who inquired after my master. At night I was bespoken by Lady Lucan; but she was taken ill, and the assembly was put off. I am to dine with Remy tomorrow. Some old gentlemen at the next door are in very great distress. Their little annuity comes from Jamaica, and is therefore uncertain; and one of them has had a fall, and both are very helpless; and the poor have you to help them. Persuade my master to let me give them something for him. It will be bestowed upon real want.]"

— Letters.

CHAPTER LXX.

1780.

"Lives of the Poets" creep on. — Dr. Lawrence. — Loss of a Wife. — Death of Beauclerk. — Letter-writing. — Mr. Melmoth. — Fitzosborne's Letters. — Somerset-House Exhibition. — Riots in London. — Lord George Gordon. — Mr. Akerman. — Correspondence. — Dr. Beattie. — Davies's "Life of Garrick." — Advice to a Young Clergyman. — Composition of Sermons. — Borough Election. — Lady Southwell. — Mr. Alexander Mucbean. — Lord Thurlow. — Langton's Collectanea. — Dr. Franklin's "Demonax."

IN 1780, the world was kept in impatience for the completion of his "Lives of the Poets," upon which he was employed so far as his indolence allowed him to labour.

I wrote to him on January 1. and March 13., sending him my notes of Lord Marchmont's information concerning Pope;—complaining that I had not heard from him for almost four months, though he was two letters in my debt; that I had suffered again from melancholy;—hoping that he had been in so much better company (the Poets), that he had not time to think of his distant friends; for if that were the case, I should have some recompence for my uneasiness;—that the state of my affairs did not admit of my coming to London this year; and begging he would return me Goldsmith's two poems, with his lines marked.

His friend Dr. Lawrence having now suffered the greatest affliction to which a man is liable, and which Johnson himself had felt in the most severe manner, Johnson wrote to him in an admirable strain of sympathy and pious consolation.

JOHNSON TO LAWRENCE.

"Jan. 20. 1780.

"DEAR SIR,—At a time when all your friends ought to show their kindness, and with a character which ought to make all that know you your friends, you may wonder that you have yet heard nothing from me. I have been hindered by a vexatious and incessant cough, for which within these ten days I have been bled once, fasted four or five times, taken physic five times, and opiates, I think, six. This day it seems to remit.

"The loss, dear Sir, which you have lately suffered, I felt many years ago, and know therefore how much has been taken from you, and how little help can be had from consolation. He that outlives a wife whom he has long loved, sees himself disjoined from the only mind that has the same hopes, and fears, and interest; from the only companion with whom he has shared much good or evil; and with whom he could set his mind at liberty, to retrace the past or anticipate the future. The continuity of being is lacerated; the settled course of sentiment and action is stopped; and life stands suspended and motionless, till it is driven by external causes into a new channel. But the time of suspense is dreadful.

"Our first recourse in this distressed solitude is, perhaps for want of habitual piety, to a gloomy acquiescence in necessity. Of two mortal beings, one must lose the other. But surely there is a higher and better comfort to be drawn from the consideration of that Providence which watches over all, and a belief that the living and the dead are equally in the hands of God, who will reunite those whom he has separated, or who sees that it is best not to reunite. I am, dear Sir, &c.,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHNSON TO BOSWELL.

"April 8. 1780.

"DEAR SIR,—Well, I had resolved to send you the Chesterfield letter<sup>2</sup>, but I will write once again without it. Never impose tasks upon mortals. To require two things is the way to have them both undone.

"For the difficulties which you mention in your affairs, I am sorry; but difficulty is now very general; it is not therefore less grievous, for there is less hope of help. I pretend not to give you advice, not knowing the state of your affairs; and general counsels about prudence and frugality would do you little good. You are, however, in the right not to increase your own perplexity by a journey hither; and I hope that by staying at home you will please your father.

"Poor dear Beauclerk — neq, ut soles, dabis joco. His wit and his folly, his acuteness and maliciousness, his merriment and reasoning, are now over. Such another will not often be found among mankind.<sup>3</sup> He directed himself to be buried by the side of his mother; an instance of tenderness which I hardly expected. He has left his children to the care of Lady Di, and if she dies, of Mr. Langton, and of Mr. Leicester his relation, and a man of good character. His library has been offered to sale to the Russian ambassador.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> First Lord Eliot. See post, sub 30th March, 1781. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> See it antè, p. 85. — C.

<sup>3</sup> In the spring of this year (11th March) Dr. Johnson society lost one of its brightest ornaments by the death of Mr. Beauclerk. The charms of conversation, like those

"Dr. Percy, notwithstanding all the noise of the newspapers, has had no literary loss.<sup>2</sup> Clothes and moveables were burnt to the value of about one hundred pounds; but his papers, and I think his books, were all preserved.

"Poor Mr. Thrale has been in extreme danger from an apoplectical disorder, and recovered, beyond the expectation of his physicians: he is now at Bath, that his mind may be quiet, and Mrs. Thrale and Miss are with him.

"Having told you what has happened to your friends, let me say something to you of yourself. You are always complaining of melancholy, and I conclude from those complaints that you are fond of it. No man talks of that which he is desirous to conceal, and every man desires to conceal that of which he is ashamed. Do not pretend to deny it; manifestum habemus furem. Make it an invariable and obligatory law to yourself, never to mention your own mental diseases. If you are never to speak of them, you will think on them but little; and if you think little of them, they will molest you rarely. When you talk of them, it is plain that you want either praise or pity: for praise there is no room, and pity will do you no good; therefore, from this hour speak no more, think no more, about them.

"Your transaction with Mrs. Stewart<sup>3</sup> gave me great satisfaction. I am much obliged to you for your attention. Do not lose sight of her. Your countenance may be of great credit, and of consequence of great advantage to her. The memory of her brother is yet fresh in my mind; he was an ingenious and worthy man. Please to make my compliments to your lady and to the young ladies. I should like to see them, pretty loves! I am, dear Sir, yours affectionately, SAM. JOHNSON."

acting, are transient; and of the social talents of Beauclerk, as of the dramatic powers of Garrick, little can remain but the general testimony of contemporaries to their excellence. Mr. Hardy, in his Life of Lord Charlemont, says of Beauclerk: "His conversation could scarcely be equalled. He possessed an exquisite taste, various accomplishments, and the most perfect good breeding. He was eccentric—often querulous—entertaining a contempt for the generality of the world, which the politeness of his manners could not always conceal; but to those whom he liked, most generous and friendly. Devoted at one moment to pleasure, and at another to literature, sometimes absorbed in play, and sometimes in books, he was, altogether, one of the most accomplished, and who in good humour, and surrounded by those who suited his fancy, one of the most agreeable men that could possibly exist." Life, vol. i. p. 34. Mr. Hardy has also preserved several of Beauclerk's letters, from one of which I extract some passages that touch on Johnson and his society.

"Adelphi, 20th Nov. 1773.

"Goldsmith the other day put a paragraph into the newspapers in praise of Lord Mayor Townshend. The same night he happened to sit next to Lord Shelburne, at Drury-lane; I mentioned the circumstance of the paragraph to him, and he said to Goldsmith that he hoped he had mentioned nothing about Malagrida in it. 'Do you know,' answered Goldsmith, 'that I never could conceive the reason why they all you Malagrida, for Malagrida was a very good sort of man.' You see plainly what he meant to say, but that airy turn of expression is peculiar to himself. Mr. Walpole says that this story is a picture of Goldsmith's whole life. [Post, 23 March, 1783.]

"Johnson has been confined for some weeks in the Isle of Ky; we hear that he was obliged to swim over to the main

[JOHNSON TO MRS. THRALE.

(Extract.)

"London, April 6. 1780.

"I have not quite neglected my Lives. Addison is a long one, but it is done. Prior is not short, and that is done too. I am upon Rowe, which cannot fill much paper. Seward (Mr. William) called on me one day and read Spence.<sup>4</sup> I dined yesterday at Mr. Jodrell's in a great deal of company. On Sunday I dine with Dr. Lawrence, and at night go to Mrs. Vesey. I have had a little cold, or two, or three; but I did not much mind them, for they were not very bad."

— Letters.

JOHNSON TO MRS. PORTER.

"London, April 8. 1780.

"DEAR MADAM,— I am indeed but a sluggish correspondent, and know not whether I shall much mend: however, I will try. I am glad that your oysters proved good, for I would have every thing good that belongs to you; and would have your health good, that you may enjoy the rest. My health is better than it has been for some years past; and, if I see Lichfield again, I hope to walk about it.

"Your brother's request I have not forgotten. I have bought as many volumes as contain about an hundred and fifty sermons, which I will put in a box, and get Mr. Mathias to send him. I shall add a letter.

"We have been lately much alarmed at Mr. Thrale's. He has had a stroke, like that of an apoplexy; but he has at last got so well as to be at Bath, out of the way of trouble and business, and is likely to be in a short time quite well. I hope all the Lichfield ladies are quite well, and that every thing is prosperous among them.

"A few weeks ago I sent you a little stuff gown, such as is all the fashion at this time. Yours is the same with Mrs. Thrale's, and Miss bought it for us. These stuffs are very cheap, and are thought very pretty.

land, taking hold of a cow's tail. Be that as it may, Lady Di has promised to make a drawing of it.

"Our poor club is in a miserable state of decay; unless you come and relieve it, it will certainly expire. Would you imagine that Sir Joshua Reynolds is extremely anxious to be a member at Almack's? [p. 501.] You see what noble ambition will make a man attempt. That den is not yet opened. There is nothing new at present in the literary world. Mr. Jones [Sir William], of our club, is going to publish an account, in Latin, of the Eastern poetry, with extracts translated verbatim in verse. I fancy it will be a very pretty book.

"Goldsmith has written a prologue for Mrs. Yates, which she spoke this evening before the Opera. It is very good. I hope you have fixed your time for returning to England. We cannot do without you. If you do not come here, I will bring all the Club over to Ireland, to live with you, and that will drive you here in your own defence. Johnson shall spoil your books, Goldsmith pull your flowers, and Boswell talk to you: stay, then, if you can. Adieu, my dear Lord, &c.

T. BEAUCLERK."

Lady Di's pencil was much celebrated, and Horace Walpole built a room for the reception of some of her drawings, which he called the Beauclerk closet; but I have never seen any of her ladyship's works which seemed to me to merit, as works of art, such high reputation. — CROKER.

<sup>1</sup> His library was sold by public auction in April and May, 1781, for 5,011*l.* — MALONE.

<sup>2</sup> By a fire in Northumberland House, where he had an apartment, in which I have passed many an agreeable hour. — BOSWELL.

<sup>3</sup> See anté, p. 641. n. 5., and the Appendix. — C.

<sup>4</sup> Spence's very amusing Anecdotes, which had been lent Johnson in manuscript: they were not printed in extenso, till 1820. — CROKER.

"Pray give my compliments to Mr. Pearson, and to every body, if any such body there be, that cares about me.

"I am now engaged about the rest of the Lives, which I am afraid will take some time, though I purpose to use despatch; but something or other always hinders. I have a great number to do, but many of them will be short.

"I have lately had colds; the first was pretty bad, with a very troublesome and frequent cough; but by bleeding and physic it was sent away. I have a cold now, but not bad enough for bleeding.

"For some time past, and indeed ever since I left Lichfield last year, I have abated much of my diet, and am, I think, the better for abstinence. I can breathe and move with less difficulty; and I am as well as people of my age commonly are. I hope we shall see one another again some time this year. I am, dear love, your humble servant,
— Pearson MSS. "SAM. JOHNSON."]

Mrs. Thrale being now at Bath with her husband, the correspondence between Johnson and her was carried on briskly.

[JOHNSON TO MRS. THRALE.

(Extracts.)

"April 11. 1780.<sup>1</sup>

"On Sunday I dined with poor Lawrence, who is deafen than ever. When he was told that Dr. Moisy visited Mr. Thrale, he inquired for what, and said that there was nothing to be done which Nature would not do for herself. On Sunday evening I was at Mr. Vesey's, and there was inquiry about my master; but I told them all good. There was Dr. Barnard of Eton, and we made a noise all the evening; and there was Pepps<sup>2</sup>, and Wraxall<sup>3</sup> till I drove him away. * * * You are at all places of high resort, and bring home hearts by dozens; while I am seeking for something to say of men about whom I know nothing but their verses, and sometimes very little of them. Now I have begun, however, I do not despair of making an end. Mr. Nichols holds that Addison is the most taking of all that I have done. I doubt they will not be done before you come away.

"Now you think yourself the first writer in the world for a letter about nothing. Can you write such a letter as this? so miscellaneous, with such noble disdain of regularity, like Shakspeare's works? such graceful negligence of transition, like the ancient enthusiasts? The pure voice of nature and of friendship. Now of whom shall I proceed to speak? Of whom but Mrs. Montagu? Having mentioned Shakspeare and Nature, does not the name of Montagu force itself upon me? Such were the transitions of the ancients, which now seem abrupt, because the intermediate idea is lost to modern understandings."

"April 15. — I thought to have finished Rowe's Life to-day, but have had five or six visitors who hindered me; and I have not been quite well. Next week I hope to despatch four of five of them."

"April 18. — You make verses, and they are read in public, and I know nothing about them. This very crime, I think, broke the link of amity between Richardson and Miss M[ulso]<sup>4</sup>, after a tenderness and confidence of many years."

"April 25. — How do you think I live? On Thursday [20th] I dined with Hamilton<sup>6</sup>, and went thence to Mrs. Ord.<sup>7</sup> On Friday, with much company, at Mrs. Reynolds's. On Saturday at Dr. Bell's. On Sunday at Dr. Burney's, with your two sweets from Kensington, who are both well: at night came Mrs. Ord, Mr. Harris, and Mr. Greville, &c. On Monday with Reynolds; at night with Lady Lucan; to-day with Mr. Langton; to-morrow with the Bishop of St. Asaph; on Thursday with Mr. Bowles; Friday —; Saturday at the Academy<sup>8</sup>; Sunday with Mr. Ramsay. I told Lady Lucan how long it was since she sent to me; but she said I must consider how the world rolls about her.<sup>9</sup> I not only scout the town from day to day, but many visitors come to me in the morning, so that my work makes no great progress, but I will try to quicken it."

— Letters.

I shall present my readers with one of her original letters to him at this time, which will amuse them probably more than those well written but studied epistles which she has inserted in her collection<sup>10</sup>, because it exhibits the easy vivacity of their literary intercourse. It is also of value as a key to Johnson's answer, which she has printed by itself, and of which shall subjoin extracts.

<sup>1</sup> Dated in Mrs. Thrale's volume, by mistake, 1779. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> Afterwards Sir William Weller Pepps, Baronet, father of Lord Chavellor Cottenham; a Master in Chancery; a great friend of Mrs. Thrale's, and, what is more to his honour, of Hannah More. There never was much cordiality between him and Johnson, but their differences became wider from Pepps's resentment of Johnson's alleged depreciation of Lord Lyttelton. That, I think, was only a pretext: Johnson was a little jealous of Pepps's favour at Streatham, and Pepps, who was much admired by a circle of his own, would not submit to Johnson's dictatorship. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>3</sup> Nathaniel Wraxall, who published some volumes of travels and history, and latterly Memoirs of his own Life, flippant, and often inaccurate, but amusing; and when duly sifted, not without value as a gossiping contribution to the history of his times. For a passage in this work, in which, reflecting on Count Woronzow, he was (somewhat over-barshly, I think) convicted of a libel, and imprisoned in Newgate. He was born in 1751, and created a Baronet in 1813. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> Compare this with two former phrases, in which Shakspeare and Mrs. Montagu are mentioned (ante, p. 204, 205., and wonder at the inconsistencies to which the greatest genius and the highest spirit may be reduced! Perhaps Johnson's original disposition to depreciate Mrs. Montagu may have arisen from his having heard that she thought Rasselas an opiate (Carter's Letters, iii. 108.). His lit praise was no doubt produced by her charity to Mr. Williams. This, though it may explain, does not excuse the inconsistencies. — CROKER, 1831-47.

<sup>5</sup> Hester Mulso, afterwards Mrs. Chapone, one of Richardson's female coterie. When about three and twenty, she had been one of the few contributors to the Rambler (ante, p. 6). She was born in 1727, married Mr. Chapone in 1760, and died in 1801. She was much connected with Mrs. Cart. Mrs. Montagu, and all the Blues. — CROKER, 1835.

<sup>6</sup> Probably the Right Hon. W. G. Hamilton. — CROKER.
<sup>7</sup> This lady (celebrated, like Mrs. Montagu and Mrs. Vesey, for her blue stocking coterie) was Miss Anne Dillingham, the only daughter of an eminent surgeon. She was educated, married to Mr. Ord, of Northumberland, who left her a very large property. She died in May, 1808, at the age of eighty-two. — CROKER.

<sup>8</sup> The annual dinner on opening the Exhibition. — CROKER.
<sup>9</sup> About this time Johnson had a second interview with the King, not noticed either by Boswell or Mrs. Thrale. Hannah More says, that one evening at Mrs. Ord's, "Johnson told me he had been with the KING that morning, who enjoined him to add Spenser to his Lives of the Poets." Mem. i. 175. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>10</sup> This sneer is quite unjust — Mrs. Thrale's letters were certainly not studied; nor is the specimen produced at different in style from the others. — CROKER.

MRS. THRALE TO JOHNSON.

" Bath, Friday, April 28.

" I had a very kind letter from you yesterday, dear Sir, with a most circumstantial date.<sup>1</sup> You took trouble with my circulating letter, Mr. Evans writes me word, and I thank you sincerely for so doing; one might do mischief else, not being on the spot.

" Yesterday's evening was passed at Mrs. Montagu's. There was Mr. Melmoth.<sup>2</sup> I do not like him though, nor he me. It was expected we should have pleased each other; he is, however, just Tory enough to hate the Bishop of Peterborough<sup>3</sup> for Whiggism, and Whig enough to abhor you for Toryism.

" Mrs. Montagu flattered him finely; so he had a good afternoon on't. This evening we spent at a concert. Poor Queeny's sore eyes have just released her; she had a long confinement, and could neither read nor write, so my master treated her, very good-naturedly, with the visits of a young woman in this town, a tailor's daughter, who professes music, and teaches so as to give six lessons a day to ladies, at five and threepence a lesson. Miss Burney<sup>4</sup> says she is a great performer; and I respect the wench for getting her living so prettily. She is very modest and pretty-mannered, and not seventeen years old.

" You live in a fine whirl indeed. If I did not write regularly, you would half forget me, and that would be very wrong, for I felt my regard for you in my face last night, when the criticisms were going on.

" This morning it was all connoisseurship. We went to see some pictures painted by a gentleman-artist, Mr. Taylor, of this place. My master makes one every where, and has got a good dawdling companion to ride with him now * * * He looks well enough, but I have no notion of health for a man whose mouth cannot be sewed up. Burney and I and Queeny tease him every meal he eats, and Mrs. Montagu is quite serious with him; but what can one do? He will eat, I think; and if he does eat, I know he will not live. It makes me very unhappy, but I must bear it. Let me always have your friendship. I am, most sincerely, dear Sir, your faithful servant,

" H. L. T."

JOHNSON TO MRS. THRALE.

(Extracts.)

" London, May 1. 1780.

" DEAREST MADAM, — Mr. Thrale never will live abstintently, till he can persuade himself to live by rule * * *.<sup>5</sup> Encourage, as you can, the musical girl.

" Nothing is more common than mutual dislike, where mutual approbation is particularly expected. There is often on both sides a vigilance not over-benevolent; and as attention is strongly excited, so that nothing drops unheeded, any difference in taste or opinion, and some difference where there is no restraint will commonly appear, immediately generates dislike.

" Never let criticisms operate on your face or your mind; it is very rarely that an author is hurt by his critics. The blaze of reputation cannot be blown out, but it often dies in the socket. A very few names may be considered as perpetual lamps that shine unconsumed. From the author of 'Fitzosborne's Letters' I cannot think myself in much danger. I met him only once about thirty years ago, and in some small dispute reduced him to whistle. Having not seen him since, that is the last impression. Poor Moore, the fabulist, was one of the company.

" Mrs. Montagu's long stay, against her own inclination, is very convenient. You would, by your own confession, want a companion; and she is par pluribus. Conversing with her you may find variety in one.<sup>6</sup>

" [At Mrs. Ord's I met one Mrs. [Buller]<sup>7</sup>, a travelled lady, of great spirit, and some consciousness of her own abilities. We had a contest of gallantry an hour long, so much to the diversion of the company, that, at Ramsay's, last night, in a crowded room, they would have pitted us again. There were Smelt<sup>8</sup> and the Bishop of St. Asaph, who comes to every place; and Lord Monboddo, and Sir Joshua, and ladies out of tale.

" The Exhibition, — how will you do, either to see or not to see! The exhibition is eminently splendid. There is contour, and keeping, and grace, and expression, and all the varieties of artificial excellence. The apartments were truly very noble. The pictures, for the sake of a skylight, are at the top of the house; there we dined, and I sat over against the Archbishop of York."

" May 7. 1780. — I dined on Wednesday with Mr. Fitzmaurice<sup>9</sup>; who almost made me promise to pass part of the summer at Llewenny. Tomorrow I dine with Mrs. Southwell [p. 246.]; and on Thursday with Lord Lucan. To-night I go to Miss Monkton's.<sup>10</sup> Then I seramble, when you do not quite shut me up: but I am miserably under petticoat government, and yet am not very weary, nor much ashamed."

" May 8. 1780. — I dine on Thursday at Lord Lucan's, and on Saturday at Lady Craven's; and I dined yesterday with Mrs. Southwell. As to my

<sup>1</sup> This alludes to Johnson's frequent advice to her and Miss Thrale to date their letters; a laudable habit, which, however, he himself did not always practise. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> William Melmoth, the author of Fitzosborne's Letters, and the translator of the Letters of Pliny and Cicero, and some of the minor works of the latter. He died in 1799, ætat. 89. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> Dr. John Hinchliffe. — BOSWELL.

<sup>4</sup> Fanny, afterwards Madam D'Arbly. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>5</sup> I have taken the liberty to leave out a few lines. — BOSWELL.

<sup>6</sup> Line of a song in the Spectator, No. 470. — CROKER.

<sup>7</sup> Mary, daughter, and, at length, co-heiress of Mr. Hippeley Cox, of Somersetsshire, and wife of James Buller, Esq., of Downes, near Exeter, of whom Mrs. D'Arbly writes, "Mrs. Buller is tall and elegant in her person, genteel and ugly in her face, and abrupt and singular in her manners. She is very clever, sprightly, witty, and much in vogue — a Greek scholar and a celebrated traveller — having had the maternal heroism to accompany her son on the Grand Tour." — Memoirs of Burney, vol. ii. p. 291. — CROKER, 1835-47.

<sup>8</sup> Leonard Smelt, Esq., sub-governor to the sons of George III. He was much in the blue stocking circle of the day; he died in 1800, at an advanced age. — CROKER.

<sup>9</sup> The Hon. Thomas Fitzmaurice, only brother to Lord Shelburn, through whom, perhaps, may have come Johnson's acquaintance with his Lordship, (ante, p. 584, n. 5.) though I incline to believe that it was of an earlier date. Mr. Fitzmaurice had bought the Llewenny estate from Mrs. Thrale's uncle. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>10</sup> The Hon. Mary Monkton, daughter of the first Viscount Galway, born April 1746; married in 1786 to Edmund, seventh looks at the Academy, I was not told of them; and as I remember, I was very well, and am well enough now."

"May 9. 1780. — My Lives creep on. I have done Addison, Prior, Rowe, Granville, Sheffield, Collins, Pitt, and almost Fenton. I design to take Congreve next into my hand. I hope to have done before you can come home; and then whether shall I go? — Did I tell you that Scott and Jones<sup>1</sup> both offer themselves to represent the University in the place of Sir Roger Newdigate? They are struggling hard for what others think neither of them will obtain.]

—Letters.

On the 2d of May I wrote to him, and requested that we might have another meeting somewhere in the north of England in the autumn of this year.

From Mr. Langton I received soon after this time a letter, of which I extract a passage, relative both to Mr. Beauclerk and Dr. Johnson.

LANGTON TO BOSWELL.

"The melancholy information you have received concerning Mr. Beauclerk's death is true. Had his talents been directed in any sufficient degree as they ought, I have always been strongly of opinion that they were calculated to make an illustrious figure; and that opinion, as it had been in part formed upon Dr. Johnson's judgment, receives more and more confirmation by hearing what, since his death, Dr. Johnson has said concerning them. A few evenings ago he was at Mr. Vesey's, where Lord Althorpe<sup>2</sup>, who was one of a numerous company there, addressed Dr. Johnson on the subject of Mr. Beauclerk's death, saying, 'Our Club has had a great loss since we met last.' He replied, 'A loss that perhaps the whole nation could not repair!' The doctor then went on to speak of his endowments, and particularly extolled the wonderful ease with which he uttered what was highly excellent. He said, 'that no man ever was so free, when he was going to say a good thing, from a look that expressed that it was coming; or, when he had said it, from a look that expressed that it had come.' At Mr. Thrale's, some days before, when we were talking on the same subject, he said, referring to the same idea of his wonderful facility, 'that Beauclerk's talents were those which he had felt himself more disposed to envy, than those of any whom he had known.'

"On the evening I have spoken of above, at Mr. Vesey's, you would have been much gratified, as it exhibited an instance of the high importance in which Dr. Johnson's character is held, I think even beyond any I ever before was witness to. The company consisted chiefly of ladies; among whom were the Duchess Dowager of Portland<sup>3</sup>, the Duchess of Beaufort, whom, I suppose, from her rank, I must name before her mother, Mrs. Boscawen<sup>4</sup>, and her eldest sister, Mrs. Lewson, who was likewise there; Lady Lucan<sup>5</sup>, Lady Clermont<sup>6</sup>, and others of note both for their station and understandings. Among other gentlemen were Lord Althorpe, whom I have before named, Lord Macartney, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Lord Lucan, Mr. Wraxall, whose book you have probably seen, the 'Tour to the Northern Parts of Europe,' a very agreeable, ingenious man, Dr. Warren, Mr. Pepys, the master in chancery, whom, I believe, you know, and Dr. Barnard, the provost of Eton.<sup>7</sup> As soon as Dr. Johnson was come in, and had taken the chair, the company began to collect round him till they became not less than four, if not five deep; those behind standing, and listening over the heads of those that were sitting near him. The conversation for some time was chiefly between Dr. Johnson and the provost of Eton<sup>8</sup>, while the others contributed occasionally their remarks. Without attempting to detail the particulars of the Earl of Cork and Orrery. Lodge's Irish Peerage dates her birth 1737, but this is a mistake for an elder sister of the same name. Now in her eighty-ninth year, Lady Corke still entertains and enjoys society with extraordinary health, spirits, and vivacity, and Boswell's description of her fifty-four years ago, as "the lively Miss Monkton, who used always to have the finest bit of blue at her parties" (post, May 8, 1780), is characteristic to this day. — CROKER, 1835.

In July, 1836, in allusion to the mistake in the Irish peerage, she wrote me the following lively note:—

"New Burlington Street, July 22. [1836.]

"I would rather I was a hundred—because you and many other agreeable people would come to me as a wonder. The fact is, I am only verging on ninety. I wish the business of the nation may not prevent your giving me the pleasure of your company to dinner on Wednesday, the 3d, at a quarter before eight. It is in vain, I suppose, to expect you at my tea-drinking on Friday, the 5th, or in the evening of the 3d, in the event of your not being able to dine with me on that day."

M. CORK AND ORRERY."

I have suppressed a word or two of compliment, which— with the forgetting that I was both out of office and parliament, and had therefore no share in "the business of the nation"—are the only marks of animity in this note written on the verge of 91;—for I found by the register of St. James's parish that she had underdated her age by one year. She died on the 30th of May, 1840. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>1</sup> Lord Stowell and Sir William Jones. On this occasion Sir W. Dolben was chosen, but Lord Stowell was elected for the University of Oxford in 1801, and represented it till his promotion to the peerage in 1821. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> John George, second Earl Spencer, who has been so kind as to answer some of my inquiries relative to the society, of which he and Lord Stowell are now almost the only survivors. — CROKER. He died November 10, 1834—the possessor of one of the choicest private libraries in the world. — CROKER, 1835.

<sup>3</sup> Lady Margaret Cavendish Harley, only child of the second Earl of Oxford and Mortimer; married in 1734 to the second Duke of Portland. She was the heiress of three great families: herself of the Harleys; her mother (the Lady Harriet of Prior) was the heiress of John Holles, Duke of Newcastle; and her mother again, the heiress of Henry Cavendish, Duke of Newcastle. "The Duchess of Portland inherited," says the Peerage, "the spirit of her ancestors in her patronage of literature and the arts." Her birth was congratulated by Swift, and her childhood celebrated by Prior in the well-known nursery lues beginning

"My noble, lovely, little Peggy."

And she it was to whom Young addressed the ridiculous flattery of calling the Moon "the Portland of the skies." This excellent lady died in 1785. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> Mrs. Boscawen and her daughters, Mrs. Leveson (pronounced Lewson) Gower and the Duchess of Beaufort, are celebrated in Miss Hannah More's poem entitled Sensibility.

"All Leveson's sweetness and all Beaufort's grace."
CROKER, 1835.

<sup>5</sup> Margaret Smith; married in 1760 the first Lord Lucan. — A lady of taste and talents. — CROKER.

<sup>6</sup> Frances Murray; married in 1752 to the first Lord Clermont. — CROKER.

<sup>7</sup> See ante, p. 644., Johnson's own account of this evening. The gentle and good-natured Langton does not hint at his having driven away "the very agreeable and ingenious Mr. Wraxall." — CROKER.

<sup>8</sup> Dr. Barnard's colloquial powers were highly celebrated. See Nichols's Lit. Anecdotes, viii. 549. — CROKER.

conversation, which, perhaps, if I did, I should spin my account out to a tedious length, I thought, my dear Sir, this general account of the respect with which our valued friend was attended to might be acceptable."

[JOHNSON TO THOMAS WARTON.]

" Bolt Court, Fleet Street, May 9. 1780.

" SIR, — I have your pardon to ask for an involuntary fault. In a parcel sent from Mr. Boswell I found the enclosed letter, which, without looking on the direction, I broke open; but, finding I did not understand it, soon saw it belonged to you. I am sorry for this appearance of a fault, but believe me it is only the appearance. I did not read enough of the letter to know its purport. I am, Sir, your most humble servant,
— MS. "SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHNSON TO JOSEPH WARTON.

" May 23. 1780.

" DEAR SIR, — It is unnecessary to tell you how much I was obliged by your useful memorials. The shares of Fenton and Broome in the Odyssey I had before from Mr. Spence. Dr. Warburton did not know them. I wish to be told, as the question is of great importance in the poetical world, whence you had your intelligence; if from Spence, it shows at least his consistency; if from any other, it confers corroboration. If any thing useful to me should occur, I depend upon your friendship. Be pleased to make my compliments to the ladies of your house, and to the gentlemen that honoured me with the Greek Epigrams, when I had, what I hope sometime to have again, the pleasure of spending a little time with you at Winchester. I am, dear Sir, your most obliged and most humble servant,
SAM. JOHNSON."
— MS.

JOHNSON TO MRS. THRALE.

(Extracts.)

" May 23. 1780.

" But [Mrs. Montagu] and you have had, with all your adulation, nothing finer said of you than was said last Saturday night of Burke and me. We were at the Bishop of [St. Asaph's<sup>2</sup>], (a bishop little better than your bishop [Hinchliffe]), and towards twelve we fell into talk, to which the ladies listened, just as they do to you; and said, as I heard, 'There is no rising unless somebody will cry Fire!' I was last night at Miss Monkton's; and there were Lady Craven and Lady Cranburne, and many ladies and few men. Next Saturday I am to be at Mr. Pepys's, and in the intermediate time am to provide for myself as I can."

" May 25. — Congreve, whom I despatched at the Borough while I was attending the election, is one of the best of the little Lives; but then I had your conversation."<sup>3</sup>
— Letters.

JOHNSON TO DR. FARMER.

" May 25. 1780.

" SIR, — I know your disposition to second any literary attempt, and therefore venture upon the liberty of intreating you to procure from college or university registers all the dates or other informations which they can supply relating to Ambrose Philips, Broome, and Gray, who were all of Cambridge, and of whose lives I am to give such accounts as I can gather. Be pleased to forgive this trouble from, Sir, your most humble servant,
"SAM. JOHNSON."

While Johnson was thus engaged in preparing a delightful literary entertainment for the world, the tranquillity of the metropolis of Great Britain was unexpectedly disturbed by the most horrid series of outrage that ever disgraced a civilised country. A relaxation of some of the severe penal provisions against our fellow-subjects of the Catholic communion had been granted by the legislature, with an opposition so inconsiderable, that the genuine mildness of Christianity, united with liberal policy, seemed to have become general in this island. But a dark and malignant spirit of persecution soon showed itself, in an unworthy petition for the repeal of the wise and humane statute. That petition was brought forward by a mob, with the evident purpose of intimidation, and was justly rejected. But the attempt was accompanied and followed by such daring violence as is unexampled in history. Of this extraordinary tumult, Dr. Johnson has given the following concise, lively, and just account in his "Letters to Mrs. Thrale"<sup>4</sup>: —

" June 9. 1780. — On Friday, the good protestants met in Saint George's Fields at the summons of Lord George Gordon; and marching to Westminster, insulted the lords and commons, who all bore it with great tameness. At night the outrages began by the demolition of the mass-house [in Duke Street] by Lincoln's Inn.

" An exact journal of a week's defiance of go-

<sup>1</sup> The formal style of this letter, compared with that of his former correspondence with Thomas Warton, plainly proves that a coolness or misunderstanding had taken place between them. In Dr. Woolf's Memoirs of Joseph Warton we find that the coolness extended to him also: "The disagreement which took place after a long and warm friendship between Johnson and [Joseph] Warton is much to be lamented: it occurred at the house of Sir Joshua Reynolds, as I am told by one of the company, who only overheard the following conclusion of the dispute: JOHNSON. 'Sir, I am not used to be contradicted.' WARTON. 'Better for yourself and friends, Sir, if you were: our admiration could not be increased, but our love might.' The party interfered, and the conversation was stopped."

The style, however, of the next letter, written so late in Dr. Johnson's life, leads us to hope that the difference recorded by Dr. Woolf was transient. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> Shipley, Bishop of St. Asaph's; of whose too constant appearance in general society Dr. Johnson disapproved. The other bishop was Hinchliffe of Peterborough, of whom Mrs. Thrale had told, in her letters from Bath, some amiable and innocent, but not altogether episcopal concessions to the manners of the place, and who, if he was whig enough to displease Mr. Melmoth, (ante, p. 645.) would find little favour in Johnson's eyes. — CROKER, 1831-47.

<sup>3</sup> Boswell is fond of censuring Mrs. Thrale's adulation of Johnson, but the reader will observe here, and in many other instances, that she was only paying him back his own coin. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>4</sup> Vol. II. p. 143. et seq. I have selected passages from several letters, without mentioning dates. — BOSWELL. I have restored the dates, and a remarkable omission. — CROKER.

vernment I cannot give you. On Monday Mr. Strahan, who had been insulted, spoke to Lord Mansfield, who had I think been insulted too, of the licentiousness of the populace; and his lordship treated it as a very slight irregularity. On Tuesday night they pulled down Fielding's house [in Bow Street] and burnt his goods in the street. They had gutted on Monday Sir George Savile's house [in Leicester Square], but the building was saved. On Tuesday evening, leaving Fielding's ruins, they went to Newgate to demand their companions, who had been seized demolishing the chapel. The keeper could not release them but by the mayor's permission, which he went to ask; at his return he found all the prisoners released, and Newgate in a blaze. They then went to Bloomsbury [Square], and fastened upon Lord Mansfield's house, which they pulled down; and as for his goods, they totally burnt them. They have since gone to Caenwood, but a guard was there before them. They plundered some papists, I think, and burnt a mass-house, in Moorfields, the same night.

"On Wednesday I walked with Dr. Scott, to look at Newgate, and found it in ruins, with the fire yet glowing. As I went by the protestants were plundering the sessions-house at the Old Bailey. There were not, I believe, a hundred; but they did their work at leisure, in full security, without sentinels, without trepidation, as men lawfully employed in full day. Such is the cowardice of a commercial place. On Wednesday they broke open the Fleet, and the King's Bench, and the Marshalsea, and Wood-street Compter, and Clerkenwell Bridewell, and released all the prisoners.

"At night they set fire to the Fleet, and to the King's Bench, and I know not how many other places; and one might see the glare of conflagration fill the sky from many parts. The sight was dreadful. Some people were threatened: Mr. Strahan advised me to take care of myself. Such a time of terror you have been happy in not seeing.

"The king said in council, 'that the magistrates had not done their duty, but that he would do his own; and a proclamation was published, directing us to keep our servants within doors, as the peace was now to be preserved by force. The soldiers were sent out to different parts, and the town is now at quiet.

"What has happened at your house you will know; the harm is only a few butts of beer; and, I think, you may be sure that the danger is over. There is a body of soldiers at St. Margaret's Hill."<sup>1</sup>

"June 10. — The soldiers are stationed so as to be every where within call. There is no longer any body of rioters, and the individuals are hunted to their holes, and led to prison. Lord George was last night sent to the Tower. Mr. John Wilkes was this day in my neighbourhood, to seize the publisher of a seditious paper.

"Several chapels have been destroyed, and several inoffensive papists have been plundered; but the high sport was to burn the gaols. This was a good rabble trick. The debtors and the criminals were all set at liberty; but of the criminals, as has always happened, many are already retaken; and two pirates have surrendered themselves, and it is expected that they will be pardoned.

"Government now acts again with its proper force; and we are all under the protection of the king and the law. I thought that it would be agreeable to you and my master to have my testimony to the public security; and that you would sleep more quietly when I told you that you are safe."

"June 12. — The public has escaped a very heavy calamity. The rioters attempted the Bank on Wednesday night, but in no great number; and, like other thieves, with no great resolution. Jack Wilkes headed the party that drove them away. It is agreed, that if they had seized the Bank on Tuesday, at the height of the panic, when no resistance had been prepared, they might have carried irrecoverably away whatever they had found. Jack, who was always zealous for order and decency, declares, that if he be trusted with power, he will not leave a rioter alive. There is, however, now no longer any need of heroism or bloodshed; no blue riband<sup>2</sup> is any longer worn.

"All danger here is apparently over: but a little agitation still continues. We frighten one another with 70,000 Scots<sup>3</sup>, to come hither with the Dukes of Gordon and Argyll, and eat us, and hang us, or drown us; but we are all at quiet."

"June 14. — There has, indeed, been an universal panic, from which the king was the first that recovered. Without the concurrence of his ministers, or the assistance of the civil magistrates, he put the soldiers in motion, and saved the town from calamities, such as a rabble's government must naturally produce."

Such was the end of this miserable sedition, from which London was delivered by the magnanimity of the sovereign himself. Whatever some may maintain, I am satisfied that there was no combination or plan, either domestic or foreign; but that the mischief spread by a gradual contagion of frenzy, augmented by the quantities of fermented liquors of which the deluded populace possessed themselves in the course of their depredations.

I should think myself very much to blame, did I here neglect to do justice to my esteemed friend<sup>4</sup> Mr. Akerman, the keeper of Newgate, who long discharged a very important trust with an uniform intrepid firmness, and at the same time a tenderness and a liberal charity which entitled him to be recorded with distinguished honour.

Upon this occasion, from the timidity and

<sup>1</sup> In the Borough. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>2</sup> Lord George Gordon and his followers, during these outrages, wore blue ribands in their hats. — MALONE.

<sup>3</sup> Mr. Boswell seems not to have relished this allusion to a Scottish invasion, and, instead of laughing, as Johnson appears to have done, at this absurd rumour, chose to omit the passage altogether. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> Why Mr. Boswell should call the keeper of Newgate his "esteemed friend" has puzzled many readers; but besides his natural desire to make the acquaintance of every body who was eminent or remarkable, or even notorious, his strange propensity for witnessing executions probably brought him into more immediate intercourse with the keeper of Newgate. — CROKER.

negligence of magistracy on the one hand, and the almost incredible exertions of the mob on the other, the first prison of this great country was laid open, and the prisoners set free; but that Mr. Akerman, whose house was burnt, would have prevented all this, had proper aid been sent him in due time, there can be no doubt.

Many years ago, a fire broke out in the brick part which was built as an addition to the old gaol of Newgate. The prisoners were in consternation and tumult, calling out, "We shall be burnt, we shall be burnt! Down with the gate!—down with the gate!" Mr. Akerman hastened to them, showed himself at the gate, and having, after some confused vociferation of "Hear him! Hear him!" obtained a silent attention, he then calmly told them, that the gate must not go down; that they were under his care, and that they should not be permitted to escape; but that he could assure them they need not be afraid of being burnt, for that the fire was not in the prison, properly so called, which was strongly built with stone; and that if they would engage to be quiet, he himself would come in to them, and conduct them to the further end of the building, and would not go out till they gave him leave. To this proposal they agreed; upon which Mr. Akerman, having first made them fall back from the gate, went in, and with a determined resolution ordered the outer turnkey upon no account to open the gate, even though the prisoners (though he trusted they would not) should break their word, and by force bring himself to order it. "Never mind me," said he, "should that happen." The prisoners peaceably followed him, while he conducted them through passages of which he had the keys to the extremity of the gaol, which was most distant from the fire. Having by this very judicious conduct fully satisfied them that there was no immediate risk, if any at all, he then addressed them thus: "Gentlemen, you are now convinced that I told you true. I have no doubt that the engines will soon extinguish this fire: if they should not, a sufficient guard will come, and you shall be all taken out and lodged in the compters. I assure you, upon my word and honour, that I have not a farthing insured. I have left my house that I might take care of you. I will keep my promise, and stay with you if you insist upon it; but if you will allow me to go out and look after my family and property, I shall be obliged to you." Struck with his behaviour, they called out, "Master Akerman, you have done bravely; it was very kind in you: by all means go and take care of your own concerns." He did so accordingly, while they remained, and were all preserved.

Johnson has been heard to relate the substance of this story with high praise, in which he was joined by Mr. Burke. My illustrious friend, speaking of Mr. Akerman's kindness to his prisoners, pronounced this eulogy upon his character:—"He who has long had constantly in his view the worst of mankind, and is yet eminent for the humanity of his disposition, must have had it originally in a great degree, and continued to cultivate it very carefully."

[JOHNSON TO MRS. THRALE.

(Extracts.)

"June 15. 1780. — I was last week at Renny's conversation, and Renny got her room pretty well filled; and there were Mrs. Ord, and Mrs. Horneck, and Mrs. Bunbury, [p. 140. n. 7.] and other illustrious names, and much would poor Renny have given to have had Mrs. Thrale too, and Queeny, and [Fanny] Burney; but human happiness is never perfect; there is always une vuide affreuse, as Maintenon complained, — some craving void left aching in the breast. Renny is going to Rams-gate; and thus the world drops away, and I am left in the sultry town, to see the sun in the Crab, and perhaps in the Lion, while you are paddling with the Nereids."

"July 1. — I have not seen or done much since I had the misfortune of seeing you go away. I was one night at Burney's. There were Pepps, and Mrs. Ord, and Paradise, and Hoole, and Dr. Dunbar of Aberdeen, and I know not how many more; and Pepps and I had all the talk."

— Letters

JOHNSON TO MISS REYNOLDS.

"Bolt Court, June 16. 1780.

"DEAR MADAM, — I answer your letter as soon as I can, for I have just received it. I am very willing to wait on you at all times, and will sit for the picture, and, if it be necessary, will sit again, for whenever I sit I shall be always with you.

"Do not, my love, burn your papers. I have mended little but some bad rhymes.<sup>1</sup> I thought them very pretty, and was much moved in reading them. The red ink is only lake and gum, and with a moist sponge will be washed off.

"I have been out of order, but, by bleeding and other means, am now better. Let me know on which day I shall come to you. I am, &c.,

— Reyn. MSS.

"SAM. JOHNSON.

JOHNSON TO MRS. THRALE.

(Extracts.)

"London, July 10. 1780. — I stay at home to work, and yet do not work diligently; nor can tell when I shall have done, nor perhaps does any body but myself wish me to have done; for what can they hope I shall do better? Yet I wish the work was over, and I was at liberty. Would I go to Mrs. Aston and Mrs. Porter, and see the old places, and sigh to find that my old friends are gone? Would I recal plans of life which I never brought into practice, and hopes of excellence which I once presumed, and never have attained? Would I compare what I now am, with what I once expected to have been? Is it reasonable to wish for suggestions of shame, and opportunities of sorrow?"

<sup>1</sup> Of a poem now (by the favour of Mr. Palmer) before me. Johnson read it attentively, and made numerous corrections; but after all it is not worth much. — CROKER.

"July 27. — I dined yesterday at Sir Joshua's with Mrs. Cholmondeley, and she told me I was the best critic in the world, and I told her that nobody in the world could judge like her of the merit of a critic. On Sunday I was with Dr. Lawrence and his two sisters-in-law, to dine with Mr. G —, at Putney. The doctor cannot hear in a coach better than in a room, and it was but a dull day."

"August 1. — I sent to Lord Westcote<sup>1</sup> about his brother's Life; but he says he knows not whom to employ, and is sure I shall do him no injury. There is an ingenious scheme to save a day's work, or part of a day, utterly defeated. Then what avails it to be wise? The plain and the artful man must both do their own work. But I think I have got a Life of Dr. Young."<sup>2</sup>

— Letters.

JOHNSON TO LORD WESTCOTE.

"Bolt Court, Fleet Street, July 27. 1780.

MY LORD, — The course of my undertaking will now require a short life of your brother, Lord Lyttelton. My desire is to avoid offence, and to be totally out of danger. I take the liberty of proposing to your lordship, that the historical account should be written under your direction by any friend you may be willing to employ, and I will only take upon myself to examine the poetry. Four pages like those of his work, or even half so much, will be sufficient. As the press is going on, it will be fit that I should know what you shall be pleased to determine. I am, my Lord, your lordship's most humble servant,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHNSON TO LORD WESTCOTE.

"Bolt Court, Fleet Street, July 28. 1780.

"MY LORD, — I wish it had been convenient to have had that done which I proposed. I shall certainly not wantonly nor willingly offend; but when there are such near relations living, I had rather they would please themselves. For the life of Lord Lyttelton I shall need no help — it was very public, and I have no need to be minute. But I return your lordship thanks for your readiness to help me. I have another life in hand, that of Mr. West<sup>3</sup>, about which I am quite at a loss; any information respecting him would be of great use to, my Lord, your lordship's most humble servant,

"SAM. JOHNSON.]"

In the course of this month my brother

David<sup>4</sup> waited upon Dr. Johnson, with the following letter of introduction, which I had taken care should be lying ready on his arrival in London.

BOSWELL TO JOHNSON.

"Edinburgh, April 29. 1780.

"MY DEAR SIR, — This will be delivered to you by my brother David on his return from Spain. You will be glad to see the man who vowed to 'stand by the old castle of Auchinleck with heart, purse, and sword;' that romantic family solemnity devised by me, of which you and I talked with complacency upon the spot. I trust that twelve years of absence have not lessened his feudal attachment, and that you will find him worthy of being introduced to your acquaintance. I have the honour to be, with affectionate veneration, my dear Sir, your most faithful humble servant,

"JAMES BOSWELL."

Johnson received him very politely, and has thus mentioned him in a letter to Mrs. Thrale<sup>5</sup>: —

"I have had with me a brother of Boswell's, a Spanish merchant, whom the war has driven from his residence at Valencia. He is gone to see his friends, and will find Scotland but a sorry place after twelve years' residence in a happier climate. He is a very agreeable man, and speaks no Scotch."<sup>6</sup>

JOHNSON TO MRS. THRALE.

(Extract.)

"Aug. 14. 1780.

"I hope you have no design of stealing away to Italy before the election, nor of leaving me behind you; though I am not only seventy but seventy-one. Could not you let me lose a year in round numbers? Sweetly, sweetly, sings Dr. Swift, —

'Some dire misfortune to portend,
No enemy can match a friend.'

But what if I am seventy-two? I remember Sulpitius<sup>7</sup> says of Saint Martin — (now that's above your reading) — Est animus victor annorum, et senectuti cedere nescius. Match me that among your own folks. If you try to plague me, I shall tell you that, according to Galen, life begins to decline from thirty-five.<sup>8</sup>]

<sup>1</sup> Brother to the first Lord Lyttelton, by which latter title he was afterwards himself created an English peer. See anté, p. 224. n. 7. I have added to the text his letters to Lord Westcote. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> From Mr. (afterwards Sir) Herbert Croft; a very moderate production. He died at Paris, after a fifteen years' residence in that city, April 27. 1816. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> Gilbert West was Lord Westcote's first cousin. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>4</sup> Now settled in London. — BOSWELL. As inspector of seamen's wills in the Navy Pay Office; from which situation he retired in 1823, and died in 1826. — CROKER.

<sup>5</sup> Mrs. Piozzi has omitted the name, she best knows why. — BOSWELL. From delicacy, perhaps, fearing that Mr. Boswell might not like to see his name coupled with the description of Scotland, as a sorry place. — CROKER.

<sup>6</sup> Dr. Johnson had, for the last year, felt some alleviation of a troublesome disease which had long affected him; this relief he thus gratefully and devoutly acknowledged: —

"Sunday, June 18. — In the morning of this day last year, I perceived the remission of those convulsions in my breast which had distressed me for more than twenty years. I returned thanks at church for the mercy granted me, which has now continued a year." Pr. and Méd. p. 180. — CROKER.

<sup>7</sup> "The soul triumphs over years, and disdains to yield to age." Sulpitius Severus, a French ecclesiastical writer, born A. D. 350. His history of his contemporary and friend, St. Martin of Tours, is a sad record of superstition and imposture, "written in a style not unworthy the Augustan age. So natural," Gibbon adds, "is the alliance between good taste and good sense, that I am always astonished by this contrast." Hist. v. 38. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>8</sup> Mrs. Piozzi at her last birth-day must have been forty, so that Johnson must have alluded to the sprightly verses in which he had celebrated Mrs. Thrale at thirty-five (see anté, p. 170. n. 3 and p. 471. n. 3.); but since those notes were written, I have found evidence under her own hand that my suspicion was just, and that she was born in 1740, new style. — CROKER.

JOHNSON TO BEATTIE,

At Aberdeen.

" Bolt Court, Fleet Street, Aug. 21. 1780.

" SIR, — More years<sup>1</sup> than I have any delight to reckon have past since you and I saw one another: of this, however, there is no reason for making any reprehensory complaint: — Sic fata ferunt. But methinks there might pass some small interchange of regard between us. If you say that I ought to have written, I now write: and I write to tell you, that I have much kindness for you and Mrs. Beattie; and that I wish your health better, and your life long. Try change of air, and come a few degrees southwards. A softer climate may do you both good. Winter is coming in; and London will be warmer, and gayer, and busier, and more fertile of amusement than Aberdeen,

" My health is better; but that will be little in the balance when I tell you that Mrs. Montagu has been very ill, and is, I doubt, now but weakly. Mr. Thrale has been very dangerously disordered; but is much better, and I hope will totally recover. He has withdrawn himself from business the whole summer. Sir Joshua and his sister are well; and Mr. Davies has got great success as an author<sup>2</sup>, generated by the corruption of a bookseller.<sup>3</sup> More news I have not to tell you, and therefore you must be contented with hearing, what I know not whether you much wish to hear<sup>4</sup>, that I am, Sir, &c.,
SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHNSON TO BOSWELL.

" London, Aug. 21. 1780.

" DEAR SIR, — I find you have taken one of your fits of taciturnity, and have resolved not to write till you are written to: it is but a peevish humour, but you shall have your way.

" I have sat at home in Bolt Court all the summer, thinking to write the Lives, and a great part of the time only thinking. Several of them, however, are done, and I still think to do the rest.

" Mr. Thrale and his family have, since his illness, passed their time first at Bath, and then at Brighthelmstone; but I have been at neither place. I would have gone to Lichfield if I could have had time, and I might have had time if I had been active; but I have missed much, and done little.

" In the late disturbances, Mr. Thrale's house and stock were in great danger. The mob was pacified at their first invasion with about fifty pounds in drink and meat; and at their second, were driven away by the soldiers. Mr. Strahan got a garrison into his house, and maintained them a fortnight: he was so frightened, that he removed part of his goods. Mrs. Williams took shelter in the country.

" I know not whether I shall get a ramble this autumn. It is now about the time when we were travelling. I have, however, better health than I had then, and hope you and I may yet show ourselves on some part of Europe, Asia, or Africa.<sup>5</sup> In the mean time let us play no trick, but keep each other's kindness by all means in our power.

" The bearer of this is Dr. Dunbar of Aberdeen, who has written and published a very ingenious book<sup>6</sup>, and who I think has a kindness for me, and will, when he knows you, have a kindness for you.

" I suppose your little ladies are grown tall; and your son has become a learned young man. I love them all, and I love your naughty lady, whom I never shall persuade to love me. When the Lives are done, I shall send them to complete her collection, but must send them in paper, as, for want of a pattern, I cannot bind them to fit the rest. I am, Sir, yours most affectionately,
SAM. JOHNSON."

This year he wrote to a young clergyman<sup>7</sup> in the country the following very excellent letter, which contains valuable advice to divines in general: —

TO A YOUNG CLERGYMAN.

" Bolt Court, Aug. 30. 1780.

" DEAR SIR, — Not many days ago Dr. Lawrence showed me a letter, in which you make mention of me: I hope, therefore, you will not be displeased that I endeavour to preserve your goodwill by some observations which your letter suggested to me.

" You are afraid of falling into some improprieties in the daily service by reading to an audience that requires no exactness. Your fear, I hope, secures you from danger. They who contract absurd habits are such as have no fear. It is im-

<sup>1</sup> I had been five years absent from London. — BEATTIE.

<sup>2</sup> Meaning his entertaining "Memoirs of David Garrick, Esq.," of which Johnson (as Davies informed me) wrote the first sentence; thus giving, as it were, the key-note to the performance. It is, indeed, very characteristic of its author; beginning with a maxim, and proceeding to illustrate. "All excellence has a right to be recorded. I shall, therefore, think it superfluous to apologise for writing the life of a man, who, by an uncommon assemblage of private virtues, adorned the highest eminence in a public profession." — BOSWELL.

<sup>3</sup> This means that Davies, from his adversity as a bookseller, had burst into new and gaudier life as an author. — CROKER. The expression alludes to the dogma of the physiologists, "Corruptio unius est generatio alterius." Dryden makes use of it ["The corruption of a poet is the generation of a critic." — Ded. of 3d Misc. and "The corruption of a poet is the generation of a statesman." — Def. of Ess. on D. P.]; and in Congreve's Remarks on Collier, I find, "The corruption of a rotten divine is the generation of a sour critic." But the allusion is to be found still earlier in the first of Quevedo's Visions. "The corruption of mankind is the generation of a catchpole." — Fonnercau. — WRIGHT.

<sup>4</sup> I wish he had omitted the suspicion expressed here, though I believe he meant nothing but jocularity; for, though he and I differed sometimes in opinion, he well knew how much I loved and revered him. — BEATTIE.

<sup>5</sup> It will no doubt be remarked how he avoids the rebellious land of America. This puts me in mind of an anecdote, for which I am obliged to my worthy, social friend, Governor Richard Penn. "At one of Miss E. Hervey's assemblies, Dr. Johnson was following her up and down the room; upon which Lord Abington observed to her, 'Your great friend is very fond of you; you can go nowhere without him.' 'Ay,' said she, 'he would follow me to any part of the world.' 'Then, said the Earl, 'ask him to go with you to America.'" — BOSWELL. This lady was Miss Elizabeth Hervey, daughter of William, brother of Johnson's two friends, Thomas and Henry Hervey. She was born in 1730, and died at a very advanced age, unmarried. — CROKER.

<sup>6</sup> "Essays on the History of Mankind." — BOSWELL. See some account of this professor, in the first volume of the Memoirs of his pupil, Sir James Mackintosh. — CROKER, 1855.

<sup>7</sup> Probably the Reverend George Strahan, who unwarrantably, as I think, published his Prayers and Meditations. The letter itself is a most valuable one. — CROKER.

possible to do the same thing very often without some peculiarity of manner: but that manner may be good or bad, and a little care will at least preserve it from being bad: to make it good, there must, I think, be something of natural or casual felicity, which cannot be taught.

"Your present method of making your sermons seems very judicious. Few frequent preachers can be supposed to have sermons more their own than yours will be. Take care to register, somewhere or other, the authors from whom your several discourses are borrowed; and do not imagine that you shall always remember, even what, perhaps, you now think it impossible to forget.

"My advice, however, is, that you attempt, from time to time, an original sermon; and, in the labour of composition, do not burden your mind with too much at once; do not exact from yourself at one effort of excogitation, propriety of thought and elegance of expression. Invent first, and then embellish. The production of something, where nothing was before, is an act of greater energy than the expansion or decoration of the thing produced. Set down diligently your thoughts as they rise in the first words that occur; and when you have matter you will easily give it form; nor, perhaps, will this method be always necessary; for, by habit, your thoughts and diction will flow together.

"The composition of sermons is not very difficult: the divisions not only help the memory of the hearer, but direct the judgment of the writer: they supply sources of invention, and keep every part in its proper place.

"What I like least in your letter is your account of the manners of your parish; from which I gather, that it has been long neglected by the parson. The Dean of Carlisle (Dr. Percy), who was then a little rector in Northamptonshire, told me, that it might be discerned whether or no there was a clergyman resident in a parish, by the civil or savage manner of the people. Such a congregation as yours stands in need of much reformation: and I would not have you think it impossible to reform them. A very savage parish was civilised by a decayed gentleman, who came among them to teach a petty school. My learned friend, Dr. Wheeler, of Oxford, when he was a young man, had the care of a neighbouring parish for fifteen pounds a year, which he was never paid; but he counted it a convenience, that it compelled him to make a sermon weekly. One woman he could not bring to the communion; and when he reproved or exhorted her, she only answered, that she was no scholar. He was advised to set some good woman or man of the parish, a little wiser than herself, to talk to her in a language level to her mind. Such honest, I may call them holy, artifices must be practised by every clergyman; for all means must be tried by which souls may be saved. Talk to your people, however, as much as you can; and you will find, that the more frequently you converse with them upon religious subjects, the more willingly they will attend, and the more submissively they will learn. A clergyman's diligence always makes him venerable. I think I have now only to say, that, in the momentous work you have undertaken, I pray God to bless you. I am, Sir,

SAM. JOHNSON."

My next letters to him were dated 24th August, 6th September, and 1st October, and from them I extract the following passages:—

"My brother David and I find the long-indulged fancy of our comfortable meeting again at Auchinleck so well realised, that it in some degree confirms the pleasing hope of O! praeclarum diem! in a future state.

"I beg that you may never again harbour a suspicion of my indulging a peevish humour, or playing tricks; you will recollect that when I confessed to you that I had once been intentionally silent to try your regard, I gave you my word and honour that I would not do so again.

"I rejoice to hear of your good state of health; I pray God to continue it long. I have often said that I would willingly have ten years added to my life, to have ten taken from yours; I mean, that I would be ten years older to have you ten years younger. But let me be thankful for the years during which I have enjoyed your friendship, and please myself with the hopes of enjoying it many years to come in this state of being, trusting always that in another state we shall meet never to be separated. Of this we can form no notion; but the thought, though indistinct, is delightful, when the mind is calm and clear.

"The riots in London were certainly horrible; but you give me no account of your own situation during the barbarous anarchy. A description of it by Dr. Johnson would be a great painting; you might write another 'London, a Poem.'

"I am charmed with your condescending affectionate expression, 'let us keep each other's kindness by all the means in our power.' My revered friend! how elevating is it to my mind, that I am found worthy to be a companion to Dr. Samuel Johnson! All that you have said in grateful praise of Mr. Walmsley, I have long thought of you; but we are both Tories, which has a very general influence upon our sentiments. I hope that you will agree to meet me at York, about the end of this month; or if you will come to Carlisle, that would be better still, in case the dean be there. Please to consider, that to keep each other's kindness, we should every year have that free and intimate communication of mind which can be had only when we are together. We should have both our solemn and our pleasant talk.

"I write now for the third time, to tell you that my desire for our meeting this autumn is much increased. I wrote to 'Squire Godfrey Bosville', my Yorkshire chief, that I should, perhaps, pay him a visit, as I was to hold a conference with Dr. Johnson at York. I give you my word and honour that I said not a word of his inviting you; but he wrote to me as follows:—

"I need not tell you I shall be happy to see you here the latter end of this month, as you propose; and I shall likewise be in hopes that you will persuade Dr. Johnson to finish the conference here. It will add to the favour of your own company, if you prevail upon such an associate to assist your observations. I have often been entertained with his writings, and I once belonged to a club of which he was a member, and I never spent an evening there, but I heard something from him well worth remembering.'

<sup>1</sup> I had not seen his letters to Mrs. Thrale.—BOSWELL.

<sup>2</sup> See antè, p. 523. n. 1.—C.

"We have thus, my dear Sir, good comfortable quarters in the neighbourhood of York, where you may be assured we shall be heartily welcome. I pray you, then, resolve to set out; and let not the year 1780 be a blank in our social calendar, and in that record of wisdom and wit, which I keep with so much diligence, to your honour, and the instruction and delight of others."

Mr. Thrale had now another contest for the representation in parliament of the borough of Southwark, and Johnson kindly lent him his assistance by writing advertisements and letters for him<sup>1</sup>. I shall insert one as a specimen. —

"TO THE WORTHY ELECTORS OF THE BOROUGH OF SOUTHWARK.

"Southwark, Sept. 5. 1780.

"GENTLEMEN, — A new parliament being now called, I again solicit the honour of being elected for one of your representatives; and solicit it with the greater confidence, as I am not conscious of having neglected my duty, or of having acted otherwise than as becomes the independent representative of independent constituents — superior to fear, hope, and expectation, who has no private purposes to promote, and whose prosperity is involved in the prosperity of his country. As my recovery from a very severe distemper is not yet perfect, I have declined to attend the Hall, and hope an omission so necessary will not be harshly censured.

"I can only send my respectful wishes, that all your deliberations may tend to the happiness of the kingdom, and the peace of the borough. I am, Gentlemen, your most faithful and obedient servant,
"HENRY THRALE."

<sup>1</sup> He even took a personal part in it. Mrs. Piozzi says, "A Borough election once showed me his toleration of boisterous mirth, and his content in the company of people whom one would have thought at first sight little calculated for his society. A rough fellow one day on such an occasion, a hatter by trade, seeing Dr. Johnson's beaver hat in a state of decay, seized it suddenly with one hand, and clapping him on the back with the other: 'Ah, Master Johnson,' says he, 'this is no time to be thinking about hats?' 'No, no, Sir,' replies our Doctor in a cheerful tone, 'hats are of no use now, as you say, except to throw up in the air and huzza with;' accompanying his words with the true election halloo." — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> Margaret, the second daughter, and one of the co-heiresses of Arthur Cecil Hamilton, Esq. She was married in 1741 to Thomas George, the third Baron, and first Viscount, Southwell, and lived with him in the most perfect conjugal felicity, till September, 1780, when Lord Southwell died; a loss which she never ceased to lament till the hour of her own dissolution, in her eighty-first year, August 16, 1802. The "illustrious example of piety and fortitude" to which Dr. Johnson alludes, was the submitting, when past her fiftieth year, to an extremely painful surgical operation, which she endured with extraordinary firmness and composure, not allowing herself to be tied to her chair, nor uttering a single moan. This slight tribute of affection to the memory of these two most amiable and excellent persons, who were not less distinguished by their piety, beneficence, and unbounded charity, than by a suavity of manners which endeared them to all who knew them, it is hoped, will be forgiven from one who was honoured by their kindness and friendship from his childhood. — MALONE.

<sup>3</sup> Thomas, second Lord Southwell, who was born Jan. 7, 1628-9 and died in London, Nov. 18, 1766. Johnson was well

JOHNSON TO VISCOUNTESS
SOUTHWELL,

Dublin.

"Boit Court, Fleet Street, Sept. 9. 1780.

"MADAM, — Among the numerous addresses of condolence which your great loss must have occasioned, be pleased to receive this from one whose name perhaps you have never heard, and to whom your ladyship is known only by the reputation of your virtue, and to whom your lord was known only by his kindness and beneficence.

"Your ladyship is now again summoned to exert that piety of which you once gave, in a state of pain and danger, so illustrious an example; and your lord's beneficence may be still continued by those who with his fortune inherit his virtues.

"I hope to be forgiven the liberty which I shall take of informing your ladyship, that Mr. Mauritius Lowe, a son of your late lord's father<sup>3</sup>, had, by recommendation to your lord, a quarterly allowance of ten pounds, the last of which, due July 26., he has not received: he was in hourly hope of his remittance, and flattered himself that on October 26. he should have received the whole half-year's bounty, when he was struck with the dreadful news of his benefactor's death.

"May I presume to hope, that his want, and his relation, and his merit, which excited his lordship's charity, will continue to have the same effect upon those whom he has left behind; and that, though he has lost one friend, he may not yet be destitute. Your ladyship's charity cannot easily be exerted where it is wanted more; and to a mind like yours, distress is a sufficient recommendation. I hope to be allowed the honour of being, Madam, &c.,

"SAM. JOHNSON."<sup>4</sup>

On his birthday, Johnson has this note: —

"I am now beginning the seventy-second year of my life, with more strength of body and greater vigour of mind than I think is common at that age."

acquainted with this nobleman, and said, "he was the highest bred man, without insolence, that he was ever in company with." His younger brother, Edmund Southwell, lived in intimacy with Johnson for many years. See an account of him in "Hawkins's Life," p. 45. He died in London, Nov. 22, 1772. In opposition to the knight's unfavourable representation of this gentleman, to him I was indebted for my first introduction to Johnson. I take this opportunity to add, that he appeared to me a pious man, and was very fond of leading the conversation to religious subjects. — MALONE. Hawkins's account is not otherwise "unfavourable" than in representing him as labouring, like his friend Johnson, under the double affliction of poverty and hypochondriasis. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> Amongst the papers of Mr. Lowe (see ante, p. 626.) was found, in Dr. Johnson's handwriting, the following draft of a letter which, no doubt, Johnson had sketched for his poor friend, and which was probably addressed to the new Lord Southwell. It has been communicated to me by Mr. Markland: —

"MY LORD, — The allowance which you are pleased to make me, I received on the _____ by Mr. Puget. Of the joy which it brought your lordship cannot judge, because you cannot imagine my distress. It was long since I had known a morning without solitude for noon, or laid down at night without foreseeing, with terror, the distresses of the morning. My debts were small, but many; my creditors were poor, and therefore troublesome. Of this misery your lordship's bounty has given me an intermission. May your lordship live long to do much good, and to do for many what you have done for, my lord, your lordship's, &c., "M. LOWE." — CROKER.

But still he complains of sleepless nights and idle days, and forgetfulness, or neglect of resolutions. He thus pathetically expresses himself:

"Surely I shall not spend my whole life with my own total disapprobation." (Pr. and Med., p. 185.)

Mr. Macbean, whom I have mentioned more than once, as one of Johnson's humble friends, a deserving but unfortunate man, being now oppressed by age and poverty, Johnson solicited the Lord Chancellor Thurlow to have him admitted into the Charter-house. I take the liberty to insert his lordship's answer, as I am eager to embrace every occasion of augmenting the respectable notion which should ever be entertained of my illustrious friend:—

LORD THURLOW TO JOHNSON.

"London, Oct. 24. 1780.

"SIR,—I have this moment received your letter dated the 19th, and returned from Bath. In the beginning of the summer I placed one in the Chartreux, without the sanction of a recommendation so distinct and so authoritative as yours of Macbean; and I am afraid that, according to the establishment of the house, the opportunity of making the charity so good amends will not soon recur. But whenever a vacancy shall happen, if you'll favour me with notice of it, I will try to recommend him to the place, even though it should not be my turn to nominate. I am, Sir, with great regard, your most faithful and obedient servant,

"THURLOW."

Mr. Macbean was, however, on Lord Thurlow's nomination, admitted into the Chartreux in April 1781; on which occasion Dr. Johnson, with that benevolence by which he was uniformly actuated, wrote the following letter, which, for the sake of connexion, may properly be introduced here:—

JOHNSON TO DR. VYSE,

At Lambeth.

"Bolt Court, April 10. 1781.

"REV. SIR,—The bearer is one of my old friends, a man of great learning, whom the chancellor has been pleased to nominate to the Chartreux. He attends his grace the archbishop, to take the oath required; and being a modest scholar, will escape embarrassment, if you are so kind as to introduce him, by which you will do a kindness to a man of great merit, and add another to those favours which have already been conferred by you on, Sir, &c.,

SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHNSON TO BOSWELL.

"Oct. 17. 1780.

"DEAR SIR,—I am sorry to write you a letter that will not please you, and yet it is at last what I resolve to do. This year must pass without an interview; the summer has been foolishly lost, like many other of my summers and winters. I hardly saw a green field, but staid in town to work, without working much.

"Mr. Thrale's loss of health has lost him the election<sup>1</sup>; he is now going to Brighthelmstone, and expects me to go with him; and how long I shall stay, I cannot tell. I do not much like the place, but yet I shall go, and stay while my stay is desired. We must, therefore, content ourselves with knowing what we know as well as man can know the mind of man, that we love one another, and that we wish each other's happiness, and that the lapse of a year cannot lessen our mutual kindness.

"I was pleased to be told that I accused Mrs. Boswell unjustly, in supposing that she bears me ill-will. I love you so much, that I would be glad to love all that love you, and that you love; and I have love very ready for Mrs. Boswell, if she thinks it worthy of acceptance. I hope all the young ladies and gentlemen are well.

"I take a great liking to your brother. He tells me that his father received him kindly, but not fondly: however, you seem to have lived well enough at Auchinleck, while you staid. Make your father as happy as you can.

"You lately told me of your health: I can tell you in return, that my health has been for more than a year past better than it has been for many years before. Perhaps it may please God to give us some time together before we are parted. I am, dear Sir, yours, most affectionately,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHNSON TO DR. VYSE,

At Lambeth.

"Dec. 30. 1780.

"SIR,—I hope you will forgive the liberty I take, in soliciting your interposition with his grace the archbishop: my first petition was successful, and I therefore venture on a second.

"The matron of the Chartreux is about to resign her place; and Mrs. Desmoulins, a daughter of the late Dr. Swinfen<sup>2</sup>, who was well known to your father<sup>3</sup>, is desirous of succeeding her. She has been accustomed by keeping a boarding-school to the care of children, and I think is very likely to discharge her duty. She is in great distress, and therefore may probably receive the benefit of a charitable foundation. If you wish to see her, she will be willing to give an account of herself.

"If you shall be pleased, Sir, to mention her favourably to his grace, you will do a great act of kindness to, Sir, yours, &c.,

SAM. JOHNSON."

Being disappointed in my hopes of meeting Johnson this year, so that I could hear none of his admirable sayings, I shall compensate for this want by inserting a collection of them, for which I am indebted to my worthy friend

<sup>1</sup> "Mrs. Thrale felt this very acutely. When, after Mr. Thrale's death, a friend of Mr. Henry Thornton, then a candidate for Southwark, canvassed Mrs. Thrale for her interest, she replied, 'I wish your friend success, and think he will have it;—he may probably come in for two parliaments; but if he tries for a third, were he an angel from heaven, the people of Southwark would cry, 'Not this man, but Barabbas.'" — Miss Hawkins's Mem. vol. i. p. 66. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> See anté, p. 4. n. 1. — C.

<sup>3</sup> Archdeacon Vyse, who had been Treasurer of Lichfield Cathedral. — CROKER, 1847.

Mr. Langton, whose kind communications have been separately interwoven in many parts of this work. Very few articles of this collection were committed to writing by himself, he not having that habit; which he regrets, and which those who know the numerous opportunities he had of gathering the rich fruits of Johnsonian wit and wisdom, must ever regret. I however found, in conversation with him, that a good store of JOHNSONIANA was treasured in his mind; and I compared it to Herculaneum, or some old Roman field, which, when dug, fully rewards the labourer employed. The authenticity of every article is unquestionable. For the expressions, I, who wrote them down in his presence, am partly answerable.

"Theocritus is not deserving of very high respect as a writer; as to the pastoral part, Virgil is very evidently superior. He wrote, when there had been a larger influx of knowledge into the world than when Theocritus lived. Theocritus does not abound in description, though living in a beautiful country: the manners painted are coarse and gross. Virgil has much more description, more sentiment, more of nature, and more of art. Some of the most excellent parts of Theocritus are, where Castor and Pollux, going with the other Argonauts, land on the Bœbrycian coast, and there fall into a dispute with Amycus, the king of that country: which is as well conducted as Euripides could have done it; and the battle is well related. Afterwards they carry off a woman, whose two brothers come to recover her, and expostulate with Castor and Pollux on their injustice; but they pay no regard to the brothers, and a battle ensues, where Castor and his brother are triumphant. Theocritus seems not to have seen that the brothers have the advantage in their argument over his Argonaut heroes. 'The Sicilian Gossips' is a piece of merit.

"Callimachus is a writer of little excellence. The chief thing to be learned from him is his account of Rites and Mythology; which, though desirable to be known for the sake of understanding other parts of ancient authors, is the least pleasing or valuable part of their writings.

"Maittaire's account of the Stephani is a heavy book. He seems to have been a puzzle-headed man, with a large share of scholarship; but with little geometry or logic in his head, without method, and possessed of little genius. He wrote Latin verses from time to time, and published a set in his old age, which he called 'Senilia;' in which he shows so little learning or taste in writing, as to make Carteret a dactyl. In matters of genealogy it is necessary to give the bare names as they are; but in poetry, and in prose of any elegance in the writing, they require to have inflection<sup>1</sup> given to them. His book of the Dialects is a sad heap of confusion; the only way to write on them is to tabulate them with notes, added at the bottom of the page, and references.

"It may be questioned, whether there is not some mistake as to the methods of employing the poor, seemingly on a supposition that there is a certain portion of work left undone for want of persons to do it; but if that is otherwise, and all the materials we have are actually worked up, or all the manufactures we can use or dispose of are already executed, then what is given to the poor, who are to be set at work, must be taken from some who now have it: as time must be taken for learning (according to Sir William Petty's observation), a certain part of those very materials that, as it is, are properly worked up, must be spoiled by the unskillfulness of novices. We may apply to well-meaning but misjudging persons, in particulars of this nature, what Giannone said to a monk, who wanted what he called to convert him: 'Tu sei santo, ma tu non sei filosofo.' It is an unhappy circumstance that one might give away five hundred pounds a year to those that importune in the streets, and not do any good.

"There is nothing more likely to betray a man into absurdity than condescension, when he seems to suppose his understanding too powerful for his company.

"Having asked Mr. Langton if his father and mother had sat for their pictures, which he thought it right for each generation of a family to do, and being told they had opposed it, he said, 'Sir, among the anfractuosities<sup>2</sup> of the human mind, I know not if it may not be one, that there is a superstitious reluctance to sit for a picture.'

"John Gilbert Cooper related, that soon after the publication of his Dictionary, Garrick being asked by Johnson what people said of it, told him, that among other animadversions, it was objected that he cited authorities which were beneath the dignity of such a work, and mentioned Richardson. 'Nay,' said Johnson, 'I have done worse than that: I have cited thee, David.'

"Talking of expense, he observed, with what munificence a great merchant will spend his money, both from his having it at command, and from his enlarged views by calculation of a good effect upon the whole. 'Whereas,' said he, 'you will hardly ever find a country gentleman who is not a good deal disconcerted at an unexpected occasion for his being obliged to lay out ten pounds.'<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The want of "learning and taste" in not giving English names classical inflections (if that be Johnson's meaning) is a strange charge against Maittaire, whose Senilia are more liable to the very opposite reproach. If he uses "Carteret" once in its vernacular form, we have a hundred such pedantries as Rutlandus and Granbetus living at Beltoircium — Cibberus (Colley) Elyssus (Sir Richard Elyss). We have "Boothius" uttering "Shak'speriana verba sonantia." Nay, we have Κατραεττος — Κατραεττου — Κατραεττος; so that if such inflections be a sign of taste and learning, I really cannot see the meaning of Johnson's complaint of Maittaire. — CROKER, 1831-47.

<sup>2</sup> This word is not in Johnson's Dictionary, but the still clumsier form of anfractuosity is, with the explanation of finess of windings or turnings. We have already seen that Johnson did not think highly of the understandings of Mr. and Mrs. Langton, and can imagine why he conveyed his opinion of them to their son under this strange term. — CROKER.

"When in good humour, he would talk of his own writings with a wonderful frankness and candour, and would even criticise them with the closest severity. One day, having read over one of his Ramblers, Mr. Langton asked him, how he liked that paper; he shook his head, and answered, 'too wordy.' At another time, when one was reading his tragedy of 'Irene,' to a company at a house in the country, he left the room; and somebody having asked him the reason of this, he replied, 'Sir, I thought it had been better.'

"Talking of a point of delicate scrupulosity of moral conduct, he said to Mr. Langton, 'Men of harder minds than ours will do many things from which you and I would shrink; yet, Sir, they will, perhaps, do more good in life than we. But let us try to help one another. If there be a wrong twist, it may be set right. It is not probable that two people can be wrong the same way.'

"Of the preface to Capell's Shakspeare, he said, 'If the man would have come to me, I would have endeavoured to "endow his purposes with words;" for as it is, he doth "gabble monstrously."<sup>2</sup>

"He related that he had once in a dream a contest of wit with some other person, and that he was very much mortified by imagining that his opponent had the better of him. 'Now,' said he, 'one may mark here the effect of sleep in weakening the power of reflection; for had not my judgment failed me, I should have seen, that the wit of this supposed antagonist, by whose superiority I felt myself depressed, was as much furnished by me, as that which I thought I had been uttering in my own character.'

"One evening in company, an ingenious and learned gentleman read to him a letter of compliment which he had received from one of the professors of a foreign university. Johnson, in an irritable fit, thinking there was too much ostentation, said, 'I never receive any of these tributes of applause from abroad. One instance

I recollect of a foreign publication, in which mention is made of l'illustre Lockman.<sup>3</sup>

"Of Sir Joshua Reynolds, he said, 'Sir, I know no man who has passed through life with more observation than Reynolds.'

"He repeated to Mr. Langton, with great energy, in Greek, our Saviour's gracious expression concerning the forgiveness of Mary Magdalene<sup>4</sup>, Ἡ πίστις σου σέσωκέ σε· πορεύου εἰς εἰρήνην. 'Thy faith hath saved thee; go in peace.' (Luke, vii. 50.) He said, 'The manner of this dismissal is exceedingly affecting.'

"He thus defined the difference between physical and moral truth: 'Physical truth is, when you tell a thing as it actually is. Moral truth is, when you tell a thing sincerely and precisely as it appears to you. I say such a one walked across the street; if he really did so, I told a physical truth. If I thought so, though I should have been mistaken, I told a moral truth.'<sup>5</sup>

"Huggins, the translator of Ariosto, and Mr. Thomas Warton, in the early part of his literary life, had a dispute concerning that poet, of whom Mr. Warton, in his 'Observations on Spenser's Fairy Queen,' gave some account which Huggins attempted to answer with violence, and said, 'I will militate no longer against his nescience.' Huggins was master of the subject, but wanted expression. Mr. Warton's knowledge of it was then imperfect, but his manner lively and elegant. Johnson said, 'It appears to me, that Huggins has ball without powder, and Warton powder without ball.'

"Talking of the farce of 'High Life below Stairs,' he said, 'Here is a farce which is really very diverting when you see it acted, and yet one may read it and not know that one has been reading any thing at all.'<sup>6</sup>

"He used at one time to go occasionally to the green-room of Drury-lane theatre, where he was much regarded by the players, and was very easy and facetious with them. He had a very high opinion of Mrs. Clive's comic powers, and conversed more with her than with any of them. He said, 'Clive, Sir, is a good thing to sit by; she always understands what you say.' And she said of him, 'I love to sit by Dr. Johnson; he always entertains me.' One

<sup>1</sup> What Johnson says is true in fact, but the main reason is, that the property of a great merchant is more at command, from its convertibility: he draws a check or gives a bill; but country gentlemen have no means of meeting an unexpected emergency, but a mortgage, or perhaps a fall of timber — both slow and cumbrous expedients. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> "When thou wouldst gabble like a thing most brutish, I endowed thy purposes with words." — Prospero to Caliban: Tempest, act i. sc. 2. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> Secretary to the British Herring Fishery, remarkable for an extraordinary number of occasional verses, not of eminent merit. — BOSWELL. John Lockman, born in 1698, died in 1771, was also an indefatigable translator for the booksellers, "having acquired a knowledge of the languages, as Dr. Johnson told Sir J. Hawkins, by living at coffee-houses frequented by foreigners." Mr. Tyers says, "that Lockman was a very worthy man, greatly beloved by his friends, and respected even by Pope;" and he adds, "that it is a pity that he who composed so many of the Lives in the 'General Dictionary' should himself not have one in the Biographia." Rhapsody on Pope, p. 104. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> It does not appear that the woman forgiven was Mary Magdalene. — KEARNEY. It is not so stated in St. Luke's text, but it is in the authorised heading of the chapters; yet, as Dr. Hall observed to me, this seems to be contradicted in the 2nd verse of the next chapter, which gives a different account of Mary Magdalene. — CROKER.

<sup>5</sup> This account of the difference between moral and physical truth is in Locke's "Essay on Human Understanding," and many other books. — KEARNEY. 'Tis in every thinking mind. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>6</sup> That, I think, might be said of all farces. — CROKER, 1847.

night, when 'The Recruiting Officer' was acted, he said to Mr. Holland, who had been expressing an apprehension that Dr. Johnson would disclaim the works of Farquhar, 'No, Sir, I think Farquhar a man whose writings have considerable merit.'

"His friend Garrick was so busy in conducting the drama, that they could not have so much intercourse as Mr. Garrick used to profess an anxious wish that there should be. There might indeed be something in the contemptuous severity as to the merit of acting, which his old preceptor nourished in himself, that would mortify Garrick after the great applause which he received from the audience. For though Johnson said of him, 'Sir, a man who has a nation to admire him every night may well be expected to be somewhat elated;' yet he would treat theatrical matters with a ludicrous slight. He mentioned one evening, 'I met David coming off the stage, dressed in a woman's riding-hood, when he acted in The Wonder; I came full upon him, and I believe he was not pleased.'

"Once he asked Tom Davies, whom he saw dressed in a fine suit of clothes, 'And what art thou to-night?' Tom answered, 'The Thane of Ross;' which it will be recollected is a very inconsiderable character. 'O, brave!' said Johnson.

"Of Mr. Longley<sup>2</sup>, at Rochester, a gentleman of considerable learning, whom Dr. Johnson met there, he said, 'My heart warms towards him. I was surprised to find in him such a nice acquaintance with the metre in the learned languages; though I was somewhat mortified that I had it not so much to myself as I should have thought.'

"Talking of the minuteness with which people will record the sayings of eminent persons, a story was told, that when Pope was on a visit to Spence at Oxford, as they looked from the window they saw a gentleman commoner, who was just come in from riding, amusing himself with whipping at a post. Pope took occasion to say, 'That young gentleman seems to have little to do.' Mr. Beauclerk observed, 'Then, to be sure, Spence turned round and wrote that down;' and went on to say to Dr. Johnson, 'Pope, Sir, would have said the same of you, if he had seen you distilling.' JOHNSON. 'Sir, if Pope had told me of my distilling, I would have told him of his grotto.'

"He would allow no settled indulgence of idleness upon principle, and always repelled every attempt to urge excuses for it. A friend one day suggested, that it was not wholesome to study soon after dinner. JOHNSON. 'Ah, Sir, don't give way to such a fancy. At one time of my life I had taken it into my head that it was not wholesome to study between breakfast and dinner.'

"Mr. Beauclerk one day repeated to Dr. Johnson Pope's lines,

'Let modest Foster, if he will, excel
Ten metropolitans in preaching well;'

then asked the doctor, 'Why did Pope say this?' JOHNSON. 'Sir, he hoped it would vex somebody.'

"Dr. Goldsmith upon occasion of Mrs. Lennox's bringing out a play<sup>5</sup>, said to Dr. Johnson at the club, that a person had advised him to go and hiss it, because she had attacked Shakspeare in her book called 'Shakspeare Illustrated.' JOHNSON. 'And did not you tell him that he was a rascal?' GOLDSMITH. 'No, Sir, I did not. Perhaps he might not mean what he said.' JOHNSON. 'Nay, Sir, if he lied, it is a different thing.' Colman slyly said (but it is believed Dr. Johnson did not hear him), 'Then the proper expression should have been, — Sir, if you don't lie, you're a rascal.'

"His affection for Topham Beauclerk was so great, that when Beauclerk was labouring under that severe illness which at last occasioned his death, Johnson said (with a voice faltering with emotion), 'Sir, I would walk to the extent of the diameter of the earth to save Beauclerk.'

"One night at the club he produced a translation of an epitaph which Lord Elibank had written in English for his lady, and requested of Johnson to turn it into Latin for him. Having read Domina de North et Gray<sup>6</sup>, he said to Dyer, 'You see, Sir, what barbarisms we are compelled to make use of, when modern titles are to be specifically mentioned in Latin inscriptions.' When he had read it once aloud, and there had been a general approbation expressed by the company, he addressed himself to Mr. Dyer in particular, and said, 'Sir, I beg to have your judgment, for I know your nicety.' Dyer then very properly desired to read it over again; which having done, he pointed out an incongruity in one of the sentences. Johnson immediately assented to the observation, and said, 'Sir, this is owing to an alteration of a part of the sentence from the

<sup>1</sup> In a letter written by Johnson to a friend in Jan. 1742-3, he says, "I never see Garrick." — MALONE.

<sup>2</sup> A barrister — Recorder of Rochester, father of my amiable friend, the present master of Harrow (since Bishop of Ripon). Mr. Longley died in 1822. — CROKER, 1831-47.

<sup>3</sup> This would have been a very inadequate retort, for Johnson's chemistry was a mere pastime, while Pope's grotto was, although ornamental, a useful, and even necessary work. Johnson, in his Life of Pope, has treated of the grotto rather too pompously. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> Dr James Foster was an eminent preacher among the dissenters; and Pope professes to prefer his merit in so humble a station to the more splendid ministry of the

metropolitans. Pope's object no doubt was to vex the clergy; but Mr. Beauclerk probably meant to ask — what is by no means so clear — how these two lines bear on Pope's general design and argument. — CROKER.

<sup>5</sup> Probably "The Sisters," a comedy performed one night only at Covent Garden, in 1798. Dr. Goldsmith wrote an excellent epilogue to it. — MALONE.

<sup>6</sup> Lord Elibank married a Dutch lady, Maria Margaret de Yonge, the widow of Lord North and Gray. Mr. Langton mistook the phrase, which is, in the epitaph, applied to the husband, Domina North et Gray, and not to the lady, Domina de North et Gray. See Douglas's Peccage. — CROKER.

form in which I had first written it; and I believe, Sir, you may have remarked, that the making a partial change, without a due regard to the general structure of the sentence, is a very frequent cause of error in composition.

"Johnson was well acquainted with Mr. Dossie, author of a Treatise on Agriculture<sup>1</sup>; and said of him, 'Sir, of the objects which the Society of Arts were chiefly in view, the chymical effects of bodies operating upon other bodies, he knows more than almost any man.' Johnson, in order to give Mr. Dossie his vote to be a member of this society, paid up an arrears which had run on for two years. On this occasion he mentioned a circumstance, as characteristic of the Scotch. 'One of that nation,' said he, 'who had been a candidate, against whom I had voted, came up to me with a civil salutation. Now, Sir, this is their way. An Englishman would have stomached it and been sulky, and never have taken further notice of you; but a Scotchman, Sir, though you vote nineteen times against him, will accost you with equal complaisance after each time, and the twentieth time, Sir, he will get your vote.'

"Talking on the subject of toleration, one day when some friends were with him in his study, he made his usual remark, that the state has a right to regulate the religion of the people, who are the children of the state. A clergyman having readily acquiesced in this, Johnson, who loved discussion, observed, 'But, Sir, you must go round to other states than our own. You do not know what a Bramin has to say for himself.<sup>2</sup> In short, Sir, I have got no further than this: every man has a right to utter what he thinks truth, and every other man has a right to knock him down for it. Martyrdom is the test.'

"A man, he observed, should begin to write soon; for, if he waits till his judgment is matured, his inability, through want of practice, to express his conceptions, will make the disproportion so great between what he sees, and what he can attain, that he will probably be discouraged from writing at all. As a proof of the justness of this remark, we may instance what is related of the great Lord Granville<sup>3</sup>; that after he had written his letter giving an account of the battle of Dettingen, he said, 'Here is a letter, expressed in terms not good enough for a tallow-chandler to have used.'

"Talking of a court-martial that was sitting upon a very momentous public occasion, he expressed much doubt of an enlightened decision; and said, that perhaps there was not a member of it, who, in the whole course of his life, had ever spent an hour by himself in balancing probabilities.<sup>4</sup>

"Goldsmith one day brought to the club a printed ode, which he, with others, had been hearing read by its author in a public room, at the rate of five shillings each for admission. One of the company having read it aloud, Dr. Johnson said, Bolder words and more timorous meaning, I think, never were brought together.<sup>5</sup>

"Talking of Gray's Odes, he said, 'They are forced plants, raised in a hotbed; and they are poor plants: they are but cucumbers after all.' A gentleman present, who had been running down ode-writing in general, as a bad species of poetry, unluckily said, 'Had they been literally cucumbers, they had been better things than odes.' 'Yes, Sir,' said Johnson, 'for a hog.'<sup>5</sup>

"His distinction of the different degrees of attainment of learning was thus marked upon two occasions. Of Queen Elizabeth he said, 'She had learning enough to have given dignity to a bishop;' and of Mr. Thomas Davies he said, 'Sir, Davies has learning enough to give credit to a clergyman.'

"He used to quote, with great warmth, the saying of Aristotle recorded by Diogenes Laertius; that there was the same difference between one learned and unlearned, as between the living and the dead.

"It is very remarkable, that he retained in his memory very slight and trivial, as well as important, things. As an instance of this, it seems that an inferior domestic of the Duke of Leeds had attempted to celebrate his Grace's marriage in such homely rhymes as he could make; and this curious composition having been sung to Dr. Johnson, he got it by heart, and used to repeat it in a very pleasant manner. Two of the stanzas were these:—

- 'When the Duke of Leeds shall married be
To a fine young lady of high quality,
How happy will that gentlewoman be
In his Grace of Leeds's good company!
'She shall have all that's fine and fair,
And the best of silk and satin shall wear;
And ride in a coach to take the air,
And have a house in St. James's-square.'<sup>6</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Dossie also published, in two vols. 8vo., what was then a very useful work, entitled "The Handmaid to the Arts," dedicated to the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, &c. — HALL. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> Here Lord Macartney remarks, "A Bramin, or any caste of the Hindoos, will neither admit you to be of their religion, nor be converted to yours: — a thing which struck the Portuguese with the greatest astonishment when they first discovered the East Indies." — BOSWELL.

<sup>3</sup> John, Lord Carteret, and Earl Granville, who died January 2. 1763. — MALONE.

<sup>4</sup> As Mr. Langton's anecdotes are not dated, it is not easy to determine what court-martial this was: perhaps — as Sir James Mackintosh suggested — Admiral Keppel's, in 1780. — CROKER.

<sup>5</sup> At Sir Robert Cotton's, at Llewney, one day at dinner, Mrs. Thrale, meaning to please Johnson particularly with a dish of very young peas, said, while he was eating them, "Are not they charming?" "Perhaps," replied he, "they would be so — to a pig."

The Lincolnshire lady, who showed him a grotto she had been making, came off no better. "Would it not be a pretty cool habitation in summer," said she, "Dr. Johnson?" "I think it would, madam," replied he, "for a toad." — Piozzi, p. 48. — CROKER.

<sup>6</sup> The correspondent of the Gentleman's Magazine who subscribes himself Sciolus furnishes the following supplement: "A lady of my acquaintance remembers to have heard her uncle sing those homely stanzas more than forty-five years ago. He repeated the second thus:—

To hear a man of the weight and dignity of Johnson repeating such humble attempts at poetry had a very amusing effect. He, however, seriously observed of the last stanza repeated by him, that it nearly comprised all the advantages that wealth can give.

"An eminent foreigner, when he was shown the British Museum, was very troublesome with many absurd inquiries. 'Now there, Sir,' said he, 'is the difference between an Englishman and a Frenchman. A Frenchman must be always talking, whether he knows any thing of the matter or not; an Englishman is content to say nothing, when he has nothing to say.'

"His unjust contempt for foreigners was, indeed, extreme. One evening at Old Slaughter's Coffee-house, when a number of them were talking loud about little matters, he said, 'Does not this confirm old Meynell's observation, For any thing I see, foreigners are fools?'

"He said that once, when he had a violent cough, a Frenchman accosted him thus: Ah, monsieur, vous étudiez trop.

"Having spent an evening at Mr. Langton's with the Reverend Dr. Parr, he was much pleased with the conversation of that learned gentleman; and, after he was gone, said to Mr. Langton, 'Sir, I am obliged to you for having asked me this evening. Parr is a fair man. I do not know when I have had an occasion of such free controversy. It is remarkable how much of a man's life may pass without meeting with any instance of this kind of open discussion.'

"We may fairly institute a criticism between Shakspeare and Corneille, as they both had, though in a different degree, the lights of a later age. It is not so just between the Greek dramatic writers and Shakspeare. It may be applied to what is said by one of the remarkers on Shakspeare, that though Darius's shade had rescience, it does not necessarily follow that he had all past particulars revealed to him.

"Spanish plays, being wildly and improbably ideal, would please children here, as children are entertained with stories full of prodigies<sup>2</sup>, their experience not being sufficient to cause them to be so readily startled at deviations from the natural course of life. The machinery of the pagans is uninteresting to us: when a goddess appears in Homer or Virgil we grow weary; still more so in the Grecian tragedies, as in that kind of composition a nearer approach to nature is intended. Yet there are good reasons for reading romances; as the fertility of invention, the beauty of style and expression, the curiosity of seeing with what kind of performances the age and country in which they were written was delighted: for it is to be apprehended, that at the time when very wild improbable tales were well received, the people were in a barbarous state, and so on the footing of children, as has been explained.

"It is evident enough that no one who writes now can use the pagan deities and mythology; the only machinery, therefore, seems that of ministering spirits, the ghosts of the departed, witches and fairies; though these latter, as the vulgar superstition concerning them (which, while in its force, infected at least the imagination of those that had more advantage in education, though their reason set them free from it) is every day wearing out, seem likely to be of little further assistance in the machinery of poetry. As I recollect, Hammond introduces a hag or witch into one of his love-elegies, where the effect is unmeaning and disgusting.<sup>3</sup>

"The man who uses his talent of ridicule in creating or grossly exaggerating the instances he gives, who imputes absurdities that did not happen, or when a man was a little ridiculous, describes him as having been very much so, abuses his talents greatly. The great use of delineating absurdities is, that we may know how far human folly can go: the account, therefore, ought of absolute necessity to be faithful. A certain character (naming the person), as to the general cast of it, is well described by Garrick; but a great deal of the phraseology he uses in it is quite his own, particularly in the proverbial comparisons, 'obstinate as a pig,' &c.: but I don't know whether it might not be true of Lord ——<sup>4</sup>, that from a too great eagerness of praise and popularity, and a politeness carried to a ridiculous excess, he was likely, after asserting a thing in general, to give it up again in parts. For instance, if he had said Reynolds was the first of painters, he was capable enough of giving up, as objections might happen to be severally made, first his outline, — then the grace in form, — then the colouring, — and lastly, to have owned that he was such a mannerist, that the disposition of his pictures was all alike.

"She shall breed young lords and ladies fair,
And ride abroad in a coach and three pair,
And the best, &c.
And have a house," &c.

and remembered a third, which seems to have been the reductory one, and is believed to have been the only remaining one: —

When the Duke of Leeds shall have made his choice
Of a charming young lady that's beautiful and wise,
She'll be the happiest young gentlewoman under the skies,
As long as the sun and moon shall rise,
And how happy shall," &c.

is with pleasure I add that this stanza could never be more fully applied than at this present time [1792]. — BOSWELL.
The Duke and Duchess of Leeds, at the date of Boswell's note, were Francis the fifth duke, who died in 1799, and his second wife Catherine Anghish, who still survives. I believe all these additional lines to be spurious. — CROKER, 1831.

<sup>1</sup> When the corporation of Norwich applied to Johnson to point out to them a proper master for their grammar-school, he recommended Dr. Parr, on his ceasing to be usher to Sumner at Harrow. — BURNEY.

<sup>2</sup> I doubt whether he adequately understood or justly appreciated the Spanish plays; I only know them by translations, but many of them seem to me of a very high order both of pathos and comedy. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>3</sup> Not more so than the rest of the elegy (the fifth), which is certainly, in every point of view, the worst of all Hammond's productions. Johnson exposes the absurdity of modern mythology very forcibly in his Life of Hammond. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> Perhaps Lord Cork and Ortery, p. 555. — CROKER.

"For hospitality, as formerly practised, there is no longer the same reason. Heretofore the poorer people were more numerous, and, from want of commerce, their means of getting a livelihood more difficult; therefore the supporting them was an act of great benevolence: now that the poor can find maintenance for themselves, and their labour is wanted, a general undiscerning hospitality tends to ill, by withdrawing them from their work to idleness and drunkenness. Then, formerly, rents were received in kind, so that there was a great abundance of provisions in possession of the owners of the lands, which, since the plenty of money afforded by commerce, is no longer the case.

"Hospitality to strangers and foreigners in our country is now almost at an end; since, from the increase of them that come to us, there have been a sufficient number of people that have found an interest in providing inns and proper accommodations, which is in general a more expedient method for the entertainment of travellers. Where the travellers and strangers are few, more of that hospitality subsists, as it has not been worth while to provide places of accommodation. In Ireland, there is still hospitality to strangers in some degree; in Hungary and Poland, probably more.

"Colman, in a note on his translation of Terence, talking of Shakspeare's learning, asks, 'What says Farmer to this? What says Johnson?' Upon this he observed, 'Sir, let Farmer answer for himself: I never engaged in this controversy. I always said Shakspeare had Latin enough to grammaticise his English.'

"A clergyman, whom he characterised as one who loved to say little oddities, was affecting one day, at a bishop's table, a sort of slyness and freedom not in character, and repeated, as if part of 'The Old Man's Wish,' a song by Dr. Walter Pope, a verse bordering on licentiousness. Johnson rebuked him in the finest manner, by first showing him that he did not know the passage he was aiming at, and thus humbling him: 'Sir, that is not the song: it is thus.' And he gave it right. Then, looking stedfastly on him, 'Sir, there is a part of that song which I should wish to exemplify in my own life:—

"May I govern my passions with absolute sway!"

"Being asked if Barnes knew a good deal of Greek, he answered, 'I doubt, Sir, he was uoculosus inter cacos.'<sup>1</sup>

"He used frequently to observe, that men might be very eminent in a profession, without our perceiving any particular power of mind in them in conversation. 'It seems strange,' said he, 'that a man should see so far to the right, who sees so short a way to the left. Burke is the only man whose common conversation corresponds with the general fame which he has in the world. Take up whatever topic you please, he is ready to meet you.'

"A gentleman, by no means deficient in literature, having discovered less acquaintance with one of the classics than Johnson expected, when the gentleman left the room, he observed, 'You see, now, how little any body reads.' Mr. Langton happening to mention his having read a good deal in Clenardus's Greek Grammar<sup>2</sup>, 'Why, Sir,' said he, 'who is there in this town who knows any thing of Clenardus but you and I?'<sup>3</sup> And upon Mr. Langton's mentioning that he had taken the pains to learn by heart the Epistle of St. Basil, which is given in that grammar as a praxis, 'Sir,' said he, 'I never made such an effort to attain Greek.'

"Of Dodsley's 'Public Virtue, a poem,' he said 'It was fine blank' (meaning to express his usual contempt for blank verse): however this miserable poem did not sell, and my poor friend Doddy said Public Virtue was not a subject to interest the age.

"Mr. Langton, when a very young man read Dodsley's 'Cleone, a Tragedy,' to him not aware of his extreme impatience to be read to. As it went on, he turned his face to the back of his chair, and put himself into various attitudes, which marked his uneasiness. At the end of an act, however, he said, 'Come let's have some more; let's go into the slaughter-house again, Lanky. But I am afraid there is more blood than brains.' Yet he afterwards said, 'When I heard you read it, I thought higher of its power of language; when I read it myself, I was more sensible of its pathetic effect;' and then he paid it a compliment which many will think very extravagant. 'Sir,' said he, 'if Otway had written this play, no other of his pieces would have been remembered.' Dodsley himself, upon this being repeated to him, said, 'It was too much.' It must be remembered, that Johnson always appeared not to be sufficiently sensible of the merit of Otway.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Johnson, in his Life of Milton, after mentioning that giant poet's extraordinary fancy, that the world was in its decay, and that his book was to be written in an age too late for heroic poetry, thus concludes: "However inferior to the heroes who were born in better ages, he might still be great among his contemporaries, with the hope of growing every day greater in the dwindle of prosperity; he might still be a giant among the pigmies, the one-eyed monarch of the blind." — J. BOSWELL, jun.

<sup>2</sup> Nicholas Clenard, who was born in Brabant, and died at Grenada in 1542, was a great traveller and linguist. Beside his Greek Grammar (of which an improved edition was published by Vossius at Amsterdam in 1626), he wrote a Hebrew

Grammar, and an account of his travels in various countries in Latin (Epistolarum Libri duo, 8vo. 1556) — a very rare work, of which there is a copy in the Bodleian Library. F. Latin (says the author of Nouveau Dictionnaire Historique, 1789) would have been more pure, if he had not known so many languages. — MALONE.

<sup>3</sup> Mr. Langton, as has been already observed, was very studious of Greek literature. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> This assertion concerning Johnson's insensibility to the pathetic powers of Otway is too round. I once asked him whether he did not think Otway frequently tender; when answered, "Sir, he is all tenderness." — BURNBY.

"Snatches of reading," said he, "will not make a Bentley or a Clarke. They are, however, in a certain degree advantageous. I would put a child into a library (where no unfit books are), and let him read at his choice. A child should not be discouraged from reading any thing that he takes a liking to, from a notion that it is above his reach. If that be the case, the child will soon find it out and desist; if not, he of course gains the instruction; which is so much the more likely to come, from the inclination with which he takes up the study."

"Though he used to censure carelessness with great vehemence, he owned, that he once, to avoid the trouble of locking up five guineas, hid them, he forgot where, so that he could not find them."

"A gentleman who introduced his brother to Dr. Johnson was earnest to recommend him to the doctor's notice, which he did by saying, 'When we have sat together some time, you'll find my brother grow very entertaining.' 'Sir,' said Johnson, 'I can wait.'

"When the rumour was strong that we should have a war, because the French would assist the Americans, he rebuked a friend with some asperity for supposing it, saying, 'No, Sir, national faith is not yet sunk so low.'

"In the latter part of his life, in order to satisfy himself whether his mental faculties were impaired, he resolved that he would try to learn a new language, and fixed upon the Low Dutch for that purpose, and this he continued till he had read about one half of 'Thomas à Kempis;' and, finding that there appeared no abatement of his power of acquisition, he then desisted, as thinking the experiment had been duly tried. Mr. Burke justly observed, that this was not the most vigorous trial, Low Dutch being a language so near to our own: had it been one of the languages entirely different, he might have been very soon satisfied."

"Mr. Langton and he having gone to see a freemason's funeral procession when they were at Rochester, and some solemn music being played on French horns, he said, 'This is the first time that I have ever been affected by musical sounds;' adding, 'that the impression made upon him was of a melancholy kind.' Mr. Langton saying, that this effect was a fine one, — JOHNSON. 'Yes, if it softens the mind so as to prepare it for the reception of salutary feelings, it may be good; but inasmuch as it is melancholy per se, it is bad.'

"Goldsmith had long a visionary project, that some time or other, when his circumstances should be easier, he would go to Aleppo, in order to acquire a knowledge, as far as might be, of any arts peculiar to the East, and introduce them into Britain. When this was talked of in Dr. Johnson's company, he said, 'Of all men, Goldsmith is the most unfit to go out upon such an inquiry; for he is utterly ignorant of such arts as we already possess, and consequently could not know what would be accessions to our present stock of mechanical knowledge. Sir, he would bring home a grinding barrow, which you see in every street in London, and think that he had furnished a wonderful improvement.'

"'Greek, Sir,' said he, 'is like lace; every man gets as much of it as he can.'

"When Lord Charles Hay, after his return from America, was preparing his defence to be offered to the court-martial which he had demanded, having heard Mr. Langton as high in expressions of admiration of Johnson as he usually was, he requested that Dr. Johnson might be introduced to him; and Mr. Langton having mentioned it to Johnson, he very kindly and readily agreed; and, being presented by Mr. Langton to his lordship, while under arrest, he saw him several times; upon one of which occasions Lord Charles read to him what he had prepared, which Johnson signified his approbation of, saying, 'It is a very good soldierly defence.' Johnson said that he had advised his lordship, that as it was in vain to contend with those who were in possession of power, if they would offer him the rank of lieutenant-general, and a government, it would be better judged to desist from urging his complaints. It is well known that his lordship died before the sentence was made known.<sup>3</sup>

"Johnson one day gave high praise to Dr. Bentley's verses in Dodsley's Collection, which he recited with his usual energy. Dr. Adam Smith, who was present, observed, in his decisive professorial manner, "Very well, — very well." Johnson, however, added, 'Yes, they are very well, Sir; but you may observe in what manner they are well. They are the forcible verses<sup>4</sup> of a man of a strong mind, but <sup>1</sup> The French horn, however, is so far from being melancholy per se, that when the strain is light, and in the field, there is nothing so cheerful! It was the funeral occasion, and probably the solemnity of the strain, that produced the plaintive effect here mentioned. — BUNNEY. Surely the barytone of the French horn is graver than the treble of the flageolet. "Johnson said of Music, that it was the only sensual pleasure without vice." — Hawkins's Apoph. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>2</sup> It should be remembered, that this was said twenty-five or thirty years ago, when lace was very generally worn. — MALONE, 1796. But even with this explanation the meaning is not clear. Perhaps Johnson meant that Greek was an elegant ornament, like lace, of which every man gets and displays as much as he can. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> See anté, p. 497. n. 2. — C.

<sup>4</sup> Dr. Johnson, in his Life of Cowley, says, that these are "the only English verses which Bentley is known to have written." I shall here insert them, and hope my readers will apply them.

"Who strives to mount Parnassus' hill,
And thence poetic laurels bring,
Must first acquire due force and skill,
Must fly with swan's or eagle's wing.

"Who Nature's treasures would explore,
Her mysteries and arcana know,
Must high as lofty Newton soar,
Must stoop as delving Woodward low.

"Who studies ancient laws and rites,
Tongues, arts, and arms, and history,
Must drudge, like Selden, days and nights,
And in the endless labour die.

not accustomed to write verse; for there is some uncouthness in the expression.<sup>1</sup>

"Drinking tea one day at Garrick's with Mr. Langton, he was questioned if he was not somewhat of a heretic as to Shakspeare. Said Garrick, 'I doubt he is a little of an infidel.' 'Sir,' said Johnson, 'I will stand by the lines I have written on Shakspeare in my prologue at the opening of your theatre.' Mr. Langton suggested, that in the line, —

'And panting Time toil'd after him in vain,'

Johnson might have had in his eye the passage in the 'Tempest,' where Prospero says of Miranda, —

'——— She will outstrip all praise,
And make it halt behind her.'

Johnson said nothing. Garrick then ventured to observe, 'I do not think that the happiest line in the praise of Shakspeare.' Johnson exclaimed (smiling), 'Prosaical rogues! next time I write, I'll make both time and space pant.'<sup>2</sup>

"It is well known that there was formerly a rude custom for those who were sailing upon the Thames to accost each other as they passed in the most abusive language they could invent; generally, however, with as much satirical humour as they were capable of producing. Addison gives a specimen of this ribaldry in Number 383. of 'The Spectator,' when Sir Roger de Coverly and he are going to Spring-garden.<sup>3</sup> Johnson was once eminently successful in this species of contest. A fellow having attacked him with some coarse raillery, Johnson answered him thus, 'Sir, your wife, under pretence of keeping a house of ill fame, is a receiver of stolen goods.' One evening when he and Mr. Burke and Mr. Langton were in company together, and the admirable scolding of Timon of Athens was mentioned, this instance of Johnson's was quoted, and thought to have at least equal excellence.

"As Johnson always allowed the extraordinary talents of Mr. Burke, so Mr. Burke was fully sensible of the wonderful powers of Johnson. Mr. Langton recollects having passed an evening with both of them, when Mr. Burke repeatedly entered upon topics which it was evident he would have illustrated with extensive knowledge and richness of expression; but Johnson always seized upon the conversation, in which, however, he acquitted himself in a most masterly manner. As Mr. Burke and Mr. Langton were walking home, Mr. Burke observed that Johnson had been very great that night: Mr. Langton joined in this, but added, he could have wished to hear more from another person (plainly intimating that he meant Mr. Burke). 'O, no,' said Mr. Burke, 'it is enough for me to have rung the bell to him.'

"Beauclerk having observed to him of one of their friends, that he was awkward at counting money; 'Why, Sir,' said Johnson, 'I am likewise awkward at counting money. But then, Sir, the reason is plain; I have had very little money to count.'

"He had an abhorrence of affectation. Talking of old Mr. Langton, of whom he said, 'Sir, you will seldom see such a gentleman, such are his stores of literature, such his knowledge in divinity, and such his exemplary life;' he added, 'and, Sir, he has no grimace, no gesticulation, no bursts of admiration on trivial occasions: he never embraces you with an overacted cordiality.'

"Being in company with a gentleman who thought fit to maintain Dr. Berkeley's ingenious philosophy, that nothing exists but as perceived by some mind; when the gentleman was going away, Johnson said to him, 'Pray, Sir, don't leave us; for we may perhaps forget

"Who travels in religious jars, (Truth mix'd with error, shades with rays,
Like Whiston, wanting pyx or stars,
In ocean wide or sinks or strays.

"But grant our hero's hope long toil
And comprehensive genius crown,
All sciences, all hearts his spoil,
Yet what reward, or what renown?

"Envy, innate in vulgar souls,
Envy steps in and stops his rise;
Envy with poison'd tarnish touts
His lustre, and his worth decies.

"Inglorious or by wants enthral'd,
To college and old books confined;
A pedant from his learning call'd,
Dunces advanced, he's left behind:
Yet left content, a genuine stoic he,
Great without patron, rich without Sea."
— BOSWELL.

The last stanza is corrected from a better copy found by J. BOSWELL, JUN. — CROKER.

<sup>1</sup> The difference between Johnson and Smith is apparent even in this slight instance. Smith was a man of extraordinary application, and had his mind crowded with all manner of subjects; but the force, acuteness, and vivacity of Johnson were not to be found there. He had book-making so much in his thoughts, and was so chary of what might be turned to account in that way, that he once said to Sir Joshua Reynolds, that he made it a rule, when in company, never to talk of what he understood. Beauclerk had for a short time a pretty high opinion of Smith's conversation. Garrick, after listening to him for a while, as to one of whom his expectations had been raised, turned sily to a friend, and whispered him, "What was you in this? — eh? Flabby, I think." — BOSWELL. I suppose these conversations occurred at the Club, to which Smith was admitted in 1775, — only Beauclerk, Gibbon, Jones, and Reynolds being present. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>2</sup> I am sorry to see in the "Transactions of the Royal Society of Edinburgh," vol. ii., "An essay on the Character of Hamlet," written, I should suppose, by a very young man, though called "Reverend," who speaks with presumptuous petulance of the first literary character of his age. Amidst a cloudy confusion of words (which hath of late too often passed in Scotland for metaphysics), he ventures tentatively to criticise one of the noblest lines in our language: — "Dr. Johnson has remarked, that 'Time toiled after him in vain.' But I should apprehend that this is entirely to mistake the character." Time toils after every great man, as well as after Shakspeare. The workings of an ordinary mind keep pace, indeed, with time; they move no faster; they have their beginning, their middle, and their end; but superior natures can reduce themselves into a point. They do not, indeed, suppress them; but they suspend, or they lock them up in the breast." The learned society, under whose sanction such gabble is ushered into the world, would do well to offer a premium to any one who will discover its meaning. — BOSWELL. The author of this essay was Mr. Thomas Robertson, afterwards D.D. and author of a "Life of Mary Queen of Scots." — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>3</sup> Vauxhall. — CROKER.

to think of you, and then you will cease to exist."

"Goldsmith, upon being visited by Johnson one day in the Temple, said to him with a little jealousy of the appearance of his accommodation, 'I shall soon be in better chambers than these.' Johnson at the same time checked him and paid him a handsome compliment, implying that a man of his talents should be above attention to such distinctions. — 'Nay, Sir, never mind that: Nil te quæsieris extra.'<sup>1</sup>

"At the time when his pension was granted to him, he said, with a noble literary ambition, 'Had this happened twenty years ago, I should have gone to Constantinople to learn Arabic, as Pöcocke did.'

"As an instance of the niceness of his taste, though he praised West's translation of Pindar, he pointed out the following passages as faulty, by expressing a circumstance so minute as to detract from the general dignity which should prevail: —

'Down then from thy glittering nail,
Take, O Muse, thy Dorian lyre.'

"When Mr. Vesey<sup>2</sup> was proposed as a member of the Literary Club, Mr. Burke began by saying that he was a man of gentle manners. 'Sir,' said Johnson, 'you need say no more. When you have said a man of gentle manners, you have said enough.'

"The late Mr. Fitzherbert told Mr. Langton that Johnson said to him, 'Sir, a man has no more right to say an uncivil thing, than to act one; no more right to say a rude thing to another than to knock him down.'

"My dear friend, Dr. Bathurst, said he, with a warmth of approbation, 'declared he was glad that his father, who was a West India planter, had left his affairs in total ruin, because, having no estate, he was not under the temptation of having slaves.'

"Richardson had little conversation, except about his own works, of which Sir Joshua Reynolds said he was always willing to talk, and glad to have them introduced.<sup>3</sup> Johnson, when he carried Mr. Langton to see him, professed that he could bring him out into conversation, and used this allusive expression, 'Sir, I can make him rear.' But he failed; for in that interview Richardson said little else than that there lay in the room a translation of his Clarissa into German.

"Once when somebody produced a newspaper in which there was a letter of stupid abuse of Sir Joshua Reynolds, of which Johnson himself came in for a share, 'Pray,' said he, 'let us have it read aloud from beginning to end; which being done, he, with a ludicrous earnestness, and not directing his look to any particular person, called out, 'Are we alive after all this satire?'

"He had a strong prejudice against the political character of Secker, one instance of which appeared at Oxford, where he expressed great dissatisfaction at his varying the old-established toast, 'Church and king.' 'The Archbishop of Canterbury,' said he, with an affected, smooth, smiling grimace, drinks "Constitution in church and state." Being asked what difference there was between the two toasts, he said, 'Why, Sir, you may be sure he meant something.' Yet when the life of that prelate, prefixed to his sermons by Dr. Porteus and Dr. Stinton, his chaplains, first came out, he read it with the utmost avidity, and said, 'It is a life well written, and that well deserves to be recorded.'

"Of a certain noble lord<sup>4</sup>, he said, 'Respect him you could not; for he had no mind of his own. Love him you could not; for that which you could do with him every one else could.'

"Of Dr. Goldsmith he said, 'No man was more foolish when he had not a pen in his hand, or more wise when he had.'

"He told, in his lively manner, the following literary anecdote: — 'Green and Guthrie, an Irishman and a Scotchman, undertook a translation of Duhalde's History of China. Green said of Guthrie, that he knew no English, and Guthrie of Green, that he knew no French; and these two undertook to translate Duhalde's History of China. In this translation there was found, 'the twenty-sixth day of the new moon.' Now, as the whole age of the moon is but twenty-eight days, the moon, instead of being new, was nearly as old as it could be. The blunder arose from their mistaking the word neuvième, ninth, for nouvelle, or neuve, new.'

"Talking of Dr. Blagden's<sup>5</sup> copiousness and precision of communication, Dr. Johnson said, 'Blagden, Sir, is a delightful fellow.'

<sup>1</sup> Nec te quæsieris extra.

Nor seek beyond yourself. — Persius, Sat. l. 7. — C.

<sup>2</sup> The Right Hon. Agmondesham Vesey was elected a member of the Literary Club in 1773, and died August 11th, 1786. — MALONE. Yet he afterwards found that gentle manners alone were not "enough;" for when Mrs. Piozzi once asked him concerning the conversational powers of Mr. Vesey, with whom she was unacquainted, "He talked to me," said Johnson, "one day at the Club concerning Catiline's conspiracy; so I withdrew my attention, and thought about Tom Thumb." — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> A literary lady has favoured me with a characteristic anecdote of Richardson. One day at his country house at Northend, where a large company was assembled at dinner, a gentleman, who was just returned from Paris, willing to please Mr. Richardson, mentioned to him a very flattering circumstance, that he had seen his Clarissa lying on the king's brother's table. Richardson, observing that part of the company were engaged in talking to each other, affected then not to attend to it; but, by and by, when there was a general silence, and he thought that the latter might be fully heard, he addressed himself to the gentleman: "I think, Sir, you were saying somewhat about" — pausing in a high flutter of expectation. The gentleman, provoked at his inordinate vanity, resolved not to indulge it, and with an exquisitely sly air of indifference, answered, "A mere trifle, Sir, not worth repeating." The mortification of Richardson was visible, and he did not speak ten words more the whole day. Doctor Johnson was present, and appeared to enjoy it much. — BOSWELL.

<sup>4</sup> Probably Lord Cork. See antè, p. 555. 659. — CROKER.

<sup>5</sup> Afterwards Sir Charles Blagden. Hannah More's account of him was, "Doctor Blagden is Secretary to the Royal Society, so modest, so sensible, and so knowing, that he exemplifies Pope's line, 'Willing to teach, and yet not proud to know.'" — Life, vol. ii. p. 98. — CROKER, 1835.

"On occasion of Dr. Johnson's publishing his pamphlet of 'The False Alarm,' there came out a very angry answer (by many supposed to be by Mr. Wilkes). Dr. Johnson determined on not answering it; but, in conversation with Mr. Langton, mentioned a particular or two, which, if he had replied to it, he might perhaps have inserted. In the answerer's pamphlet, it had been said with solemnity, 'Do you consider, Sir, that a house of commons is to the people as a creature is to its Creator?' 'To this question,' said Dr. Johnson, 'I could have replied, that, in the first place, the idea of a Creator must be such that he has a power to unmake or annihilate his creature. Then it cannot be conceived that a creature can make laws for its Creator.'<sup>1</sup> "'Depend upon it,' said he, 'that if a man talks of his misfortunes, there is something in them that is not disagreeable to him; for where there is nothing but pure misery, there never is any recourse to the mention of it.'

"'A man must be a poor beast, that should read no more in quantity than he could utter aloud.'

"'Imlac, in Rasselas, I spelt with a c at the end, because it is less like English, which should always have the Saxon k added to the c.'<sup>2</sup>

"'Many a man is mad in certain instances, and goes through life without having it perceived. For example, a madness has seized a person, of supposing himself obliged literally to pray continually<sup>3</sup>; had the madness turned the opposite way, and the person thought it a crime ever to pray, it might not improbably have continued unobserved.'

"He apprehended that the delineation of characters in the end of the first book of the 'Retreat of the Ten Thousand' was the first instance of the kind that was known.

"'Supposing,' said he, 'a wife to be of a studious or argumentative turn, it would be very troublesome: for instance, if a woman should continually dwell upon the subject of the Arian heresy.'

"'No man speaks concerning another, even suppose it to be in his praise, if he thinks he does not hear him, exactly as he would if he thought he was within hearing.'<sup>4</sup>

"'The applause of a single human being is of great consequence.' This he said to me with great earnestness of manner, very near the time of his decease, on occasion of having desired me to read a letter addressed to him from some person in the north of England; which when I had done, and he asked me what the contents were, as I thought being particular upon it might fatigue him, it being of great length, I only told him in general that it was highly in his praise; and then he expressed himself as above.

"He mentioned with an air of satisfaction what Baretti had told him; that, meeting in the course of his studying English with an excellent paper in 'The Spectator,' one of four<sup>5</sup> that were written by the respectable dissenting minister, Mr. Grove of Taunton, and observing the genius and energy of mind that it exhibits, it greatly quickened his curiosity to visit our country; as he thought, if such were the lighter periodical essays of our authors, their productions on more weighty occasions must be wonderful indeed!

"He observed once, at Sir Joshua Reynolds's, that a beggar in the street will more readily ask alms from a man, though there should be no marks of wealth in his appearance, than from even a well-dressed woman<sup>6</sup>; which he accounted for from the great degree of carefulness as to money, that is to be found in women; saying farther upon it, that the opportunities in general that they possess of improving their condition are much fewer than men have; and adding, as he looked round the company, which consisted of men only, 'There is not one of us who does not think he might be richer, if he would use his endeavour.'

"He thus characterised an ingenious writer of his acquaintance: 'Sir, he is an enthusiast by rule.'

"'He may hold up that shield against all his enemies,' was an observation on Homer, in reference to his description of the shield of Achilles, made by Mrs. Fitzherbert [p. 20.], wife to his friend Mr. Fitzherbert of Derbyshire, and respected by Dr. Johnson as a very fine one.<sup>7</sup> He had in general a very high opinion of that lady's understanding.

"An observation of Bathurst's may be mentioned, which Johnson repeated, appearing to acknowledge it to be well founded; namely, it was somewhat remarkable how seldom, on oc-

<sup>1</sup> His profound adoration of the Great First Cause was such as to set him above that "philosophy and vain deceit" with which men of narrow conceptions have been infected. I have heard him strongly maintain that "what is right is not so from any natural fitness, but because God wills it to be right;" and it is certainly so, because he has predisposed the relations of things so, as that which he wills must be right. — BOSWELL.

<sup>2</sup> I hope the authority of the great master of our language will stop that curtailment innovation by which we see critic, public, &c. frequently written instead of critick, publick, &c. — BOSWELL. Why should we not retrench an obvious superfluity? In the preceding age public and critic were written publique and critique. I find that Johnson himself, in a memorandum among Mr. Anderdon's papers, dated in 1784, writes "cubic feet." — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> Johnson had, no doubt, his poor friend Smart in his recollection: see anté, p. 135. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> This observation confirms my suggestion, anté, p. 282. n. 5, and p. 364. n. 1, that we have suffered by Boswell's having written his Journal of the Tour to the Hebrides under Johnson's inspection. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>5</sup> No. 588. 601, 626, 635. See anté, 10th April, 1776. Johnson's praise of that on Novelty, which is No. 626.; but I find in the Biographical Preface to the Spectator, this praise attributed (I know not why) to No. 588. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>6</sup> Sterne is of a direct contrary opinion. See his "Sentimental Journey," article, The Mystery. — BOSWELL.

<sup>7</sup> Meaning, I suppose, that Homer's description of the shield of Achilles was so masterly that it alone was sufficient to prove him a great poet, and to turn all the shafts of criticism. But the reader cannot have failed to observe that many of the anecdotes in Mr. Langton's Collectanea, are very obscurely expressed, and that different topics seem sometimes jumbled into one paragraph. — CROKER.

caasion of coming into the company of any new person, one felt any wish or inclination to see him again."

This year the Reverend Dr. Franklin having published a translation of "Lucian," inscribed to him the Demonax thus:—

"To Dr. Samuel Johnson, the Demonax of the present age, this piece is inscribed by a sincere admirer of his respectable talents,

THE TRANSLATOR."

Though upon a particular comparison of Demonax and Johnson, there does not seem to be a great deal of similarity between them<sup>1</sup>, this dedication is a just compliment from the general character given by Lucian of the ancient sage, "ἀριστον ὧν ὅσα ἐγὼ φιλοσόφων γενομένων, the best philosopher whom I have ever seen or known."

CHAPTER LXXI.

1781.

The "Lives of the Poets" completed. — Observations upon, and various Readings in, the Life of Cowley. — Waller. — Milton. — Dryden. — Pope. — Broome. — Addison. — Parnell. — Blackmore. — Philips. — Congreve. — Tickell. — Akenside. — Lord Lyttelton. — Young. — Swift.

IN 1781, Johnson at last completed his "Lives of the Poets," of which he gives this account: "Some time in March I finished the 'Lives of the Poets,' which I wrote in my usual way, dilatorily and hastily, unwilling to work, and working with vigour and haste."<sup>2</sup> In a memorandum previous to this, he says of them: "Written, I hope, in such a manner as may tend to the promotion of piety."—(Pr. and Med., pp. 174. 190.)

This is the work which, of all Dr. Johnson's writings, will perhaps be read most generally, <sup>1</sup> There were many points in which Johnson did not resemble Demonax, who was high-born and rich, very mild in his manners, gentle in argument and even in his reprimands, and lived to a great age in uninterrupted health; but in some other particulars Lucian's character seems applicable to Johnson; and indeed his tract resembles (in little) Boswell's own work, being a collection of observations on several topics, moral, critical, and religious, made by a philosopher of strong sense, ready wit, and fearless veracity; and the character which Lucian ascribes to the conversation of Demonax appears to me not unlike (making due allowance for the difference of ancient and modern habits and topics) the style of that of Dr. Johnson. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> This facility of writing, and this dilatoriness ever to write, Dr. Johnson always retained, from the days that he lay a-bed and dictated his first publication to Mr. Hector, to the moment he made me copy out those variations in Pope's Homer which are printed in the Lives of the Poets. 'And now,' said he, when I had finished it for him, 'I fear not Mr. Nichols [the printer] of a pin.'—Piozzi. The first livraison

and with most pleasure. Philology and biography were his favourite pursuits, and those who lived most in intimacy with him, heard him upon all occasions, when there was a proper opportunity, take delight in expatiating upon the various merits of the English poets: upon the niceties of their characters, and the events of their progress through the world which they contributed to illuminate. His mind was so full of that kind of information, and it was so well arranged in his memory, that in performing what he had undertaken in this way, he had little more to do than to put his thoughts upon paper; exhibiting first each poet's life, and then subjoining a critical examination of his genius and works. But when he began to write, the subject swelled in such a manner, that instead of prefaces to each poet, of no more than a few pages, as he had originally intended<sup>3</sup>, he produced an ample, rich, and most entertaining view of them in every respect. In this he resembled Quintilian, who tells us, that in the composition of his "Institutions of Oratory," "Latiùs se tamen aperiente materiâ, plus quam imponebatur oneris sponte suscepi." The booksellers, justly sensible of the great additional value of the copyright, presented him with another hundred pounds, over and above two hundred, for which his agreement was to furnish such prefaces as he thought fit.<sup>4</sup>

This was, however, but a small recompence for such a collection of biography, and such principles and illustrations of criticism, as, if digested and arranged in one system, by some modern Aristotle or Longinus, might form a code upon that subject, such as no other nation can show. As he was so good as to make me a present of the greatest part of the original, and indeed only, manuscript of this admirable work, I have an opportunity of observing with wonder the correctness with which he rapidly struck off such glowing composition. He may be assimilated to the lady in Waller, who could impress with "love at first sight:"

"Some other nymphs with colours faint,
And pencil slow, may Cupid paint,
And a weak heart in time destroy:
She has a stamp, and prints the boy."

was published in 1779. This edition of the Poets was in sixty volumes, small octavo. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> His design is thus announced in his advertisement: "The booksellers having determined to publish a body of English poetry, I was persuaded to promise them a preface to the works of each author: an undertaking, as it was then presented to my mind, not very tedious or difficult. My purpose was only to have allotted to every poet an advertisement, like that which we find in the 'French Miscellanies,' containing a few dates, and a general character; but I have been led beyond my intention, I hope by the honest desire of giving useful pleasure." — BOSWELL.

<sup>4</sup> The bargain was for two hundred guineas, and the booksellers spontaneously added a third hundred; on this occasion Dr. Johnson observed to me, "Sir, I always said the booksellers were a generous set of men. Nor, in the present instance, have I reason to complain. The fact is, not that they have paid me too little, but that I have written too much." The "Lives" were soon published in a separate edition; when, for a very few corrections, he was presented with another hundred guineas. — NICHOLS. Anté, p. 531. n. 1.—C.

That he, however, had a good deal of trouble, and some anxiety, in carrying on the work, we see from a series of letters to Mr. Nichols, the printer, whose variety of literary inquiry and obliging disposition rendered him useful to Johnson. Thus:—

“In the Life of Waller, Mr. Nichols will find a reference to the Parliamentary History, from which a long quotation is to be inserted. If Mr. Nichols cannot easily find the book, Mr. Johnson will send it from Streatham.

“Clarendon is here returned.

“By some accident I laid your note upon Duke up so safely, that I cannot find it. Your informations have been of great use to me. I must beg it again, with another list of our authors, for I have laid that with the other. I have sent Stepney's Epitaph. Let me have the revises as soon as can be. December, 1778.

“I have sent Philips, with his Epitaphs, to be inserted. The fragment of a preface is hardly worth the impression, but that we may seem to do something. It may be added to the Life of Philips. The Latin page is to be added to the Life of Smith. I shall be at home to revise the two sheets of Milton. March 1. 1779.

“Please to get me the last edition of Hughes's Letters; and try to get Dennis upon Blackmore and upon Cato, and any thing of the same writer against Pope. Our materials are defective.

“As Waller professed to have imitated Fairfax, do you think a few pages of Fairfax would enrich our edition? Few readers have seen it, and it may please them. But it is not necessary.

“An account of the Lives and Works of some of the most eminent English Poets, by, &c. ‘The English Poets, biographically and critically considered, by Sam. Johnson.’ Let Mr. Nichols take his choice, or make another to his mind. May, 1781.

“You somehow forgot the advertisement for the new edition. It was not enclosed. Of Gay's Letters I see not that any use can be made, for they give no information of any thing. That he was a member of a philosophical society is something; but surely he could be but a corresponding member. However, not having his life here, I know not how to put it in, and it is of little importance.”<sup>1</sup>

Mr. Stevens appears, from the papers in my possession, to have supplied him with some anecdotes and quotations; and I observe the fair hand<sup>2</sup> of Mrs. Thrale as one of his copyists of select passages. But he was principally indebted to my steady friend, Mr. Isaac Reed, of Staple-inn, whose extensive and accurate knowledge of English literary history I do not express with exaggeration, when I say it is wonderful: indeed, his labours have proved it to the world; and all who have the pleasure of his acquaintance can bear testimony to the frankness of his communications in private society.

It is not my intention to dwell upon each of Johnson's “Lives of the Poets,” or attempt an analysis of their merits, which, were I able to do it, would take up too much room in this work; yet I shall make a few observations upon some of them, and insert a few various readings.

The Life of COWLEY he himself considered as the best of the whole, on account of the dissertation which it contains on the Metaphysical Poets.<sup>3</sup> Dryden, whose critical abilities were equal to his poetical, had mentioned them in his excellent Dedication of his Juvenal, but had barely mentioned them. Johnson has exhibited them at large, with such happy illustration from their writings, and in so luminous a manner, that indeed he may be allowed the full merit of novelty, and to have discovered to us, as it were, a new planet in the poetical hemisphere.

It is remarked by Johnson, in considering the works of a poet<sup>4</sup>, that “amendments are seldom made without some token of a rent;” but I do not find that this is applicable to prose.<sup>5</sup> We shall see, that though his amendments in this work are for the better, there is nothing of the pannus assutus; the texture is uniform; and indeed, what had been there at first, is very seldom unfit to have remained.

Various Readings<sup>6</sup> in the Life of COWLEY.

“All [future votaries of] that may hereafter pant for solitude.

“To conceive and execute the [agitation or perception] pains and the pleasures of other minds.

“The wide effulgence of [the blazing] a summer noon.”

In the Life of WALLER, Johnson gives a distinct and animated narrative of public affairs in that variegated period, with strong yet nice touches of character; and having a fair opportunity to display his political principles, does it with an unqualified manly confidence, and satisfies his readers how nobly he might have executed a Tory History of his country.

So easy is his style in these Lives, that I do not recollect more than three uncommon or learned words: one, when giving an account of the approach of Waller's mortal disease, he says, “he found his legs grow tumid;” by characteristics of wit, than is elsewhere to be found.—CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> Life of Sheffield.—BOSWELL.

<sup>5</sup> See, however, p. 657. of this volume, where the same remark is made, and Johnson is there speaking of prose. In his Life of Dryden, his observations on the opera of “King Arthur” furnish a striking instance of the truth of this remark.—MALONE.

<sup>6</sup> The original reading is enclosed in brackets, and the present one is printed in italics.—BOSWELL.

<sup>1</sup> See several more in “The Gentleman's Magazine,” 1785. The editor of that miscellany, in which Johnson wrote for several years, seems justly to think that every fragment of so great a man is worthy of being preserved.—BOSWELL. The originals are now in the British Museum.—P. CUNNINGHAM.

<sup>2</sup> A fair hand, in more than one sense—her writing is an almost perfect specimen of calligraphy, as beautiful, I think, as I ever saw; and this power remained unimpaired to the last years of her long life.—CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> Hawkins says, that he also gave it the preference, as containing a nicer investigation and discrimination of the using the expression his legs swelled, he would have avoided this; and there would have been no impropriety in its being followed by the interesting question to his physician, "What that swelling meant?" Another, when he mentions that Pope had emitted proposals; when published or issued would have been more readily understood; and a third, when he calls Orrery and Dr. Delaney writers both undoubtedly veracious; when true, honest, or faithful, might have been used. Yet, it must be owned, that none of these are hard or too big words; that custom would make them seem as easy as any others; and that a language is richer and capable of more beauty of expression, by having a greater variety of synonyms.

His dissertation upon the unfitnes of poetry for the awful subjects of our holy religion, though I do not entirely agree with him, has all the merit of originality, with uncommon force and reasoning.

Various Readings in the Life of WALLER.

"Consented to [the insertion of their names] their own nomination.

"[After] paying a fine of ten thousand pounds.

"Congratulating Charles the Second on his [coronation] recovered right.

"He that has flattery ready for all whom the vicissitudes of the world happen to exalt, must be [confused to degrade his powers] scorned as a prostituted mind.

"The characters by which Waller intended to distinguish his writings are [elegance] sprightliness and dignity.

"Blossoms to be valued only as they [fetch] foretell fruits.

"Images such as the superficies of nature [easily] readily supplies.

"[His] Some applications [are sometimes] may be thought too remote and unsequential.

"His images are [sometimes confused] not always distinct."

Against his Life of MILTON, the hounds of whiggism have opened in full cry.<sup>1</sup> But of Milton's great excellence as a poet, where shall we find such a blazon as by the hand of Johnson? I shall select only the following passage concerning "Paradise Lost:"—

"Fancy can hardly forbear to conjecture with what temper Milton surveyed the silent progress of his work, and marked his reputation stealing its way in a kind of subterraneous current, through fear and silence. I cannot but conceive him calm and confident, little disappointed, not at all dejected, relying on his own merit with steady consciousness, and waiting, without impatience, the vicissitudes of opinion, and the impartiality of a future generation."

Indeed even Dr. Towers, who may be considered as one of the warmest zealots of The Revolution Society itself, allows, that "Johnson has spoken in the highest terms of the abilities of that great poet, and has bestowed on his principal poetical compositions the most honourable encomiums."<sup>2</sup>

That a man, who venerated the church and monarchy as Johnson did, should speak with a just abhorrence of Milton as a politician, or rather as a daring foe to good polity, was surely to be expected; and to those who censure him, I would recommend his commentary on Milton's celebrated complaint of his situation, when by the lenity of Charles the Second, "a lenity of which," as Johnson well observes, "the world has had perhaps no other example, he, who had written in justification of the murder of his sovereign, was safe under an Act of Oblivion." "No sooner is he safe than he finds himself in danger, fallen on evil days and evil tongues, with darkness and with dangers compassed round. This darkness, had his eyes been better employed, had undoubtedly deserved compassion; but to add the mention of danger was ungrateful and unjust. He was fallen, indeed, on evil days; the time was come in which regicides could no longer boast their wickedness. But of evil tongues for Milton to complain, required impudence at least equal to his other powers; Milton, whose warmest advocates must allow, that he never spared any asperity of reproach, or brutality of insolence."

I have, indeed, often wondered how Milton, "an acrimonious and surly republican,"<sup>3</sup>—"a man who in his domestic relations was so severe and arbitrary," and whose head was filled with the hardest and most dismal tenets of Calvinism, should have been such a poet; should not only have written with sublimity, but with beauty, and even gaiety; should have exquisitely painted the sweetest sensa-

<sup>1</sup> "Mr. Nichols," says Murphy, "whose attachment to his illustrious friend was unwearied, showed him, in 1780, a book called Remarks on Johnson's Life of Milton, in which the affair of Lauder was renewed with virulence, and a poetical scald in the Literary Magazine, 1758 (when Johnson had ceased to write in that collection), was urged as an additional proof of deliberate malice. He read the libellous passage with attention, and instantly wrote on the margin: 'In the business of Lauder I was deceived, partly by thinking the man too frantic to be fraudulent. Of the poetical scald, quoted from the Magazine, I am not the author. I fancy it was put in after I had quitted that work; for I not only did not write it, but I do not remember it.' " But see anté, p. 73. n. 2.—CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> See "An Essay on the Life, Character, and Writings of Dr. Samuel Johnson." London, 1787; which is very well written, making a proper allowance for the democratical bigotry of its author; whom I cannot however but admire for his liberality in speaking thus of my illustrious friend:—

"He possessed extraordinary powers of understanding, which were much cultivated by study, and still more by meditation and reflection. His memory was remarkably retentive, his imagination uncommonly vigorous, and his judgment keen and penetrating. He had a strong sense of the importance of religion; his piety was sincere, and sometimes ardent; and his zeal for the interests of virtue was often manifested in his conversation and in his writings. The same energy which was displayed in his literary productions was exhibited also in his conversation, which was various, striking, and instructive; and perhaps no man ever equalled him for nervous and pointed repartees. His Dictionary, his Moral Essays, and his productions in polite literature, will convey useful instruction, and elegant entertainment, as long as the language in which they are written shall be understood."—BOSWELL.

<sup>3</sup> Johnson's Life of Milton. — BOSWELL.

tions of which our nature is capable; imaged the delicate raptures of connubial love; nay, seemed to be animated with all the spirit of revelry. It is a proof that in the human mind the departments of judgment and imagination, perception and temper, may sometimes be divided by strong partitions; and that the light and shade in the same character may be kept so distinct as never to be blended.<sup>1</sup>

In the Life of Milton, Johnson took occasion to maintain his own and the general opinion of the excellence of rhyme over blank verse, in English poetry; and quotes this apposite illustration of it by "an ingenious critic," that it seems to be verse only to the eye.<sup>2</sup> The gentleman whom he thus characterises is (as he told Mr. Seward) Mr. Lock, of Norbury Park, in Surrey, whose knowledge and taste in the fine arts is universally celebrated; with whose elegance of manners the writer of the present work has felt himself much impressed, and to whose virtues a common friend, who has known him long and is not much addicted to flattery, gives the highest testimony.

Various Readings in the Life of MILTON.

"I cannot find any meaning but this which [his most bigoted advocates] even kindness and reverence can give.

"[Perhaps no] scarcely any man ever wrote so much, and praised so few.

"A certain [rescue] preservative from oblivion.

"Let me not be censured for this digression, as [contracted] pedantic or paradoxical.

"Socrates rather was of opinion, that what we had to learn was how to [obtain and communicate happiness] do good and avoid evil.

"Its elegance [who can exhibit?] is less attainable."

I could, with pleasure, expatiate upon the masterly execution of the Life of DRYDEN, which we have seen<sup>3</sup> was one of Johnson's literary projects at an early period, and which it is remarkable, that after desisting from it, from a supposed scantiness of materials, he should, at an advanced age, have exhibited so amply.

His defence of that great poet against the illiberal attacks upon him, as if his embracing the Roman Catholic communion had been a time-serving measure, is a piece of reasoning at once able and candid. Indeed, Dryden himself, in his "Hind and Panther," hath given such a picture of his mind, that they who know the anxiety for repose as to the awful subject of our state beyond the grave, though they may think his opinion ill-founded, must think charitably of his sentiment:—

"But, gracious God, how well dost thou provide For erring judgments an unerring guide!
Thy throne is darkness in the abyss of light,
A blaze of glory that forbids the sight.
O! teach me to believe thee thus conceal'd;
And search no farther than thyself reveal'd;
But Her alone for my director take,
Whom thou hast promised never to forsake.
My thoughtless youth was wing'd with vain desires;
My manhood long misled by wand'ring fires,
Follow'd false lights; and when their glimpse was gone,
My pride struck out new sparkles of her own.
Such was I, such by nature still I am;
Be thine the glory, and be mine the shame.
Good life be now my task; my doubts are done;
What more could shock my faith than Three in One?"

In drawing Dryden's character, Johnson has given, though I suppose unintentionally, some touches of his own. Thus: "The power that predominated in his intellectual operations was rather strong reason than quick sensibility. Upon all occasions that were presented, he studied rather than felt; and produced sentiments not such as nature enforces, but meditation supplies. With the simple and elemental passions, as they spring separate in the mind, he seems not much acquainted. He is, therefore, with all his variety of excellence, not often pathetic, and had so little sensibility of the power of effusions purely natural, that he did not esteem them in others." It may indeed be observed, that in all the numerous writings of Johnson, whether in prose or verse, and even in his tragedy, of which the subject is the distress of an unfortunate princess, there is not a single passage that ever drew a tear.<sup>4</sup>

Various Readings in the Life of DRYDEN.

"The reason of this general perusal, Addison has attempted to [find in] derive from the delight which the mind feels in the investigation of secrets.

"His best actions are but [convenient] inability of wickedness.

"When once he had engaged himself in disputation, [matter] thoughts flowed in on either side.

"The abyss of an un-ideal [emptiness] vacancy.
"These, like [many other harlots], the harlots of other men, had his love, though not his approbation.

"He [sometimes displays] descends to display his knowledge with pedantic ostentation.

"French words which [were then used in] had then crept into conversation."

<sup>1</sup> Mr. Malone thinks it is rather a proof that he felt nothing of those cheerful sensations which he has described: that on these topics it is the poet, and not the man, that writes.—BOSWELL.

<sup>2</sup> One of the most natural instances of the effect of blank verse occurred to the late Earl of Hopeton. His lordship observed one of his shepherds poring in the fields upon Milton's "Paradise Lost;" and having asked him what book it was, the man answered, "An't please your lordship, this is a very odd sort of an author: he would fain rhyme, but cannot get at it."—BOSWELL.

<sup>3</sup> See anté, p. 516.—BOSWELL.

<sup>4</sup> It seems to me, that there are many pathetic passages in Johnson's works, both prose and verse.—KEARNEY. The deep and pathetic morality of the Fanny of Human Wishes, has often extracted tears from those whose eyes wander dry over the pages of professed sentimentality.—WALTER SCOTT.

The Life of POPE<sup>1</sup> was written by Johnson con amore, both from the early possession which that writer had taken of his mind, and from the pleasure which he must have felt, in for ever silencing all attempts to lessen his poetical fame, by demonstrating his excellence, and pronouncing the following triumphant eulogium :

"After all this, it is surely superfluous to answer the question that has once been asked, Whether Pope was a poet? otherwise than by asking in return, if Pope be not a poet, where is poetry to be found? To circumscribe poetry by a definition, will only show the narrowness of the definer; though a definition which shall exclude Pope will not easily be made. Let us look round upon the present time, and back upon the past; let us inquire to whom the voice of mankind has decreed the wreath of poetry; let their productions be examined, and their claims stated, and the pretensions of Pope will be no more disputed."

I remember once to have heard Johnson say, "Sir, a thousand years may elapse before there shall appear another man with a power of versification equal to that of Pope." That power must undoubtedly be allowed its due share in enhancing the value of his captivating composition.

Johnson, who had done liberal justice to Warburton in his edition of Shakspeare, which

<sup>1</sup> Mr. D'Israeli has, in the third volume of his "Literary Curiosities," favoured the public with an original memorandum of Dr. Johnson's, of hints for the "Life of Pope," written down as they were suggested to his mind in the course of his researches. — CHALMERS.

<sup>2</sup> Of Johnson's conduct towards Warburton, a very honourable notice is taken by the editor of Tracts by Warburton, and a Warburtonian, not admitted into the Collection of their respective Works. After an able and "fond, though not undistinguishing," consideration of Warburton's character, he says, —

"In two immortal works, Johnson has stood forth in the foremost rank of his admirers. By the testimony of such a man, impertinence must be abashed, and malignity itself must be softened. Of literary merit, Johnson, as we all know, was a sagacious but a most severe judge. Such was his discernment, that he pierced into the most secret springs of human actions; and such was his integrity, that he always weighed the moral characters of his fellow-creatures in the 'balance of the sanctuary.' He was too courageous to prostitute a rival, and too proud to truckle to a superior. Warburton he knew, as I know him, and as every man of sense and virtue would wish to be known, — I mean, both from his own writings, and from the writings of those who dissented from his principles or who envied his reputation. But, as to favours, he had never received or asked any from the Bishop of Gloucester; and, if my memory fails me not, he had seen him only once, when they met almost without design, conversed without much effort, and parted without any lasting impression of hatred or affection. Yet, with all the ardour of sympathetic genius, Johnson had done that spontaneously and ably, which, by some writers, had been before attempted injudiciously, and which, by others, from whom more successful attempts might have been expected, has not hitherto been done at all. He spoke well of Warburton, without insulting those whom Warburton despised. He suppressed not the imperfections of this extraordinary man, while he endeavoured to do justice to his numerous and transcendental excellencies. He defended him when living, amidst the clamours of his enemies; and praised him when dead, amidst the silence of his friends."

Having availed myself of the eulogy of this editor [Dr. Parr] on my departed friend, for which I warmly thank him, let me not suffer the lustre of his reputation, honestly acquired by profound learning and vigorous eloquence, to be tarnished by a charge of illiberality. He has been accused of invidiously dragging again into light certain writings of a person [Bishop Hurd] respectable by his talents, his learning, his station, and his age, which were published a great was published during the life of that powerful writer, with still greater liberality took an opportunity, in the life of Pope, of paying the tribute due to him when he was no longer in "high place," but numbered with the dead.<sup>2</sup>

It seems strange, that two such men as Johnson and Warburton, who lived in the same age and country, should not only not have been in any degree of intimacy, but been almost personally unacquainted. But such instances, though we must wonder at them, are not rare. If I am rightly informed, after a careful inquiry, they never met but once, which was at the house of Mrs. French, in London, well known for her elegant assemblies and bringing eminent characters together. The interview proved to be mutually agreeable.<sup>3</sup>

I am well informed, that Warburton said of Johnson, "I admire him, but I cannot bear his style;" and that Johnson being told of this, said, "That is exactly my case as to him." The manner in which he expressed his admiration of the fertility of Warburton's genius and of the variety of his materials, was, "The table is always full, Sir. He brings things from the north, and the south, and from every quarter. In his 'Divine Legation,' you are always entertained. He carries you round and round, without carrying you forward to the point, but then you have no wish to be many years ago, and have since, it is said, been silently given up by their author. But when it is considered that these writings were not size of youth, but deliberate works of one well advanced in life, overflowing at once with flattery to a great man of great interest in the church, and with unjust and acrimonious abuse of two men of eminent merit; and that, though it would have been unreasonable to expect an humiliating recantation, no apology whatever has been made in the cool of the evening, for the oppressive fervour of the heat of the day; no slight relenting indication has appeared in any note, or any corner of later publications; is it not fair to understand him as superciliously persevering? When he allows the shafts to remain in the wounds, and will not stretch forth a lenient hand, is it wrong, is it not generous, to become an indignant avenger? — BOSWELL. Warburton himself did not feel, as Mr. Boswell was disposed to think he did, kindly or gratefully towards Johnson: for in one of his letters to a friend, he says, —

"The remarks he (Dr. Johnson) makes in every page on my commentaries, are full of insolent and malignant reflections, which, had they not in them as much folly as malignity, I should have had reason to have been offended with. As it is, I think myself obliged to him in this setting before the public so many of my notes, with his remarks upon them: for though I have no great opinion of the trifling part of the public, which pretends to judge of this part of literature, in which boys and girls decide, yet I think nobody can be mistaken in this comparison; though I think their thoughts have never yet extended thus far as to reflect, that to discover the corruption in an author's text, and by a happy sagacity to restore it to sense, is no easy task; but when the discovery is made, then to cavil at the conjecture, to propose an equivalent, and defend nonsense, by producing out of the thick darkness it occasions a weak and faint glimmering of sense (which has been the business of this editor throughout) is the easiest, as well as the dullest, of all literary efforts." — Warburton's Letters, published by Bp. Hurd, 8vo. 367. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> Johnson being asked "whether he had ever been in company with Dr. Warburton?" answered, "I never saw him till one evening, about a week ago, at the Bishop of St. [Asaph's]; at first he looked surlily at me; but after we had been jostled into conversation, he took me to a window, asked me some questions, and before we parted was so well pleased with me, that he patted me." "You always, Sir, preserved a respect for him?" "Yes, and justly; when as yet I was in no favour with the world, he spoke well of me, and I hope I never forgot the obligation." — Hawkins's Anaph. — CROKER.

carried forward." He said to the Reverend Mr. Strahan, "Warburton is perhaps the last man who has written with a mind full of reading and reflection."

It is remarkable that in the Life of Broome, Johnson takes notice of Dr. Warburton's using a mode of expression which he himself used, and that not seldom, to the great offence of those who did not know him. Having occasion to mention a note, stating the different parts which were executed by the associated translators of "The Odyssey," he says, "Dr. Warburton told me, in his warm language, that he thought the relation given in the note a lie." The language is warm indeed; and, I must own, cannot be justified in consistency with a decent regard to the established forms of speech. Johnson had accustomed himself to use the word lie, to express a mistake or an error in relation; in short, when the thing was not so as told, though the relater did not mean to deceive. When he thought there was intentional falsehood in the relater, his expression was, "He lies, and he knows he lies."

Speaking of Pope's not having been known to excel in conversation, Johnson observes, that "traditional memory retains no sallies of raillery, or sentences of observation; nothing either pointed or solid, wise or merry; and that one apophthegm only is recorded." In this respect, Pope differed widely from Johnson, whose conversation was, perhaps, more admirable than even his writings, however excellent. Mr. Wilkes has, however, favoured me with one repartee of Pope, of which Johnson was not informed.<sup>1</sup> Johnson, after justly censuring him for having "nursed in his mind a foolish disesteem of kings," tells us, "yet a little regard shown him by the Prince of Wales melted his obduracy; and he had not much to say when he was asked by his royal highness, how he could love a prince while he disliked kings?" The answer which Pope made was, "The young lion is harmless, and even playful; but when his claws are full grown, he becomes cruel, dreadful, and mischievous."

But although we have no collection of Pope's sayings, it is not therefore to be concluded, that he was not agreeable in social intercourse; for Johnson has been heard to say, that the happiest conversation is that of which nothing is distinctly remembered, but a general effect of pleasing impression." The late Lord Somerville<sup>2</sup>, who saw much both of great and brilliant life, told me, that he had dined in company with Pope, and that after dinner the little man, as he called him, drank his bottle of Burgundy, and was exceedingly gay and entertaining.

I cannot withhold from my great friend a censure of at least culpable inattention to a nobleman, who, it has been shown, behaved to him with uncommon politeness. He says, "except Lord Bathurst, none of Pope's noble friends were such as that a good man would wish to have his intimacy with them known to posterity." This will not apply to Lord Mansfield, who was not ennobled in Pope's lifetime; but Johnson should have recollected, that Lord Marchmont was one of those noble friends.<sup>3</sup> He includes his lordship, along with Lord Bolingbroke, in a charge of neglect of the papers which Pope left by his will; when, in truth, as I myself pointed out to him, before he wrote that poet's life, the papers were "committed to the sole care and judgment of Lord Bolingbroke, unless he (Lord Bolingbroke) shall not survive me;" so that Lord Marchmont has no concern whatever with them. After the first edition of the Lives, Mr. Malone, whose love of justice is equal to his accuracy, made, in my hearing, the same remark to Johnson: yet he omitted to correct the erroneous statement.<sup>4</sup> These particulars I mention, in the belief that there was only forgetfulness in my friend; but I owe this much to the Earl of Marchmont's reputation, who, were there no other memorials, will be immortalised by that line of Pope, in the verses on his Grotto:

"And the bright flame was shot through Marchmont's soul."

Various Readings in the Life of Pope.

"[Somewhat free] sufficiently bold in his criticisms.

"All the gay [niceties] varieties of diction.

"Strikes the imagination with far [more] greater force.

"It is [probably] certainly the noblest version of poetry which the world has ever seen.

<sup>1</sup> He however ought to have been: for it is to be found in Ruffhead's "Life of Pope," p. 535., though in more decent and appropriate terms than Wilkes or Boswell attributed to him. "The young lion may be caressed with safety before his nails are grown." — CROKER, 1835.

<sup>2</sup> [James, 13th Lord Somerville, who died in 1765.] Let me here express my grateful remembrance of Lord Somerville's kindness to me, at a very early period. He was the first person of high rank that took particular notice of me in the way most flattering to a young man, fondly ambitious of being distinguished for his literary talents; and by the honour of his encouragement made me think well of myself, and aspire to deserve it better. He had a happy art of communicating his varied knowledge of the world, in short remarks and anecdotes, with a quiet pleasant gravity, that was exceedingly engaging. Never shall I forget the hours which I enjoyed with him at his apartments in the royal palace of Holyrood House, and at his seat near Edinburgh, which he himself had formed with an elegant taste. — BOSWELL.

<sup>3</sup> He said, on a subsequent occasion, that another of Pope's noble friends, "Lord Peterborough, was a favourite of his." See post, 27th June, 1784. And he had said, not long before, (antè, p. 614.) that "Bathurst was a pleasing man," and that "he had heard no ill of Marchmont." — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> This neglect, however, assuredly did not arise from any ill-will towards Lord Marchmont, but from inattention; just as he neglected to correct his statement concerning the family of Thomson, the poet, after it had been shown to be erroneous. — MALONE. Johnson seems to have habitually disregarded such corrections; but as to the Lives of the Poets, the truth is, that he began the work as a thing that might be done in a few weeks, and was surprised and intigued at the length to which he found it expand: and it is not wonderful that at so advanced an age he was not very anxious to purchase minute accuracy by the labour of revision. — CROKER.

"Every sheet enabled him to write the next with [less trouble] more facility.

"No man sympathises with [vanity depressed] the sorrows of vanity.

"It had been [criminal] less easily excused.

"When he [threatened to lay down] talked of laying down his pen.

"Society [is so named emphatically in opposition to] politically regulated, is a state contradistinguished from a state of nature.

"A fetitious life of an [absurd] infatuated scholar.

"A foolish [contempt, disregard,] disesteem of kings.

"His hopes and fears, his joys and sorrows [were like those of other mortals] acted strongly upon his mind.

"Eager to pursue knowledge and attentive to [accumulate] retain it.

"A mind [excursive] active, ambitious, and adventurous.

"In its [noblest] widest searches still longing to go forward.

"He wrote in such a manner as might expose him to few [neglects] hazards.

"The [reasonableness] justice of my determination.

"A [favourite] delicious employment of the poets.

"More terrific and more powerful [beings] phantoms perform on the stormy ocean.

"The inventor of [those] this petty [beings] nation.

"The [mind] heart naturally loves truth."

In the Life of ADDISON we find an unpleasant account of his having lent Steele a hundred pounds, and "reclaimed his loan by an execution." In the new edition of the Biographia Britannica, the authenticity of this anecdote is denied. But Mr. Malone has obliged me with the following note concerning it:—

"March 15th, 1781. — Many persons having doubts concerning this fact, I applied to Dr. Johnson, to learn on what authority he asserted it. He told me, he had it from Savage, who lived in intimacy with Steele, and who mentioned, that Steele told him the story with tears in his eyes. Ben Victor, Dr. Johnson said, likewise informed him of this remarkable transaction, from the relation of Mr. Wilks the comedian, who was also an intimate of Steele's.<sup>1</sup> Some, in defence of Addison, have said, that 'the act was done with the good-natured view of rousing Steele, and correcting that profusion which always made him necessitous.' 'If that were the case,' said Johnson, 'and that he only wanted to alarm Steele, he would afterwards have returned the money to his friend, which it is not pretended he did.' 'This too,' he added, 'might be retorted by an advocate for Steele, who might allege, that he did not repay the loan intentionally, merely to see whether Addison would be mean and ungenerous enough to make use of legal process to recover it. But of such speculations there is no end; we cannot dive into the hearts of men; but their actions are open to observation.'

"I then mentioned to him that some people thought that Mr. Addison's character was so pure, that the fact, though true, ought to have been suppressed. He saw no reason for this. 'If nothing but the bright side of characters should be shown, we should sit down in despondency, and think it utterly impossible to imitate them in any thing. The sacred writers,' he observed, 'related the vicious as well as the virtuous actions of men; which had this moral effect, that it kept mankind from despair, into which otherwise they would naturally fall, were they not supported by the recollection that others had offended like themselves, and by penitence and amendment of life had been restored to the favour of Heaven.'<sup>2</sup>

"E. M."

The last paragraph of this note is of great importance; and I request that my readers may consider it with particular attention. It will be afterwards referred to in this work.

Various Readings in the Life of ADDISON.

"[But he was our first example.] He was, however, one of our earliest examples of correctness.

"And [overlook] despise their masters.

"His instructions were such as the [state] character of his [own time] readers made [necessary] proper.

"His purpose was to [diffuse] infuse literary curiosity by gentle and unsuspected conveyance [among] into the gay, the idle, and the wealthy.

"Framed rather for those that [wish] are learning to write.

"Domestic [manners] scenes."

In his Life of PARNELL, I wonder that Johnson omitted to insert an epitaph which he had long before composed for that amiable man, without ever writing it down, but which he was so good as, at my request, to dictate to me, by which means it has been preserved.

<sup>1</sup> The late Mr. Burke informed me, in 1792, that Lady Dorothea Primrose, who died at a great age, I think in 1768, and had been well acquainted with Steele, told him the same story. — MALONE. Lady Dorothea, the sixth and youngest daughter of the first Earl of Roseberry, could not have been, at her death, in 1768, more than sixty-five, and was probably some years less, and must have been little more than a child when Addison died; so that her evidence as a contemporary is not worth much. If the story be at all true (which I doubt), the most probable explanation is that which was given by Mr. Thomas Sheridan (see post, 15th April, 1781), namely, that it was a friendly execution put in to screen Steele's goods from hostile creditors. A not unfrequent practice, nor quite unjustifiable, when the debt is real. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> I have since observed, that Johnson has further enforced

the propriety of exhibiting the faults of virtuous and eminent men in their true colours, in the last paragraph of the 164th Number of his Rambler: —

"It is particularly the duty of those who consign illustrious names to posterity, to take care lest their readers be misled by ambiguous examples. That writer may be justly condemned as an enemy to goodness, who suffers fondness or interest to confound right with wrong, or to shelter the faults which even the wisest and the best have committed, from that ignominy which guilt ought always to suffer, and with which it should be more deeply stigmatised, when dignified by its neighbourhood to uncommon worth; since we shall be in danger of beholding it without abhorrence, unless its turpitude be laid open, and the eye secured from the deception of surrounding splendour." — MALONE.

"Hic requiescit THOMAS PARNELL, S. T. P.

"Qui sacerdos pariter et poeta,
Utrisque partes ita implevit,
Ut neque sacerdoti suavitas poetæ,
Nec poetæ sacerdotis sanctitas, deesset."

Various Readings in the Life of PARNELL.

"About three years [after] afterwards.

"[Did not much want] was in no great need of improvement.

"But his prosperity did not last long [was clouded with that which took away all his powers of enjoying either profit or pleasure, the death of his wife, whom he is said to have lamented with such sorrow, as hastened his end.]" His end, whatever was the cause, was now approaching.

"In the Hermit, the [composition] narrative, as it is less airy, is less pleasing."

In the Life of BLACKMORE, we find that writer's reputation generously cleared by Johnson from the cloud of prejudice which the malignity of contemporary wits had raised around it. In the spirited exertion of justice, he has been imitated by Sir Joshua Reynolds, in his praise of the architecture of Vanbrugh.

We trace Johnson's own character in his observations on Blackmore's "magnanimity as an author." "The incessant attacks of his enemies, whether serious or merry, are never discovered to have disturbed his quiet, or to have lessened his confidence in himself." Johnson, I recollect, once told me, laughing heartily, that he understood it has been said of him, "He appears not to feel; but when he is alone, depend upon it, he suffers sally." I am as certain as I can be of any man's real sentiments, that he enjoyed the perpetual shower of little hostile arrows, as evidences of his fame.

Various Readings in the Life of BLACKMORE.

"To [set] engage poetry [on the side] in the cause of virtue.

"He likewise [established] enforced the truth of Revelation.

"[Kindness] benevolence was ashamed to favour.

"His practice, which was once [very extensive] invidiously great.

"There is scarcely any distemper of dreadful name [of] which he has not [shown] taught his reader how [it is to be opposed] to oppose.

"Of this [contemptuous] indecent arrogance.

"[He wrote] but produced likewise a work of a different kind.

"At least [written] compiled with integrity.

"Faults which many tongues [were desirous] would have made haste to publish.

"But though he [had not] could not boast of much critical knowledge.

"He [used] waited for no felicities of fancy.

"Or had ever elated his [mind] views to that ideal perfection which every [mind] genius born to excel is condemned always to pursue and never to overtake.

"The [first great] fundamental principle of wisdom and of virtue."

Various Readings in the Life of PHILIPS.

"His dreaded [rival] antagonist Pope.

"They [have not often much] are not loaded with thought.

"In his translation from Pindar, he [will not be denied to have reached] found the art of reaching all the obscurity of the Theban bard."

Various Readings in the Life of CONGREVE.

"Congreve's conversation must surely have been at least equally pleasing with his writings.

"It apparently [requires] presupposes a similar knowledge of many characters.

"Reciprocoation of [similes] conceits.

"The dialogue is [quick and various] sparkling.

"Love for Love; a comedy [more drawn from life] of nearer alliance to life.

"The general character of his miscellanies is, that they show little wit and [no] little virtue.

"[Perhaps] certainly he had not the fire requisite for the higher species of lyric poetry."

Various Readings in the Life of TICKELL.

"[Longed] long wished to peruse it.

"At the [accession] arrival of King George.

"Fiction [unnaturally] unskilfully compounded of Grecian deities and Gothic fairies."

Various Readings in the Life of AKENSIDE.

"For [another] a different purpose.

"[A furious] an unnecessary, and outrageous zeal.

"[Something which] what he called and thought liberty.

"[A favourer of innovation] lover of contradiction.

"Warburton's [censure] objections.

"His rage [for liberty] of patriotism.

"Mr. Dyson with [a zeal] an ardour of friendship."

In the Life of LYTTELTON, Johnson seems to have been not favourably disposed towards that nobleman. Mrs. Thrale suggests that he was offended by Molly Aston's preference of his lordship to him.<sup>2</sup> I can by no means join <sup>1</sup> I should have thought that Johnson, who had felt the severe affliction from which Parnell never recovered, would have preserved this passage. He omitted it, doubtless, because he afterwards learned, that however he might have lamented his wife, his end was hastened by other means. — MALONE. Malone had not turned to the Life, where he would have found the substance of this passage transferred to another paragraph. The common story combines both these causes; for it is said that the loss of his wife led poor Parnell into such intemperance as shortened his life. — CROKER, 1835.

<sup>2</sup> Let not my readers smile to think of Johnson's being a candidate for female favour; Mr. Peter Garriek assured me that he was told by a lady, that, in her opinion, Johnson was "a very seducing man." Disadvantages of person and manner may be forgotten, where intellectual pleasure is communicated to a susceptible mind; and that Johnson was capable of feeling the most delicate and disinterested attachment appears from the following letter, which is published by Mrs. Thrale, with some others to the same person, of which the excellence is not so apparent:

"JOHNSON TO MISS BOOTHBY.

"January, 1755.

"DEAREST MADAM, — Though I am afraid your illness leaves you little leisure for the reception of airy civilities, yet I cannot forbear to pay you my congratulations on the new in the censure bestowed by Johnson on his lordship, whom he calls "poor Lyttelton," for returning thanks to the critical reviewers, for having "kindly commended" his "Dialogues of the Dead." Such "acknowledgments," says my friend, "never can be proper, since they must be paid either for flattery or for justice." In my opinion, the most upright man, who has been tried on a false accusation, may, when he is acquitted, make a bow to his jury. And when those, who are so much the arbiters of literary merit, as in a considerable degree to influence the public opinion, review an author's work, placido lumine, when I am afraid mankind in general are better pleased with severity, he may surely express a grateful sense of their civility.

Various Readings in the Life of LYTTTELTON.

"He solaced [himself] his grief by writing a long poem to her memory.

"The production rather [of a mind that means well, than thinks vigorously] as it seems of leisure than of study, rather effusions than compositions.

"His last literary [work] production.

"[Found the way] undertook to persuade."

As the introduction to his critical examination of the genius and writings of Young, he did Mr. Herbert Croft, then a barrister of Lincoln's Inn, now a clergyman<sup>1</sup>, the honour to adopt a Life of Young, written by that gentleman, who was the friend of Dr. Young's son, and wished to vindicate him from some very erroneous remarks to his prejudice. Mr. Croft's performance was subjected to the revision of Dr. Johnson, as appears from the following note to Mr. John Nichols<sup>2</sup>:

"This Life of Dr. Young was written by a friend of his son. What is crossed with black is expunged by the author, what is crossed with red is expunged by me. If you find any thing more that can be well omitted, I shall not be sorry to see it yet shorter."

It has always appeared to me to have a considerable share of merit, and to display a pretty successful imitation of Johnson's style. When I mentioned this to a very eminent literary character [Mr. Burke], he opposed me vehemently, exclaiming, "No, no, it is not a good imitation of Johnson; it has all his pomp without his force; it has all the nodosities of the oak without its strength." This was an image so happy, that one might have thought he would have been satisfied with it; but he was not. And setting his mind again to work, he added, with exquisite felicity, "It has all the contortions of the sibyl, without the inspiration."

Mr. Croft very properly guards us against supposing that Young was a gloomy man; and mentions, that "his parish was indebted to the good-humour of the author of the 'Night Thoughts' for an assembly and a bowling-green." A letter from a noble foreigner is quoted, in which he is said to have been "very pleasant in conversation."

Mr. Langton, who frequently visited him, informs me that there was an air of benevolence in his manner, but that he could obtain from him less information than he had hoped to receive from one who had lived so much in intercourse with the brightest men of what has been called the Augustan age of England; and that he showed a degree of eager curiosity concerning the common occurrences that were then passing, which appeared somewhat remarkable in a man of such intellectual stores, of such an advanced age, and who had retired from life with declared disappointment in his expectations.

An instance at once of his pensive turn of mind, and his cheerfulness of temper, appeared in a little story, which he himself told to Mr. Langton, when they were walking in his garden: "Here (said he) I had put a handsome sun-dial, with this inscription, Eheu fugaces! which (speaking with a smile) was sadly verified, for by the next morning my dial had been carried off."<sup>3</sup>

It gives me much pleasure to observe, that however Johnson may have casually talked, yet when he sits, as "an ardent judge zealous to his trust, giving sentence" upon the excellent works of Young, he allows them the high praise to which they are justly entitled. "The Universal Passion," says he, "is indeed a very great performance, — his distichs have the weight of solid sentiment, and his points the sharpness of resistless truth."

But I was most anxious concerning Johnson's decision upon "Night Thoughts," which I esteem as a mass of the grandest and richest year; and to declare my wishes that your years to come may be many and happy. In this wish, indeed, I include myself, who have none but you on whom my heart reposes; yet surely I wish your good, even though your situation were such as should permit you to communicate no gratifications to, dearest, dearest Madam, your, &c., SAM. JOHNSON."

— BOSWELL.

There is here a slight mistake in the text. It was not Molly Aston, but Hill Boothby, for whose affections Johnson and Lord Lyttelton were rival candidates. — MALONE. The mistake of the gay and handsome Molly Aston the object of Johnson's youthful admiration, for Miss Boothby whom he never saw till she was an ailing and ascetic old maid, is surely not a slight one. See anté, p. 20, n. 2. Mrs. Piozzi states that Johnson confessed that he had depreciated Lyttelton from a jealous recollection of the preference that Miss Boothby showed him. But this would indeed have been an odium in longum jacens, as Miss Boothby had been dead twenty-five years. She might perhaps have offended the proud spirit of Johnson, by paying more attention to so distinguished a visitor as Sir George Lyttelton; but that he, a married and eminently moral man, could, at the time of Johnson's acquaintance with her, have had any design on poor Miss Boothby's heart, is quite impossible. — CROKER.

<sup>1</sup> See anté p. 650, n. 2. — C.

<sup>2</sup> Gentleman's Magazine, vol. iv. p. 10.

<sup>3</sup> The late Mr. James Ralph told Lord Macartney, that he passed an evening with Dr. Young at Lord Melcombe's (then Mr. Doddington), at Ilamersmith. The doctor happening to go out into the garden, Mr. Doddington observed to him, on his return, that it was a dreadful night, as in truth it was, there being a violent storm of rain and wind. "No, Sir," replied the doctor, "it is a very fine night. The Lord is abroad!" — BOSWELL.

poetry that human genius has ever produced; and was delighted to find this character of that work: "In his 'Night Thoughts,' he has exhibited a very wide display of original poetry, variegated with deep reflection and striking allusions: a wilderness of thought, in which the fertility of fancy scatters flowers of every hue and of every odour. This is one of the few poems in which blank verse could not be changed for rhyme, but with disadvantage." And afterwards, "Particular lines are not to be regarded; the power is in the whole; and in the whole there is a magnificence like that ascribed to Chinese plantation, the magnificence of vast extent and endless diversity."

But there is in this poem not only all that Johnson so well brings in view, but a power of the pathetic beyond almost any example that I have seen. He who does not feel his nerves shaken and his heart pierced by many passages in this extraordinary work, particularly by that most affecting one, which describes the gradual torment suffered by the contemplation of an object of affectionate attachment visibly and certainly decaying into dissolution, must be of a hard and obstinate frame.

To all the other excellencies of "Night Thoughts" let me add the great and peculiar one, — that they contain not only the noblest sentiments of virtue and contemplations on immortality, but the Christian sacrifice, the divine propitiation, with all its interesting circumstances, and consolations to a "wounded spirit," solemnly and poetically displayed in such imagery and language, as cannot fail to exalt, animate, and soothe the truly pious. No book whatever can be recommended to young persons, with better hopes of seasoning their minds with vital religion, than "Young's Night Thoughts."

In the Life of SWIFT, it appears to me that Johnson had a certain degree of prejudice against that extraordinary man, of which I have elsewhere had occasion to speak. Mr. Thomas Sheridan imputed it to a supposed apprehension in Johnson, that Swift had not been sufficiently active in obtaining for him an Irish degree when it was solicited<sup>1</sup>; but of this there was not sufficient evidence; and let me not presume to charge Johnson with injustice, because he did not think so highly of the writings of this author, as I have done from my youth upwards. Yet that he had an unfavourable bias is evident, were it only from that passage in which he speaks of Swift's practice of saving, as "first ridiculous, and at last detestable;" and yet, after some examination of circumstances, finds himself obliged to own, that "it will perhaps appear that he only liked one mode of expense better than another, and saved merely that he might have something to give."

One observation which Johnson makes in Swift's life should be often inculcated: "It may be justly supposed, that there was in his conversation what appears so frequently in his letters, an affectation of familiarity with the great, an ambition of momentary equality, sought and enjoyed by the neglect of those ceremonies which custom has established as the barriers between one order of society and another. This transgression of regularity was by himself and his admirers termed greatness of soul; but a great mind disdains to hold any thing by courtesy, and therefore never usurps what a lawful claimant may take away. He that encroaches on another's dignity, puts himself in his power; he is either repelled with helpless indignity, or endured by clemency and condescension."

Various Readings in the Life of SWIFT.

"Charity may be persuaded to think that it might be written by a man of a peculiar [opinions] character, without ill intention.

"He did not [disown] deny it.

"[To] by whose kindness it is not unlikely that he was [indebted for] advanced to his benefices.

"[With] for this purpose he had recourse to Mr. Harley.

"Sharpe, whom he [represents] describes as 'the harmless tool of others' hate.'

"Harley was slow because he was [irresolute] doubtful.

"When [readers were not many] we were not yet a nation of readers.

"[Every man who] he that could say he knew him.

"Every man of known influence has so many [more] petitions [than] which [he can] cannot grant, that he must necessarily offend more than he [can gratify] gratifies.

"Ecclesiastical [preferments] benefices.

"Swift [procured] contrived an interview.

"[As a writer] In his works he has given very different specimens.

"On all common occasions he habitually [assumes] affects a style of [superiority] arrogance.

"By the [omission] neglect of those ceremonies.

"That their merits filled the world [and] or that there was no [room for] hope of more."

I have not confined myself to the order of the "Lives," in making my few remarks. Indeed a different order is observed in the original publication, and in the collection of Johnson's works. And should it be objected, that many of my various readings are inconsiderable, those who make an objection will be pleased to consider, that such small particulars are intended for those who are nicely critical in composition, to whom they will be an acceptable selection.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> See anté, p. 37. n. 3. and p. 277. — C.

<sup>2</sup> Mr. Chalmers here records a curious literary anecdote — that when a new and enlarged edition of the "Lives of the Poets" was published in 1783, Mr. Nichols, in justice to the purchasers of the preceding editions, printed the additions in a separate pamphlet, and advertised that it might be had gratis. Not ten copies were called for. It may be presumed that the owners of the former editions had bound their sets; but it must also be observed, that the alterations were not considerable. — CROKER.

"Spence's Anecdotes," which are frequently quoted and referred to in Johnson's "Lives of the Poets," are in a manuscript collection, made by the Reverend Mr. Joseph Spence<sup>1</sup>, containing a number of particulars concerning eminent men. To each anecdote is marked the name of the person on whose authority it is mentioned. This valuable collection is the property of the Duke of Newcastle, who, upon the application of Sir Lucas Pepys, was pleased to permit it to be put into the hands of Dr. Johnson, who I am sorry to think made but an awkward return. "Great assistance," says he, "has been given me by Mr. Spence's Collection, of which I consider the communication as a favour worthy of public acknowledgement;" but he has not owned to whom he was obliged; so that the acknowledgement is unappropriated to his grace.<sup>2</sup>

While the world in general was filled with admiration of Johnson's "Lives of the Poets," there were narrow circles in which prejudice and resentment were fostered, and from which attacks of different sorts issued against him.<sup>3</sup> By some violent Whigs he was arraigned of injustice to Milton; by some Cambridge men, of depreciating Gray; and his expressing with a dignified freedom what he really thought of George, Lord Lyttelton, gave offence to some of the friends of that nobleman, and particularly produced a declaration of war against him from Mrs. Montagu, the ingenious essayist on Shakspeare, between whom and his lordship a commerce of reciprocal compliments had long been carried on. In this war the smaller powers in alliance with him were of course led to engage, at least on the defensive, and thus I for one was excluded<sup>4</sup> from the enjoyment of "a Feast of Reason," such as Mr. Cumberland has described, with a keen yet just and delicate pen, in his "Observer." These minute inconveniences gave not the least disturbance to Johnson. He nobly said, when I talked to him of the feeble though shrill outcry which had been raised, "Sir, I considered myself as intrusted with a certain portion of truth. I have given my opinion sincerely; let them show where they think me wrong."

CHAPTER LXXII.

1781.

Warren Hastings. — Liberty and Necessity. — Picture of a Man, by Shakspeare and by Milton. — Registration of Deeds. — Duty of a Member of Parliament. — Deportment of a Bishop. — "Merriment of Parsons." — Zachariah Mudge. — Dr. Walter Harte. — Scale of Liquors. — Dancing. — Sir Philip Jennings Clerk. — American War. — Dudley Long. — Exaggerated Praise. — "Learning to Talk." — Veracity. — Death of Mr. Thrale. — Queen's Arms Club. — Constructive Treason. — Castes of Men. — Passion Week. — Addison. — Blackstone. — Steele. — Educating by Lectures. — The Resurrection. — Apparitions.

WHILE my friend is thus contemplated in the splendour derived from his last and perhaps most admirable work, I introduce him with peculiar propriety as the correspondent of Warren Hastings! a man whose regard reflects dignity even upon Johnson; a man, the extent of whose abilities was equal to that of his power; and who, by those who are fortunate enough to know him in private life, is admired for his literature and taste, and beloved for the candour, moderation, and mildness of his character. Were I capable of paying a suitable tribute of admiration to him, I should certainly not withhold it at a moment<sup>5</sup> when it is not possible that I should be suspected of being an interested flatterer. But how weak would be my voice after that of the millions whom he governed! His condescending and obliging compliance with my solicitation, I with humble gratitude acknowledge; and while by publishing his letter to me, accompanying the valuable communication, I do eminent honour to my great friend, I shall entirely disregard any invidious suggestions, that, as I in some degree participate in the honour, I have, at the same time, the gratification of my own vanity in view.

WARREN HASTINGS TO BOSWELL.

"Park Lane, Dec. 2. 1790.

"SIR, — I have been fortunately spared the troublesome suspense of a long search, to which, in performance of my promise, I had devoted this morning, by lighting upon the objects of it among the first papers that I laid my hands on; my veneration for your great and good friend, Dr. Johnson, and the pride, or I hope something of a better sentiment, which I indulge in possessing such <sup>1</sup> The Rev. Joseph Spence, A. M., Rector of Great Harwood in Buckinghamshire, and Prebendary of Durham, died at Byfleet in Surrey, August 20. 1768. He was a fellow of New College in Oxford, and held the office of Professor of Poetry in that University from 1728 to 1738. — MALONE.

<sup>2</sup> It appears from a letter of Mrs. Boscawen to Hannah More (Mem. i. 191.) that she was the person who procured Johnson the loan of Spence's papers. — CROKER, 1835.

<sup>3</sup> From this disreputable class, I except an ingenious, though not satisfactory, defence of Hammond, which I did not see till lately, by the favour of its author, my amiable friend, the Reverend Mr. Bevil, who published it without his name. It is a juvenile performance, but elegantly written, with classical enthusiasm of sentiment, and yet with a becoming modesty, and great respect for Dr. Johnson. — BOSWELL.

<sup>4</sup> Boswell had never been cordially received at Mrs. Montagu's. See anté, p. 205. n. 2. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>5</sup> January, 1791. — BOSWELL. At this date Mr. Hastings's impeachment was still lingering on, but with a certainty of his ultimate acquittal. — CROKER.

memorials of his good will towards me, having induced me to bind them in a parcel containing other select papers, and labelled with the titles appertaining to them. They consist but of three letters, which I believe were all that I ever received from Dr. Johnson. Of these, one, which was written in quadruplicate, under the different dates of its respective despatches, has already been made public, but not from any communication of mine. This, however, I have joined to the rest; and have now the pleasure of sending them to you, for the use to which you informed me it was your desire to destine them.

"My promise was pledged with the condition, that if the letters were found to contain any thing which should render them improper for the public eye, you would dispense with the performance of it. You will have the goodness, I am sure, to pardon my recalling this stipulation to your recollection, as I shall be loth to appear negligent of that obligation which is always implied in an epistolary confidence. In the reservation of that right I have read them over with the most scrupulous attention, but have not seen in them the slightest cause on that ground to withhold them from you. But, though not on that, yet on another ground, I own I feel a little, yet but a little, reluctance to part with them: I mean on that of my own credit, which I fear will suffer by the information conveyed by them, that I was early in the possession of such valuable instructions for the beneficial employment of the influence of my late station, and (as it may seem) have so little availed myself of them. Whether I could, if it were necessary, defend myself against such an imputation, it little concerns the world to know. I look only to the effect which these relics may produce, considered as evidences of the virtues of their author; and believing that they will be found to display an uncommon warmth of private friendship, and a mind ever attentive to the improvement and extension of useful knowledge, and solicitous for the interests of mankind, I can cheerfully submit to the little sacrifice of my own fame, to contribute to the illustration of so great and venerable a character. They cannot be better applied, for that end, than by being intrusted to your hands. Allow me, with this offering, to infer from it a proof of the very great esteem with which I have the honour to profess myself, Sir, your, &c., WARREN HASTINGS.

"P. S. At some future time, and when you have no further occasion for these papers, I shall be obliged to you if you will return them."

The last of the three letters thus graciously put into my hands, and which has already appeared in public, belongs to this year; but I shall previously insert the first two in the order of their dates. They altogether form a grand group in my biographical picture.

JOHNSON TO WARREN HASTINGS.

"March 30. 1774.

"SIR, — Though I have had but little personal knowledge of you, I have had enough to make me wish for more; and though it be now a long time since I was honoured by your visit, I had too much pleasure from it to forget it. By those whom we delight to remember, we are unwilling to be forgotten; and therefore I cannot omit this opportunity of reviving myself in your memory by a letter which you will receive from the hands of my friend Mr. Chambers<sup>1</sup>; a man whose purity of manners and vigour of mind are sufficient to make every thing welcome that he brings.

"That this is my only reason for writing will be too apparent by the uselessness of my letter to any other purpose. I have no questions to ask; not that I want curiosity after either the ancient or present state of regions in which have been seen all the power and splendour of wide-extended empire; and which, as by some grant of natural superiority, supply the rest of the world with almost all that pride desires and luxury enjoys. But my knowledge of them is too scanty to furnish me with proper topics of inquiry: I can only wish for information; and hope that a mind comprehensive like yours will find leisure, amidst the cares of your important station, to inquire into many subjects of which the European world either thinks not at all, or thinks with deficient intelligence and uncertain conjecture. I shall hope that he who once intended to increase the learning of his country by the introduction of the Persian language will examine nicely the traditions and histories of the East; that he will survey the wonders of its ancient edifices and trace the vestiges of its ruined cities; and that, at his return, we shall know the arts and opinions of a race of men from whom very little has been hitherto derived.

"You, Sir, have no need of being told by me how much may be added by your attention and patronage to experimental knowledge and natural history. There are arts of manufacture practised in the countries in which you preside, which are yet very imperfectly known here, either to artificers or philosophers. Of the natural productions, animate and inanimate, we yet have so little intelligence, that our books are filled, I fear, with conjectures about things which an Indian peasant knows by his senses.

"Many of those things my first wish is to see; my second, to know, by such accounts as a man like you will be able to give.

"As I have not skill to ask proper questions, I have likewise no such access to great men as can enable me to send you any political information. Of the agitations of an unsettled government, and the struggles of a feeble ministry, care is doubtless taken to give you more exact accounts than I can obtain. If you are inclined to interest yourself much in public transactions, it is no misfortune to you to be distant from them.

"That literature is not totally forsaking us, and that your favourite language is not neglected, will appear from the book<sup>2</sup>, which I should have pleased myself more with sending, if I could have presented it bound; but time was wanting. I beg, however, Sir, that you will accept it from a man very desirous of your regard; and that if you think me able to gratify you by any thing more important, you will employ me.

<sup>1</sup> Afterwards Sir Robert Chambers, one of his majesty's judges in India — BOSWELL. Auté, p. 90. n. 2. — C.

<sup>2</sup> Jones's "Persian Grammar."

"I am now going to take leave, perhaps a very long leave, of my dear Mr. Chambers. That he is going to live where you govern may justly alleviate the regret of parting; and the hope of seeing both him and you again, which I am not willing to mingle with doubt, must at present comfort as it can, Sir, your, &c.,
SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHNSON TO HASTINGS.

"London, Dec. 20. 1774.

"SIR, — Being informed that by the departure of a ship there is now an opportunity of writing to Bengal, I am unwilling to slip out of your memory by my own negligence, and therefore take the liberty of reminding you of my existence by sending you a book which is not yet made public.

"I have lately visited a region less remote and less illustrious than India, which afforded some occasions for speculation. What has occurred to me, I have put into the volume<sup>1</sup>, of which I beg your acceptance.

"Men in your station seldom have presents totally disinterested: my book is received, let me now make my request. There is, Sir, somewhere within your government, a young adventurer, one Channey Lawrence, whose father is one of my oldest friends. Be pleased to show the young man what countenance is fit; whether he wants to be restrained by your authority, or encouraged by your favour. His father is now president of the college of physicians; a man venerable for his knowledge, and more venerable for his virtue.

"I wish you a prosperous government, a safe return, and a long enjoyment of plenty and tranquillity. I am, Sir, your, &c.,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHNSON TO HASTINGS.

"Jan. 9. 1781.

"SIR, — Amidst the importance and multiplicity of affairs in which your great office engages you, I take the liberty of recalling your attention for a moment to literature, and will not prolong the interruption by an apology which your character makes needless.

"Mr. Hoole, a gentleman long known and long esteemed in the India House, after having translated Tasso, has undertaken Ariosto. How well he is qualified for his undertaking he has already shown. He is desirous, Sir, of your favour in promoting his proposals, and flatters me by supposing that my testimony may advance his interest.

"It is a new thing for a clerk of the India House to translate poets; — it is new for a governor of Bengal to patronise learning. That he may find his ingenuity rewarded, and that learning may flourish under your protection, is the wish of, Sir, your, &c.,
SAM. JOHNSON."

I wrote to him in February, complaining of having been troubled by a recurrence of the perplexing question of Liberty and Necessity; and mentioning that I hoped soon to meet him again in London.

JOHNSON TO BOSWELL.

"March 14. 1781.

"DEAR SIR, — I hoped you had got rid of all this hypocrisy of misery. What have you to do with Liberty and Necessity? Or what more than to hold your tongue about it? Do not doubt but I shall be most heartily glad to see you here again, for I love every part about you but your affectation of distress.

"I have at last finished my Lives, and have laid up for you a load of copy, all out of order, so that it will amuse you a long time to set it right. Come to me, my dear Bozzy, and let us be as happy as we can. We will go again to the Mitre, and talk old times over. I am, dear Sir, yours affectionately,
SAM. JOHNSON."

On Monday, March 19., I arrived in London, and on Tuesday, the 20th, met him in Fleet Street, walking, or rather indeed moving along; for his peculiar march is thus described in a very just and picturesque manner, in a short Life<sup>2</sup> of him published very soon after his death: — "When he walked the streets, what with the constant roll of his head, and the concomitant motion of his body, he appeared to make his way by that motion, independent of his feet." That he was often much stared at while he advanced in this manner may easily be believed; but it was not safe to make sport of one so robust as he was. Mr. Langton saw him one day, in a fit of absence, by a sudden start, drive the load off a porter's back, and walk forward briskly, without being conscious of what he had done. The porter was very angry, but stood still, and eyed the huge figure with much earnestness, till he was satisfied that his wisest course was to be quiet, and take up his burthen again.

Our accidental meeting in the street after a long separation was a pleasing surprise to us both. He stepped aside with me into Falcon Court, and made kind inquiries about my family; and as we were in a hurry, going different ways, I promised to call on him next day. He said he was engaged to go out in the morning. "Early, Sir?" said I. JOHNSON. "Why, Sir, a London morning does not go with the sun."

I waited on him next evening, and he gave me a great portion of his original manuscript of his "Lives of the Poets," which he had preserved for me.

I found on visiting his friend, Mr. Thrale, that he was now very ill, and had removed, I suppose by the solicitation of Mrs. Thrale, to a house in Grosvenor Square. I was sorry to see him sadly changed in his appearance.

He told me I might now have the pleasure to see Dr. Johnson drink wine again, for he had lately returned to it. When I mentioned this to Johnson, he said, "I drink it now some-

<sup>1</sup> The "Journey to the Western Islands of Scotland." — BOSWELL.

<sup>2</sup> Published by Kearsley, with this well-chosen motto: —

— "From his cradle
He was a scholar, and a ripe and good one:
And, to add greater honours to his age,
Than man could give him, he died fearing Heaven.
SHAKESPEARE.

times, but not socially." The first evening that I was with him at Thrale's, I observed he poured a large quantity of it into a glass, and swallowed it greedily. Every thing about his character and manners was forcible and violent; there never was any moderation. Many a day did he fast, many a year did he refrain from wine: but when he did eat, it was voraciously; when he did drink wine, it was copiously. He could practise abstinence, but not temperance.

Mrs. Thrale and I had a dispute whether Shakspeare or Milton had drawn the most admirable picture of a man.<sup>1</sup> I was for Shakspeare, Mrs. Thrale for Milton; and, after a fair hearing, Johnson decided for my opinion.

I told him of one of Mr. Burke's playful sallies upon Dean Marlay<sup>2</sup>: "I don't like the Deanship of Ferns; it sounds so like a barren title." "Dr. Heath<sup>3</sup> should have it," said I. Johnson laughed, and, condescending to trifle in the same mode of conceit, suggested Dr. Moss.<sup>4</sup>

He said, "Mrs. Montagu has dropt me.<sup>5</sup> Now, Sir, there are people whom one should like very well to drop, but would not wish to be dropt by." He certainly was vain of the society of ladies, and could make himself very agreeable to them when he chose it: Sir Joshua Reynolds agreed with me that he could. Mr. Gibbon, with his usual sneer, controverted it, perhaps in resentment of Johnson's having talked with some disgust of his ugliness, which one would think a philosopher would not mind. Dean Marlay wittily observed, "A lady may be vain when she can turn a wolf-dog into a lap-dog."

The election for Ayrshire, my own county, was this spring tried upon a petition before a committee of the House of Commons. I was one of the counsel for the sitting member<sup>6</sup>, and took the liberty of previously stating different points to Johnson, who never failed to see them clearly, and to supply me with some good hints. He dictated to me the following note upon the registration of deeds:—

<sup>1</sup> Shakspeare makes Hamlet thus describe his father:

"See what a grace was seated on his brow:
Hyperion's curls, the front of Jove himself,
An eye like Mars, to threaten and command;
A station like the herald, Mercury,
New-lighted on a heaven-kissing hill;
A combination and a form, indeed,
Where every god did seem to set his seal,
To give the world assurance of a man."

Milton thus portrays our first parent, Adam:

"His fair large front and eye sublime declared
Absolute rule; and hyacinthin locks
Round from his parted forelock manly hung Clust'ring, but not beneath his shoulders down."

BOSWELL.

The latter part of this description, "but not beneath" &c., may very probably be ascribed to Milton's prejudices in favour of the partisans, who had a great aversion to long hair. — MALONE. It is strange that the picture drawn by the unlearned Shakspeare should be full of classical images, and that by the learned Milton void of them. Milton's description appears to be more picturesque. — KEARNEY. Dr. Kearney seems to have forgotten that Milton is here a mere descriptive poet, giving a kind of abstract delineation of the "All laws are made for the convenience of the community. What is legally done should be legally recorded, that the state of things may be known, and that wherever evidence is requisite, evidence may be had. For this reason, the obligation to frame and establish a legal register is enforced by a legal penalty, which penalty is the want of that perfection and plenitude of right which a register would give. Thence it follows that this is not an objection merely legal; for the reason on which the law stands being equitable, makes it an equitable objection."

"This," said he, "you must enlarge on, when speaking to the committee. You must not argue there as if you were arguing in the schools; close reasoning will not fix their attention: you must say the same thing over and over again in different words. If you say it but once, they miss it in a moment of inattention. It is unjust, Sir, to censure lawyers for multiplying words when they argue; it is often necessary for them to multiply words."

His notion of the duty of a member of parliament, sitting upon an election-committee, was very high; and when he was told of a gentleman upon one of those committees, who read the newspapers part of the time, and slept the rest, while the merits of a vote were examined by the counsel; and as an excuse, when challenged by the chairman for such behaviour, bluntly answered, "I had made up my mind upon that case;" Johnson, with an indignant contempt, said, "If he was such a rogue as to make up his mind upon a case without hearing it, he should not have been such a fool as to tell it." "I think," said Mr. Dudley Long<sup>7</sup>, now North, "the Doctor has pretty plainly made him out to be both rogue and fool."

Johnson's profound reverence for the hierarchy made him expect from bishops the highest degree of decorum; he was offended even at their going to taverns: "A bishop," said he, "has nothing to do at a tipping-house. It is not indeed immoral in him to go to a tavern; neither would it be immoral in him to whip a first man, while Shakspeare is a dramatist, speaking in the character of an enthusiastic youth, fresh from his studies, and boiling with indignation and grief, which he endeavours to controul, or moderate, by these classical and, what in any other case would be, pedantic allusions. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> Dr. Richard Marlay, afterwards Lord Bishop of Waterford; a very amiable, benevolent, and ingenious man. He was chosen a member of the Literary Club in 1777, and died in Dublin, July 2, 1802, in his seventy-fifth year. — MALONE. In very early life, I had the honour of the bishop's acquaintance and indulgent notice of my first attempts in literature. He was all that Mr. Malone says of him. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> Dr. Benjamin Heath, celebrated for a curious library, which was sold in 1810, at very high prices. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> Dr. Charles Mass had been already better provided for, having been, in 1766, Bishop of St. David's, and in 1774, of Bath and Wells. He died in 1802. — CROKER.

<sup>5</sup> Mrs. Montagu, with, I think, an over nicety of feeling (if that was the real cause) 'dropt' him on account of his life of Lord Lyttelton. See anté, p. 675. — CROKER.

<sup>6</sup> Hugh Montgomery, Esq. The petitioner, however, William Macdowell, Esq., was declared duly elected. — CROKER.

<sup>7</sup> This ingenious and pleasant gentleman died in 1829, at the age of eighty, after an illness which had for some years secluded him from society. — CROKER.

top in Grosvenor Square: but, if he did, I hope the boys would fall upon him, and apply the whip to him. There are gradations in conduct; there is morality, — decency, — propriety. None of these should be violated by a bishop. A bishop should not go to a house where he may meet a young fellow leading out a wench." BOSWELL. "But, Sir, every tavern does not admit women." JOHNSON. "Depend upon it, Sir, any tavern will admit a well-dressed man and a well-dressed woman: they will not perhaps admit a woman whom they see every night walking by their door, in the street. But a well-dressed man may lead in a well-dressed woman to any tavern in London. Taverns sell meat and drink, and will sell them to any body who can eat and can drink. You may as well say that a mercer will not sell silks to a woman of the town."

He also disapproved of bishops going to routs; at least of their staying at them longer than their presence commanded respect. He mentioned a particular bishop. "Poh!" said Mrs. Thrale, "the Bishop of [St. Asaph's] is never minded at a rout." BOSWELL. "When a bishop places himself in a situation where he has no distinct character, and is of no consequence, he degrades the dignity of his order." JOHNSON. "Mr. Boswell, Madam, has said it as correctly as it could be."

Nor was it only in the dignitaries of the church that Johnson required a particular decorum and delicacy of behaviour; he justly considered that the clergy, as persons set apart for the sacred office of serving at the altar, and impressing the minds of men with the awful concerns of a future state, should be somewhat more serious than the generality of mankind, and have a suitable composure of manners. A due sense of the dignity of their profession, independent of higher motives, will ever prevent them from losing their distinction in an indiscriminate sociality; and did such as affect this know how much it lessens them in the eyes of those whom they think to please by it, they would feel themselves much mortified.

Johnson and his friend Beauclerk were once together in company with several clergymen, who thought that they should appear to advantage, by assuming the lax jollity of men of the world; which, as it may be observed in similar cases, they carried to noisy excess. Johnson, who they expected would be entertained, sat grave and silent for some time; at last, turning to Beauclerk, he said, by no means in a whisper, "This merriment of parsons is mighty offensive."

Even the dress of a clergyman should be in character, and nothing can be more despicable than conceited attempts at avoiding the appearance of the clerical order; attempts, which are as ineffectual as they are pitiful. Dr.

Porteus, now Bishop of London, in his excellent charge when presiding over the diocese of Chester, justly animadverted upon this subject; and observes of a reverend fop, that he "can be but half a beau."

Addison, in "The Spectator," has given us a fine portrait of a clergyman, who is supposed to be a member of his Club; and Johnson has exhibited a model, in the character of Mr. Mudge<sup>2</sup>, which has escaped the collectors of his works, but which he owned to me, and which indeed he showed to Sir Joshua Reynolds at the time when it was written. It bears the genuine marks of Johnson's best manner, and is as follows:—

"The Reverend Mr. Zachariah Mudge, prebendary of Exeter, and vicar of St. Andrew's in Plymouth; a man equally eminent for his virtues and abilities, and at once beloved as a companion and revered as a pastor. He had that general curiosity to which no kind of knowledge is indifferent or superfluous; and that general benevolence by which no order of men is hated or despised.

"His principles both of thought and action were great and comprehensive. By a solicitous examination of objections, and judicious comparison of opposite arguments, he attained what inquiry never gives but to industry and perspicuity, a firm and unshaken settlement of conviction. But his firmness was without asperity; for, knowing with how much difficulty truth was sometimes found, he did not wonder that many missed it.

"The general course of his life was determined by his profession; he studied the sacred volumes in the original languages; with what diligence and success his 'Notes upon the Psalms' give sufficient evidence. He once endeavoured to add the knowledge of Arabic to that of Hebrew; but, finding his thoughts too much diverted from other studies, after some time desisted from his purpose.

"His discharge of parochial duties was exemplary. How his Sermons were composed, may be learned from the excellent volume which he has given to the public; but how they were delivered, can be known only to those that heard them; for, as he appeared in the pulpit, words will not easily describe him. His delivery, though unconstrained, was not negligent, and though forcible, was not turbulent; disdaining anxious nicety of emphasis, and laboured artifice of action, it captivated the hearer by its natural dignity; it roused the sluggish and fixed the volatile, and detained the mind upon the subject without directing it to the speaker.

"The grandeur and solemnity of the preacher did not intrude upon his general behaviour; at the table of his friends he was a companion communicative and attentive, of unaffected manners, of manly cheerfulness, willing to please, and easy to be pleased. His acquaintance was universally solicited, and his presence obstructed no enjoyment which religion did not forbid. Though studious, he was popular; though argumentative, he was modest; though inflexible, he was candid; and though metaphysical, yet orthodox."<sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Dr. Shipley. See anté, p. 647. n. 2. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> See anté, p. 127. — BOSWELL.

<sup>3</sup> "London Chronicle," May 2. 1769. This respectable man is there mentioned to have died on the 3d of April, that year, at Cofleet, [near Exeter] the seat of Thomas Veale, Esq., in his way to London. — BOSWELL.

On Friday, March 30., I dined with him at Sir Joshua Reynolds's, with the Earl of Charlemont, Sir Annesley Stewart, Mr. Eliot of Port-Eliot, Mr. Burke, Dean Marlay, Mr. Langton; a most agreeable day, of which I regret that every circumstance is not preserved: but it is unreasonable to require such a multiplication of felicity.

Mr. Eliot, with whom Dr. Walter Harte<sup>1</sup> had travelled, talked to us of his "History of Gustavus Adolphus," which he said was a very good book in the German translation. JOHNSON. "Harte was excessively vain. He put copies of his book in manuscript into the hands of Lord Chesterfield and Lord Granville, that they might revise it. Now how absurd was it to suppose that two such noblemen would revise so big a manuscript. Poor man! he left London the day of the publication of his book, that he might be out of the way of the great praise he was to receive; and he was ashamed to return, when he found how ill his book had succeeded. It was unlucky in coming out on the same day with Robertson's 'History of Scotland.' His husbandry, however is good." BOSWELL. "So he was fitter for that than for heroic history: he did well, when he turned his sword into a ploughshare."

Mr. Eliot mentioned a curious liquor peculiar to his country, which the Cornish fishermen drink. They call it mahogany; and it is made of two parts gin and one part treacle, well beaten together. I begged to have some of it made, which was done with proper skill by Mr. Eliot. I thought it very good liquor; and said it was a counterpart of what is called Athol porridge in the Highlands of Scotland, which is a mixture of whisky and honey. JOHNSON said, "that must be a better liquor than the Cornish, for both its component parts are better." He also observed, "Mahogany must be a modern name; for it is not long since the wood called mahogany was known in this country." I mentioned his scale of liquors: — claret for boys, — port for men, — brandy for heroes. "Then," said Mr. Burke, "let me have claret: I love to be a boy; to have the careless gaiety of boyish days." JOHNSON. "I should drink claret too, if it would give me that; but it does not: it neither makes boys men, nor men boys. You'll be drowned by it before it has any effect upon you."

I ventured to mention a ludicrous paragraph in the newspapers, that Dr. Johnson was learning to dance of Vestris. Lord Charlemont, wishing to excite him to talk, proposed, in a whisper, that he should be asked whether it was true. "Shall I ask him?" said his lordship. We were, by a great majority, clear for the experiment. Upon which his lordship very gravely, and with a courteous air, said, "Pray, Sir, is it true that you are taking lessons of Vestris?" This was risking a good deal, and required the boldness of a general of Irish volunteers to make the attempt. JOHNSON was at first startled, and in some heat answered, "How can your lordship ask so simple a question?" But immediately recovering himself, whether from unwillingness to be deceived or to appear deceived, or whether from real good humour, he kept up the joke: "Nay, but if any body were to answer the paragraph, and contradict it, I'd have a reply, and would say, that he who contradicted it was no friend either to Vestris or me. For why should not Dr. JOHNSON add to his other powers a little corporeal agility? Socrates learnt to dance at an advanced age, and Cato learnt Greek at an advanced age. Then it might proceed to say, that this JOHNSON, not content with dancing on the ground, might dance on the rope; and they might introduce the elephant dancing on the rope. A nobleman<sup>2</sup> wrote a play called 'Love in a Hollow Tree.' He found out that it was a bad one, and therefore wished to buy up all the copies and burn them. The Duchess of Marlborough had kept one; and when he was against her at an election, she had a new edition of it printed, and prefixed to it, as a frontispiece, an elephant dancing on a rope, to show that his lordship's writing comedy was as awkward as an elephant dancing on a rope."

On Sunday, April 1., I dined with him at Mr. Thrale's, with Sir Philip Jennings Clerk and Mr. Perkins, who had the superintendence of Mr. Thrale's brewery, with a salary of five hundred pounds a year. Sir Philip had the appearance of a gentleman of ancient family, well advanced in life. He wore his own white hair in a bag of goodly size, a black velvet coat, with an embroidered waistcoat, and very rich laced ruffles; which Mrs. Thrale said were old-fashioned, but which, for that reason, I thought the more respectable, more like a Tory; yet Sir Philip was then in opposition in parliament. "Ah! Sir," said JOHNSON, "ancient ruffles and modern principles do not agree." Sir Philip defended the opposition to the American war ably and with temper, and I joined him. He said the majority of the nation was against the ministry. JOHNSON. "I, Sir, am against the ministry; but it is for having too little of that of which opposition thinks they have too much. Were I minister, if any man wagged his finger against me, he should be turned out; for that which it is in the power of government to give at pleasure to one or to another should be given to the supporters of government. If you will not oppose at the expense of losing your place, your opposition will not be honest, you will feel no serious grievance; and the present opposition is only a contest to get what others have. Sir Robert Walpole acted as I would do. As to the American war, the sense of the nation is with the ministry. The majority of those who can understand is with it; the majority of those who can only hear is against it; and as those who can only hear are more numerous than those who can understand, and opposition is always loudest, a majority of the rabble will be for opposition."

<sup>1</sup> Mr. Eliot, afterwards Lord Eliot, had accompanied Mr. Stanhope, the natural son of Lord Chesterfield, for whom the celebrated Letters were written, and is frequently mentioned in them. Mr. Harte was travelling tutor to both these young gentlemen: see anté, p. 217. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> William, the first Viscount Grimston. — BOSWELL. Lord Charlemont was far from being pleased with Mr. Boswell's having published this conversation. See his "Lycé" by Hardy, vol. i. p. 401. — CROKER.

This boisterous vivacity<sup>1</sup> entertained us; but the truth in my opinion was, that those who could understand the best were against the American war, as almost every man now is, when the question has been coolly considered.

Mrs. Thrale gave high praise to Mr. Dudley Long (now North). JOHNSON. "Nay, my dear lady, don't talk so. Mr. Long's character is very short.<sup>2</sup> It is nothing. He fills a chair. He is a man of genteel appearance, and that is all. I know nobody who blasts by praise as you do: for whenever there is exaggerated praise, every body is set against a character. They are provoked to attack it. Now there is Peypys<sup>3</sup>: you praised that man with such disproportion, that I was incited to lessen him, perhaps more than he deserves. His blood is upon your head. By the same principle, your malice defeats itself; for your censure is too violent. And yet (looking to her with a leering smile) she is the first woman in the world, could she but restrain that wicked tongue of hers;—she would be the only woman, could she but command that little whirligig."

Upon the subject of exaggerated praise I took the liberty to say, that I thought there might be very high praise given to a known character which deserved it, and therefore it would not be exaggerated. Thus, one might say of Mr. Edmund Burke, he is a very wonderful man. JOHNSON. "No, Sir, you would not be safe, if another man had a mind perversely to contradict. He might answer, 'Where is all the wonder? Burke is, to be sure, a man of uncommon abilities; with a great quantity of matter in his mind, and a great fluency of language in his mouth. But we are not to be stunned and astonished by him.' So you see, Sir, even Burke would suffer, not from any fault of his own, but from your folly."

Mrs. Thrale mentioned a gentleman who had acquired a fortune of four thousand a year in trade, but was absolutely miserable because he could not talk in company; so miserable, that he was impelled to lament his situation in the street to ***** whom he hates, and who he knows despises him. "I am a most unhappy man," said he. "I am invited to conversations; I go to conversations; but, alas! I have no conversation." JOHNSON. "Man commonly cannot be successful in different ways. This gentleman has spent, in getting four thousand pounds a year, the time in which he might have learnt to talk; and now he cannot talk." Mr. Perkins made a shrewd and droll remark: "If he had got his four thousand a year as a mountebank, he might have learnt to talk at the same time that he was getting his fortune."

Some other gentlemen came in. The conversation concerning the person whose character Dr. Johnson had treated so slightly, as he did not know his merit, was resumed. Mrs. Thrale said, "You think so of him, Sir, because he is quiet, and does not exert himself with force. You'll be saying the same thing of Mr. ***** there, who sits as quiet." This was not well bred; and Johnson did not let it pass without correction. "Nay, Madam, what right have you to talk thus? Both Mr. ***** and I have reason to take it ill. You may talk so of Mr. *****; but why do you make me do it? Have I said anything against Mr. *****? You have set him, that I might shoot him: but I have not shot him."

One of the gentlemen said he had seen three folio volumes of Dr. Johnson's sayings collected by me. "I must put you right, Sir," said I; "for I am very exact in authenticity. You could not see folio volumes, for I have none: you might have seen some in quarto and octavo. This is an inattention which one should guard against." JOHNSON. "Sir, it is a want of concern about veracity. He does not know that he saw any volumes. If he had seen them, he could have remembered their size."

Mr. Thrale appeared very lethargic to-day. I saw him again on Monday evening, at which time he was not thought to be in immediate danger: but early in the morning of Wednesday the 4th he expired. Upon that day there was a call of the Literary Club; but Johnson apologised for his absence by the following note:—

"Wednesday, (4th April.)

"Mr. Johnson knows that Sir Joshua Reynolds and the other gentlemen will excuse his incompliance with the call, when they are told that Mr. Thrale died this morning."

<sup>1</sup> This is "boisterous vivacity," because Boswell happened to have taken up the other side of the question.—CROKER, 1847.

<sup>2</sup> Here Johnson condescended to play upon the words long and short. But little did he know that, owing to Mr. Long's reserve in his presence, he was talking thus of a gentleman distinguished amongst his acquaintance for acuteness of wit; and to whom, I think, the French expression, "Il pétille d'esprit," is particularly suited. He has gratified me by mentioning that he heard Dr. Johnson say, "Sir, if I were to lose Boswell, it would be a limb amputated."—BOSWELL. See anté, p. 678. n. 7.—C.

<sup>3</sup> William Weller Peypys, Esq., one of the masters in the High Court of Chancery, and well known in polite circles. My acquaintance with him is not sufficient to enable me to speak of him from my own judgment. But I know that both at Eton and Oxford he was the intimate friend of the late Sir James Macdonald, the Marcellus of Scotland, whose extraordinary talents, learning, and virtues will ever be remembered with admiration and regret.—BOSWELL. See anté, p. 644.—C.

Johnson was in the house, and thus mentions the event:—

“ Good Friday, April 13th, 1781. — On Wednesday, 11th, was buried my dear friend Thrale, who died on Wednesday, 4th; and with him were buried many of my hopes and pleasures. About five, I think, on Wednesday morning, he expired. I felt almost the last flutter of his pulse, and looked for the last time upon the face that for fifteen years had never been turned upon me but with respect or benignity.<sup>1</sup> Farewell. May God, that delighteth in mercy, have had mercy on thee! I had constantly prayed for him some time before his death. The decease of him, from whose friendship I had obtained many opportunities of amusement, and to whom I turned my thoughts as to a refuge from misfortunes, has left me heavy. But my business is with myself.” (Pr. and Med., p. 187.<sup>2</sup>)

Mr. Thrale's death was a very essential loss to Johnson, who, although he did not foresee all that afterwards happened, was sufficiently convinced that the comforts which Mr. Thrale's family afforded him would now in a great measure cease. He, however, continued to show a kind attention to his widow and children as long as it was acceptable; and he took upon him, with a very earnest concern, the office of one of his executors; the importance of which seemed greater than usual to him, from his circumstances having been always such that he had scarcely any share in the real business of life. His friends of the Club were in hopes that Mr. Thrale might have made a liberal provision for him for his life, which, as Mr. Thrale left no son and a very large fortune, it would have been highly to his honour to have done; and, considering Dr. Johnson's age, could not have been of long duration; but he bequeathed him only two hundred pounds, which was the legacy given to each of his executors. I could not but be somewhat diverted by hearing Johnson talk in a pompous manner of his new office, and particularly of the concerns of the brewery, which it was at last resolved should be sold. Lord Lucan tells a very good story, which, if not precisely exact, is certainly characteristic; that when the sale of Thrale's brewery was going forward, Johnson appeared bustling about, with an ink-horn and pen in his button-hole, like an excise-man; and on being asked what he really considered to be the value of the property which was to be disposed of, answered, “ We are not here to sell a parcel of boilers and vats, but the potentiality of growing rich beyond the dreams of avarice.”<sup>3</sup>

[JOHNSON TO MRS. THRALE.

“ London, April 5, 1781.

“ DEAREST MADAM, — Of your injunctions to pray for you and write to you, I hope to leave neither unobserved; and I hope to find you willing in a short time to alleviate your trouble by some other exercise of the mind. I am not without my part of the calamity. No death since that of my wife has ever oppressed me like this. But let us remember that we are in the hands of Him who knows when to give and when to take away, who will look upon us with mercy through all our variations of existence, and who invites us to call on him in the day of trouble. Call upon him in this great revolution of life, and call with confidence. You will then find comfort for the past, and support for the future. He that has given you happiness in marriage, to a degree of which, without personal knowledge, I should have thought the description fabulous, can give you another mode of happiness as a mother, and at last the happiness of losing all temporal cares in the thoughts of an eternity in heaven.

“ I do not exhort you to reason yourself into tranquillity. We must first pray, and then labour; first implore the blessing of God, and [use] those means, which he puts into our hands. Cultivated ground has few weeds; a mind occupied by lawful business has little room for useless regret.

“ We read the will to-day; but I will not fill my first letter with any account than that, with all my zeal for your advantage, I am satisfied; and that the other executors, more used to consider property than I, commended it for wisdom and equity. Yet why should I not tell you that you have five hundred pounds for your immediate expenses, and two thousand pounds a year, with both the houses, and all the goods?

“ Let us pray for one another, that the time, whether long or short, that shall yet be granted us, may be well spent; and that when this life, which at the longest is very short, shall come to an end, a better may begin which shall never end.”

— Letters.

On Friday, April 6th, he carried me to dine at a club which, at his desire, had been lately formed at the Queen's Arms in St. Paul's Churchyard. He told Mr. Hoole that he wished to have a city Club, and asked him to collect one; but, said he, “ Don't let them be in the Borough, is now the largest of its kind in the world. The buildings extend over ten acres, and the machinery includes two steam-engines. The store-cellars contain 126 vats, varying in their contents from 4000 barrels down to 500. About 160 horses are employed in conveying beer to different parts of London. The quantity brewed in 1826 was 380,180 barrels, upon which a duty of ten shillings the barrel, 180,090*l.*, was paid to the revenue; and, in the last year, the malt consumed exceeded 100,000 quarters. — WRIGHT, 1835.

<sup>1</sup> Johnson's expressions on this occasion remind us of Isaac Walton's eulogy on Whitgift, in his Life of Hooker. “ He lived to be present at the expiration of her (Queen Elizabeth's) last breath, and to behold the closing of those eyes that had long looked upon him with reverence and affection.” — KEARNEY.

<sup>2</sup> At a subsequent date he added, on the same paper: — “ 18th September. My first knowledge of Thrale was in 1765. I enjoyed his favour for almost a fourth part of my life.” See ante, p. 169. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> The brewery was sold by Dr. Johnson and his brother executor, to Messrs. BARCLAY, PERKINS, & Co., for 135,000*l.* While on his Tour to the Hebrides, in 1773, Johnson mentioned that Thrale “ paid 20,000*l.* a year to the revenue, and that he had four vats, each of which held 1600 barrels, above a thousand hogheads.” The establishment in Park Street,

<sup>4</sup> It seems unfeeling to have dined at a tavern the day but one after poor Thrale's death; but he was afraid to indulge his own morbid grief. He writes to Mrs. Thrale, “ Our sorrow has different effects; you are driven into solitude, I am driven into company. * * * I give my affliction a little vent, and amuse it as I can.” — CROKER.

patriots."<sup>1</sup> The company were to-day very sensible, well-behaved men. I have preserved only two particulars of his conversation. He said he was glad Lord George Gordon had escaped, rather than that a precedent should be established for hanging a man for constructive treason, which, in consistency with his true, manly, constitutional Toryism, he considered would be a dangerous engine of arbitrary power. And upon its being mentioned that an opulent and very indolent Scotch nobleman, who totally resigned the management of his affairs to a man of knowledge and abilities, had claimed some merit by saying, "The next best thing to managing a man's own affairs well is being sensible of incapacity, and not attempting it, but having a full confidence in one who can do it:"—JOHNSON. "Nay, Sir, this is paltry. There is a middle course. Let a man give application; and depend upon it he will soon get above a despicable state of helplessness, and attain the power of acting for himself."

On Saturday, April 7., I dined with him at Mr. Hoole's with Governor Bouchier and Captain Orme, both of whom had been long in the East Indies; and, being men of good sense and observation, were very entertaining. Johnson defended the oriental regulation of different castes of men, which was objected to as totally destructive of the hopes of rising in society by personal merit. He showed that there was a principle in it sufficiently plausible by analogy. "We see," said he, "in metals that there are different species; and so likewise in animals, though one species may not differ very widely from another, as, in the species of dogs, the cur, the spaniel, the mastiff. The Bramins are the mastiffs of mankind."<sup>2</sup>

On Thursday, April 12., I dined with him at a bishop's, where were Sir Joshua Reynolds, Mr. Berenger, and some more company. He had dined the day before at another bishop's.<sup>3</sup> I have unfortunately recorded none of his conversation at the bishop's where we dined together: but I have preserved his ingenious defence of his dining twice abroad in Passion-week; a laxity in which I am convinced he would not have indulged himself at the time when he wrote his solemn paper in "The Rambler" upon that awful season. It appeared to me, that by being much more in company, and enjoying more luxurious living, he had contracted a keener relish for pleasure, and was consequently less rigorous in his religious rites. This he would not acknowledge; but he reasoned with admirable sophistry as follows: "Why, Sir, a bishop's calling company together in this week is, to use the vulgar phrase, not the thing. But you must consider laxity is a bad thing; but preciseness is also a bad thing; and your general character may be more hurt by preciseness than by dining with a bishop in Passion-week. There might be a handle for reflection. It might be said, 'He refuses to dine with a bishop in Passion-week, but was three Sundays absent from church.'" BOSWELL. "Very true, Sir. But suppose a man to be uniformly of good conduct, would it not be better that he should refuse to dine with a bishop in this week, and so not encourage a bad practice by his example?" JOHNSON. "Why, Sir, you are to consider whether you might not do more harm by lessening the influence of a bishop's character by your disapprobation in refusing him, than by going to him."<sup>4</sup>

JOHNSON TO MRS. PORTER.

"London, April 12. 1781.

"DEAR MADAM,—Life is full of troubles. I have just lost my dear friend Thrale. I hope he is happy; but I have had a great loss. I am otherwise pretty well. I require some care of myself, but that care is not ineffectual; and when I am out of order, I think it often my own fault.

"The spring is now making quick advances. As it is the season in which the whole world is enlivened and invigorated, I hope that both you and I shall partake of its benefits. My desire is to see Lichfield; but being left executor to my friend, I know not whether I can be spared; but I will try, for it is now long since we saw one another; and how little we can promise ourselves many more interviews, we are taught by hourly examples of mortality. Let us try to live so as that mortality may not be an evil. Write to me soon, my dearest: your letters will give me great pleasure.

"I am sorry that Mr. Porter has not had his box; but by sending it to Mr. Mathias, who very readily undertook its conveyance, I did the best I could, and perhaps before now he has it. Be so kind as to make my compliments to my friends. I have a great value for their kindness, and hope to enjoy it before summer is past. Do write to me. I am, dearest love, your, &c.,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

On Friday, April 13., being Good Friday, I went to St. Clement's church with him as usual. There I saw again his old fellow-collegian, Edwards, to whom I said, "I think, Sir, Dr. Johnson and you meet only at church." "Sir," said he, "it is the best place we can meet in, except heaven, and I hope we shall meet there too." Dr. Johnson told me that

<sup>1</sup> The truth is, that the patriots had driven him away from Sir Joshua's Club, which he latterly seldom attended. See ante p. 529, n. 1. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> Rajapouts, the military caste; the Bramins, pacific and abstemious. — KEARNEY.

<sup>3</sup> The only bishops at whose houses Johnson is recorded to have dined were Shipley of St. Asaph and Porteus of Chester, afterwards of London. By a letter, post, April, 1782, it appears that he dined two consecutive days, in April of that year, with the Bishops of St. Asaph's and Chester. It is odd that he should, in two succeeding Aprils, have dined on two successive days with these two bishops, but it seems nevertheless certain. The matter is of some little importance, for we had rather be assured that Bishop Porteus were not the bishop here alluded to. See post, 26th April, 1782. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> This is a very poor excuse for many reasons, but one is very obvious — that the refusal need neither have been public nor motive, as the French say. — CROKER, 1847.

there was very little communication between Edwards and him after their unexpected renewal of acquaintance. "But," said he, smiling, "he met me once and said, 'I am told you have written a very pretty book called 'The Rambler.' I was unwilling that he should leave the world in total darkness, and sent him a set."

Mr. Berenger<sup>1</sup> visited him to-day, and was very pleasing. We talked of an evening society for conversation at a house in town, of which we were all members, but of which Johnson said, "It will never do, Sir. There is nothing served about there; neither tea, nor coffee, nor lemonade, nor anything whatever; and depend upon it, Sir, a man does not love to go to a place from whence he comes out exactly as he went in." I endeavoured, for argument's sake, to maintain that men of learning and talents might have very good intellectual society, without the aid of any little gratifications of the senses. Berenger joined with Johnson, and said that without these any meeting would be dull and insipid. He would therefore have all the slight refreshments; nay, it would not be amiss to have some cold meat, and a bottle of wine upon a sideboard. "Sir," said Johnson to me, with an air of triumph, "Mr. Berenger knows the world. Every body loves to have good things furnished to them without any trouble. I told Mrs. Thrale once, that, as she did not choose to have card-tables, she should have a profusion of the best sweetmeats, and she would be sure to have company enough come to her." I agreed with my illustrious friend upon this subject; for it has pleased God to make man a composite animal, and where there is nothing to refresh the body, the mind will languish.

On Sunday, April 15., being Easter-day, after solemn worship in St. Paul's church, I found him alone. Dr. Scott, of the Commons, came in. He talked of its having been said, that Addison wrote some of his best papers in "The Spectator" when warm with wine. Dr. Johnson did not seem willing to admit this. Dr. Scott, as a confirmation of it, related that Blackstone, a sober man, composed his "Commentaries" with a bottle of port before him; and found his mind invigorated and supported in the fatigue of his great work, by a temperate use of it.

I told him, that in a company where I had lately been, a desire was expressed to know his authority for the shocking story of Addison's sending an execution into Steele's house.

"Sir," said he, "it is generally known; it is known to all who are acquainted with the literary history of that period: it is as well known as that he wrote 'Cato.' Mr. Thomas Sheridan once defended Addison to me, by alleging that he did it in order to cover Steele's goods from other creditors, who were going to seize them."<sup>2</sup>

We talked of the difference between the mode of education at Oxford and that in those colleges where instruction is chiefly conveyed by lectures. JOHNSON. "Lectures were once useful; but now, when all can read, and books are so numerous, lectures are unnecessary. If your attention fails, and you miss a part of the lecture, it is lost; you cannot go back as you do upon a book." Dr. Scott agreed with him. "But yet," said I, "Dr. Scott, you yourself gave lectures at Oxford." He smiled. "You laughed," then said I, "at those who came to you."

Dr. Scott left us, and soon afterwards we went to dinner. Our company consisted of Mrs. Williams, Mrs. Desmoulins, Mr. Levett, Mr. Allen, the printer, (Mr. Macbean), and Mrs. Hall, sister of the Reverend Mr. John Wesley, and resembling him, as I thought, both in figure and manner. Johnson produced now, for the first time, some handsome silver salvers, which he told me he had bought fourteen years ago; so it was a great day. I was not a little amused by observing Allen perpetually struggling to talk in the manner of Johnson, like the little frog in the fable blowing himself up to resemble the stately ox.

I mentioned a kind of religious Robin-Hood society<sup>3</sup>, which met every Sunday evening at Coachmakers'-Hall, for free debate; and that the subject for this night was, the text which relates, with other miracles which happened at our Saviour's death, "And the graves were opened, and many bodies of the saints which slept arose, and came out of the graves after his resurrection, and went into the holy city, and appeared unto many." Mrs. Hall said it was a very curious subject, and she should like to hear it discussed. JOHNSON (somewhat warmly). "One would not go to such a place to hear it, — one would not be seen in such a place, to give countenance to such a meeting." I, however, resolved that I would go. "But, Sir," said she to Johnson, "I should like to hear you discuss it." He seemed reluctant to engage in it. She talked of the resurrection of the human race in general, and maintained that we shall be raised with the was there, and was all himself, all chivalry, blank verse, and anecdote. He told us some curious stories of Pope, with whom he used to spend the summer at his uncle Lord Cobham's." He died in Sept. 1782, æt. 62. — CROKER.

<sup>1</sup> Richard Berenger, many years Gentleman of the Horse to her present majesty, and author of The History and Art of Horsemanship, 2 vols. 4to. 1771. — MALONE. Mr. Berenger's mother was sister of Lord Cobham and of Lady Lyttelton, mother of the first lord. Talking of good manners, Johnson named Mr. Berenger as the standard of true elegance; but some one objecting that he too much resembled the gentlemen in Congreve's comedies, Johnson said, "Well then, we must fix on the famous Thomas Hervey," [anté, p. 183. n. 4.] — PIOZZI. "I dined the other day," says Hannah More, "at Mrs. Boscawen's, very pleasantly, for Berenger

<sup>2</sup> See anté, p. 671. — C.

<sup>3</sup> The original Robin-Hood was a debating club, "chiefly composed" (says the Connoisseur, 28th March, 1754) "of lawyers, clerks, petty tradesmen, and low mechanics, where it is usual for the advocates of infidelity to assemble and openly avow their infidelity." See Genl. Mag. xxii. 54. and xxiv. 154. — CROKER.

same bodies. JOHNSON. "Nay, Madam, we see that it is not to be the same body; for the scripture uses the illustration of grain sown, and we know that the grain which grows is not the same with what is sown. You cannot suppose that we shall rise with a diseased body; it is enough if there be such a sameness as to distinguish identity of person." She seemed desirous of knowing more, but he left the question in obscurity.

Of apparitions<sup>1</sup>, he observed, "A total disbelief of them is adverse to the opinion of the existence of the soul between death and the last day; the question simply is, whether departed spirits ever have the power of making themselves perceptible to us: a man who thinks he has seen an apparition can only be convinced himself; his authority will not convince another; and his conviction, if rational, must be founded on being told something which cannot be known but by supernatural means."

He mentioned a thing as not unfrequent, of which I had never heard before, — being called, that is, hearing one's name pronounced by the voice of a known person at a great distance, far beyond the possibility of being reached by any sound uttered by human organs. "An acquaintance, on whose veracity I can depend, told me, that walking home one evening to Kilmarnock, he heard himself called from a wood, by the voice of a brother who had gone to America: and the next packet brought accounts of that brother's death." Macbean asserted that this inexplicable calling was a thing very well known. Dr. Johnson said, that one day at Oxford, as he was turning the key of his chamber, he heard his mother distinctly call — Sam. She was then at Lichfield; but nothing ensued. This phenomenon is, I think, as wonderful as any other mysterious fact, which many people are very slow to believe, or rather, indeed, reject with an obstinate contempt.

Some time after this, upon his making a remark which escaped my attention, Mrs. Williams and Mrs. Hall were both together striving to answer him. He grew angry, and called out loudly, "Nay, when you both speak at once, it is intolerable." But checking himself, and softening, he said, "This one may say, though, you are ladies." Then he brightened into gay humour, and addressed them in the words of one of the songs in "The Beggar's Opera,"

"But two at a time there's no mortal can bear."

"What, Sir," said I, "are you going to turn Captain Macheath?" There was something as pleasantly ludicrous in this scene as can be imagined. The contrast between Macheath, Polly, and Lucy — and Dr. Samuel Johnson, blind, peevish Mrs. Williams, and lean, lank, preaching Mrs. Hall, was exquisite.

I stole away to Coachmakers'-hall, and heard the difficult text of which we had talked, discussed with great decency, and some intelligence, by several speakers. There was a difference of opinion as to the appearance of ghosts in modern times, though the argument for it, supported by Mr. Addison's authority, preponderated. The immediate subject of debate was embarrassed by the bodies of the saints having been said to rise, and by the question what became of them afterwards: — did they return again to their graves? or were they translated to heaven? Only one evangelist mentions the fact (Matthew, xxvii. 52, 53.), and the commentators whom I have looked at do not make the passage clear. There is, however, no occasion for our understanding it farther than to know that it was one of the extraordinary manifestations of divine power which accompanied the most important event that ever happened.

CHAPTER LXXIII.

1781.

Dinner at Mrs. Garrick's. — Miss Hannah More. — Mudge's "Sermons." — A Printer's Devil. — Quotation. — Letter-writing. — Bet Flint. — Oratory. — Beauclerk's Library. — English Sermons. — Blue-Stocking Clubs. — Miss Monckton. — Talking for Victory. — A Cui Bono Man. — "Heroic Epistle." — Lord Carlisle's Poems. — Dr. Barnard. — "Of Tory and Whig." — Visit to Welwyn. — Dr. Young. — Trusting to Impressions. — Original Sin. — Ancient Egyptians. — Wealth. — Memory and Recollection. — Marrying a pretty Woman. — Thrade's Brewery. — Mr. Bewley. — Johnson's Hearth-broom. — Dr. Patten. — Visit to Ashbourne and Lichfield.

On Friday, April 20., I spent with him one of the happiest days that I remember to have enjoyed in the whole course of my life. Mrs. Garrick, whose grief for the loss of her husband was, I believe, as sincere as wounded affection and admiration could produce, had this day, for the first time since his death, a select party of his friends to dine with her.<sup>2</sup> The company was, Miss Hannah More, who lived with her, and whom she called her chaplain; Mrs. Boscaewen, Mrs. Elizabeth Carter, Sir Joshua

<sup>1</sup> As this subject frequently recurs in this volume, the reader may be led erroneously to suppose that Dr. Johnson was so fond of such discussions as frequently to introduce them. But the truth is, that the author himself delighted in talking concerning ghosts, and what he has frequently denominated the mysterious; and therefore took every opportunity of leading Johnson to converse on such subjects. — MALONE. The author of this work was most undoubtedly fond of the mysterious, and perhaps upon some occasions may have directed the conversation to those topics, when they would not spontaneously have suggested themselves to Johnson's mind; but that he also had a love for speculations of that nature may be gathered from his writings throughout.

— J. BOSWELL, J. S.

<sup>2</sup> Garrick had been dead two years and three months. — CROKER, 1847.

Reynolds, Dr. Burney, Dr. Johnson, and myself. We found ourselves very elegantly entertained at her house in the Adelphi, where I have passed many a pleasing hour with him "who gladdened life." She looked well, talked of her husband with complacency, and while she cast her eyes on his portrait, which hung over the chimney-piece, said, that "death was now the most agreeable object to her." The very semblance of David Garrick was cheering. Mr. Beauclerk, with happy propriety, inscribed under that fine portrait of him, which by Lady Diana's kindness is now the property of my friend Mr. Langton, the following passage from his beloved Shakspeare:

" ——— A merrier man,
Within the limit of becoming mirth,
I never spent an hour's talk withal.
His eye begets occasion for his wit;
For every object that the one doth catch
The other turns to a mirth-moving jest;
Which his fair tongue (Conceit's expositor)
Delivers in such apt and gracious words,
That aged ears play truant at his tales,
And younger hearings are quite ravished;
So sweet and voluble is his discourse."

We were all in fine spirits; and I whispered to Mrs. Boscawen, "I believe this is as much as can be made of life."<sup>1</sup> In addition to a splendid entertainment, we were regaled with Lichfield ale, which had a peculiar appropriate value. Sir Joshua, and Dr. Burney, and I drank cordially of it to Dr. Johnson's health; and though he would not join us, he as cordially answered, "Gentlemen, I wish you all as well as you do me."

The general effect of this day dwells upon my mind in fond remembrance; but I do not find much conversation recorded. What I have preserved shall be faithfully given.

One of the company mentioned Mr. Thomas Hollis, the strenuous Whig, who used to send over Europe presents of demerit books, with their boards stamped with daggers and caps of liberty. Mrs. Carter said, "He was a bad man: he used to talk uncharitably." JOHNSON. "Poh! poh! Madam; who is the worse for being talked of very uncharitably? Besides, he was a dull poor creature as ever lived: and I believe he would not have done harm to a man whom he knew to be of very opposite principles to his own. I remember once at the Society of Arts, when an advertisement was to be drawn up, he pointed me out as the man who could do it best. This, you will observe, was kindness to me. I however slept away, and escaped it."

Mrs. Carter having said of the same person, "I doubt he was an atheist:" JOHNSON. "I don't know that. He might, perhaps, have become one, if he had had time to ripen (smiling). He might have exuberated into an atheist."

Sir Joshua Reynolds praised "Mudge's Sermons." JOHNSON. "Mudge's Sermons are good, but not practical. He grasps more sense than he can hold; he takes more corn than he can make into meal; he opens a wide prospect, but it is so distant, it is indistinct.<sup>3</sup> I love 'Blair's Sermons.' Though the dog is a Scotchman, and a presbyterian, and every thing he should not be, I was the first to praise them. Such was my candour" (smiling). MRS. BOSCAWEN. "Such his great merit, to get the better of all your prejudices." JOHNSON. "Why, Madam, let us compound the matter; let us ascribe it to my candour, and his merit."

In the evening we had a large company in the drawing-room; several ladies, the Bishop of Killaloe (Dr. Barnard), Dr. Percy, Mr. Chamberlayne<sup>4</sup> of the Treasury, &c. &c. Somebody said, the life of a mere literary man could not be very entertaining. JOHNSON. "But it certainly may. This is a remark which has been made, and repeated, without justice. Why should the life of a literary man be less entertaining than the life of any other man? Are there not as interesting varieties in such a life? As a literary life it may be very entertaining." BOSWELL. "But it must be better surely when it is diversified with a little active variety—such as his having gone to Jamaica;—or—his having gone to the Hebrides." JOHNSON was not displeased at this.

Talking of a very respectable author, he told us a curious circumstance in his life, which was, that he had married a printer's devil. REYNOLDS. "A printer's devil, Sir! why, I thought a printer's devil was a creature with a black face and in rags." JOHNSON. "Yes, Sir. But I suppose he had her face washed, and put clean clothes on her." Then, looking very serious, and very earnest. "And she did not

<sup>1</sup> Rosaline's character of Biron. Love's Labour's Lost, act 2. sc. 1. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> Boswell was right; four other such women or such men, it would have been difficult to collect. Hannah More gives two anecdotes only of this day, neither mentioned by Boswell. "Johnson was in full song, and I quarrelled with him sadly. I accused him of not having done justice to the 'Allegro' and 'Penseroso.' He spoke disparagingly of both. I praised Lycidas, which he absolutely abused, adding, that if Milton had not written Paradise Lost he would have only ranked among the minor poets. He was a Phidias that could cut a Colossus out of a rock, but could not cut heads out of cherry-stones." Boswell brought to my mind my being made by Sir William Forbes the umpire in a trial of skill between Garrick and Boswell, which could most nearly imitate Johnson's manner. I remember I gave it for Boswell in familiar conversation, and for Garrick in reciting poetry. Mrs. Boscawen shone with her usual mild lustre." — Memoirs, i. 212. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>3</sup> See anté, p. 679., a more favourable opinion. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> Edward Chamberlayne was, for a short time, Secretary of the Treasury under Lord Rockingham, an office which he unwillingly accepted; and, overwhelmed with its fancied responsibilities, he, on the 5th April, 1782, committed suicide by throwing himself out of one of the windows of the Treasury. He lived 36 hours, with his understanding clear, arranged his affairs with great coolness, did not reproach himself for self-murder, but expressed contrition that he had done business with Lord Rockingham on Good Friday! He was the brother of Mrs. Kennicott. See Hannah More's Memoirs, i. 245. — CROKER, 1847.

DAVID GARRICK

(From the Painting by Sir Joshua Reynolds)

London : John Murray, Albemarle Street

disgrace him;—the woman had a bottom of good sense." The word bottom thus introduced was so ludicrous when contrasted with his gravity, that most of us could not forbear tittering and laughing; though I recollect that the Bishop of Killaloe kept his countenance with perfect steadiness, while Miss Hannah More slyly hid her face behind a lady's back who sat on the same settee with her. His pride could not bear that any expression of his should excite ridicule, when he did not intend it: he therefore resolved to assume and exercise despotic power, glanced sternly around, and called out in a strong tone, "Where's the merriment?" Then collecting himself, and looking awful, to make us feel how he could impose restraint, and as it were searching his mind for a still more ludicrous word, he slowly pronounced, "I say the woman was fundamentally sensible;" as if he had said, Hear this now, and laugh if you dare. We all sat composed as at a funeral.<sup>1</sup>

He and I walked away together: we stopped a little while by the rails of the Adelphi, looking on the Thames, and I said to him with some emotion, that I was now thinking of two friends we had lost, who once lived in the buildings behind us, Beaucherk and Garrick. "Ay, sir, (said he, tenderly) and two such friends as cannot be supplied."

For some time after this day I did not see him very often, and of the conversation which I did enjoy, I am sorry to find I have preserved but little. I was at this time engaged in a variety of other matters which required exertion and assiduity, and necessarily occupied almost all my time.

One day, having spoken very freely of those who were then in power, he said to me, "Between ourselves, Sir, I do not like to give opposition the satisfaction of knowing how much I disapprove of the ministry." And when I mentioned that Mr. Burke had boasted how quiet the nation was in George the Second's reign, when whigs were in power, compared with the present reign, when tories governed;—"Why, sir," said he, "you are to consider that tories having more reverence for government, will not oppose with the same violence as whigs, who, being unrestrained by that principle, will oppose by any means."

This month he lost not only Mr. Thrale, but another friend, Mr. William Strahan, junior, printer, the eldest son of his old and constant friend, printer to his Majesty.

JOHNSON TO MRS. STRAHAN.

"23d April, 1781.

"DEAR MADAM,—The grief which I feel for the loss of a very kind friend is sufficient to make me know how much you suffer by the death of an amiable son: a man of whom I think it may be truly said, that no one knew him who does not lament him. I look upon myself as having a friend, another friend, taken from me.

"Comfort, dear Madam, I would give you, if I could; but I know how little the forms of consolation can avail. Let me, however, counsel you not to waste your health in unprofitable sorrow, but go to Bath, and endeavour to prolong your own life. But when we have all done all that we can, one friend must in time lose the other. I am, dear Madam, your most humble servant,
SAM. JOHNSON."

On Tuesday, May 8., I had the pleasure of again dining with him and Mr. Wilkes, at Mr. Dilly's. No negotiation was now required to bring them together; for Johnson was so well satisfied with the former interview, that he was very glad to meet Wilkes again, who was this day seated between Dr. Beattie and Dr. Johnson; (between Truth<sup>2</sup> and Reason, as General Paoli said, when I told him of it.) WILKES.

"I have been thinking, Dr. Johnson, that there should be a bill brought into parliament that the controverted elections for Scotland should be tried in that country, at their own Abbey of Holyrood-house, and not here; for the consequence of trying them here is, that we have an inundation of Scotchmen, who come up and never go back again. Now, here is Boswell, who is come upon the election for his own county, which will not last a fortnight." JOHNSON. "Nay, Sir, I see no reason why they should be tried at all; for, you know, one Scotchman is as good as another." WILKES.

"Pray, Boswell, how much may be got in a year by an advocate at the Scotch bar?" BOSWELL. "I believe, two thousand pounds."

WILKES. "How can it be possible to spend that money in Scotland?" JOHNSON. "Why, Sir, the money may be spent in England; but there is a harder question. If one man in Scotland gets possession of two thousand pounds, what remains for all the rest of the nation?" WILKES. "You know, in the last war, the immense booty which Thurot carried off by the complete plunder of seven Scotch isles; he re-embarked with three and sixpence."

Here again Johnson and Wilkes joined in extravagant sportive raillery upon the supposed poverty of Scotland, which Dr. Beattie and I did not think it worth our while to dispute.

The subject of quotation being introduced, Mr. Wilkes censured it as pedantry. JOHNSON. "No, Sir, it is a good thing; there is a community of mind in it. Classical quotation is the parole of literary men all over the world." WILKES. "Upon the continent they all quote the Vulgate Bible. Shakspeare is chiefly quoted here: and we quote also Pope, Prior, Butler, Waller, and sometimes Cowley."

We talked of letter-writing. JOHNSON. "It is now become so much the fashion<sup>1</sup> to publish letters, that, in order to avoid it, I put as little into mine as I can." BOSWELL. "Do what you will, Sir, you cannot avoid it. Should you even write as ill as you can, your letters would be published as curiosities:

<sup>1</sup> Manners are certainly more refined than they were. Such a scene as this could hardly now occur in respectable company. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> In allusion to Dr. Beattie's Essay on Truth. — CROKER.

'Behold a miracle, instead of wit!
See two dull lines with Stanhope's pencil writ.'

He gave us an entertaining account of Bet Flint, a woman of the town, who, with some eccentric talents and much effrontery, forced herself upon his acquaintance. "Bet," said he, "wrote her own Life in verse<sup>2</sup>, which she brought to me, wishing that I would furnish her with a preface to it (laughing). I used to say of her, that she was generally slut and drunkard; occasionally whore and thief. She had, however, genteel lodgings, a spinnet on which she played, and a boy that walked before her chair. Poor Bet was taken up on a charge of stealing a counterpane, and tried at the Old Bailey. Chief Justice [Wilkes], who loved a wench, summed up favourably, and she was acquitted.<sup>3</sup> After which, Bet said, with a gay and satisfied air, 'Now that the counterpane is my own, I shall make a petticoat of it.'<sup>4</sup>

Talking of oratory, Mr. Wilkes described it as accompanied with all the charms of poetical expression. JOHNSON. "No, Sir; oratory is the power of beating down your adversary's arguments, and putting better in their place." WILKES. "But this does not move the passions." JOHNSON. "He must be a weak man who is to be so moved." WILKES (naming a celebrated orator). "Amidst all the brilliancy of [Burke's] imagination, and the exuberance of his wit, there is a strange want of taste. It was observed of Apelles's Venus<sup>5</sup>, that her flesh seemed as if she had been nourished by roses: his oratory would sometimes make one suspect that he eats potatoes and drinks whiskey."

Mr. Wilkes observed, how tenacious we are of forms in this country; and gave as an instance, the vote of the House of Commons for remitting money to pay the army in America in Portugal pieces, when, in reality, the remittance is made not in Portugal money, but in our specie. JOHNSON. "Is there not a law, Sir, against exporting the current coin of the realm?" WILKES. "Yes, Sir; but might not the House of Commons, in case of real evident necessity, order our own current coin to be sent into our own colonies?" Here Johnson, with that quickness of recollection which distinguished him so eminently, gave the Middlesex patriot an admirable retort upon his own ground. "Sure, Sir, you don't think a resolution of the House of Commons equal to the law of the land. WILKES (at once perceiving the application). "God forbid, Sir."—To hear what had been treated with such violence in "The False Alarm" now turned into pleasant repartee, was extremely agreeable. Johnson went on:—"Locke observes well, that a prohibition to export the current coin is impolitic; for when the balance of trade happens to be against a state, the current coin must be exported."

Mr. Beauclerk's great library was this season sold in London by auction. Mr. Wilkes said, he wondered to find in it such a numerous collection of sermons: seeming to think it strange that a gentleman of Mr. Beauclerk's character in the gay world should have chosen to have many compositions of that kind. JOHNSON. "Why, Sir, you are to consider, that sermons make a considerable branch of English literature; so that a library must be very imperfect if it has not a numerous collection of sermons<sup>6</sup>: and in all collections, Sir, the desire <sup>1</sup> It had been long growing into a fashion. Doctor Arbuthnot had, 60 years before, called the publication of posthumous letters, "a new terror of death."—CROKER, 1847.

<sup>2</sup> Johnson, whose memory was wonderfully retentive, remembered the first four lines of this curious production, which have been communicated to me by a young lady of his acquaintance:—

"When first I drew my vital breath,
A little minikin I came upon earth;
And then I came from a dark abode,
Into this gay and gaudy world."—BOSWELL.

<sup>3</sup> Johnson was here guilty, not merely of coarseness, but, it seems, of scandal; for James Boswell, junior, ascertained from the Sessions paper that Bet was tried at the Old Bailey in September, 1758, not by the Chief Justice here alluded to, but before Sir William Moreton, recorder; and she was acquitted not in consequence of any favourable summing up of the judge, but because the prosecutrix could not prove that the goods charged to have been stolen were her property.—MALONE.

<sup>4</sup> This story and two or three others of the same stamp are wretchedly told in Madam D'Arblay's Memoirs, i. 88. But one is ready enough to join in the exclamation she attributed to Mrs. Thrale, "Bless me, Sir, how can all these vagabonds contrive to get at you, of all people?"—CROKER, 1847.

<sup>5</sup> Mr. Wilkes mistook the objection of Euphranor to the Thesaurus of Parrhasius for a description of the Venus of Apelles. Vide Plutarch. "Pellone an price clarioris Athenienses."—KEARNEY. "Euphranor, comparing his own representation of Thesaurus with that by Parrhasius, said that the latter looked as if the hero had been fed on roses, but that his showed that he had lived on beef." Plut. Xyl. v. li. p. 346.—CROKER.

<sup>6</sup> Mr. Wilkes probably did not know that there is in an English sermon the most comprehensive and lively account of that entertaining faculty for which he himself was so much admired. It is in Dr. Barrow's first volume, and fourteenth sermon, "Against foolish Talking and Jestings." My old acquaintance, the late Corby Morris, in his ingenious "Essay on Wit, Humour, and Ridicule," calls it "a profuse description of wit;" but I do not see how it could be curtailed, without leaving out some good circumstance of discrimination. As it is not generally known, and may perhaps dispose some to read sermons, from which they may receive real advantage, while looking only for entertainment, I shall here subjoin it.

"But first (says the learned preacher) it may be demanded, what the thing we speak of is? Or what this facetiousness (or wit, as he calls it before) doth import? To which questions I might reply, as Democritus did to him that asked the definition of a man, 'Tis that which we all see and know.' Any one better apprehends what it is by acquaintance than I can inform him by description. It is, indeed, a thing so versatile and multiform, appearing in so many shapes, so many postures, so many garbs, so variously apprehended by several eyes and judgments, that it seemeth no less hard to settle a clear and certain notion thereof, than to make a portrait of Proteus, or to define the figure of the fleeting air. Sometimes it lieth in pat allusion to a known story, or in some subtle application of a trivial saying, or in forging an apposite tale; sometimes it playeth in words and phrases, taking advantage from the ambiguity of their sense, or the affinity of their sound: sometimes it is wrapt in a dress of humorous expression: sometimes it lurketh under an odd of augmenting them grows stronger in proportion to the advance in acquisition; as motion is accelerated by the continuance of the impetus. Besides, Sir," looking at Mr. Wilkes, with a placid but significant smile, "a man may collect sermons with intention of making himself better by them. I hope Mr. Beauclerk intended that some time or other that should be the case with him."

Mr. Wilkes said to me, loud enough for Dr. Johnson to hear, "Dr. Johnson should make me a present of his 'Lives of the Poets,' as I am a poor patriot, who cannot afford to buy them." Johnson seemed to take no notice of this hint; but in a little while he called to Mr. Dilly, "Pray, Sir, be so good as to send a set of my Lives to Mr. Wilkes, with my compliments." This was accordingly done; and Mr. Wilkes paid Dr. Johnson a visit, was courteously received, and sat with him a long time.

The company gradually dropped away. Mr. Dilly himself was called down stairs upon business; I left the room for some time; when I returned, I was struck with observing Dr. Samuel Johnson and John Wilkes, Esq. literally tête-à-tête; for they were reclined upon their chairs, with their heads leaning almost close to each other, and talking earnestly, in a kind of confidential whisper, of the personal quarrel between George the Second and the King of Prussia. Such a scene of perfectly easy sociality between two such opponents in the war of political controversy, as that which I now beheld, would have been an excellent subject for a picture. It presented to my mind the happy days which are foretold in the scripture, when the lion shall lie down with the kid.<sup>1</sup>

After this day there was another pretty long interval, during which Dr. Johnson and I did not meet. When I mentioned it to him with regret, he was pleased to say, "Then, Sir, let us live double."

About this time it was much the fashion for several ladies to have evening assemblies, where the fair sex might participate in conversation with literary and ingenious men, animated by a desire to please. These societies were denominated Blue-stocking Clubs; the origin of which title being little known, it may be worth while to relate it. One of the most eminent members of those societies, when they first commenced, was Mr. Stillingfleet<sup>2</sup>, whose dress was remarkably grave, and in particular it was observed that he wore blue stockings. Such was the excellence of his conversation, that his absence was felt as so great a loss, that it used to be said, "We can do nothing without the blue stockings"; and thus by degrees the title was established. Miss Hannah More has admirably described a Blue-stocking Club in her "Bus Bleu," a poem in which many of the persons who were most conspicuous there are mentioned.

Johnson was prevailed with to come sometimes into these circles, and did not think himself too grave even for the lively Miss Monckton<sup>3</sup> (now Countess of Cork), who used to have the finest bit of blue at the house of her mother, Lady Galway. Her vivacity enchanted the sage, and they used to talk together with all imaginable ease. A singular instance happened one evening, when she insisted that some of Sterne's writings were very pathetic. Johnson bluntly denied it. "I am sure," said she, "they have affected me." "Why," said Johnson, smiling and rolling himself about, "that is because, dearest, you're a dunce." When she some time afterwards mentioned this to him, he said, with equal truth and politeness, "Madam, if I had thought so, I certainly should not have said it."

Another evening Johnson's kind indulgence towards me had a pretty difficult trial. I had dined at the Duke of Montrose's with a very agreeable party; and his grace, according to his usual custom, had circulated the bottle very freely. Lord Graham and I went together to Miss Monckton's, where I certainly was in extraordinary spirits, and above all fear or awe. In the midst of a great number of persons of the first rank, amongst whom I recollect, with confusion, a noble lady of the most stately decorum, I placed myself next to Johnson, and similitude: sometimes it is lodged in a sly question, in a smart answer, in a quirkish reason, in a shrewd intimation, in a cunningly diverting or cleverly retorting an objection: sometimes it is couched in a bold scheme of speech, in a tart irony, in a lusty hyperbole, in a startling metaphor, in a laudable reconciling of contradictions, or in acute nonsense: sometimes a scemical representation of persons or things, a counterfeit speech, a mimical look or gesture, passeth for wit: sometimes an affected simplicity, sometimes a presumptuous bluntness giveth it being: sometimes it riseth only from lucky hitting upon what is strange: sometimes from a rafty wresting obvious matter to the purpose. Often it consisteth in one knows not what, and springeth up one can hardly tell how. Its ways are unaccountable and inexplicable; being answerable to the numberless roivings of fancy and windings of language. It is, in short, a manner of speaking out of the simple and plain way (such as reason teacheth and loveth things by), which, by a pretty surprizing uncouthness in conceit or expression, doth affect and amuse the fancy, stirring in it some wonder, and breeding some delight thereto. It raiseth admiration, as signifying a nimble sagacity and apprehension, a special felicity of invention, a vivacity of spirit, and reach of wit more than vulgar; it seeming to argue rare quickness of parts, that one can fetch in remote matters applicable; a notable skill, that he can dexterously accommodate them to the purpose before him: together with a lively briskness of humour, not apt to damp those sportful flashes of imagination. (Whence in Aristotle such persons are termed επιδιδυμοι, dexterous men, and εργαστοι, men of facile or versatile manners, who can easily turn themselves to all things, or turn all things to themselves.) It also procureth delight, by gratifying curiosity with its rareness, as semblance of difficulty: (as monsters, not for their beauty, but their rarity; as juggling tricks, not for their use, but their abstruseness, are beheld with pleasure:) by diverting the mind from its road of serious thoughts; by instilling gaiety and airiness of spirit; by provoking to such dispositions of spirit in way of emulation or complaisance; and by seasoning matters, otherwise distasteful or insipid, with an unusual and thence grateful tang." — BOSWELL.

<sup>1</sup> When I mentioned this to the Bishop of Killaloe (Dr. Barnard), "With the goat," said his lordship. Such, however, was the engaging politeness and pleasantry of Mr. Wilkes, and such the social good humour of the bishop, that when they dined together at Mr. Dilly's, where I also was, they were mutually agreeable. — BOSWELL.

<sup>2</sup> Mr. Benjamin Stillingfleet, author of tracts relating to natural history, &c. — BOSWELL.

<sup>3</sup> See ant., p. 645. n. 10. — C.

thinking myself now fully his match, talked to him in a loud and boisterous manner, desirous to let the company know how I could contend with Ajax. I particularly remember pressing him upon the value of the pleasures of the imagination, and, as an illustration of my argument, asking him, "What, Sir, supposing I were to fancy that the — (naming the most charming duchess in his majesty's dominions) were in love with me, should I not be very happy?" My friend with much address evaded my interrogatories, and kept me as quiet as possible; but it may easily be conceived how he must have felt.<sup>1</sup> However, when a few days afterwards I waited upon him and made an apology, he behaved with the most friendly gentleness.

While I remained in London this year. Johnson and I dined together at several places. I recollect a placid day at Dr. Butter's<sup>2</sup>, who had now removed from Derby to Lower Grosvenor Street, London; but of his conversation on that and other occasions during this period I neglected to keep any regular record, and shall therefore insert here some miscellaneous articles which I find in my Johnsonian notes.

His disorderly habits, when "making provision for the day that was passing over him," appear from the following anecdote, communicated to me by Mr. John Nichols: "In the year 1763 a young bookseller, who was an apprentice to Mr. Whiston, waited on him with a subscription to his 'Shakspeare;' and observing that the doctor made no entry in any book of the subscriber's name, ventured diffidently to ask whether he would please to have the gentleman's address, that it might be properly inserted in the printed list of subscribers. 'I shall print no list of subscribers,' said Johnson, with great abruptness; but almost immediately recollecting himself, added, very complacently, 'Sir, I have two very cogent reasons for not printing any list of subscribers: one, that I have lost all the names; the other, that I have spent all the money.'

Johnson could not brook appearing to be worsted in argument, even when he had taken the wrong side, to show the force and dexterity of his talents. When, therefore, he perceived that his opponent gained ground, he had recourse to some sudden mode of robust sophistry.

Once when I was pressing upon him with visible advantage, he stopped me thus: "My dear Boswell, let's have no more of this; you'll make nothing of it. I'd rather have you whistle a Scotch tune."

Care, however, must be taken to distinguish between Johnson when he "talked for victory," and Johnson when he had no desire but to inform and illustrate. "One of Johnson's principal talents," says an eminent friend of his, "was shown in maintaining the wrong side of an argument, and in a splendid perversion of the truth. If you could contrive to have his fair opinion on a subject, and without any bias from personal prejudice, or from a wish to be victorious in argument, it was wisdom itself, not only convincing, but overpowering."

He had, however, all his life habituated himself to consider conversation as a trial of intellectual vigour and skill: and to this, I think, we may venture to ascribe that unexampled richness and brilliancy which appeared in his own. As a proof at once of his eagerness for colloquial distinction, and his high notion of this eminent friend<sup>3</sup>, he once addressed him thus: "—, we now have been several hours together, and you have said but one thing for which I envied you."

He disliked much all speculative desponding considerations, which tended to discourage men from diligence and exertion. He was in this like Dr. Shaw, the great traveller, who, Mr. Daines Barrington told me, used to say, "I hate a cui bono man." Upon being asked by a friend what he should think of a man who was apt to say non est tanti; "That he's a stupid fellow, Sir," answered Johnson. "What would these tanti men be doing the while?" When I, in a low-spirited fit, was talking to him with indifference of the pursuits which generally engage us in a course of action, and inquiring a reason for taking so much trouble; "Sir," said he, in an animated tone, "it is driving on the system of life."

He told me that he was glad that I had, by General Oglethorpe's means, become acquainted with Dr. Shebbeare. Indeed that gentleman, whatever objections were made to him, had knowledge and abilities much above the class of ordinary writers, and deserves to be remembered as a respectable name in literature,

<sup>1</sup> Next day I endeavoured to give what had happened the most ingenious turn I could by the following verses:

TO THE HONOURABLE MISS MONCKTON.
 Not that with th' excellent Montrose
 I had the happiness to dine;
 Not that I late from table rose,
 From Graham's wit, from generous wine.
 It was not these alone which led
 On sacred manners to encroach;
 And made me feel what most I dread,
 Johnson's just frown, and self-reproach.
 But when I enter'd, not abash'd,
 From your bright eyes were shot such rays,
 At once intoxication flash'd,
 And all my frame was in a blaze!

But not a brilliant blaze, I own;
 Of the dull smoke I'm yet ashamed;
 I was a dreary ruin grown,
 And not enlighten'd, though inflamed.

Victim at once to wine and love,
 I hope, Maria, you'll forgive;
 While I invoke the powers above,
 That henceforth I may wiser live.

The lady was generously forgiving, returned me an obliging answer, and I thus obtained an act of oblivion, and took care never to offend again. — BOSWELL.

<sup>2</sup> See anté, p. 549. — C.

<sup>3</sup> The Right Hon. William Gerrard Hamilton. — MALONE. It seems an odd way of expressing a high notion of a gentleman's conversation, to say that "in several hours he had said but one good thing." — CROKER.

were it only for his admirable "Letters on the English Nation," under the name of "Battista Angeloni, a Jesuit."

Johnson and Shebbeare<sup>1</sup> were frequently named together, as having in former reigns had no predilection for the family of Hanover. The author<sup>2</sup> of the celebrated "Heroic Epistle to Sir William Chambers" introduced them in one line [p. 604. n. 4.], in a list of those "who tasted the sweets of his present majesty's reign." Such was Johnson's candid relish of the merit of that satire, that he allowed Dr. Goldsmith, as he told me, to read it to him from beginning to end, and did not refuse his praise to its execution.<sup>3</sup>

Goldsmith could sometimes take adventurous liberties with him, and escape unpunished. Beauclerk told me, that when Goldsmith talked of a project for having a third theatre in London solely for the exhibition of new plays, in order to deliver authors from the supposed tyranny of managers, Johnson treated it slightly; upon which Goldsmith said, "Ay, ay, this may be nothing to you, who can now shelter yourself behind the corner of a pension;" and Johnson bore this with good humour.

Johnson praised the Earl of Carlisle's poems<sup>4</sup>, which his lordship had published with his name, as not disdaining to be a candidate for literary fame. My friend was of opinion that when a man of rank appeared in that character, he deserved to have his merit handsomely allowed.<sup>5</sup> In this I think he was more liberal than Mr. William Whitehead, in his "Elegy to Lord Villiers," in which, under the pretext of "superior toils, demanding all their care," he discovers a jealousy of the great paying their court to the Muses:—

"——— to the chosen few

Who dare excel, thy fostering aid afford;
Their arts, their magic powers, with honours due
Exalt; — but be thyself what they record."

Johnson had called twice on the Bishop of Killaloe before his lordship set out for Ireland, having missed him the first time. He said, "It would have hung heavy on my heart if I had not seen him. No man ever paid more attention to another than he has done to me; and I have neglected him, not wilfully, but from being otherwise occupied. Always, Sir, set a high value on spontaneous kindness. He whose inclination prompts him to cultivate your friendship of his own accord, will love you more than one whom you have been at pains to attach to you."

This gave me very great pleasure, for there had been once a pretty smart altercation between Dr. Barnard and him, upon a question, whether a man could improve himself after the age of forty-five; when Johnson in a hasty humour expressed himself in a manner not quite civil. Dr. Barnard made it the subject of a copy of pleasant verses, in which he supposed himself to learn different perfections from different men. They concluded with delicate irony<sup>6</sup>:

"Johnson shall teach me how to place
In fairest light each borrow'd grace;
From him I'll learn to write,
Copy his clear familiar style,
And, by the roughness of his file,
Grow, like himself, polite."

I know not whether Johnson ever saw the poem, but I had occasion to find that, as Dr. Barnard and he knew each other better, their mutual regard increased.

Johnson told me that he was once much pleased to find that a carpenter, who lived near him, was very ready to show him some things in his business which he wished to see; "It was paying," said he, "respect to literature."

I asked him if he was not dissatisfied with having so small a share of wealth, and none of those distinctions in the state which are the objects of ambition. He had only a pension of three hundred a year. Why was he not in such circumstances as to keep his coach? Why had he not some considerable office? JOHNSON. "Sir, I have never complained of the world; nor do I think that I have reason to complain. It is rather to be wondered at that I have so much. My pension is more out of the usual course of things than any instance that I have known. Here, Sir, was a man avowedly no friend to government at the time, who got a pension without asking for it. I never courted the great; they sent for me; but I think they

<sup>1</sup> I recollect a ludicrous paragraph in the newspapers, that he king had pensioned both a He-bear and a She-bear. — BOSWELL. See anté, p. 193. — C.

<sup>2</sup> See anté, p. 325. n. 4. — C.

<sup>3</sup> He remembered it too, anté, p. 587. n. 3. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> Frederick, fifth Earl of Carlisle, born in 1748; died in 825. — CROKER.

<sup>5</sup> Men of rank and fortune, however, should be pretty well spared of having a real claim to the approbation of the public, as writers, before they venture to stand forth. Dryden, in his preface to "All for Love," thus expresses himself:—"Men of pleasant conversation (at least esteemed so) and nud with a trifling kind of fancy, perhaps helped out by a matter of Latin, are ambitious to distinguish themselves from the herd of gentlemen by their poetry:

'Rarus enim fermè sensus communis in illa
Fortuna.' — Juv. viii. 72.

[For in that fortune common sense is rare.]

and is not this a wretched affectation, not to be contented with what fortune has done for them, and sit down quietly with their estates, but they must call their wits in question, and needlessly expose their nakedness to public view? Not considering that they are not to expect the same approbation from sober men which they have found from their flatterers after the third bottle; if a little glittering in discourse has passed them on us for witty men, where was the necessity of undecieving the world? Would a man who has an ill title to an estate, but yet is in possession of it — would he bring it out of his own accord to be tried at Westminster? We who write, if we want the talents, yet have the excuse that we do it for a poor subsistence; but what can be urged in their defence, who, not having the vocation of poverty to scribble, out of mere wantonness take pains to make themselves ridiculous? Horace was certainly in the right where he said, 'That no man is satisfied with his own condition.' A poet is not pleased because he is not rich; and the rich are discontented because the poets will not admit them of their number.' — BOSWELL.

<sup>6</sup> See the whole poem, and some anecdotes connected with it, in Miss Reynolds's Recollections, Appendix. — CROKER.

now give me up. They are satisfied: they have seen enough of me." Upon my observing that I could not believe this, for they must certainly be highly pleased by his conversation; conscious of his own superiority, he answered, "No, Sir; great lords and great ladies don't love to have their mouths stopped." This was very expressive of the effect which the force of his understanding and brilliancy of his fancy could not but produce; and, to be sure, they must have found themselves strangely diminished in his company. When I warmly declared how happy I was at all times to hear him,—"Yes, Sir," said he; "but if you were lord chancellor it would not be so: you would then consider your own dignity."

There were much truth and knowledge of human nature in this remark. But certainly one should think that in whatever elevated state of life a man who knew the value of the conversation of Johnson might be placed, though he might prudently avoid a situation in which he might appear lessened by comparison, yet he would frequently gratify himself in private with the participation of the rich intellectual entertainment which Johnson could furnish. Strange, however, is it, to consider how few of the great sought his society<sup>1</sup>; so that if one were disposed to take occasion for satire on that account, very conspicuous objects present themselves. His noble friend, Lord Elibank, well observed, that if a great man procured an interview with Johnson, and did not wish to see him more, it showed a mere idle curiosity, and a wretched want of relish for extraordinary powers of mind. Mrs. Thrale justly and wittily accounted for such conduct by saying, that Johnson's conversation was by much too strong for a person accustomed to obsequiousness and flattery; it was mustard in a young child's mouth!

One day, when I told him that I was a zealous Tory, but not enough "according to knowledge," and should be obliged to him for "a reason," he was so candid, and expressed himself so well, that I begged of him to repeat what he had said, and I wrote down as follows:—

"Of Tory and Whig."

"A wise Tory and a wise Whig, I believe, will agree. Their principles are the same, though their modes of thinking are different. A high Tory makes government unintelligible; it is lost in the clouds. A violent Whig makes it impracticable: he is for allowing so much liberty to every man, that there is not power enough to govern any man. The prejudice of the Tory is for establishment, the prejudice of the Whig is for innovation. A Tory does not wish to give more real power to government; but that government should have more reverence. Then they differ as to the church. The Tory is not for giving more legal power to the clergy, but wishes they should have a considerable influence, founded on the opinion of mankind: the Whig is for limiting and watching them with a narrow jealousy."

JOHNSON TO PERKINS.

"June 2. 1781.

"SIR, — However often I have seen you, I have hitherto forgotten the note; but I have now sent it, with my good wishes for the prosperity of you and your partner<sup>2</sup>, of whom, from our short conversation, I could not judge otherwise than favourably. I am, Sir, your most humble servant,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

On Saturday, June 2., I set out for Scotland, and had promised to pay a visit, in my way, as I sometimes did, at Southill, in Bedfordshire, at the hospitable mansion of Squire Dilly, the elder brother of my worthy friends, the booksellers, in the Poultry. Dr. Johnson agreed to be of the party this year, with Mr. Charles Dilly and me, and to go and see Lord Bute's seat at Luton Hoe. He talked little to us in the carriage, being chiefly occupied in reading Dr. Watson's<sup>3</sup> second volume of "Chemical Essays," which he liked very well, and his own "Prince of Abyssinia," on which he seemed to be intensely fixed; having told us, that he had not looked at it since it was first finished. I happened to take it out of my pocket this day, and he seized upon it with avidity. He pointed out to me the following remarkable passage:—

"By what means (said the prince) are the Europeans thus powerful? or why, since they can so easily visit Asia and Africa for trade or conquest, cannot the Asiatics and Africans invade their coasts, plant colonies<sup>4</sup> in their ports, and give laws to their natural princes? The same wind that carried them back would bring us thither." "They are more powerful, Sir, than we (answered Imlac), because they are wiser. Knowledge will always predominate over ignorance, as man governs the other animals. But why their knowledge is more than ours, I know not what reason can be given but the unsearchable will of the Supreme Being."

He said, "This, Sir, no man can explain otherwise."

We stopped at Welwin, where I wished much to see, in company with Johnson, the residence of the author of "Night Thoughts," which was then possessed by his son, Mr. Young. Here some address was requisite, for I was not show the propriety of equalising the revenues of bishoprics. He has informed us that he has burnt all his chemical paper. The friends of our excellent constitution, now assailed on every side by innovators and levellers, would have less regretted the suppression of some of his lordship's other writings. — BOSWELL.

<sup>1</sup> See anté, p. 501. n. 3. — C.

<sup>2</sup> Mr. Barclay, a descendant of Robert Barclay, of Ury, the celebrated apologist of the people called Quakers, and remarkable for maintaining the principles of his venerable progenitor, with as much elegance of modern manners as is consistent with primitive simplicity. — BOSWELL. Died 1831.

<sup>3</sup> Now Bishop of Llandaff, one of the poorest bishoprics in this kingdom. His lordship has written with much zeal to

<sup>4</sup> The Phœnicians and Carthaginians did plant colonies in Europe. — KEARNEY.

acquainted with Mr. Young; and had I proposed to Dr. Johnson that we should send to him, he would have checked my wish, and perhaps been offended. I therefore concerted with Mr. Dilly, that I should steal away from Dr. Johnson and him, and try what reception I could procure from Mr. Young: if unfavourable, nothing was to be said; but if agreeable, I should return and notify it to them. I hastened to Mr. Young's, found he was at home, sent in word that a gentleman desired to wait upon him, and was shown into a parlour, where he and a young lady, his daughter, were sitting. He appeared to be a plain, civil, country gentleman; and when I begged pardon for presuming to trouble him, but that I wished much to see his place, if he would give me leave, he behaved very courteously, and answered, "By all means, Sir. We are just going to drink tea; will you sit down?" I thanked him, but said that Dr. Johnson had come with me from London, and I must return to the inn to drink tea with him: that my name was Boswell; I had travelled with him in the Hebrides. "Sir," said he, "I should think it a great honour to see Dr. Johnson here. Will you allow me to send for him?" Availing myself of this opening, I said that "I would go myself and bring him when he had drunk tea; he knew nothing of my calling here." Having been thus successful, I hastened back to the inn, and informed Dr. Johnson that Mr. Young, son of Dr. Young, the author of 'Night Thoughts,' whom I had just left, desired to have the honour of seeing him at the house where his father lived." Dr. Johnson luckily made no inquiry how this invitation had arisen, but agreed to go; and when we entered Mr. Young's parlour, he addressed him with a very polite bow, "Sir, I had a curiosity to come and see this place. I had the honour to know that great man your father." We went into the garden, where we found a gravel walk, on each side of which was a row of trees, planted by Dr. Young, which formed a handsome Gothic arch. Dr. Johnson called it a fine grove. I beheld it with reverence.

We sat some time in the summer-house, on the outside wall of which was inscribed, "Ambulantes in horto audiebant vocem Dei"; and in the reference to a brook by which it is situated, "Vivendi rectè qui prorogat horam,"<sup>2</sup> &c. I said to Mr. Young, that I had been told his father was cheerful. "Sir," said he, "he was too well bred a man not to be cheerful in company; but he was gloomy when alone. He never was cheerful after my mother's death, and he had met with many disappointments." Dr. Johnson observed to me afterwards, "That this was no favourable account of Dr. Young; for it is not becoming in a man to have so little acquiescence in the ways of Providence, as to be gloomy because he has not obtained as much preferment as he expected; nor to continue gloomy for the loss of his wife. Grief has its time." The last part of this censure was theoretically made. Practically, we know that grief for the loss of a wife may be continued very long, in proportion as affection has been sincere. No man knew this better than Dr. Johnson.

We went into the church, and looked at the monument erected by Mr. Young to his father. Mr. Young mentioned an anecdote, that his father had received several thousand pounds of subscription-money for his "Universal Passion," but had lost it in the South Sea.<sup>3</sup> Dr. Johnson thought this must be a mistake, for he had never seen a subscription-book.

Upon the road we talked of the uncertainty of profit with which authors and booksellers engage in the publication of literary works. JOHNSON. "My judgment I have found is no certain rule as to the sale of a book." BOSWELL. "Pray, Sir, have you been much plagued with authors sending you their works to revise?" JOHNSON. "No, Sir; I have been thought a sour surly fellow." BOSWELL. "Very lucky for you, Sir,—in that respect." I must however observe, that, notwithstanding what he now said, which he no doubt imagined at the time to be the fact, there was, perhaps, no man who more frequently yielded to the solicitations even of very obscure authors to read their manuscripts, or more liberally assisted them with advice and correction.

He found himself very happy at Squire Dilly's, where there is always abundance of excellent fare, and hearty welcome.

On Sunday, June 3., we all went to Southill church, which is very near to Mr. Dilly's house. It being the first Sunday in the month, the holy sacrament was administered, and I stayed to partake of it. When I came afterwards into Dr. Johnson's room, he said, "You did right to stay and receive the communion: I had not thought of it." This seemed to imply that he did not choose to approach the altar without a previous preparation, as to which good men entertain different opinions, some holding that it is irreverent to partake of that ordinance without considerable premeditation; others, that whoever is a sincere Christian, and in a proper frame of mind to discharge any other ritual duty of our religion, may, without scruple, discharge this most solemn one. A middle notion I believe to be the just one, which is, that communicants need not think a

<sup>1</sup> "Walking in the garden, they heard the voice of God." Genesis, iii. 8. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> — The man who has it in his power
To practise virtue, and protracts the hour,
Waits till the river pass away: but, lo!
Ceaseless it flows, and will for ever flow."

FRANCIS, Hor. Epist. lib. i. ep. 2. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> This assertion is disproved by a comparison of dates. The first four satires of Young were published in 1725. The South Sea scheme (which no doubt was meant) was in 1720. — MALONE.

long train of preparatory forms indispensably necessary; but neither should they rashly and lightly venture upon so awful and mysterious an institution. Christians must judge, each for himself, what degree of retirement and self-examination is necessary upon each occasion.

Being in a frame of mind which I hope, for the felicity of human nature, many experience, — in fine weather, — at the country-house of a friend, — consoled and elevated by pious exercises, — I expressed myself with an unrestrained fervour to my "Guide, Philosopher, and Friend." "My dear Sir, I would fain be a good man; and I am very good now. I fear God, and honour the king; I wish to do no ill, and to be benevolent to all mankind." He looked at me with a benignant indulgence; but took occasion to give me wise and salutary caution. "Do not, Sir, accustom yourself to trust to impressions. There is a middle state of mind between conviction and hypocrisy, of which many are unconscious. By trusting to impressions, a man may gradually come to yield to them, and at length be subject to them, so as not to be a free agent, or what is the same thing in effect, to suppose that he is not a free agent. A man who is in that state should not be suffered to live; if he declares he cannot help acting in a particular way, and is irresistibly impelled, there can be no confidence in him, no more than in a tiger. But, Sir, no man believes himself to be impelled irresistibly; we know that he who says he believes it, lies. Favourable impressions at particular moments, as to the state of our souls, may be deceitful and dangerous. In general, no man can be sure of his acceptance with God; some, indeed, may have had it revealed to them. St. Paul, who wrought miracles, may have had a miracle wrought on himself, and may have obtained supernatural assurance of pardon, and mercy, and beatitude; yet St. Paul, though he expresses strong hope, also expresses fear, lest having preached to others, he himself should be a castaway."

The opinion of a learned bishop of our acquaintance, as to there being merit in religious faith, being mentioned: — JOHNSON. "Why, yes, Sir, the most licentious man, were hell open before him, would not take the most beautiful trumpet to his arms. We must, as the apostle says, live by faith, not by sight.<sup>1</sup>

I talked to him of original sin, in consequence of the fall of man, and of the atonement made by our Saviour.* After some conversation, which he desired me to remember, he, at my request, dictated to me as follows:

"With respect to original sin, the inquiry is not necessary; for, whatever is the cause of human corruption, men are evidently and confessedly so corrupt, that all the laws of heaven and earth are insufficient to restrain them from crimes.

"Whatever difficulty there may be in the conception of vicarious punishments, it is an opinion which has had possession of mankind in all ages. There is no nation that has not used the practice of sacrifices. Whoever, therefore, denies the propriety of vicarious punishments, holds an opinion which the sentiments and practice of mankind have contradicted from the beginning of the world. The great sacrifice for the sins of mankind was offered at the death of the Messiah, who is called in Scripture 'The Lamb of God, that taketh away the sins of the world.' To judge of the reasonableness of the scheme of redemption, it must be considered as necessary to the government of the universe that God should make known his perpetual and irreconcilable detestation of moral evil. He might indeed punish, and punish only the offenders; but as the end of punishment is not revenge of crimes but propagation of virtue, it was more becoming the Divine clemency to find another manner of proceeding, less destructive to man, and at least equally powerful to promote goodness. The end of punishment is to reclaim and warn. That punishment will both reclaim and warn, which shows evidently such abhorrence of sin in God, as may deter us from it, or strike us with dread of vengeance when we have committed it. This is effected by vicarious punishment. Nothing could more testify the opposition between the nature of God and moral evil, or more amply display his justice, to men and angels, to all orders and successions of beings, than that it was necessary for the highest and purest nature, even for Divinity itself, to pacify the demands of vengeance by a painful death: of which the natural effect will be, that when justice is appeased, there is a proper place for the exercise of mercy; and that such propitiation shall supply, in some degree, the imperfections of our obedience and the inefficacy of our repentance: for obedience and repentance, such as we can perform, are still necessary. Our Saviour has told us, that he did not come to destroy the law, but to fulfil: to fulfil the typical law, by the performance of what those types had foreshown; and the moral law, by precepts of greater purity and higher exaltation."

Here he said, "God bless you with it." ]

<sup>1</sup> There seems much obscurity here. If the bishop used the word merit in a popular sense, and meant only to say, colloquially, that "a religious faith was meritorious or praiseworthy," the observation was hardly worth recording; yet it is not, on the other hand, likely that he meant, speaking theologially, to attribute merit towards salvation to any act or operation of the human mind, "for that were" (as the Homily forbids) "to count ourselves to be justified by some act or virtue which is within us." But on either interpretation it seems hard to discover the connexion or meaning of the reply attributed to Dr. Johnson. The bishop's opinion is evidently very imperfectly stated, and there must have been some connecting links in the chain of Johnson's reasoning which Mr. Boswell has lost. The passage — not quite accurately quoted by Dr. Johnson — is in St. Paul's second epistle to the Corinthians, v. 7: "We walk by faith, and not by sight." — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> Dr. Orden, in his second sermon "On the Articles of the Christian Faith," with admirable acuteness thus addresses the opposers of that doctrine, which accounts for the confusion, sin, and misery which we find in this life: "It would be severe in God, you think, to degrade us to such a sad state as this, for the offence of our first parents; but you can allow him to place us in it without any inducement. Are our calamities lessened by not being ascribed to Adam? If your condition be unhappy, is it not still unhappy, whatever was the occasion? with the aggravation of this reflection, that it was as good as it was at first designed, there seems to be somewhat the less reason to look for its amendment." — BOSWELL.

acknowledged myself much obliged to him; but I begged that he would go on as to the propitiation being the chief object of our most holy faith. He then dictated this one other paragraph.

"The peculiar doctrine of Christianity is, that of an universal sacrifice and perpetual propitiation.<sup>1</sup> Other prophets only proclaimed the will and the threatenings of God. Christ satisfied his justice."

The Reverend Mr. Palmer<sup>2</sup>, fellow of Queen's College, Cambridge, dined with us. He expressed a wish that a better provision were made for parish-clerks. JOHNSON, "Yes, Sir, a parish-clerk should be a man who is able to make a will or write a letter for any body in the parish."

I mentioned Lord Monboddo's notion<sup>3</sup> that the ancient Egyptians, with all their learning and all their arts, were not only black, but woolly-haired. Mr. Palmer asked how did it appear upon examining the mummies? Dr. Johnson approved of this test.<sup>4</sup>

Although upon most occasions I never heard a more strenuous advocate for the advantages of wealth than Dr. Johnson, he this day, I know not from what caprice, took the other side. "I have not observed," said he, "that men of very large fortunes enjoy any thing extraordinary that makes happiness. What has the Duke of Bedford? What has the Duke of Devonshire? The only great instance that I have ever known of the enjoyment of wealth was that of Jamaica Dawkins, who going to visit Palmyra, and hearing that the way was infested by robbers, hired a troop of Turkish horse to guard him."<sup>5</sup>

Dr. Gibbons<sup>6</sup>, the dissenting minister, being mentioned, he said, "I took to Dr. Gibbons." And addressing himself to Mr. Charles Dilly, added, "I shall be glad to see him. Tell him, if he'll call on me, and dawdle over a dish of tea in an afternoon, I shall take it kind."

The Reverend Mr. Smith, vicar of Southill, a very respectable man, with a very agreeable family, sent an invitation to us to drink tea. I remarked Dr. Johnson's very respectful politeness. Though always fond of changing the scene, he said, "We must have Mr. Dilly's leave. We cannot go from your house, Sir, without your permission." We all went, and were well satisfied with our visit. I, however, remember nothing particular, except a nice distinction which Dr. Johnson made with respect to the power of memory, maintaining that forgetfulness was a man's own fault. "To remember and to recollect," said he, "are different things. A man has not the power to recollect what is not in his mind, but when a thing is in his mind he may remember it."<sup>7</sup>

The remark was occasioned by my leaning back on a chair, which a little before I had perceived to be broken, and pleading forgetfulness as an excuse. "Sir," said he, "its being broken was certainly in your mind."

When I observed that a housebreaker was in general very timorous;—JOHNSON, "No wonder, Sir; he is afraid of being shot getting into a house, or hanged when he has got out of it."

He told us, that he had in one day written six sheets of a translation from the French; adding, "I should be glad to see it now. I wish that I had copies of all the pamphlets written against me, as it is said Pope had. Had I known that I should make so much noise in the world, I should have been at pains to collect them. I believe there is hardly a day in which there is not something about me in the newspapers."

On Monday, June 4, we all went to Luton-Hoe, to see Lord Bute's magnificent seat, for which I had obtained a ticket. As we entered the park, I talked in a high style of my old friendship with Lord Mountstuart, and said, "I shall probably be much at this place." The sage, aware of human vicissitudes, gently checked me: "Don't you be too sure of that."<sup>8</sup> He made two or three peculiar observations;

<sup>1</sup> See antè, p. 292. This passage proves the justice of that observation as to Johnson's opinion on this important point. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> This unfortunate person, whose full name was Thomas Fische Palmer, afterwards went to Dundee, in Scotland, where he officiated as minister to a congregation of the sect who call themselves Unitarians, from a notion that they distinctively worship one God, because they deny the mysterious doctrine of the Trinity. They do not advert that the great body of the Christian church in maintaining that mystery maintain also the unity of the Godhead: "the Trinity in Unity—three persons and one God." The church humbly adores the Divinity as exhibited in the holy Scriptures. The Unitarian sect vainly presumes to comprehend and define the Almighty. Mr. Palmer, having heated his mind with political speculations, became so much dissatisfied with our excellent constitution as to compose, publish, and circulate writings, which were found to be so seditious and dangerous, that upon being found guilty by a jury, the court of justiciary in Scotland sentenced him to transportation for fourteen years. A loud clamour against this sentence was made by some members of both houses of parliament; but both houses approved of it by a great majority, and he was conveyed to the settlement for convicts in New South Wales. — BOSWELL. Mr. T. F. Palmer was of Queen's College in Cambridge, where he took the degree of master of arts in 1772, and that of S. T. B. in 1781. He died on his return from Botany Bay in 1803. — MALONE.

<sup>3</sup> Taken from Herodotus. — BOSWELL.

<sup>4</sup> It appears from every kind of evidence, that the Egyptians had long hair, and sharp and handsome features. At all events, they were not negroes. — CROKER, 1835.

<sup>5</sup> Henry Dawkins, Esq., the companion of Wood and Bouverie in their travels, and the patron of the Athenian Stuart. — CROKER.

<sup>6</sup> Thomas Gibbons, "a Calvinist" (says the Biog. Dicit.) "of the old stamp, and a man of great piety and primitive manners." He wrote a life of Dr. Watts, and assisted Dr. Johnson with some materials for the Life of Watts in the English Poets. He died in 1785, ætat. sixty-five. — CROKER.

<sup>7</sup> Mr. Boswell's note was, I suspect, imperfect. A thing to be either remembered or recollected must equally have been in the mind. In his Dictionary, Johnson defines "Remember—to bear in mind, to recollect, to call to mind." This would seem to imply that he considered the words as nearly synonymous; but in his definition of "Recollect—to recover memory, to gather what is scattered," he makes the true distinction. When the words are to be contradistinguished, it may be said that remembrance is spontaneous, and recollection an effort; and this, I think, is what Johnson meant. — CROKER.

<sup>8</sup> See antè, p. 478, n. 5.

"Dulcis inexpertis cultura potentis amici, Expertus metuit."—Hor. l. Epist. xviii. 86.

The inexperienced love to court the great; Experience dreads it." — CROKER.

as, when shown the botanical garden, "Is not every garden a botanical garden?" When told that there was a shrubbery to the extent of several miles; — "That is making a very foolish use of the ground; a little of it is very well." When it was proposed that we should walk on the pleasure-ground; "Don't let us fatigue ourselves. Why should we walk there? Here's a fine tree, let's get to the top of it." But upon the whole, he was very much pleased. He said, "This is one of the places I do not regret having come to see. It is a very stately place, indeed; in the house, magnificence is not sacrificed to convenience, nor convenience to magnificence. The library is very splendid; the dignity of the rooms is very great; and the quantity of pictures is beyond expectation, beyond hope."

It happened without any previous concert that we visited the seat of Lord Bute upon the king's birthday; we dined and drank his majesty's health at an inn in the village of Luton.

In the evening I put him in mind of his promise to favour me with a copy of his celebrated Letter to the Earl of Chesterfield<sup>1</sup>, and he was at last pleased to comply with this earnest request, by dictating it to me from his memory; for he believed that he himself had no copy. There was an animated glow in his countenance while he thus recalled his high-minded indignation.

He laughed heartily at a ludicrous action in the court of session, in which I was counsel. The society of procurators, or attorneys, entitled to practise in the inferior courts at Edinburgh, had obtained a royal charter, in which they had taken care to have their ancient designation of Procurators changed into that of Solicitors, from a notion, as they supposed, that it was more genteel; and this new title they displayed by a public advertisement for a general meeting at their hall.

It has been said that the Scottish nation is not distinguished for humour; and, indeed, what happened on this occasion may, in some degree, justify the remark; for although this society had contrived to make themselves a very prominent object for the ridicule of such as might stoop to it, the only joke to which it gave rise was the following paragraph, sent to the newspaper called "The Caledonian Mercury."

"A correspondent informs us, the Worshipful Society of Challeans, Cadies, or Running-Stationers of this city are resolved, in imitation, and encouraged by the singular success of their brethren, of an equally respectable Society, to apply for a Charter of their Privileges, particularly of the sole privilege of PROCURING, in the most extensive sense of the word, exclusive of chairmen, porters, penny-post men, and other inferior ranks; their brethren, the R—Y—L. S—L—RS, alias P—C—RS<sup>2</sup>, before the INFERIOR Courts of this City, always excepted.

"Should the Worshipful Society be successful, they are further resolved not to be puffed up thereby, but to demean themselves with more equanimity and decency than their r-y-l, learned, and very modest brethren above mentioned have done, upon their late dignification and exaltation."

A majority of the members of the society prosecuted Mr. Robertson, the publisher of the paper, for damages; and the first judgment of the whole court very wisely dismissed the action: Solventur risu tabula, tu missus abibis. But a new trial or review was granted upon a petition, according to the forms in Scotland. This petition I was engaged to answer, and Dr. Johnson, with great alacrity, furnished me this evening with what follows. [See Appendix.]

I am ashamed to mention, that the court, by a plurality of voices, without having a single additional circumstance before them, reversed their own judgment, made a serious matter of this dull and foolish joke, and adjudged Mr. Robertson to pay to the society five pounds (sterling money) and costs of suit. The decision will seem strange to English lawyers.

On Tuesday, June 5., Johnson was to return to London. He was very pleasant at breakfast: I mentioned a friend of mine having resolved never to marry a pretty woman. JOHNSON. "Sir, it is a very foolish resolution to resolve not to marry a pretty woman. Beauty is of itself very estimable. No, Sir, I would prefer a pretty woman, unless there are objections to her. A pretty woman may be foolish; a pretty woman may be wicked; a pretty woman may not like me. But there is no such danger in marrying a pretty woman as is apprehended; she will not be persecuted if she does not invite persecution. A pretty woman, if she has a mind to be wicked, can find a readier way than another; and that is all."

I accompanied him in Mr. Dilly's chaise to Shefford, where, talking of Lord Bute's never going to Scotland, he said, "As an Englishman, I should wish all the Scotch gentlemen should be educated in England; Scotland would become a province; they would spend all their rents in England."<sup>3</sup> This is a subject of much consequence, and much delicacy. The advantage of an English education is unquestionably very great to Scotch gentlemen of talents and ambition; and regular visits to Scotland, and perhaps other means, might be

<sup>1</sup> See antè, p. 85. — C.

<sup>2</sup> Royal Solicitors, alias Procurators. — C.

<sup>3</sup> It may seem unlikely that Boswell should have garbled Johnson's statements, yet, recollecting that Boswell was now about to become an absentee, and knowing that he occasionally twisted Johnson's expressions in favour of his own views, I cannot but suspect, both from Johnson's good sense and former opinions, antè, pp. 312, 578., as well as from the context, that to what he said "as an Englishman" he must have added, "but if a Scotchman, I should be of a different opinion." — CROKER, 1847.

effectually used to prevent them from being totally estranged from their native country, any more than a Cumberland or Northumberland gentleman, who has been educated in the south of England. I own, indeed, that it is no small misfortune for Scotch gentlemen, who have neither talents nor ambition, to be educated in England, where they may be perhaps distinguished only by a nickname, lavish their fortune in giving expensive entertainments to those who laugh at them, and saunter about as mere idle, insignificant hangers-on even upon the foolish great; when, if they had been judiciously brought up at home, they might have been comfortable and creditable members of society.

At Shefford I had another affectionate parting from my revered friend, who was taken up by the Bedford coach and carried to the metropolis. I went with Messieurs Dilly to see some friends at Bedford; dined with the officers of the militia of the county, and next day proceeded on my journey.

JOHNSON TO LANGTON.

" Bolt Court, June 16. 1781.

" DEAR SIR, — How welcome your account of yourself and your invitation to your new house was to me, I need not tell you, who consider our friendship not only as formed by choice, but as matured by time. We have been now long enough acquainted to have many images in common, and therefore to have a source of conversation which neither the learning nor the wit of a new companion can supply.

" My 'Lives' are now published; and if you will tell me whither I shall send them, that they may come to you, I will take care that you shall not be without them.

" You will perhaps be glad to hear that Mrs. Thrale is disencumbered of her brewhouse: and that it seemed to the purchaser so far from an evil, that he was content to give for it an hundred and thirty-five thousand pounds. Is the nation ruined?

" Please to make my respectful compliments to Lady Ilothes, and keep me in the memory of all the little dear family, particularly Mrs. Jane. I am, Sir, your, &c.,
SAM. JOHNSON."

Johnson's charity to the poor was uniform and extensive, both from inclination and principle. He not only bestowed liberally out of his own purse, but what is more difficult as well as rare, would beg from others, when he had proper objects in view. This he did judiciously as well as humanely. Mr. Philip Metcalfe tells me, that when he has asked him for some money for persons in distress, and Mr. Metcalfe has offered what Johnson thought too much, he insisted on taking less, saying, "No, no, Sir; we must not pamper them."

I am indebted to Mr. Malone, one of Sir Joshua Reynolds's executors, for the following note, which was found among his papers after his death, and which, we may presume, his unaffected modesty prevented him from communicating to me with the other letters from Dr. Johnson with which he was pleased to furnish me. However slight in itself, as it does honour to that illustrious painter and most amiable man, I am happy to introduce it.

JOHNSON TO REYNOLDS.

" June 23. 1781.

" DEAR SIR, — It was not before yesterday that I received your splendid benefaction. To a hand so liberal in distributing, I hope nobody will envy the power of acquiring. I am, dear Sir, your, &c.,
" SAM. JOHNSON."

The following letters were written at this time by Johnson to Miss Reynolds; the latter, on receiving from her a copy of her "Essay on Taste," privately printed, but never published.

[JOHNSON TO MISS REYNOLDS.

" 25th June, 1781.

" DEAR MADAM, — You may give the book<sup>1</sup> to Mrs. Horneck [p. 140.], and I will give you another for yourself.

" I am afraid there is no hope of Mrs. Thrale's custom for your pictures; but, if you please, I will mention it. She cannot make a pension out of her jointure.<sup>2</sup>

" I will bring the papers myself. I am, Madam, your most humble servant,
SAM. JOHNSON."
— Reynolds MSS.]

JOHNSON TO MISS REYNOLDS.<sup>3</sup>

" Bolt Court, July 21. 1781.

" DEAREST MADAM, — There is in these [papers?] such force of comprehension, such nicety of observation, as Locke or Pascal might be proud of. This I say with an intention to have you think I speak my opinion. They cannot, however, be printed in their present state. Many of your notions seem not very clear in your own mind; many are not sufficiently developed and expanded for the common reader: the expression almost every where

JOHNSON TO MISS REYNOLDS.

" Bolt Court, June 28. 1781.

" DEAREST MADAM, — There is in these [pages or remarks] such depth of penetration, such nicety of observation, as Locke or Pascal might be proud of. This I desire you to believe is my real opinion. However, it cannot be published in its present state. Many of your notions seem not to be very clear in your own mind; many are not sufficiently developed and expanded for the common reader: it wants every where to be made smoother and plainer. You may, by revision and correction, make it a very elegant and a very curious work. I am, my dearest dear, your, &c., SAM. JOHNSON."
— Malone.

<sup>1</sup> Probably the Beauties of Johnson, published about this time: see anté, p. 67. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> Miss Reynolds, it seems, wished to dispose of her collection, and thought that Mrs. Thrale might purchase and pay for it by an annuity. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> I print this hyperbolical eulogy from the original in the Reynolds Papers, but Mr. Malone, who first produced it, gives it with variations so great in the expressions, and so small in the meaning, that I preserve it as a curious instance of falsification, without, as far as I can see, any object.

wants to be made clearer and smoother. You may, by revision and improvement, make it a very elegant work. I am, my dearest dear, your most humble servant,

SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHNSON TO ASTLE.<sup>1</sup>

"July 17. 1781.

"SIR, — I am ashamed that you have been forced to call so often for your books, but it has been by no fault on either side. They have never been out of my hands, nor have I ever been at home without seeing you; for to see a man so skilful in the antiquities of my country is an opportunity of improvement not willingly to be missed.

"Your notes on Alfred appear to me very judicious and accurate, but they are too few. Many things familiar to you are unknown to me, and to most others; and you must not think too favourably of your readers: by supposing them knowing, you will leave them ignorant. Measure of land, and value of money, it is of great importance to state with care. Had the Saxons any gold coin?

"I have much curiosity after the manners and transactions of the middle ages, but have wanted either diligence or opportunity, or both. You, Sir, have great opportunities, and I wish you both diligence and success. I am, Sir, &c.,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

The following curious anecdote I insert in Dr. Burney's own words:

"Dr. Burney related to Dr. Johnson the partiality which his writings had excited in a friend of Dr. Burney's, the late Mr. Bewley<sup>2</sup>, well known in Norfolk by the name of the Philosopher of Musingham; who, from the Ramblers and plan of his Dictionary, and long before the author's fame was established by the Dictionary itself, or any other work, had conceived such a reverence for him, that he earnestly begged Dr. Burney to give him the cover of the first letter he had received from him, as a relic of so estimable a writer. This was in 1755. In 1760, when Dr. Burney visited Dr. Johnson at the Temple, in London, where he had then chambers, he happened to arrive there before he was up; and being shown into the room where he was to breakfast, finding himself alone, he examined the contents of the apartment, to try whether he could, undiscovered, steal any thing to send to his friend Bewley, as another relic of the admirable Dr. Johnson. But finding nothing better to his purpose, he sent some bristles off his hearth-broom, and enclosed them in a letter to his country enthusiast, who received them with due reverence. The Doctor was so sensible of the honour done to him by a man of genius and science, to whom he was an utter stranger, that he said to Dr. Burney, 'Sir, there is no man possessed of the smallest portion of modesty, but must be flattered with the admiration of such a man. I'll give him a set of my Lives, if he will do me the honour to accept of them.' In this he kept his word; and Dr. Burney had not only the pleasure of gratifying his friend with a present more worthy of his acceptance than the segment from the hearth-broom, but soon after introducing him to Dr. Johnson himself in Bolt Court, with whom he had the satisfaction of conversing a considerable time, not a fortnight before his death; which happened in St. Martin's Street, during his visit to Dr. Burney, in the house [No. 36.] where the great Sir Isaac Newton had lived and died before."

In one of his little memorandum-books is the following minute:

"August 9., 3 P.M., atq. 72, in the summer-house at Streatham. After innumerable resolutions formed and neglected, I have retired hither, to plan a life of greater diligence, in hope that I may yet be useful, and be daily better prepared to appear before my Creator and my Judge, from whose infinite mercy I humbly call for assistance and support. My purpose is, — To pass eight hours every day in some serious employment. Having prayed, I purpose to employ the next six weeks upon the Italian language for my settled study."

How venerably pious does he appear in these moments of solitude! and how spirited are his resolutions for the improvement of his mind, even in elegant literature, at a very advanced period of life, and when afflicted with many complaints!

In autumn he went to Oxford, Birmingham, Lichfield, and Ashbourne, for which very good reasons might be given in the conjectural yet positive manner of writers, who are proud to account for every event which they relate.<sup>3</sup> He himself, however, says, "The motives of my journey I hardly know: I omitted it last year, and am not willing to miss it again." (Pr. and Med., p. 198.) But some good considerations arise, amongst which is the kindly recollection of Mr. Hector, surgeon, of Birmingham. "Hector is likewise an old friend, the only companion of my childhood that passed through the school with me. We have always loved one another; perhaps we may be made better by some serious conversation; of which, however, I have no distinct hope."

He says, too, "At Lichfield, my native place, I hope to show a good example by frequent attendance on public worship."

<sup>1</sup> [Ante, p. 46. n. 8. — C.] The will of King Alfred, alluded to in this letter, from the original Saxon, in the library of Mr. Astle, has been printed at the expense of the University of Oxford. — BOSWELL.

<sup>2</sup> Mr. William Bewley was a Monthly Reviewer, and died in the house of Dr. Burney, in 1783. If this anecdote were seriously true, Mr. Bewley might have been better called an idiot than an enthusiast. That he should have really received the bristles with reverence — that Burney should not have mentioned the fact to Johnson for twenty-five years, and that Johnson should have considered it as an honour, would be very strange. Nor does the story acquire much confirmation from Madam D'Arbly's addition, that it happened in Bolt Court, where Johnson did not live till seventeen years after the assigned date. I conclude the affair must have been a mere pleasantry. — CROKER, 1831-47.

<sup>3</sup> This observation, just enough in general, is ill-placed here; for this had been, as we have seen, an almost annual excursion, and, besides the additional motives for the journey mentioned in the text, it appears that Mrs. Thrale's kindness had forced him to undertake this little tour for the benefit of his health and spirits. Did Boswell wish to conceal Mrs. Thrale's attention? — CROKER.

JOHNSON TO DR. PATTEN.

"Sept. 24. 1781.

"DEAR SIR, — It is so long since we passed any time together, that you may be allowed to have forgotten some part of my character; and I know not upon what other supposition I can pass without censure or complaint the ceremony of your address. Let me not trifle time in words, to which while we speak or write them we assign little meaning. Whenever you favour me with a letter, treat me as one that is glad of your kindness and proud of your esteem.

"The papers which have been sent for my perusal I am ready to inspect, if you judge my inspection necessary or useful; but indeed, I do not; for what advantage can arise from it? A dictionary consists of independent parts, and therefore one page is not much a specimen of the rest. It does not occur to me that I can give any assistance to the author, and for my own interest I resign it into your hands, and do not suppose that I shall ever see my name with regret where you shall think it proper to be put.

"I think it, however, my duty to inform a writer who intends me so great an honour, that in my opinion he would have consulted his interest by dedicating his work to some powerful and popular neighbour, who can give him more than a name. What will the world do but look on and laugh when one scholar dedicates to another?

"If I had been consulted about this Lexicon of Antiquities while it was yet only a design, I should have recommended rather a division of Hebrew, Greek, and Roman particulars into three volumes, than a combination in one. The Hebrew part, at least, I would have wished to separate, as it might be a very popular book, of which the use might be extended from men of learning down to the English reader, and which might become a concomitant to the Family Bible.

"When works of a multifarious and extensive kind are undertaken in the country, the necessary books are not always known. I remember a very learned and ingenious clergyman<sup>1</sup>, of whom, when he had published notes upon the Psalms, I inquired what was his opinion of Hammond's Commentary, and was answered, that he had never heard of it. As this gentleman has the opportunity of consulting you, it needs not to be supposed that he has not heard of all the proper books; but unless he is near some library, I know not how he could peruse them; and if he is conscious that his supellex is nimis angusta, it would be prudent to delay his publication till his deficiencies may be supplied.

"It seems not very candid to hint any suspicions of imperfection in a work which I have not seen, yet what I have said ought to be excused, since I cannot but wish well to a learned man, who has elected me for the honour of a dedication, and to whom I am indebted for a correspondence so valuable as yours. And I beg that I may not lose any part of his kindness, which I consider with respectful gratitude. Of you, dear Sir, I entreat that you will never again forget for so long a time your most humble servant,

SAM. JOHNSON.<sup>2</sup>
— Gent. Mag.

JOHNSON TO MRS. THRALE.

(Extracts.)

"Oxford, October 17. 1781. — On Monday evening arrived at the Angel inn at Oxford, Mr. Johnson and Mr. Barber, without any sinister accident.

"I am here; but why am I here? on my way to Lichfield, where I believe Mrs. Aston will be glad to see me. We have known each other long, and, by consequence, are both old; and she is paralytic; and if I do not see her soon, I may see her no more in this world. To make a visit on such considerations is to go on a melancholy errand. But such is the course of life.

"Lichfield, October 20. 1781. — I wrote from Oxford, where I staid two days. On Thursday I went to Birmingham, and was told by Hector that I should not be well so soon as I expected; but that well I should be. Mrs. Careless took me under her care, and told me when I had tea enough. On Friday I came hither, and have escaped the post-chaises<sup>3</sup> all the way. Every body here is as kind as I expected; I think Lucy is kinder than ever."

"Ashbourne, November 10. 1781. — Yesterday I came to Ashbourne, and last night I had very little rest. Dr. Taylor lives on milk, and grows every day better, and is not wholly without hope.

"Lichfield, December 3. 1781. — I am now come back to Lichfield, where I do not intend to stay long enough to receive another letter. I have little to do here but to take leave of Mrs. Aston. I hope not the last leave. But Christians may with more confidence than Sophonisba

Avremo tosto lungo lungo spazio

Per stare assieme, et sarà forse eterno.<sup>4</sup>

— Letters.

Trissino."

JOHNSON TO ALLEN<sup>5</sup>,

Bolt Court.

"Ashbourne, November 26. 1781.

"DEAR SIR, — I am weary enough of the country to think of Bolt Court, and purpose to leave Ashbourne, where I now am, in a day or two, and to make my way through Lichfield, Birmingham, and Oxford, with what expedition I decently can, and then we will have a row and a dinner, and now and then a dish of tea together.

<sup>3</sup> He means escaped the expense of post-chaises by happening to find places in stage-coaches. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> We soon shall find, in mutual converse blest,
A long, perhaps eternal, space of rest. — C.

<sup>5</sup> Communicated to me by Mr. P. Cunningham; who found also in a pocket-book of Allen's, memoranda of Johnson's departure and return. "October 15. 1781, Dr. Johnson set out about 9 A.M. to Oxford, Lichfield, and Ashbourne." "December 11. 1781, Dr. Johnson returned from Derbyshire." — CROKER.

<sup>1</sup> See anté, p. 679., an allusion to Mr. Mudge's notes on the Psalms, whence Mr. Chalmers very justly concludes that he is the person meant. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> Dr. Thomas Patten had been a Fellow of Corpus Christi College, A. M. 1736, D. D. 1754. He was afterwards Rector of Childry, Berks, where he died in 1790. The letter in the text relates to Mr. Wilson's Archæological Dictionary, which was ultimately dedicated to Johnson. See post, 31 Dec. 1782. — CROKER. Jones, of Nayland, describes Patten as one of Bishop Horne's "excellent friends" in early life — "a man of the purest manners and unquestionable erudition." — MARKLAND.

I doubt not but you have been so kind as to send the oysters to Lichfield, and I now beg that you will let Mrs. Desmoulins have a guinea on my account.

My health has been but indifferent, much of the time I have been out, and my journey has not supplied much entertainment.

"I shall be at Lichfield, I suppose, long enough to receive a letter, and I desire Mrs. Desmoulins to write immediately what she knows. I wish to be told about Frank's wife and child.<sup>1</sup> I am, dear Sir, your most humble servant,
— MS. "SAM. JOHNSON."]

My correspondence with him during the rest of this year was, I know not why, very scanty, and all on my side. I wrote him one letter to introduce Mr. Sinclair (now Sir John), the member for Caithness<sup>2</sup>, to his acquaintance; and informed him in another that my wife had again been affected with alarming symptoms of illness.

CHAPTER LXXIV.

1782.

Death of Robert Levett. — Verses to his Memory. — Chatterton. — Dr. Lawrence. — Death of Friendship. — "Beauties" and "Deformities" of Johnson. — Misery of being in Debt. — Six Rules for Travellers. — Death of Lord Auchinleck. — "Kindness and Fondness." — Life. — Old Age. — Evils of Poverty. — Prayer on leaving Stratham. — Visit to Cowdrey. — Nichols's "Anecdotes." — Wilson's "Archæological Dictionary." — Dr. Patten.

In 1782 his complaints increased, and the history of his life this year is little more than a mournful recital of the variations of his illness, in the midst of which, however, it will appear from his letters, that the powers of his mind were in no degree impaired.

JOHNSON TO BOSWELL.

"Jan. 5. 1782.

"DEAR SIR, — I sit down to answer your letter on the same day in which I received it, and am pleased that my first letter of the year is to you. No man ought to be at ease while he knows himself in the wrong; and I have not satisfied myself with my long silence. The letter relating to Mr. Sinclair, however, was, I believe, never brought.

"My health has been tottering this last year; and I can give no very laudable account of my time. I am always hoping to do better than I have ever hitherto done. My journey to Ashbourne and Staffordshire was not pleasant; for what enjoyment has a sick man visiting the sick? Shall we ever have another frolic like our journey to the Hebrides?

"I hope that dear Mrs. Boswell will surmount her complaints: in losing her you will lose your anchor, and be tossed, without stability, by the waves of life.<sup>3</sup> I wish both you and her very many years, and very happy.

"For some months past I have been so withdrawn from the world, that I can send you nothing particular. All your friends, however, are well, and will be glad of your return to London. I am, dear Sir, &c.,
SAM. JOHNSON."

At a time when he was less able than he had once been to sustain a shock, he was suddenly deprived of Mr. Levett; which event he thus communicated to Dr. Lawrence.

JOHNSON TO LAWRENCE.

"Jan. 17. 1782.

"SIR, — Our old friend, Mr. Levett, who was last night eminently cheerful, died this morning. The man who lay in the same room, hearing an uncommon noise, got up and tried to make him speak, but without effect. He then called Mr. Holder, the apothecary, who, though when he came he thought him dead, opened a vein, but could draw no blood. So has ended the long life of a very useful and very blameless man. I am, Sir, your most humble servant,
SAM. JOHNSON."

In one of his memorandum-books in my possession is the following entry:

"January 20., Sunday, Robert Levett was buried in the churchyard of Bridewell, between one and two in the afternoon. He died on Thursday, 17., about seven in the morning, by an instantaneous death. He was an old and faithful friend: I have known him from about 1746. Commendavi. May God have mercy on him! May he have mercy on me!"

Such was Johnson's affectionate regard for Levett<sup>4</sup>, that he honoured his memory with the following pathetic verses:

"Condemn'd to Hope's delusive mine,
As on we toil from day to day,
By sudden blast or slow decline
Our social comforts drop away.

"Well try'd through many a varying year,
See Levett to the grave descend;
Officious, innocent, sincere,
Of every friendless name the friend.

"Yet still he fills affection's eye,
Obscurely wise and coarsely kind;
Nor, letter'd arrogance, deny
Thy praise to merit unrefined.

"When fainting Nature call'd for aid,
And hovering death prepared the blow,
His vigorous remedy display'd
The power of art without the show.

<sup>1</sup> Barber was with him on this journey: the whole letter exhibits minutiae of Johnson's charity and good nature towards his humble friends. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> The Right Hon. Sir John Sinclair of Ulbster, Bart.; a voluminous writer on agriculture and statistics. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> The truth of this has been proved by sad experience. — BOSWELL. Mrs. Boswell died June 4. 1789. — MALONE.

<sup>4</sup> See an account of him, antè, p. 78. n. 7. — C.

"In misery's darkest caverns known,
His ready help was ever nigh,
Where hopeless anguish pour'd his groan,
And lonely want retired to die.<sup>1</sup>

"No summons mock'd by chill delay,
No petty gains disclaim'd by pride:
The modest wants of every day
The toil of every day supply'd.

"His virtues walk'd their narrow round,
Nor made a pause, nor left a void;
And sure the eternal Master found
His single talent<sup>2</sup> well employ'd.

"The busy day, the peaceful night<sup>3</sup>,
Unfelt, uncounted, glided by;
His frame was firm, his powers were bright,
Though now his eightieth year was nigh.

"Then, with no throbs of fiery pain,
No cold gradations of decay,
Death broke at once the vital chain,
And freed his soul the nearest way."

[JOHNSON TO MR. BEATNIFFE,

Recorder of Hull.

"Bolt Court, Fleet Street, February 14. 1782.

SIR, — Robert Levett, with whom I have been connected by a friendship of many years, died lately at my house. His death was sudden, and no will has yet been found; I therefore gave notice of his death in the papers, that an heir, if he has any, may appear. He has left very little; but of that little his brother is doubtless heir, and your friend may be perhaps his brother. I have had another application from one who calls himself his brother; and I suppose it is fit that the claimant should give some proofs of his relation. I would gladly know, from the gentleman that thinks himself R. Levett's brother,

"In what year, and in what parish, R. Levett was born?

"Where or how was he educated?

"What was his early course of life?

"What were the marks of his person; his stature; the colour of his eyes?

"Was he marked by the small-pox?

"Had he any impediment in his speech?

"What relations had he, and how many are now living?

"His answer to these questions will show whether he knew him; and he may then proceed to show that he is his brother.

"He may be sure, that nothing shall be hastily wasted or removed. I have not looked into his boxes, but transferred that business to a gentleman in the neighbourhood, of character above suspicion.<sup>4</sup> SAM. JOHNSON."

— Harwood MSS.

JOHNSON TO MRS. STRAIAN.

"Feb. 4. 1782.

"DEAR MADAM, — Mrs. Williams showed me your kind letter. This little habitation is now but a melancholy place, clouded with the gloom of disease and death. Of the four inmates, one has been suddenly snatched away; two are oppressed by very afflictive and dangerous illness; and I tried yesterday to gain some relief by a third bleeding from a disorder which has for some time distressed me, and I think myself to-day much better.

"I am glad, dear Madam, to hear that you are so far recovered as to go to Bath. Let me once more entreat you to stay till your health is not only obtained, but confirmed. Your fortune is such as that no moderate expense deserves your care; and you have a husband who, I believe, does not regard it. Stay, therefore, till you are quite well. I am, for my part, very much deserted; but complaint is useless. I hope God will bless you, and I desire you to form the same wish for me. I am, dear Madam, &c., SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHNSON TO MALONE.

"Feb. 27. 1782.

"SIR, — I have for many weeks been so much out of order, that I have gone out only in a coach to Mrs. Thrale's, where I can use all the freedom that sickness requires. Do not, therefore, take it amiss, that I am not with you and Dr. Farmer. I hope hereafter to see you often. I am, Sir, &c.,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHNSON TO MALONE.

"March 2. 1782.

"DEAR SIR, — I hope I grow better, and shall soon be able to enjoy the kindness of my friends. I think this wild adherence to Chatterton<sup>5</sup> more unaccountable than the obstinate defence of Ossian. In Ossian there is a national pride, which may be <sup>1</sup> Johnson repeated this line to me thus:

"And labour steals an hour to die."

But he afterwards altered it to the present reading. — BOSWELL.

<sup>2</sup> Allusion to the parable, Matthew xxv. 15. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> Johnson, who used to disparage Gray so much, found some of his happy expressions lingering in his memory. Mr. Markland pointed out to me that "The busy day — the peaceful night" are in Gray's Ode on Vicissitudes, and "The thoughtless day, the easy night," in his Verses on Eton College. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>4</sup> The results of Johnson's inquiries were, that Levett was born at West Ella, about five miles from Hull; was supposed to be about 78 years old, was the eldest of a family of ten children, and left two brothers and a sister living. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>5</sup> This note was in answer to one which accompanied one of the earliest pamphlets on the subject of Chatterton's forgery, entitled "Cursory Observations on the Poems attributed to Thomas Rowley," &c. Mr. Thomas Warton's very able "Inquiry" appeared about three months afterwards; and Mr. Tyrwhitt's admirable "Vindication of his Appendix," in the summer of the same year, left the believers in this daring imposture nothing but "the resolution to say again what had been said before." Daring, however, as this fiction was, and wild as was the adherence to Chatterton, both were greatly exceeded in 1795 and the following year, by a still more audacious imposture, and the pertinacity of one of its adherents, who has immortalised his name by publishing a bulky volume, of which the direct and manifest object was, to prove the authenticity of certain papers attributed to Shakspeare, after the fabricator of the spurious trash had publicly acknowledged the imposture. — MALONE. Mr. Malone alludes to the forgery, by Mr. William Henry Ireland, of the Shakespearian papers which were exhibited, with a ridiculous mixture of pomp and mystery, at his father's house in Norfolk Street. It seems scarcely conceivable how such palpable impositions could have deceived the most ignorant; and yet there were numerous dupes in the critical and literary circles of the day. Mr. W. H. Ireland afterwards published a full and minute confession of the whole progress of his forgery; but, with a curious obstinacy, he, in this work, vehemently accuses of blindness, ignorance, and bad faith, all those who detected what he confesses to have been an imposture, and is equally lavish in praise of the discernment and judgment of those whom he proves to have been dupes. — CROKER. He died in 1834. — WRIGHT.

forgiven, though it cannot be applauded. In Chatterton there is nothing but the resolution to say again what has once been said. I am, Sir, &c.,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

These short letters show the regard which Dr. Johnson entertained for Mr. Malone, who the more he is known is the more highly valued. It is much to be regretted that Johnson was prevented from sharing the elegant hospitality of that gentleman's table, at which he would in every respect have been fully gratified. Mr. Malone, who has so ably succeeded him as an editor of Shakspeare, has, in his Preface, done great and just honour to Johnson's memory.

JOHNSON TO MRS. PORTER.

"London, March 2. 1782.

"DEAR MADAM, — I went away from Lichfield ill, and have had a troublesome time with my breath. For some weeks I have been disordered by a cold, of which I could not get the violence abated till I had been let blood three times. I have not, however, been so bad but that I could have written, and am sorry that I neglected it.

"My dwelling is but melancholy. Both Williams, and Desmoulins, and myself, are very sickly; Frank is not well; and poor Levett died in his bed the other day by a sudden stroke. I suppose not one minute passed between health and death. So uncertain are human things.

"Such is the appearance of the world about me; I hope your scenes are more cheerful. But whatever befalls us, though it is wise to be serious, it is useless and foolish, and perhaps sinful, to be gloomy. Let us, therefore, keep ourselves as easy as we can; though the loss of friends will be felt, and poor Levett had been a faithful adherent for thirty years.

"Forgive me, my dear love, the omission of writing; I hope to mend that and my other faults. Let me have your prayers. Make my compliments to Mrs. Cobb, and Miss Adey, and Mr. Pearson, and the whole company of my friends. I am, &c.,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHNSON TO MRS. PORTER.

"Bolt Court, March 19. 1782.

"DEAR MADAM, — My last was but a dull letter, and I know not that this will be much more cheerful: I am, however, willing to write, because you are desirous to hear from me. My disorder has now begun its ninth week, for it is not yet over. I was last Thursday bled for the fourth time, and have since found myself much relieved, but I am very tender and easily hurt; so that since we parted I have had but little comfort. But I hope that the spring will recover me, and that in the summer I shall see Lichfield again, for I will not delay my visit another year to the end of autumn.

"I have, by advertising, found poor Mr. Levett's brothers, in Yorkshire, who will take the little he has left; it is but little, yet it will be welcome, for I believe they are of very low condition.

"To be sick, and to see nothing but sickness and death, is but a gloomy state: but I hope better times, even in this world, will come; and whatever this world may withhold or give, we shall be happy in a better state. Pray for me, my dear Lucy. Make my compliments to Mrs. Cobb, and Miss Adey, and my old friend, Hetty Bailey, and to all the Lichfield ladies. I am, &c.,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

On the day on which this letter was written, he thus feelingly mentions his respected friend and physician, Dr. Lawrence: —

"Poor Lawrence has almost lost the sense of hearing; and I have lost the conversation of a learned, intelligent, and communicative companion, and a friend whom long familiarity has much endeared. Lawrence is one of the best men whom I have known. — Nostrum omnium, miserere Deus." (Pr. and Med. p. 203.)<sup>1</sup>

It was Dr. Johnson's custom, when he wrote to Dr. Lawrence concerning his own health, to use the Latin language. I have been favoured by Miss Lawrence with one of these letters as a specimen:

"T. LAWRENCIO, MEDICO S.

"Mails Calendis, 1782.<sup>2</sup>

"Novum frigus, nova tussis, nova spirandi difficultas, novam sanguinis missionem suadent, quam tamen te inconsulto nolim fieri. Ad te venire vis possum, nec est cur ad me venias. Licere vel non licere uno verbo dicendum est; cætera mihi et Holdero<sup>3</sup> reliqueris. Si per te licet, imperator nuncio Holderum ad me deducere. Postquam tu discesseris quò me vertam?"<sup>4</sup>

Soon after the above letter; Dr. Lawrence left London, but not before the palsy had made so great a progress as to render him unable to write for himself. The following are

<sup>1</sup> Dr. Lawrence had long been his friend and confidant. A conversation Mrs. Thrale saw them hold together in Essex Street, one day in the year 1781 or 1782, was a singular and melancholy one. Dr. Johnson was exceedingly ill, and she accompanied him thither for advice. The physician was, however, in some respects, more to be pitied than the patient: Johnson was panting under an asthma and dropsy; but Lawrence had been brought home that very morning struck with the palsy, from which he had, two hours before they came, strove to awaken himself by blisters: they were both deaf, and scarce able to speak besides; one from difficulty of breathing, the other from paralytic debility. To give and receive medical counsel, therefore, they fairly sat down on each side a table in the doctor's gloomy apartment, adorned with skeletons, preserved monsters, and agreed to write Latin billets to each other. [Mr. Malone, in his MS. notes, says that this description is fatal, as Dr. Lawrence had no skeletons or monsters in his room.] "Such a scene, &c.," exclaims Mrs. Thrale, "did I never see." "You," said Johnson, are "timidè and gelidè;" finding that his friend had prescribed palliative not drastic remedies. "It is not me," replies poor Lawrence, in an interrupted voice; "'tis nature that is gelidè and timidè." In fact he lived but few months after, and retained his faculties a still shorter time. He was a man of strict piety and profound learning, but little skilled in the knowledge of life or manners, and died without ever having enjoyed the reputation he so justly deserved. — Anecdotes. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> Boswell here departs a little from the order of date. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> Mr. Holder, in the Strand, Dr. Johnson's apothecary. — BOSWELL.

<sup>4</sup> May, 1782. Fresh cold, renewed cough, and an increased difficulty of breathing; all suggest a further letting of blood, which, however, I do not choose to have done without your advice. I cannot well come to you, nor is there any occasion for your coming to me. You may say, in one word, yes or no, and leave the rest to Holder and me. If you con-extracts from letters addressed by Johnson to Miss Lawrence:

JOHNSON TO MISS LAWRENCE.

"Bolt Court, Fleet Street, Feb. 4. 1783.

"You will easily believe with what gladness I read that you had heard once again that voice to which we have all so often delighted to attend. May you often hear it. If we had his mind, and his tongue, we could spare the rest.

"I am not vigorous, but much better than when dear Dr. Lawrence held my pulse the last time. Be so kind as to let me know, from one little interval to another, the state of his body. I am pleased that he remembers me, and hope that it never can be possible for me to forget him. July 22d, 1782.

"I am much delighted even with the small advances which dear Dr. Lawrence makes towards recovery. If we could have again but his mind, and his tongue in his mind, and his right hand, we should not much lament the rest. I should not despair of helping the swelled hand by electricity, if it were frequently and diligently supplied.

"Let me know from time to time whatever happens; and I hope I need not tell you how much I am interested in every change. Aug. 26. 1782.

"Though the account with which you favoured me in your last letter could not give me the pleasure that I wished, yet I was glad to receive it; for my affection to my dear friend makes me desirous of knowing his state, whatever it be. I beg, therefore, that you continue to let me know, from time to time, all that you observe.

"Many fits of severe illness have, for about three months past, forced my kind physician often upon my mind. I am now better; and hope gratitude, as well as distress, can be a motive to remembrance."

JOHNSON TO CAPTAIN LANGTON<sup>1</sup>,

In Rochester.

"Bolt Court, March 20. 1782.

"DEAR SIR, — It is now long since we saw one another: and, whatever has been the reason, neither you have written to me, nor I to you. To let friendship die away by negligence and silence, is certainly not wise. It is voluntarily to throw away one of the greatest comforts of this weary pilgrimage, of which when it is, as it must be, taken finally away, he that travels on alone will wonder how his esteem could be so little. Do not forget me; you see that I do not forget you. It is pleasing in the silence of solitude to think that there is one at least, however distant, of whose benevolence there is little doubt, and whom there is yet hope of seeing again.

"Of my life, from the time we parted, the history is mournful. The spring of last year deprived me of Thrale, a man whose eye for fifteen years had scarcely been turned upon me but with respect or tenderness; for such another friend, the general course of human things will not suffer man to hope. I passed the summer at Streatham, but there was no Thrale; and having idled away the summer with a weakly body and neglected mind, I made a journey to Staffordshire on the edge of winter. The season was dreary, I was sickly, and found the friends sickly whom I went to see. After a sorrowful sojourn, I returned to a habitation possessed for the present by two sick women, where my dear old friend, Mr. Levett, to whom, as he used to tell me, I owe your acquaintance, died a few weeks ago, suddenly, in his bed; there passed not, I believe, a minute between health and death. At night, at Mrs. Thrale's, as I was musing in my chamber, I thought with uncommon earnestness, that, however I might alter my mode of life, or whithersoever I might remove, I would endeavour to retain Levett about me: in the morning my servant brought me word that Levett was called to another state, a state for which, I think, he was not unprepared, for he was very useful to the poor. How much soever I valued him, I now wish that I had valued him more.<sup>2</sup>

"I have myself been ill more than eight weeks of a disorder, from which, at the expense of about fifty ounces of blood, I hope I am now recovering.

"You, dear Sir, have, I hope, a more cheerful scene; you see George fond of his book, and the pretty Misses airy and lively, with my own little Jenny<sup>3</sup>, equal to the best; and in whatever can contribute to your quiet or pleasure, you have Lady Rothes ready to concur. May whatever you enjoy of good be increased, and whatever you suffer of evil be diminished. I am, dear Sir, &c.,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHNSON TO HECTOR,<sup>4</sup>

"London, March 21. 1782.

"DEAR SIR, — I hope I do not very grossly flatter myself to imagine that you and dear Mrs. Careless (p. 488.) will be glad to hear some account of me. I performed the journey to London with very little inconvenience, and came safe to my habitation, where I found nothing but ill health, and, of consequence, very little cheerfulness. I then went to visit a little way into the country, where I got a complaint by a cold which has hung eight weeks upon me, and from which I am, at the expense of fifty ounces of blood, not yet free. I am afraid I must once more owe my recovery to warm weather, which seems to make no advances towards us.

"Such is my health, which will, I hope, soon grow better. In other respects I have no reason to complain. I know not that I have written any thing more generally commended than the Lives of the Poets; and have found the world willing enough to caress me, if my health had invited me to be sent, the messenger will bring Holder to me. When you shall be gone, whither shall I turn myself?" — CROKER.

<sup>1</sup> Mr. Langton being at this time on duty at Rochester, he is addressed by his military title. — BOSWELL. This is, I think, a mistake: Mr. Langton had now fixed his residence at Rochester. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>2</sup> Johnson has here expressed a sentiment similar to that contained in one of Shenstone's stanzas, to which, in his life of that poet, he has given high praise:

"I prized every hour that went by,
Beyond all that had pleased me before;
But now they are gone, and I sigh,
And I grieve that I prized them no more."

J. BOSWELL, jun.

<sup>3</sup> See ant., p. 565. n. 2. — C.

<sup>4</sup> A part of this letter having been torn off, I have, from the evident meaning, supplied a few words and half words at the ends and beginning of lines. — BOSWELL.

in much company; but this season I have been almost wholly employed in nursing myself.

"When summer comes I hope to see you again, and will not put off my visit to the end of the year. I have lived so long in London, that I did not remember the difference of seasons.

"Your health, when I saw you, was much improved. You will be prudent enough not to put it in danger. I hope, when we meet again, we shall congratulate each other upon fair prospects of longer life; though what are the pleasures of the longest life, when placed in comparison with a happy death? I am, &c., SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHNSON TO HECTOR.

(Without a date, but supposed to be about this time.)

"DEAR SIR, — That you and dear Mrs. Careless should have care or curiosity about my health gives me that pleasure which every man feels from finding himself not forgotten. In age we feel again that love of our native place and our early friends, which, in the bustle or amusements of middle life, were overborne and suspended. You and I should now naturally cling to one another; we have outlived most of those who could pretend to rival us in each other's kindness. In our walk through life we have dropped our companions, and are now to pick up such as chance may offer us, or to travel on alone. You, indeed, have a sister, with whom you can divide the day; I have no natural friend left: but Providence has been pleased to preserve me from neglect; I have not wanted such alleviations of life as friendship could supply. My health has been, from my twentieth year, such as has seldom afforded me a single day of ease; but it is at least not worse; and I sometimes make myself believe that it is better. My disorders are, however, still sufficiently oppressive.

"I think of seeing Staffordshire again this autumn, and intend to find my way through Birmingham, where I hope to see you and dear Mrs. Careless well. I am, Sir, &c.,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

"March 18.<sup>1</sup> — Having been from the middle of January distressed by a cold, which made my respiration very laborious, and from which I was but little relieved by being blooded three times; having tried to ease the oppression of my breast by frequent opiates, which kept me waking in the night and drowsy the next day, and subjected me to the tyranny of vain imaginations; having to all this added frequent cathartics, sometimes with mercury, I at last persuaded Dr. Lawrence, on Thursday, March 14., to let me bleed more copiously. Sixteen ounces were taken away, and from that time my breath has been free, and my breast easy. On that day I took little food, and no flesh. On Thursday night I slept with great tranquillity. On the next night I took diacodium [syrup of poppies], and had a most restless night. Of the next day I remember nothing, but that I rose in the afternoon, and saw Mrs. Lennox and Seward.

"Sunday, 17. — I lay late, and had only palfrey to dinner. I read part of Waller's Directory<sup>2</sup>, a pious, rational book: but in any except a very regular life difficult to practise.

"It occurred to me, that though my time might pass unemployed, no more should pass uncounted, and this has been written to-day, in consequence of that thought. I read a Greek chapter, prayed with Francis, which I now do commonly, and explained to him the Lord's Prayer, in which I find connexion, not observed, I think, by the expositors. I made punch for myself and my servants, by which, in the night, I thought both my breast and imagination disordered.

"Monday, 18. — I rose late, looked a little into books. Saw Miss Reynolds and Miss Thrale, and Nicolajda<sup>3</sup>; afterwards Dr. Hunter<sup>4</sup> came for his catalogue. I then dined on tea, &c.; then read over part of Dr. Lawrence's book "De Temperamentis," which seems to have been written with a troubled mind.

"My mind has been for some time much disturbed. The peace of God be with me.

"Tuesday, 19. — I rose late. I was visited by Mrs. Thrale, Mr. Cotton, and Mr. Crofts.<sup>5</sup> I took Lawrence's paper in hand, but was chill; having fasted yesterday, I was hungry, and dined freely, then slept a little, and drank tea; then took candles, and wrote to Aston and Lucy; then went on with Lawrence, of which little remains. I prayed with Francis.

"Mens sedatio, laus Deo.

"To-morrow Shaw<sup>7</sup> comes. I think to finish Lawrence, and write to Langton.

"Poor Lawrence has almost lost the sense of hearing; and I have lost the conversation of a learned, intelligent, and communicative companion, and a friend whom long familiarity has much endeared. Lawrence is one of the best men whom I have known.

"Nostrum omnium miserere Deus.

"Wednesday, 20. — Shaw came; I finished reading Lawrence. I dined liberally. Wrote a long letter to Langton, and designed to read, but was hindered by Strahan. The ministry is dissolved. I prayed with Francis, and gave thanks.

"To-morrow — To Mrs. Thrale — To write to Hector — To Dr. Taylor.

"Thursday, 21. — I went to Mrs. Thrale. Mr. Cox<sup>8</sup> and Paradise met me at the door, and went with me in the coach. Paradise's loss.<sup>9</sup> In

<sup>1</sup> For the latter half of this month of March he kept the following diary, of which Boswell has given only one paragraph. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> Sir William Waller, the Parliamentary General in the Grand Rebellion, wrote "Divine Meditations on several Occasions, with a daily Directory, 1689." — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>3</sup> A learned Greek; a friend of Mr. Langton. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> The catalogue referred to was probably that of the ancient coins in Dr. Hunter's museum, which was published in the ensuing year, with a classical dedication to the queen, which perhaps Dr. Johnson revised. — CROKER.

<sup>5</sup> This means, I suppose, Galeu's work, De Temperamentis et inaequali temperie, Lib. iii. Thoma Linacro, Anglo interprete, 1521. A curious book, which Dr. Lawrence had probably lent him, perhaps with a view to the "paper" subsequently mentioned. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>6</sup> Probably Mr. Herbert Croft, who had supplied him with a life of Young. — CROKER.

<sup>7</sup> Probably the editor of the Gaelic Dictionary, who, about this period, was warmly engaged in the Ossian controversy, and as he took Dr. Johnson's part, probably received some assistance from him. Ante, p. 528; post, p. 745.

<sup>8</sup> Mr. Cox was, I believe, a solicitor in Southampton Buildings. — CROKER.

<sup>9</sup> This probably refers to some property in Virginia which Mr. Paradise possessed in right of his wife, and which had the evening wrote to Hector. At night there were eleven visitants. Conversation with Mr. Cox. When I waked I saw the penthouses covered with snow.

"Friday, 22. — I spent the time idly. Mens turbata. In the afternoon it snowed. At night I wrote to Taylor about the pot, and to Hamilton about the Fœdera.<sup>1</sup>

"Saturday, 23. — I came home and found that Desmoulins had, while I was away, been in bed. Letters from Langton and Boswell. I promised L. —<sup>2</sup> six guineas.

"Sunday, 24. — I rose not early. Visitors, Allen, Dav's, Windham, Dr. Horsley.<sup>3</sup> Dinner at Strahan's. Came home and chatted with Williams, and read Romans ix. in Greek.

"To-morrow begin again to read the Bible; put rooms in order; copy L. —'s letter. At night I read 11 p. and something more, of the Bible, in fifty-five minutes

"Tuesday, 26. — I copied L. —'s letter. Then wrote to Mrs. Thrale. Cox visited me. I sent home Dr. Lawrence's papers, with notes. I gave [Mrs. Desmoulins] a guinea, and found her a gown.

"Wednesday, 27. — At Harley-street.<sup>4</sup> Bad nights — In the evening Dr. Bromfield and his family — Merlin's steelyard given me.

"Thursday, 28. — I came home. Sold Rymer or Davies; wrote to Boswell. Visitors, Dr. Percy, Mr. Crofts. I have, in ten days, written to [Mrs.] Aston, Lucy, Hector, Langton, Boswell; perhaps to all by whom my letters are desired.

"The weather, which now begins to be warm, gives me great help. I have hardly been at church his year; certainly not since the 15th of January. My cough and difficulty of breath would not permit it.

"This is the day on which, in 1752, dear Tetty lied. I have now uttered a prayer of repentance and contrition; perhaps Tetty knows that I prayed for her. Perhaps Tetty is now praying for me. God help me. Thou, God, art merciful; hear my prayers, and enable me to trust in Thee.

"We were married almost seventeen years, and have now been parted thirty.

"I then read 11 p. from Ex. 36. to Lev. 7. I prayed with Francis, and used the prayer for Good Friday.

"29. — Good Friday. After a night of great disturbance and solicitude, such as I do not remember, I rose, drank tea, but without eating, and went to church. I was very composed, and coming home, read Hammond on one of the Psalms for the day. I then read Leviticus. Scott [Lord Stowell] came in. A kind letter from [Mrs.] Gastrell. I read on, then went to evening prayers, and afterwards drank tea, with buns: then read till I finished Leviticus, 24 pages et supra.

"30. — Saturday. Visitors, Paradise, and I think Horsley. Read 11 pages of the Bible. I was faint; dined on herrings and potatoes. At prayers, I think, in the evening. I wrote to [Mrs.] Gastrell, and received a kind letter from Hector. At night Lowe. Pr[ayed] with Francis.

"31. — Easter-Day. Read 15 pages of the Bible. Cætera alibi."
—Pr. and Med.

On the foregoing curious passage — "March 20.<sup>5</sup> The ministry is dissolved. I prayed with Francis, and gave thanks" — it has been the subject of discussion whether there are two distinct particulars mentioned here? Or that we are to understand the giving of thanks to be in consequence of the dissolution of the ministry? In support of the last of these conjectures may be urged his mean opinion of that ministry, which has frequently appeared in the course of this work; and it is strongly confirmed by what he said on the subject to Mr. Seward: — "I am glad the ministry is removed.<sup>6</sup> Such a bunch of imbecility never disgraced a country.<sup>7</sup> If they sent a messenger into the city to take up a printer, the messenger was taken up instead of the printer, and committed by the sitting alderman. If they sent one army to the relief of another, the first army was defeated and taken before the second arrived. I will not say that what they did was always wrong; but it was always done at a wrong time."

I wrote to him at different dates; regretted that I could not come to London this spring, but hoped we should meet somewhere in the summer; mentioned the state of my affairs, and suggested hopes of some preferment; informed him, that as "The Beauties of Johnson" had been published in London, some obscure scribbler had published at Edinburgh what he called "The Deformities of Johnson."

JOHNSON TO BOSWELL.

"London, March 28. 1782.

"DEAR SIR, — The pleasure which we used to receive from each other on Good-Friday and Easter-day, we must be this year content to miss. Let us, however, pray for each other, and I hope to see one another yet from time to time with mutual delight. My disorder has been a cold, which impeded the organs of respiration, and kept me many weeks in a state of great uneasiness; but by repeated phlebotomy it is now relieved: and next to the recovery of Mrs. Boswell, I flatter myself, that you will rejoice at mine.

"What we shall do in the summer, it is yet too been confiscated. See Jefferson's Letters, where he advocates Paradise's claims as being a whig and friend to American independence. — CROKER.

<sup>1</sup> A set of Rymer which he was charitably endeavouring to sell for Davies, probably to Mr. Gerard Hamilton; and this was, perhaps, the occasion which made Mr. Hamilton say (as is stated in Malone's MS. notes communicated to me by Mr. Markland) that Johnson once asked him for 50l. for a charitable purpose. Sir Joshua told Malone that he never asked him for more than a guinea for one object. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> Lennox or Lowe? I believe Lowe. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>3</sup> In 1788 Bishop of St. David's. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> Probably Mr. Ramsay's. Antic, p. 630. — CROKER.

<sup>5</sup> Boswell gave only this passage from the Diary, and misdated it 20th January, and introduced it by these words: "In one of Johnson's registers of this year there occurs the following curious passage" — CROKER.

<sup>6</sup> On the preceding day the ministry had been changed. — MALONE. Lord North's administration was superseded by that of Lord Rockingham, on the 19th March. — CROKER.

<sup>7</sup> Johnson's personal pique against Lord North makes him unjust to the ministry, by reproaching them with the mischiefs created by the factions which opposed them. — See post, p. 712. — CROKER, 1847.

early to consider. You want to know what you shall do now; I do not think this time of bustle and confusion like to produce any advantage to you. Every man has those to reward and gratify who have contributed to his advancement. To come hither with such expectations at the expense of borrowed money, which I find you know not where to borrow, can hardly be considered prudent. I am sorry to find, what your solicitations seem to imply, that you have already gone the whole length of your credit. This is to set the quiet of your whole life at hazard. If you anticipate your inheritance, you can at last inherit nothing; all that you receive must pay for the past. You must get a place, or pine in penury, with the empty name of a great estate. Poverty, my dear friend, is so great an evil, and pregnant with so much temptation, and so much misery, that I cannot but earnestly enjoin you to avoid it. Live on what you have; live if you can on less; do not borrow either for vanity or pleasure; the vanity will end in shame, and the pleasure in regret: stay therefore at home, till you have saved money for your journey hither.

"The Beauties of Johnson" are said to have got money to the collector; if the "Deformities" have the same success, I shall be still a more extensive benefactor.

"Make my compliments to Mrs. Boswell, who is I hope reconciled to me; and to the young people, whom I never have offended. You never told me the success of your plea against the solicitors. I am, dear Sir, &c., SAM. JOHNSON."

[JOHNSON TO MRS. GASTRELL AND MRS. ASTON.

"Bolt Court, March 30. 1782.

"DEAREST LADIES, — The tenderness expressed in your kind letter makes me think it necessary to tell you that they who are pleased to wish me well, need not be any longer particularly solicitous about me. I prevailed on my physician to bleed me very copiously, almost against his inclination. However, he kept his finger on the pulse of the other hand, and, finding that I bore it well, let the vein run on. From that time I have mended, and hope I am now well. I went yesterday to church without inconvenience, and hope to go to-morrow.

"Here are great changes in the great world; but I cannot tell you more than you will find in the papers. The men have got in whom I have endeavoured to keep out; but I hope they will do better than their predecessors; it will not be easy to do worse.

"Spring seems now to approach, and I feel its benefit, which I hope will extend to dear Mrs. Aston.

"When Dr. Falconer saw me, I was at home only by accident, for I lived much with Mrs. Thrale, and had all the care from her that she could take or could be taken. But I have never been ill enough to want attendance; my disorder has been rather tedious than violent; rather irksome than painful. He needed not have made such a tragical representation.

"I am now well enough to flatter myself with some hope of pleasure from the summer. How happy would it be if we could see one another, and be all tolerably well! Let us pray for one another. I am, &c., SAM. JOHNSON."

— Penbrooke MSS.

JOHNSON TO MISS REYNOLDS.

"April 8. 1782.

"DEAREST MADAM, — Your work<sup>1</sup> is full of very penetrating meditation, and very forcible sentiments. I read it with a full perception of the sublime, with wonder and terror; but I cannot think of any profit from it; it seems not born to be popular.

"Your system of the mental fabric is exceedingly obscure, and, without more attention than will be willingly bestowed, is unintelligible. The plans of Burnaby will be more safely understood, and are often charming. I was delighted with the different bounty of different ages.

"I would make it produce something if I could, but I have indeed no hope. If a bookseller would buy it at all, as it must be published without a name, he would give nothing for it worth your acceptance. I am, &c., SAM. JOHNSON."

— Reynolds MSS.

JOHNSON TO MRS. THRALE.

(Extracts.)

"26th April, [1782]. — I have been very much out of order since you sent me away; but why should I tell you, who do not care, nor desire to know. I dined with Mr. Paradise on Monday, with the Bishop of St. Asaph [Shipley] yesterday with the Bishop of Chester [Porteus] I dine to day<sup>2</sup>, and with the Academy on Saturday, with Mr. Hoole on Monday, and with Mr. Garrick on Thursday, the 2d of May, and then — what care you? — what then?

"Do not let Mr. Piozzi<sup>3</sup> nor any body else put me quite out of your head; and do not think that any one will love you like your, &c."

"30th April, 1782. — I have had a fresh cold and been very poorly. But I was yesterday at Mr. Hoole's, where were Miss Reynolds and many others. I am going to the club.

"Since Mrs. Garrick's invitation I have a letter from Miss Moore<sup>4</sup>, to engage me for the evening. I have an appointment to Miss Monkton, another with Lady Sheffield<sup>5</sup> at Mrs. Way's.<sup>6</sup>

"Two days ago Mr. Cumberland had his third night<sup>7</sup>, which, after all expenses, put into his own pocket five pounds. He has lost his plume.

<sup>1</sup> I can hardly think that this could be the same work mentioned anté, p. 697; nor am I able to explain the allusion to Burnaby, which, I suspect, may have been a mis-transcription for Dunbury. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> Hannah More was at this dinner, and sat next to Johnson. She urged him to take a little wine; he replied, "I can't drink a little, child; therefore I never touch it. Abstinence is as easy to me as temperance would be difficult." Anté, p. 678. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>3</sup> This is the first time that this name occurs. — Gabriel Piozzi was a Brescian, who came to England a few years before as a professional singer, and was introduced by Burney at Streatham, where he gave lessons to the young ladies, and sometimes sang for the company. It seems that he had now made considerable advances in Mrs. Thrale's good graces, and in about two years she married him. I died in March, 1809, at her family seat in Wales. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> Hannah More. — CROKER.
<sup>5</sup> The first wife of the first Lord Sheffield. — CROKER.
<sup>6</sup> Wife of Daniel Way, Esq. of the Exchequer Office, whom there is so copious an account in Nichols's continuation of Bowyer's Anecdotes. — CROKER.

<sup>7</sup> The play of the Walloons, acted about this time; but the third night was the 2d of May. — CROKER.

"Mrs. S[heridan]<sup>1</sup> refused to sing, at the Duchess of Devonshire's request, a song to the Prince of Wales. They pay for the [theatre]<sup>2</sup> neither principal nor interest; and poor Garrick's funeral expenses are yet unpaid, though the undertaker is broken. Could you have a better purveyor for a little scandal? But I wish I was at Streatham."<sup>3</sup>

— Letters.

Notwithstanding his afflicted state of body and mind this year, the following correspondence affords a proof not only of his benevolence and conscientious readiness to relieve a good man from error, but by his clothing one of the sentiments in his "Rambler," in different language, not inferior to that of the original, shows his extraordinary command of clear and forcible expression.

A clergyman at Bath wrote to him, that in "The Morning Chronicle," a passage in "The Beauties of Johnson," article Death, had been pointed out as supposed by some readers to recommend suicide, the words being, "To die is the fate of man; but to die with lingering anguish is generally his folly;" and respectfully suggesting to him, that such an erroneous notion of any sentence in the writings of an acknowledged friend of religion and virtue should not pass uncontradicted. Johnson thus answered this clergyman's letter:—

JOHNSON TO THE REV. MR. ———,

At Bath.

"May 15. 1782.

"SIR, — Being now in the country in a state of recovery, as I hope, from a very oppressive disorder, I cannot neglect the acknowledgment of our Christian letter. The book called 'The Beauties of Johnson' is the production of I know of whom; I never saw it but by casual inspection, and considered myself as utterly disengaged on its consequences. Of the passage you mention, I remember some notice in some paper; but knowing that it must be misrepresented, I thought it no more, nor do I know where to find it in my own books. I am accustomed to think little newspapers; but an opinion so weighty and serious as yours has determined me to do, what I could without your reasonable admonition have omitted: and I will direct my thought to be true in its true state.<sup>3</sup> If I could find the passage, would direct you to it. I suppose the tenor is: — 'Acute diseases are the immediate and inevitable strokes of Heaven; but of them the pain short, and the conclusion speedy; chronic disorders, by which we are suspended in tedious torture between life and death, are commonly the effect of our own misconduct and intemperance. To die, &c.' — This, Sir, you see, is all true and all blameless. I hope some time in the next week to have all rectified. My health has been lately much shaken; if you favour me with any answer, it will be a comfort to me to know that I have your prayers. I am, &c., SAM. JOHNSON."

This letter, as might be expected, had its full effect, and the clergyman acknowledged it in grateful and pious terms.<sup>4</sup>

The following letters require no extracts from mine to introduce them:—

JOHNSON TO BOSWELL.

"London, June 3. 1782.

"DEAR SIR, — The earnestness and tenderness of your letter is such, that I cannot think myself showing it more respect than it claims, by sitting down to answer it the day on which I received it.

"This year has afflicted me with a very irksome and severe disorder. My respiration has been much impeded, and much blood has been taken away. I am now harassed by a catarrhus cough, from which my purpose is to seek relief by change of air; and I am, therefore, preparing to go to Oxford.

"Whether I did right in dissuading you from coming to London this spring, I will not determine. You have not lost much by missing my company; I have scarcely been well for a single week. I might have received comfort from your kindness; but you would have seen me afflicted, and, perhaps, found me peevish. Whatever might have been your pleasure or mine, I know not how I could have honestly advised you to come hither with borrowed money. Do not accustom yourself to consider debt only as an inconvenience; you will find it a calamity. Poverty takes away so many means of doing good, and produces so much inability to resist evil, both natural and moral, that it is by all virtuous means to be avoided. Consider a man whose fortune is very narrow; whatever be his rank by birth, or whatever his reputation by intellectual excellence, what can he do? or what evil can he prevent? That he cannot help the needy is evident; he has nothing to spare. But, perhaps, his advice or admonition may be useful. His poverty will destroy his influence; many more can find that he is poor, than that he is wise; and few will reverence the understanding that is of so little advantage to its owner. I say nothing of the personal wretchedness of a debtor, which, however, has passed into a proverb. Of riches it is not necessary to write the praise. Let it, however, be remembered, that he who has money to spare, has it always in his power to benefit others; and of such power a good man must always be desirous.

<sup>1</sup> See ante, April 10. 1775. — C.

<sup>2</sup> Drury-lane Theatre, sold by Garrick to Sheridan. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> What follows appeared in "The Morning Chronicle" of May 29. 1782:—

"A correspondent having mentioned in 'The Morning Chronicle' of December 12. the last clause of the following paragraph, as seeming to favour suicide; we are requested to put the whole passage, that its true meaning may appear, which is not to recommend suicide, but exercise.

<sup>4</sup> Exercise cannot secure us from that dissolution to which we are decreed; but while the soul and body continue united, it can make the association pleasing, and give probable hopes that they shall be disjoined by an easy separation. It was a principle among the ancients, that acute diseases are from Heaven, and chronic from ourselves; the dart of death, indeed, falls from Heaven; but we poison it by our own misconduct: to die is the fate of man; but to die with lingering anguish is generally his folly." — BOSWELL. The passage is in No. 85. of the Rambler. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>5</sup> The correspondence may be seen at length in "The Gentleman's Magazine," Feb. 1786. — BOSWELL.

"I am pleased with your account of Easter.<sup>1</sup> We shall meet, I hope, in autumn, both well and both cheerful; and part each the better for the other's company. Make my compliments to Mrs. Boswell, and to the young charmers. I am, &c.,
"SAM. JOHNSON."

[JOHNSON TO MRS. THRALE.

(Extracts.)

"Sunday, June 8.<sup>2</sup> 1782. — I have this day taken a passage to Oxford for Monday — not to frisk, as you express it with very unfeeling irony, but to catch at the hopes of better health. The change of place may do something. To leave the house where so much has been suffered affords some pleasure."

"Oxford, June 11. — Yesterday I came to Oxford, without fatigue or inconvenience. Here is Miss More<sup>3</sup>, at Dr. Adams's, with whom I shall dine to-morrow."

"Oxford, June 12. 1782. — I find no particular salubrity in this air; my respiration is very laborious; my appetite is good, and my sleep commonly long and quiet: but a very little motion disables me."

"I dine to-day with Dr. Adams, and to-morrow with Dr. Wetherel.<sup>4</sup> Yesterday Dr. Edwards<sup>5</sup> invited some men from Exeter college, whom I liked very well. These variations of company help the mind, though they cannot do much for the body. But the body receives some help from a cheerful mind."

"Oxford, June 17. 1782. — Oxford has done, I think, what for the present it can do, and I am going slyly to take a place in the coach for Wednesday, and you or my sweet Queeney will fetch me on Thursday, and see what you can make of me."

"To-day I am going to dine with Dr. Wheeler, and to-morrow Dr. Edwards has invited Miss Adams and Miss More. He has really done all that he could do for my relief or entertainment, and really drives me away by doing too much."
— Letters.

JOHNSON TO MR. PERKINS.<sup>6</sup>

"July 28. 1782.

"DEAR SIR, — I am much pleased that you are going a very long journey, which may by proper conduct restore your health and prolong your life."

"Observe these rules: — 1. Turn all care out of your head as soon as you mount the chaise. 2. Do not think about frugality; your health is worth more than it can cost. 3. Do not continue any day's journey to fatigue. 4. Take now and then a day's rest. 5. Get a smart sea-sickness, if you can. 6. Cast away all anxiety, and keep your mind easy. This last direction is the principal; with an unquiet mind, neither exercise, nor diet, nor physic, can be of much use."

"I wish you, dear Sir, a prosperous journey, and a happy recovery. I am, dear Sir, your most affectionate humble servant,
"SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHNSON TO BOSWELL.

"Aug. 24. 1782.

"DEAR SIR, — Being uncertain whether I should have any call this autumn into the country I did not immediately answer your kind letter. I have no call; but if you desire to meet me at Ashbourne, I believe I can come thither; if you had rather come to London, I can stay at Streatham take your choice."

"This year has been very heavy. From the middle of January to the middle of June, I was battered by one disorder after another! I am now very much recovered, and hope still to be better. What happiness it is that Mrs. Poswe has escaped."

"My Lives are reprinting, and I have forgotte the author of Gray's character? write immediately, and it may be perhaps yet inserted. Of London or Ashbourne you have your free choice; at any place I shall be glad to see you. I am, &c.,
"SAM. JOHNSON."

On the 30th August, I informed him that my honoured father had died that morning a complaint under which he had long laboured having suddenly come to a crisis, while I was upon a visit at the seat of Sir Charles Presto from whence I had hastened the day before upon receiving a letter by express.

JOHNSON TO BOSWELL.

"London, Sept. 7. 1782

"DEAR SIR, — I have struggled through the year with so much infirmity of body, and so strong impressions of the fragility of life, that death, whenever it appears, fills me with melancholy; and I cannot hear without emotion of the removal of any one, whom I have known, in another state."

"Your father's death had every circumstance that could enable you to bear it; it was at a mature age, and it was expected; and as his general life had been pious, his thoughts had doubtless many years past been turned upon eternity. That you did not find him sensible must doubtless grieve

<sup>1</sup> Which I celebrated in the Church of England chapel at Edinburgh, founded by Lord Chief Baron Smith, of respectable and pious memory. — BOSWELL.

<sup>2</sup> Mrs. Piozzi had misdated and misplaced this and the following letter. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> Hannah More writes: — "Oxford, June 13th, 1782. — "Who do you think is my principal cicerone at Oxford? Only Dr. Johnson! and we do so gallant it about. You cannot imagine with what delight he showed me every part of his own college (Pembroke), nor how rejoiced Henderson [p. 763. n. 4.] looked to make one in the party. Dr. Adams, the Master of Pembroke, had contrived a very pretty piece of gallantry. We spent the day and evening at his house. After dinner Johnson begged to conduct me to see the college; he would let no one show it me but himself: 'This was my room; this Shensone's.' Then, after pointing out all the rooms of the poets who had been of his college, 'in short,' said he, 'we were a nest of singing birds.' 'Here we walked, there we played at cricket.' He ran over with pleasure the history of his juvenile days he passed there. When he came into the common room we spied a fine large print of Johnson, framed, and hung up that very morning, with this motto, 'And is Johnson ours, himself a host?' Under which stared you the face, 'From Miss More's Sensibility.' This little incident amused us; but, alas! Johnson looks very ill, indeed, spleen and wan. However, he made an effort to be cheerful. — CROKER, 1835.

<sup>4</sup> Master of University College, father of Sir Charles Wetherel, Attorney General in 1826. — CROKER.

<sup>5</sup> See anté, p. 621. n. 2. — C.

<sup>6</sup> Mr. Thrale's successor in the brewery. — CROKER, 18

<sup>7</sup> The Rev. Mr. Temple, Vicar of St. Givulias, Cornwall. — BOSWELL. Anté, p. 149. n. 1. — C.

you; his disposition towards you was undoubtedly that of a kind, though not of a fond father. Kindness, at least actual, is in our power, but fondness is not; and if by negligence or imprudence you had extinguished his fondness, he could not at will rekindle it. Nothing then remained between you but mutual forgiveness of each other's faults, and mutual desire of each other's happiness. I shall long to know his final disposition of his fortune.

"You, dear Sir, have now a new station, and have therefore new cares, and new employments. Life, as Cowley seems to say, ought to resemble a well-ordered poem; of which one rule generally received is, that the exordium should be simple, and should promise little. Begin your new course of life with the least show and the least expense possible: you may at pleasure increase both, but you cannot easily diminish them. Do not think your estate your own, while any man can call upon you for money which you cannot pay: therefore, begin with timorous parsimony. Let it be your first care not to be in any man's debt.

"When the thoughts are extended to a future state, the present life seems hardly worthy of all those principles of conduct and maxims of prudence which one generation of men has transmitted to another; but upon a closer view, when it is perceived how much evil is produced and how much good is impeded by embarrassment and distress, and how little room the expedients of poverty leave for the exercise of virtue, it grows manifest that the boundless importance of the next life enforces some attention to the interests of this.

"Be kind to the old servants, and secure the kindness of the agents and factors. Do not disgust them by asperity, or unwelcome gaiety, or apparent suspicion. From them you must learn the real state of your affairs, the characters of your tenants, and the value of your lands.

"Make my compliments to Mrs. Boswell. I think her expectations from air and exercise are the best that she can form. I hope she will live long and happily.

"I forget whether I told you that Rasay has been here. We dined cheerfully together. I entertained lately a young gentleman from Corriehatchin. I received your letters only this morning. I am, &c.,
SAM. JOHNSON."

In answer to my next letter I received one from him, dissuading me from hastening to him as I had proposed. What is proper for publication is the following paragraph, equally just and tender:—

"One expense, however, I would not have you to spare: let nothing be omitted that can preserve Mrs. Boswell, though it should be necessary to transplant her for a time into a softer climate. She is the prop and stay of your life. How much must your children suffer by losing her!"

My wife was now so much convinced of his sincere friendship for me, and regard for her, that without any suggestion on my part, she wrote him a very polite and grateful letter.

JOHNSON TO MRS. BOSWELL.

"London, Sept. 7. 1782.

"DEAR LADY,—I have not often received so much pleasure as from your invitation to Auchin-leck. The journey thither and back is, indeed, too great for the latter part of the year; but if my health were fully recovered, I would suffer no little heat and cold, nor a wet or a rough road, to keep me from you. I am, indeed, not without hope of seeing Auchinleck again; but to make it a pleasant place I must see its lady well, and brisk, and airy. For my sake, therefore, among many greater reasons, take care, dear Madam, of your health; spare no expense, and want no attendance, that can procure ease or preserve it. Be very careful to keep your mind quiet; and do not think it too much to give an account of your recovery to, Madam, yours, &c.,

SAM. JOHNSON."

[JOHNSON TO LOWE.<sup>1</sup>

"Oct. 22 1782.

"SIR,—I congratulate you on the good that has befallen you. I always told you that it would come. I would not, however, have you flatter yourself too soon with punctuality. You must not expect the other half year at Christmas. You may use the money as your needs require; but save what you can.

"You must undoubtedly write a letter of thanks to your benefactor in your own name. I have put something on the other side. I am, Sir, your most humble servant,
SAM. JOHNSON."
—MSS.

LOWE TO LORD SOUTHWELL.

"MY LORD,—The allowance which you are pleased to make me, I received on the by Mr. Puget. Of the joy which it brought your lordship cannot judge, because you cannot imagine my distress. It was long since I had known a morning without solicitude for noon, or lain down at night without foreseeing with terror the distresses of the morning. My debts were small, but many; my creditors were poor, and therefore troublesome. Of this misery your lordship's bounty has given me an intermission. May your lordship live long to do much good, and to do for many what you have done for, my Lord, your lordship's &c., M. LOWE."]

—MSS

JOHNSON TO BOSWELL.

"London, Dec. 7. 1782.

"DEAR SIR,—Having passed almost this whole year in a succession of disorders, I went in October to Brightelmstone, whither I came in a state of so much weakness, that I rested four times in walking between the inn and the lodging. By phisic and abstinence I grew better, and am now reasonably easy, though at a great distance from health. I am afraid, however, that health begins, after seventy, and long before, to have a meaning different from that which it had at thirty. But it is culpable to murmur at the established order of the creation, as it is vain to oppose it. He that lives must grow old; and he that would rather grow old than die has God to thank for the infirmities of old age.

"At your long silence I am rather angry. You do not, since now you are the head of your house, think it worth your while to try whether you or your friend can live longer without writing; nor suspect, after so many years of friendship, that when I do not write to you I forget you. Put all such useless jealousies out of your head, and disdain to regulate your own practice by the practice of another, or by any other principle than the desire of doing right.

<sup>1</sup> These two letters communicated by Mr. Markland relate to the renewal of Lowe's annuity from Lord Southwell, and show his constant zeal for his humble friend. — CROKER.

"Your economy, I suppose, begins now to be settled; your expenses are adjusted to your revenue, and all your people in their proper places. Resolve not to be poor. Whatever you have, spend less. Poverty is a great enemy to human happiness: it certainly destroys liberty; and it makes some virtues impracticable, and others extremely difficult.

"Let me know the history of your life since your accession to your estate; — how many houses, how many cows, how much land in your own hand, and what bargains you make with your tenants.

"Of my 'Lives of the Poets' they have printed a new edition in octavo, I hear, of three thousand. Did I give a set to Lord Hailes? If I did not, I will do it out of these. What did you make of all your copy?

"Mrs. Thrale and the three misses are now, for the winter, in Argyll Street. Sir Joshua Reynolds has been out of order, but is well again; and I am, dear Sir, your, &c., SAM. JOHNSON."

MRS. BOSWELL TO JOHNSON.

"Edinburgh, Dec. 20. 1782.

"DEAR SIR, — I was made happy by your kind letter, which gave us the agreeable hopes of seeing you in Scotland again.

"I am much flattered by the concern you are pleased to take in my recovery. I am better, and hope to have it in my power to convince you by my attention, of how much consequence I esteem your health to the world and to myself. I remain, Sir, with grateful respect, your obliged and obedient servant, MARGARET BOSWELL."

The death of Mr. Thrale had made a very material alteration with respect to Johnson's reception in that family. The manly authority of the husband no longer curbed the lively exuberance of the lady; and as her vanity had been fully gratified, by having the Colossus of Literature attached to her for many years, she gradually became less assiduous to please him. Whether her attachment to him was already divided by another object, I am unable to ascertain; but it is plain that Johnson's penetration was alive to her neglect or forced attention; for on the 6th of October this year we find him making a "parting use of the library" at Streatham, and pronouncing a prayer which he composed on leaving Mr. Thrale's family.

"Almighty God, Father of all mercy, help me by thy grace, that I may, with humble and sincere thankfulness, remember the comforts and conveniences which I have enjoyed at this place; and that I may resign them with holy submission, equally trusting in thy protection when thou givest and when thou takest away. Have mercy upon me, O Lord! have mercy upon me! To thy fatherly protection, O Lord, I commend this family. Bless, guide, and defend them, that they may so pass through this world, as finally to enjoy in thy presence everlasting happiness, for Jesus Christ's sake. Amen." (Pr. and Med., p. 214.)

One cannot read this prayer without some emotions not very favourable to the lady whose conduct occasioned it.<sup>1</sup>

The next day, he made the following memorandum:

"October 7. — I was called early. I packed up my bundles, and used the foregoing prayer, with my morning devotions somewhat, I think, enlarged. Being earlier than the family, I read St. Paul's farewell in the Acts, and then read fortuitously in the Gospels, — which was my parting use of the library."

And in one of his memorandum books I find, "Sunday, went to church at Streatham. Templo valedixi cum osculo."<sup>2</sup>

He met Mr. Philip Metcalfe<sup>3</sup> often at Sir Joshua Reynolds's and other places, and was a good deal with him at Brightelmstone this autumn, being pleased at once with his excellent table and animated conversation. Mr. Metcalfe showed him great respect, and sent him a note that he might have the use of his carriage whenever he pleased. Johnson (30 October, 1782.) returned this polite answer, "Mr. Johnson is very much obliged by the kind offer of the carriage, but he has no desire of using Mr. Metcalfe's carriage, except when he can have the pleasure of Mr. Metcalfe's company." Mr. Metcalfe could not but be highly pleased that his company was thus valued by Johnson, and he frequently attended him in airings. They also went together to Chichester, and they visited Petworth, and <sup>1</sup> Johnson, though dissatisfied with Mrs. Thrale, meant no reproach on this occasion — he makes a parting use of the library — makes a valediction to the church, and pronounces a prayer on quitting "a place where he had enjoyed so much comfort," not because Mrs. Thrale made him less welcome there, but because she, and he with her, were leaving it. When Boswell came to town six months later, he found his friend domiciled in Mrs. Thrale's residence in Argyll Street. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> He seems to have taken leave of the kitchen as well as of the church at Streatham in Latin.

<sup>3</sup> Oct. 6. Die Dominica, 1782.

"Pransus sum Streathamæ agninum cruis coctum cum herbis (spinach) comminutis, farcinem farinaceum cum ovis passis, lumbos bovillos, et pullum gallinæ Turcicæ; et poscarnes missas, ficus, uvas, non admodum maturas, ita voluit anni intemperies, cum malis Persicis, iis tamen duris. Non lætus accubui, cibum modicè sumpsit, ne intemperantiâ a extremum peccaretur. Si recte memini, in mentem venerunt epulis in excoquis Hadoni celebrare. Streathamianum quand revisam?" — Rose MSS. The phrase "ne intemperantiâ a extremum peccaretur" is remarkable, and proves that this, which at first sight looks like burlesque, was written in sober sadness. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> Mr. Metcalfe, who signed the Round Robin, antè, p. 531. He was a friend of Sir Joshua Reynolds, and a member of three parliaments. He took a leading part in the relief of the French clergy, expelled by the Revolution, and died May 24 1809. — CROKER, 1847.

Cowdray, the venerable seat of the Lords Montacute. "Sir," said Johnson, "I should like to stay here four-and-twenty hours. We see here how our ancestors lived."

That his curiosity was still unabated appears from two letters to Mr. John Nichols, of the 10th and 20th of October this year. In one he says, "I have looked into your 'Anecdotes,' and you will hardly thank a lover of literary history for telling you that he has been much informed and gratified. I wish you would add your own discoveries and intelligence to those of Dr. Rawlinson<sup>2</sup>, and undertake the Supplement to Wood. Think of it." In the other, "I wish, Sir, you could obtain some fuller information of Jortin<sup>3</sup>, Markland<sup>4</sup>, and Thirlby.<sup>5</sup> They were three contemporaries of great eminence."

JOHNSON TO REYNOLDS.

"Brightelmstone, Nov. 14. 1782.

"DEAR SIR, — I heard yesterday of your late disorder, and should think ill of myself if I had heard of it without alarm. I heard likewise of your recovery, which I sincerely wish to be complete and permanent. Your country has been in danger of losing one of its brightest ornaments, and I of losing one of my oldest and kindest friends; but I hope you will still live long, for the honour of the nation; and that more enjoyment of your elegance, your intelligence, and your benevolence is still reserved for, dear Sir, your most affectionate, &c.,

SAM. JOHNSON."

The Reverend Mr. Wilson<sup>6</sup> having dedicated to him his "Archæological Dictionary," that mark of respect was thus acknowledged: —

JOHNSON TO THE REV. MR. WILSON,

Clitheroe, Lancashire.

"Dec. 31. 1782.

"REVEREND SIR, — That I have long omitted to return you thanks for the honour conferred upon me by your dedication, I entreat you with great earnestness not to consider as more faulty than it is. A very importunate and oppressive disorder has for some time debarred me from the pleasures and obstructed me in the duties of life. The esteem and kindness of wise and good men is one of the last pleasures which I can be content to lose; and gratitude to those from whom this pleasure is received is a duty of which I hope never to be reproached with the final neglect. I therefore now return you thanks for the notice which I have received from you, and which I consider as giving to my name not only more bulk, but more weight; not only as extending its superficialities, but as increasing its value. Your book was evidently wanted, and will, I hope, find its way into the school; to which, however, I do not mean to confine it; for no man has so much skill in ancient rites and practices as not to want it. As I suppose myself to owe part of your kindness to my excellent friend, Dr. Patten, he has likewise a just claim to my acknowledgment, which I hope you, Sir, will transmit. There will soon appear a new edition of my Poetical Biography: if you will accept of a copy to keep me in your mind, be pleased to let me know how it may be conveniently conveyed to you. This present is small, but it is given with good-will by, reverend Sir, your most, &c.,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

<sup>1</sup> This venerable mansion has since [25th Sept. 1793] been totally destroyed by fire. — MALONE. There is a popular superstition that this inheritance is accursed, for having been part of the plunder of the church at the Dissolution; and some lamentable accidents have given countenance to the vulgar prejudice. When I visited the ruins of Cowdray some twenty years ago I was reminded (in addition to older stories) that the curse of both fire and water had fallen on Cowdray; its noble owner, Browne Viscount Montagu, the last male of his ancient race, having been drowned in the Rhine at Schaffhausen in October, 1793, a few days after the destruction of Cowdray: and the good folks of the neighbourhood did not scruple to prophesy that it would turn out a fatal inheritance. At that period the present possessor, Mr. Poyntz, who had married Lord Montagu's sister and heiress, had two sons, who seemed destined to inherit Cowdray; but, on the 7th July, 1815, these young gentlemen, boating off Epsom with their father, on a very fine day, the boat was unexpectedly upset, and the two youths perished; and thus were once more fulfilled the forebodings of superstition. See some curious observations on the subject of the fatality attending the inheritance of confiscated church property in Sir Henry Spelman's Treatise on the "History and Fall of Sacrilege." — CROKER, 1831. See Archbishop Whittgift's speech to Queen Elizabeth, as given by Walton, in his "Life of Hooker: "Curses have, and will cleave to the very stones of those buildings that have been consecrated to God, and the father's sin of sacrilege hath and will prove to be entailed on his son and family." See also the remarkable passage of Sir H. Spelman's History and Fate of Sacrilege quoted, Quarterly Review, vol. 41. p. 188. — MARKLAND, 1835. The Browne and Poyntz families being extinct in the male line, Cowdray has lately passed by purchase into the possession of the Earl of Egmont — let us hope melioribus fatis. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>2</sup> Dr. Richard Rawlinson, an eminent antiquary, and a great benefactor to the University of Oxford. He founded the Anglo-Saxon professorship there, and bequeathed to it all his collection of MSS., medals, antiquities, and curiosities. He died in 1754, at. 65. There had been some idea of obtaining this professorship for Johnson. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> Dr. John Jortin, a voluminous and respectable writer on general subjects, as well as an eminent divine. He died in August, 1770, Archdeacon of London and Vicar of Kensington; where his piety and charity, greater even than his great learning and talents, are still remembered. His laconic epitaph in Kensington churchyard, dictated by himself, contains a new turn of that thought which must be common to all epitaphs. — Johannes Jortin mortalis esse desit, A.S. 1770, at. 72. "John Jortin ceased to be mortal, &c." — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> Jeremiah Markland was an eminent critic, particularly in Greek literature. He died in 1776, at. 83. — CROKER.

<sup>5</sup> Styan Thirlby: a critic of at least as much reputation as he deserves. He studied successively divinity, medicine, and law. He seems to have been of a temper at once perverse and indolent, and to have dimmed and disgraced his talents by habits of intoxication. He complains, in a strain of self-satisfaction, that "when a man (meaning himself) thus towers by intellectual exaltation above his contemporaries, he is represented as drunken, or lazy, or capricious." He died in 1753, at. 61. — CROKER.

<sup>6</sup> A concise but very just character of Mr. Wilson is given by Dr. Whittaker in the dedication of a plate, in the History of Whalley. "Viro Reverendo Thomæ Wilson S. T. B. ecclesie de Clitheroe, ministro — sodali jucundissimo — αγαθολογῶν insignifelicij juvenum institutori." He died in 1813, aged sixty-five; during about forty of which, he was laboriously occupied as the master of the grammar school of Clitheroe. — MARKLAND.

CHAPTER LXXV.

1783.

Country Gentleman. — House of Hanover. — Conversation. — Lies of Vanity. — Opium. — Exaggeration. — Neglect of Merit. — Use of Riches. — Crabbe's "Village." — Keeping Accounts. — Lords Mansfield, Loughborough, and Thurlow. — Harrington's Nuga Antiqua. — "Quos Deus vult perdere," &c. — Prince of Wales. — Burney's Travels. — Chinese Architecture. — Innovation. — Tyburn. — Dr. Hurd. — Parentheses. — "Derrick or Smart." — "The great Twalmley." — Owen Cambridge. — Family Histories. — "Turkish Spy." — Orchards. — Oratory. — Origin of Language. — Madness. — Rev. James Compton.

In 1783 he was more severely afflicted than ever, as will appear in the course of his correspondence; but still the same ardour for literature, the same constant piety, the same kindness for his friends, and the same vivacity, both in conversation and writing, distinguished him.

Having given Dr. Johnson a full account of what I was doing at Auchinleck, and particularly mentioned what I knew would please him,—my having brought an old man of eighty-eight from a lonely cottage to a comfortable habitation within my inclosures, where he had good neighbours near to him,—I received an answer in February, of which I extract what follows:

"I am delighted with your account of your activity at Auchinleck, and wish the old gentleman, whom you have so kindly removed, may live long to promote your prosperity by his prayers. You have now a new character and new duties; think on them and practise them.

"Make an impartial estimate of your revenue; and whatever it is, live upon less. Resolve never to be poor. Frugality is not only the basis of quiet, but of beneficence. No man can help others that wants help himself. We must have enough, before we have to spare.

"I am glad to find that Mrs. Boswell grows well; and hope that, to keep her well, no care nor caution will be omitted. May you long live happily together. When you come hither, pray bring with you Baxter's Anacreon. I cannot get that edition in London."<sup>1</sup>

On Friday, March 21., having arrived in London the night before, I was glad to find him at Mrs. Thrale's house, in Argyll Street, appearances of friendship between them being still kept up. I was shown into his room; and after the first salutation he said, "I am glad you are come; I am very ill." He looked pale, and was distressed with a difficulty of breathing; but after the common inquiries, he assumed his usual strong animated style of conversation. Seeing me now for the first time as a laird, or proprietor of land, he began thus: "Sir, the superiority of a country gentleman over the people upon his estate is very agreeable; and he who says he does not feel it to be agreeable, lies; for it must be agreeable to have a casual superiority over those who are by nature equal with us." BOSWELL. "Yet, Sir, we see great proprietors of land who prefer living in London." JOHNSON. "Why, Sir, the pleasure of living in London, the intellectual superiority that is enjoyed there, may counterbalance the other. Besides, Sir, a man may prefer the state of the country gentleman upon the whole, and yet there may never be a moment when he is willing to make the change, to quit London for it." He said, "It is better to have five per cent. out of land than out of money, because it is more secure; but the readiness of transfer and promptness of interest make many people rather choose the funds. Nay, there is another disadvantage belonging to land, compared with money: a man is not so much afraid of being a hard creditor, as of being a hard landlord." BOSWELL. "Because there is a sort of kindly connexion between a landlord and his tenants." JOHNSON. "No, Sir; many landlords with us never see their tenants. It is because, if a landlord drives away his tenants, he may not get others; whereas the demand for money is so great, it may always be lent."

He talked with regret and indignation of the factious opposition to government at this time, and imputed it in a great measure to the Revolution. "Sir," said he, in a low voice, having come nearer to me, while his old prejudices seemed to be fermenting in his mind, "this Hanoverian family is isolée here. They have no friends. Now the Stuarts had friends who stuck by them so late as 1745. When the right of the king is not revered, there will not be reverence for those appointed by the king."

His observation, that the present royal family has no friends, has been too much justified by the very ungrateful behaviour of many who were under great obligations to his majesty: at the same time there are honourable exceptions; and the very next year after this conversation, and ever since, the king has had as extensive and generous support as ever was given to any monarch, and has had the satisfaction of knowing that he was more and more endeared to his people.

He repeated to me his verses on Mr. Levett, with an emotion which gave them full effect; and then he was pleased to say, "You must be as much with me as you can. You have done me good. You cannot think how much better I am since you came in."

He sent a message to acquaint Mrs. Thrale

<sup>1</sup> Dr. Johnson should seem not to have sought diligently for Baxter's Anacreon; for there are two editions of that book, and they are frequently found in the London sale catalogues.—MALONE.

that I was arrived. I had not seen her since her husband's death. She soon appeared, and favoured me with an invitation to stay to dinner, which I accepted. There was no other company but herself and three of her daughters, Dr. Johnson, and I. She too said she was very glad I was come; for she was going to Bath, and should have been sorry to leave Dr. Johnson before I came. This seemed to be attentive and kind; and I, who had not been informed of any change, imagined all to be as well as formerly. He was little inclined to talk at dinner, and went to sleep after it; but when he joined us in the drawing-room he seemed revived, and was again himself.

Talking of conversation, he said, "There must, in the first place, be knowledge — there must be materials; in the second place, there must be a command of words; in the third place, there must be imagination, to place things in such views as they are not commonly seen in; and, in the fourth place, there must be presence of mind, and a resolution that is not to be overcome by failures: this last is an essential requisite; for want of it many people do not excel in conversation. Now I want it; I throw up the game upon losing a trick." I wondered to hear him talk thus of himself, and said, "I don't know, Sir, how this may be; but I am sure you beat other people's cards out of their hands." I doubt whether he heard this remark. While he went on talking triumphantly, I was fixed in admiration, and said to Mrs. Thrale, "O for short-hand to take this down!"—"You'll carry it all in your head," said she: "a long head is as good as short-hand."

It has been observed and wondered at, that Mr. Charles Fox never talked with any freedom in the presence of Dr. Johnson; though it is well known, and I myself can witness, that his conversation is various, fluent, and exceedingly agreeable. Johnson's own experience, however, of that gentleman's reserve, was a sufficient reason for his going on thus: "Fox never talks in private company; not from any determination not to talk, but because he has not the first motion. A man who is used to the applause of the House of Commons has no wish for that of a private company. A man accustomed to throw for a thousand pounds, if set down to throw for sixpence, would not be at the pains to count his dice. Burke's talk is the ebullition of his mind. He does not talk from a desire of distinction, but because his mind is full."

He thus curiously characterised one of our old acquaintance: "[Sheridan] is a good man, Sir; but he is a vain man and a liar. He, however, only tells lies of vanity; of victories, for instance, in conversation, which never happened." This alluded to a story, which I had repeated from that gentleman, to entertain Johnson with its wild bravado. "This Johnson, Sir," said he, "whom you are all afraid of, will shrink, if you come close to him in argument, and roar as loud as he. He once maintained the paradox, that there is no beauty but in utility. 'Sir, said I, 'what say you to the peacock's tail, which is one of the most beautiful objects in nature, but would have as much utility if its feathers were all of one colour?' He felt what I thus produced, and had recourse to his usual expedient, ridicule; exclaiming, 'A peacock has a tail, and a fox has a tail;' and then he burst out into a laugh. 'Well, Sir,' said I, with a strong voice, looking him full in the face, 'you have unkenmelled your fox; pursue him if you dare.' He had not a word to say, Sir." Johnson told me that this was fiction from beginning to end.<sup>1</sup>

After musing for some time, he said, "I wonder how I should have any enemies; for I do harm to nobody."<sup>2</sup> BOSWELL. "In the first place, Sir, you will be pleased to recollect that you set out with attacking the Scotch; so you got a whole nation for your enemies." JOHNSON. "Why, I own that by my definition of oats I meant to vex them." BOSWELL. "Pray, Sir, can you trace the cause of your antipathy to the Scotch?" JOHNSON. "I cannot, Sir."<sup>3</sup> BOSWELL. "Old Mr. Sheridan says it was because they sold Charles the First." JOHNSON. "Then, Sir, old Mr. Sheridan has found out a very good reason."

Surely the most obstinate and sulky nationality, the most determined aversion to this great and good man, must be cured, when he is seen thus playing with one of his prejudices, of which he candidly admitted that he could not tell the reason. It was, however, probably owing to his having had in his view the worst part of the Scottish nation, the needy adventurers<sup>4</sup>, many of whom he thought were <sup>1</sup> Were I to insert all the stories which have been told of contests boldly maintained with him, imaginary victories obtained over him, of reducing him to silence, and of making him own that his antagonist had the better of him in argument, my volumes would swell to an immoderate size. One instance, I find, has circulated both in conversation and in print; that when he would not allow the Scotch writers to have merit, the late Dr. Rose, of Chiswick, asserted, that he could name me Scotch writer whom Dr. Johnson himself would allow to have written better than any man of the age; and upon Johnson's asking who it was, answered "Lord Bute, when he signed the warrant for your pension." Upon which Johnson, struck with the repartee, acknowledged that it was true. When I mentioned it to Johnson, "Sir," said he, "if Rose said this, I never heard it." — BOSWELL.

<sup>2</sup> This reflection was very natural in a man of a good heart, who was not conscious of any ill-will to mankind, though the sharp sayings which were sometimes produced by his discrimination and vivacity, which he perhaps did not recollect, were I am afraid, too often remembered with resentment. — BOSWELL.

<sup>3</sup> When Johnson asserted so distinctly that he could not trace the cause of his antipathy to the Scotch, it may seem unjust to attribute to him any secret personal motive; but it is the essence of prejudice to be unconscious of its cause, and I am convinced that Johnson received in early life some serious injury or affront from the Scotch. See anté, p. 54. n. 2. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> This can hardly have been the cause. Many of Johnson's earliest associates were indeed "needy Scotch adventurers;" that is, they were poor scholars, indigent men of education and talent, who brought those articles to the London market, as Dr. Johnson himself had done. Such were Sheils, Stewart, Macbean, &c. But Johnson had no aversion to these men:

advanced above their merits by means which he did not approve. Had he in his early life been in Scotland, and seen the worthy, sensible, independent gentlemen, who live rationally and hospitably at home, he never could have entertained such unfavourable and unjust notions of his fellow-subjects. And accordingly we find, that when he did visit Scotland, in the latter period of his life, he was fully sensible of all that it deserved, as I have already pointed out when speaking of his "Journey to the Western Islands."

Next day, Saturday, 22d March, I found him still at Mrs. Thrale's, but he told me that he was to go to his own house in the afternoon. He was better, but I perceived he was but an unruly patient; for Sir Lucas Pepys, who visited him while I was with him, said, "If you were tractable, Sir, I should prescribe for you."

I related to him a remark which a respectable friend had made to me upon the then state of government, when those who had been long in opposition had attained to power, as it was supposed, against the inclination of the sovereign. "You need not be uneasy," said this gentleman, "about the king. He laughs at them all; he plays them one against another." JOHNSON. "Don't think so, Sir. The king is as much oppressed as a man can be. If he plays them one against another, he wins nothing."

I had paid a visit to General Oglethorpe in the morning, and was told by him that Dr. Johnson saw company on Saturday evenings, and he would meet me at Johnson's that night. When I mentioned this to Johnson, not doubting that it would please him, as he had a great value for Oglethorpe, the fretfulness of his disease<sup>1</sup> unexpectedly showed itself; his anger suddenly kindled, and he said with vehemence, "Did not you tell him not to come? Am I to be hunted in this manner?" I satisfied him that I could not divine that the visit would not be convenient, and that I certainly could not take it upon me of my own accord to forbid the General.

I found Dr. Johnson in the evening in Mrs. Williams's room, at tea and coffee with her and Mrs. Desmoulins, who were also both ill; it was a sad scene, and he was not in a very good humour. He said of a performance that had lately come out, "Sir, if you should search all the madhouses in England, you would not find ten men who would write so, and think it sense."<sup>2</sup>

I was glad when General Oglethorpe's arrival was announced, and we left the ladies. Dr. Johnson attended him in the parlour, and was as courteous as ever. The General said he was busy reading the writers of the middle age. Johnson said they were very curious. OGLETHORPE. "The House of Commons has usurped the power of the nation's money and used it tyrannically.<sup>3</sup> Government is now carried on by corrupt influence, instead of the inherent right of the king." JOHNSON. "Sir, the want of inherent right in the king occasions all this disturbance. What we did at the Revolution was necessary; but it broke our constitution."<sup>4</sup> OGLETHORPE. "My father did not think it necessary."

On Sunday, 23d March, I breakfasted with Dr. Johnson, who seemed much relieved, having taken opium the night before. He however protested against it, as a remedy that should be given with the utmost reluctance, and only in extreme necessity. I mentioned how commonly it was used in Turkey, and that therefore it could not be so pernicious as he apprehended. He grew warm, and said, "Turks take opium, and Christians take opium; but Russel, in his account of Aleppo, tells us, that it is as disgraceful in Turkey to take too much opium, as it is with us to get drunk. Sir, it is amazing how things are exaggerated. A gentleman was lately telling in a company where I was present, that in France as soon as a man of fashion marries, he takes an opera girl into keeping; and this he mentioned as a general custom. 'Pray, Sir,' said I, 'how many opera girls may there be?' He answered, 'About fourscore.' 'Well then, Sir,' said I, 'you see there can be no more than fourscore men of fashion who can do this.'<sup>5</sup>

Mrs. Desmoulins made tea; and she and I talked before him upon a topic which he had once borne patiently from me when we were by ourselves, — his not complaining of the world, because he was not called to some great office, nor had attained to great wealth. He flew into a violent passion, I confess with some on the contrary, he lived with them in familiar friendship, did them active kindnesses, and with Macbean (who seems to have been the survivor of his earliest friends) he continued in the kindest intercourse to his last hour. — CROKER.

<sup>1</sup> Johnson suspected that Boswell, with his usual officiousness, had invited Oglethorpe to this unseasonable visit. When Johnson chides his over-zealous friend for such intermeddling, Boswell, with easy complacency, can discover no cause for the reprimand but Johnson's sickness or ill humour. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> I suspect that "Annus Mirabilis; or, the Eventful Year 1782, an Historical Poem, by the Rev. W. Tasker, author of the Warlike Genius of Britain," (see anté, p. 624. n. 3) is here meant. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> What could General Oglethorpe mean by saying that "the House of Commons had usurped the power of the nation's money?" Since a House of Commons has existed, has it not exercised the power of the nation's money? It

Mr. Boswell did not make an erroneous note, General Oglethorpe talked nonsense, which indeed there is reason to suspect that this amiable old gentleman (now in his 85th year) sometimes did. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> I have, in my "Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides," fully expressed my sentiments upon this subject. The Revolution was necessary, but not a subject for glory; because it for a long time blasted the generous feelings of loyalty. And now, when by the benignant effect of time the present royal family are established in our affections, how unwise is it to revive by celebrations the memory of a shock, which it would surely have been better that our constitution had not required! — BOSWELL.

<sup>5</sup> Yes; but it may be doubted whether there were fourscore persons whom the society of Paris would admit to be strictly and par excellence men of fashion. The fact, however, though expressed with colloquial latitude, was but too nearly true. — CROKER.

justice, and commanded us to have done. "Nobody," said he, "has a right to talk in this manner, to bring before a man his own character, and the events of his life, when he does not choose it should be done. I never have sought the world; the world was not to seek me. It is rather wonderful that so much has been done for me. All the complaints which are made of the world are unjust. I never knew a man of merit neglected; it was generally by his own fault that he failed of success. A man may hide his head in a hole; he may go into the country, and publish a book now and then, which nobody reads, and then complain he is neglected. There is no reason why any person should exert himself for a man who has written a good book: he has not written it for any individual. I may as well make a present to the postman who brings me a letter. When patronage was limited, an author expected to find a Mæcenas, and complained if he did not find one. Why should he complain? This Mæcenas has others as good as he, or others who have got the start of him." BOSWELL. "But, surely, Sir, you will allow that there are men of merit at the bar, who never get practice." JOHNSON. "Sir, you are sure that practice is got from an opinion that the person employed deserves it best; so that if a man of merit at the bar does not get practice, it is from error, not from injustice. He is not neglected. A horse that is brought to market may not be bought, though he is a very good horse; but that is from ignorance, not from inattention."

There was in this discourse much novelty, ingenuity, and discrimination, such as is seldom to be found. Yet I cannot help thinking that men of merit, who have no success in life, may be forgiven for lamenting, if they are not allowed to complain. They may consider it as hard that their merit should not have its suitable distinction. Though there is no intentional injustice towards them on the part of the world, their merit not having been perceived, they may yet repine against fortune or fate, or by whatever name they choose to call the supposed mythological power of destiny. It has, however, occurred to me, as a consolatory thought, that men of merit should consider thus:—How much harder would it be, if the same persons had both all the merit and all the prosperity? Would not this be a miserable distribution for the poor dunces? Would men of merit exchange their intellectual superiority, and the enjoyments arising from it, for external distinction and the pleasures of wealth? If they would not, let them not envy others, who are poor where they are rich, a compensation which is made to them. Let them look inwards and be satisfied; recollecting with conscious pride what Virgil finely says of the Corycæus Senex, and which I have, in another place<sup>1</sup>, with truth and sincerity applied to Mr. Burke:

"Regum æquabat opes animis."

On the subject of the right employment of wealth, Johnson observed,—"A man cannot make a bad use of his money, so far as regards society, if he does not hoard it<sup>2</sup>; for if he either spends it or lends it out, society has the benefit. It is in general better to spend money than to give it away; for industry is more promoted by spending money than by giving it away. A man who spends his money is sure he is doing good with it; he is not so sure when he gives it away. A man who spends ten thousand a year will do more good than a man who spends two thousand and gives away eight."

In the evening I came to him again. He was somewhat fretful from his illness. A gentleman asked him whether he had been abroad to-day. "Don't talk so childishly," said he. "You may as well ask if I hanged myself to-day." I mentioned politics. JOHNSON. "Sir, I'd as soon have a man to break my bones as talk to me of public affairs, internal or external. I have lived to see things all as bad as they can be."

Having mentioned his friend the second Lord Southwell, he said, "Lord Southwell was the highest-bred man without insolence, that I ever was in company with; the most qualified I ever saw. Lord Orrery was not dignified; Lord Chesterfield was, but he was insolent. Lord *****<sup>3</sup> is a man of coarse manners, but a man of abilities and information. I don't say he is a man I would set at the head of a nation, though perhaps he may be as good as the next prime minister that comes; but he is a man to be at the head of a club,—I don't say our CLUB,—for there's no such club." BOSWELL. "But, Sir, was he not a factious man?" JOHNSON. "O yes, Sir, as factious a fellow as could be found; one who was for sinking us all into the mob." BOSWELL. "How then, Sir, did he get into favour with the king?" JOHNSON. "Because, Sir, I suppose he promised the king to do whatever the king pleased."

He said, "Goldsmith's blundering speech to Lord Shelburne, which has been so often mentioned, and which he really did make to him, was only a blunder in emphasis:—'I wonder <sup>1</sup> Letter to the People of Scotland against the Attempt to diminish the Number of Lords of Session, 1785.—BOSWELL. I do not see the peculiar resemblance between these men of merit—Mr. Burke and the old Corycæus.—CROKER, 1847.

<sup>2</sup> This surely is too broadly stated: society is injured when money is spent, as in the case of Egalité, Duke of Orleans, in profligacy or corruption, or in exciting political sedition.—CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> Shelburne, the second Earl, afterwards first Marquis of Lansdowne. He was now the head of the short-lived ministry of 1782, of which Mr. Pitt was Chancellor of the Exchequer, and which was ousted by the coalition in 1783, soon after this conversation. See anté, p. 584. n. 5, and post, p. 721. n. 2.—CROKER.

they should call your lordship Malagrida, for Malagrida was a very good man ;— meant, I wonder they should use Malagrida as a term of reproach."

Soon after this time I had an opportunity of seeing, by means of one of his friends, a proof that his talents, as well as his obliging service to authors, were ready as ever. He had revised "The Village," an admirable poem, by the Reverend Mr. Crabbe.<sup>1</sup> Its sentiments as to the false notions of rustic happiness and rustic virtue were quite congenial with his own; and he had taken the trouble not only to suggest slight corrections and variations, but to furnish some lines when he thought he could give the writer's meaning better than in the words of the manuscript.<sup>2</sup>

JOHNSON TO REYNOLDS.

March 4. 1783.

"STR,— I have sent you back Mr. Crabbe's poem, which I read with great delight. It is original, vigorous, and elegant.

"The alterations which I have made I do not require him to adopt, for my lines are, perhaps, not often better than his own; but he may take mine and his own together, and perhaps between them produce something better than either. He is not to think his copy wantonly defaced. A wet sponge will wash all the red lines away, and leave the page clear.

"His dedication will be least liked. It were better to contract it into a short sprightly address. I do not doubt Mr. Crabbe's success. I am, Sir, &c., SAM. JOHNSON."

— Reynolds MSS.

On Sunday, March 30., I found him at home in the evening, and had the pleasure to meet with Dr. Brocklesby, whose reading, and knowledge of life, and good spirits, supply him with a never-failing source of conversation. He mentioned a respectable gentleman, who became extremely penurious near the close of his life. Johnson said there must have been a degree of madness about him. "Not at all,

Sir," said Dr. Brocklesby, "his judgment was entire." Unluckily, however, he mentioned that although he had a fortune of twenty-seven thousand pounds, he denied himself many comforts, from an apprehension that he could not afford them. "Nay, Sir," cried Johnson, "when the judgment is so disturbed that a man cannot count, that is pretty well."

I shall here insert a few of Johnson's sayings, without the formality of dates, as they have no reference to any particular time or place.

"The more a man extends and varies his acquaintance, the better." This, however, was meant with a just restriction; for he on another occasion said to me, "Sir, a man may be so much of every thing, that he is nothing of any thing."

"Raising the wages of day-labourers is wrong; for it does not make them live better, but only makes them idler, and idleness is a very bad thing for human nature."

"It is a very good custom to keep a journal for a man's own use; he may write upon a card a day all that is necessary to be written, after he has had experience of life. At first there is a great deal to be written, because, there is a great deal of novelty: but when once a man has settled his opinions, there is seldom much to be set down."

"There is nothing wonderful in the Journal<sup>3</sup> which we see Swift kept in London, for it contains slight topics, and it might soon be written."

I praised the accuracy of an account-book of a lady whom I mentioned. JOHNSON. "Keeping accounts, Sir, is of no use when a man is spending his own money, and has nobody to whom he is to account. You won't eat less beef to-day, because you have written down what it cost yesterday." I mentioned another lady who thought as he did, so that her husband could not get her to keep an account of the expense of the family, as she thought it enough that she never exceeded the

*Must sleepy bards the flattering dream prolong,
Mechanic echoes of the Mantuan song?
From truth and nature shall we widely stray,
Where Virgil, not where fancy, leads the way?"*

Here we find Johnson's poetical and critical powers undiminished. I must however observe, that the aids he gave to this poem, as to "The Traveller" and "Deserted Village" of Goldsmith, were so small as by no means to impair the distinguished merit of the author.—BOSWELL.

<sup>3</sup> In his Life of Swift, he thus speaks of this Journal: "In the midst of his power and his politics, he kept a journal of his visits, his walks, his interviews with ministers, and quarrels with his servant, and transmitted it to Mrs. Johnson and Mrs. Dingley, to whom he knew that whatever befell him was interesting, and no account could be too minute. Whether these diurnal trifles were properly exposed to eyes which had never received any pleasure from the dean, may be reasonably doubted: they have, however, some odd attractions: the reader finding frequent mention of names which he has been used to consider as important, goes on in hope of information; and, as there is nothing to fatigue attention, if he is disappointed, he can hardly complain." It may be added, that the reader not only hopes to find, but does find, in this very entertaining Journal, such curious information, respecting persons and things, which he will in vain seek for in other books of the same period.—MALONE.

<sup>1</sup> This amiable gentleman is still alive, resident in his rectory of Trowbridge, in Wiltshire. His subsequent publications have placed him high in the roll of British poets—though his having taken a view of life too minute, too humiliating, too painful, and too just, may have deprived his works of so extensive, or, at least, so brilliant, a popularity as some of his contemporaries have attained: but I venture to believe, that there is no poet of his times who will stand higher in the opinion of posterity. He generally deals with "the short and simple annals of the poor," but he exhibits them with such a deep knowledge of human nature—with such general ease and simplicity, and such accurate force of expression, whether gay or pathetic, as, in my humble judgment, no poet, except Shakespeare, has excelled.—C., 1831. Mr. Crabbe died Feb. 8, 1832.—CROKER, 1835.

<sup>2</sup> I shall give an instance, marking the original by Roman, and Johnson's substitution in Italic characters:

"In fairer scenes, where peaceful pleasures spring,
Tityrus, the pride of Mantuan swains might sing;
But charm'd by him, or smitten with his views,
Shall modern poets court the Mantuan muse?
From truth and nature shall we widely stray,
Where iancy leads, or Virgil led the way?"

"On *Mincio's banks, in Cæsar's boundless reign,
If Tityrus found the golden age again,*

sum allowed her. JOHNSON. "Sir, it is fit she should keep an account, because her husband wishes it; but I do not see its use." I maintained that keeping an account has this advantage, that it satisfies a man that his money has not been lost or stolen, which he might sometimes be apt to imagine, were there no written state of his expense; and, besides, a calculation of economy, so as not to exceed one's income, cannot be made without a view of the different articles in figures, that one may see how to retrench in some particulars less necessary than others. This he did not attempt to answer.

Talking of an acquaintance of ours<sup>1</sup>, whose narratives, which abounded in curious and interesting topics, were unhappily found to be very fabulous; I mentioned Lord Mansfield's having said to me, "Suppose we believe one half of what he tells." JOHNSON. "Ay; but we don't know which half to believe. By his lying we lose not only our reverence for him, but all comfort in his conversation." BOSWELL. "May we not take it as amusing fiction?" JOHNSON. "Sir, the misfortune is, that you will insensibly believe as much of it as you incline to believe."

It is remarkable, that notwithstanding their congeniality in politics, he never was acquainted with a late eminent noble judge<sup>2</sup>, whom I have heard speak of him as a writer with great respect. JOHNSON, I know not upon what degree of investigation, entertained no exalted opinion of his lordship's intellectual character. Talking of him to me one day, he said, "It is wonderful, Sir, with how little real superiority of mind men can make an eminent figure in public life." He expressed himself to the same purpose concerning another law-lord<sup>3</sup>, who, it seems, once took a fancy to associate with the wits of London; but with so little success, that Foote said, "What can he mean by coming among us? He is not only dull himself, but the cause of dulness in others." Trying him by the test of his colloquial powers, JOHNSON had found him very defective. He once said to Sir Joshua Reynolds, "This man now has been ten years about town, and has made nothing of it;" meaning as a companion.<sup>4</sup> He said to me, "I never heard any thing from him in company that was at all striking; and depend upon it, Sir, it is when you come close to a man in conversation, that you discover what his real abilities are: to make a speech in a public assembly is a knack. Now, I honour Thurlow, Sir; Thurlow is a fine fellow; he fairly puts his mind to yours."

After repeating to him some of his pointed, lively sayings, I said, "It is a pity, Sir, you don't always remember your own good things, that you may have a laugh when you will." JOHNSON. "Nay, Sir, it is better that I forget them, that I may be reminded of them, and have a laugh on their being brought to my recollection."

When I recalled to him his having said, as we sailed up Lochlomond, "That if he wore any thing fine, it should be very fine;" I observed that all his thoughts were upon a great scale. JOHNSON. "Depend upon it, Sir, every man will have as fine a thing as he can get; as large a diamond for his ring." BOSWELL. "Pardon me, Sir; a man of a narrow mind will not think of it; a slight trinket will satisfy him:

<sup>1</sup> Nec sufferre queat majoris pondera gemmæ."<sup>5</sup>

I told him I should send him some "Essays" which I had written<sup>6</sup>, which I hoped he would be so good as to read, and pick out the good ones. JOHNSON. "Nay, Sir, send me only the good ones: don't make me pick them."

I heard him once say, "Though the proverb 'Nullum numen adest, si sit prudentia,' does not always prove true, we may be certain of the converse of it, 'Nullum numen adest, si sit imprudentia.'"<sup>7</sup>

Once, when Mr. Seward was going to Bath, and asked his commands, he said, "Tell Dr. Harington that I wish he would publish another volume of the 'Nugæ Antiquæ;'<sup>8</sup> it is a very pretty book."<sup>9</sup> Mr. Seward seconded this wish, and recommended to Dr. Harington to dedicate it to JOHNSON, and take for his motto what Catullus says to Cornelius Nepos:

"————— namque tu solebas
Meas esse aliquid putare NUGAS."<sup>10</sup>

As a small proof of his kindness and delicacy of feeling, the following circumstance may be mentioned: One evening, when we

<sup>1</sup> This, Mr. Chalmers thought, was George Stevens. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>2</sup> Lord Mansfield. See antè, p. 232. n. 1. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> No doubt Lord Loughborough. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> Knowing as well as I do what precision and elegance of oratory his lordship can display, I cannot but suspect that his unfavourable appearance in a social circle, which drew such animadversions upon him, must be owing to a cold affectation of consequence, from being reserved and stiff. If it be so and he might be an agreeable man if he would, we cannot be sorry that he misses his aim. — BOSWELL.

<sup>5</sup> He fears the burthen of a heavier gem.
Juvenal, i. 29. — C.

<sup>6</sup> They are to be found, under the title of "The Hypochondriack," in the London Magazine from 1775 to 1781. — CROKER.

<sup>7</sup> Mrs. Piozzi gives a more classical and, I suppose, more correct, version of JOHNSON'S variation: Nullum numen adest nisi sit prudentia. — CROKER.

<sup>8</sup> It has since appeared. — BOSWELL. Though the MSS., of which this work was composed, had descended to Dr. Harington, the work was not edited by him, but by the Reverend Henry Harington, M. A. — MARKLAND.

<sup>9</sup> A new and greatly improved edition of this very curious collection was published by Mr. Park in 1804, in two volumes, octavo. In this edition the letters are chronologically arranged, and the account of the bishops, which was formerly printed from a very corrupt copy, is taken from Sir John Harington's original manuscript, which he presented to Henry, Prince of Wales, and is now in the royal library in the Museum. — MALONE.

<sup>10</sup> ———— For you are wont
To think my trifles something. — C.

were in the street together, and I told him I was going to sup at Mr. Beauclerk's, he said, "I'll go with you." After having walked part of the way, seeming to recollect something, he suddenly stopped and said, "I cannot go, — but I do not love Beauclerk the less."

On the frame of his portrait Mr. Beauclerk had inscribed

"———— Ingenium ingens Inculto latet hoc sub corpore."

After Mr. Beauclerk's death, when it became Mr. Langton's property, he made the inscription to be defaced. Johnson said complacently, "It was kind in you to take it off;" and then, after a short pause, added, "and not unkind in him to put it on."

He said, "How few of his friends' houses would a man choose to be at when he is sick!" He mentioned one or two. I recollect only Thrale's.

He observed, "There is a wicked inclination in most people to suppose an old man decayed in his intellects. If a young or middle-aged man, when leaving a company, does not recollect where he laid his hat, it is nothing; but if the same inattention is discovered in an old man, people will shrug up their shoulders, and say, 'His memory is going.'"

When I once talked to him of some of the sayings which every body repeats, but nobody knows where to find, such as Quos DEUS vult perdere, prius dementat; he told me that he was once offered ten guineas to point out from whence Semel insanivimus omnes was taken.

<sup>1</sup> The whole passage is very descriptive of Johnson:

"———— Iracundior est paulo: minus aptus acutus
Naribus horum hominum: rideri possit eo quod
Rusticius tonso toga deluit: et male laxus
In pede calceus hæret: at est bonus, ut melior vir
Non alius quisquam: at tibi amicus: at ingenium ingens Inculto latet hoc sub corpore." — Hor. Sat. iii. lib. 1. 27.

"Your friend is passionate — perhaps unfit
For the brisk petulance of modern wit:
His hair ill cut, his robe, that awkward flows
On his large shoes, to raillery expose
The man you love: yet is he not possess'd
Of virtues, with which very few are blest?"

While, underneath this rough uncouth disguise,
A genius of extensive knowledge lies." — Francis.

CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> The words occur (as Mr. Bindley observes to me) in the first Eclogue of Mantuanus, "De Honesto Amore," &c.

"Id commune malum; semel insanivimus omnes."

[The evil's common; all for once are mad. — C.]

With the following elucidation of the other saying — Quos DEUS (it should rather be, Quem JUPITER) vult perdere, prius dementat [Whom God would ruin, he first disorders in mind. — C.] Mr. Boswell was furnished by Mr. Richard How, of Apsley, in Bedfordshire, as communicated to that gentleman by his friend, Mr. John Pitts, late rector of Great Brick-hill, in Buckingham: "Perhaps no scrap of Latin whatever has been more quoted than this. It occasionally falls even from those who are scrupulous even to pedantry in their Latinity, and will not admit a word into their compositions which has not the sanction of the first age." The word demento is of no authority, either as a verb active or neuter. After a long search, for the purpose of deciding a bet, some gentlemen of Cambridge found it among the fragments of Euripides, in what edition I do not recollect, where it is given as a translation of a Greek Iambic:

Ὁ Θεὸς ἴθιμι ἀπολοῦσαι, πρῶτ' ἀποθνήσκω.

"The above scrap was found in the handwriting of a suicide of fashion, Sir D. O., some years ago, lying on the table of the room where he had destroyed himself. The suicide was

He could not do it; but many years afterwards met with it by chance in Johannes Baptista Mantuanus."

I am very sorry that I did not take a note of an eloquent argument, in which he maintained that the situation of Prince of Wales was the happiest of any person's in the kingdom, even beyond that of the sovereign. I recollect only—the enjoyment of hope—the high superiority of rank, without the anxious cares of government—and a great degree of power, both from natural influence wisely used, and from the sanguine expectations of those who look forward to the chance of future favour.

Sir Joshua Reynolds communicated to me the following particulars:

Johnson thought the poems published as translations from Ossian had so little merit, that he said, "Sir, a man might write such stuff for ever, if he would abandon his mind to it."

He said, "A man should pass a part of his time with the laughers, by which means any thing ridiculous or particular about him might be presented to his view, and corrected." I observed, he must have been a bold laugher who would have ventured to tell Dr. Johnson of any of his peculiarities.

Having observed the vain ostentatious importance of many people in quoting the authority of dukes and lords, as having been in their company, he said, he went to the other extreme, and did not mention his authority when he should have done it, had it not been that of a duke or a lord.

a man of classical acquirements: he left no other paper behind him." See another of these proverbial sayings,

"Incidit in Scyllam, cupiens vitare Charybdim,"
[Shunning Charybdis into Scylla falls. — C.]

I, some years ago, in a note on a passage in The Merchant of Venice, traced it to its source. It occurs (with a slight variation) in the Alexandreis of Philip Gualtier (a poet of the thirteenth century), which was printed at Lyons in 1558. Darius is the person addressed: —

"———— Quo tendis inertem,
Rex periture, fugam? nescis, heu! perditte, nescis
Quem fugias: hostes incurris dum fugis hostem;
Incidit in Scyllam, cupiens vitare Charybdim."

[Why, fated king, a tame evasion try?

You know not, Lost One, whom or where to fly;
You meet the foe you dread: and pressed by all,
Shunning Charybdis into Scylla fall. — C.]

The author of this line was first ascertained by Galleottus Martius, who died in 1476, as is observed in Menagiana, vol. iii. p. 130. edit. 1762. For an account of Philip Gualtier, see Vossius de Poet. Latini, p. 254. fol. 1637. A line, not less frequently quoted than any of the preceding, was suggested for inquiry, several years ago, in a note on The Rape of Lucrece:

"Solamen miseris socios habuisse doloris."

[—" 'Tis to the wretched some relief
To have, at least, a partner in their grief. — C.]

But the author of this verse has not, I believe, been discovered. — MALONE.

<sup>3</sup> I am happy, however, to mention a pleasing instance of his enduring with great gentleness to hear one of his most striking particularities pointed out: Miss Hunter, a niece of his friend Christopher Smart, when a very young girl, struck by his extraordinary notions, said to him, "Pray, Dr. Johnson, why do you make such strange gestures?" "From bad habit," he replied: "do you, my dear, take care to guard against bad habits." This I was told by the young lady's brother at Margate. — BOSWELL.

Dr. Goldsmith said once to Dr. Johnson that he wished for some additional members to the Literary Club, to give it an agreeable variety; "for," said he, "there can now be nothing new among us: we have travelled over one another's minds. Johnson seemed a little angry, and said, "Sir, you have not travelled over my mind, I promise you." Sir Joshua, however, thought Goldsmith right; observing, that "when people have lived a great deal together, they know what each of them will say on every subject. A new understanding, therefore, is desirable: because, though it may only furnish the same sense upon a question which would have been furnished by those with whom we are accustomed to live, yet this sense will have a different colouring; and colouring is of much effect in every thing else as well as in painting."

Johnson used to say that he made it a constant rule to talk as well as he could, both as to sentiment and expression; by which means, what had been originally effort became familiar and easy. The consequence of this, Sir Joshua observed, was, that his common conversation in all companies was such as to secure him universal attention, as something above the usual colloquial style was expected.

Yet, though Johnson had this habit in company, when another mode was necessary, in order to investigate truth, he could descend to a language intelligible to the meanest capacity. An instance of this was witnessed by Sir Joshua Reynolds, when they were present at an examination of a little blackguard boy, by Mr. Saunders Welch, the late Westminster justice. Welch, who imagined that he was exalting himself in Dr. Johnson's eyes by using big words, spoke in a manner that was utterly unintelligible to the boy; Dr. Johnson perceiving it, addressed himself to the boy, and changed the pompous phraseology into colloquial language. Sir Joshua Reynolds, who was much amused by this proceeding, which seemed a kind of reversing of what might have been expected from the two men, took notice of it to Dr. Johnson, as they walked away by themselves. Johnson said, that it was continually the case; and that he was always obliged to translate the justice's swelling diction (smiling), so as that his meaning might be understood by the vulgar, from whom information was to be obtained.

Sir Joshua once observed to him, that he had talked above the capacity of some people with whom they had been in company together. "No matter, Sir," said Johnson; "they consider it as a compliment to be talked to as if they were wiser than they are. So true is this, Sir, that Baxter made it a rule in every sermon that he preached to say something that was above the capacity of his audience."

Johnson's dexterity in retort, when he seemed to be driven to an extremity by his adversary, was very remarkable. Of his power, in this respect, our common friend, Mr. Windham, of Norfolk, has been pleased to furnish me with an eminent instance. However unfavourable to Scotland, he uniformly gave liberal praise to George Buchanan, as a writer. In a conversation concerning the literary merits of the two countries, in which Buchanan was introduced, a Scotchman, imagining that on this ground he should have an undoubted triumph over him, exclaimed, "Ah, Dr. Johnson, what would you have said of Buchanan had he been an Englishman?" "Why, Sir," said Johnson, after a little pause, "I should not have said of Buchanan, had he been an Englishman, what I will now say of him as Scotchman,—that he was the only man of genius his country ever produced."

And this brings to my recollection another instance of the same nature. I once reminded him that when Dr. Adam Smith was expatiating on the beauty of Glasgow, he had cut him short by saying, "Pray, Sir, have you ever seen Brentford?" and I took the liberty to add, "My dear Sir, surely that was shocking." "Why then, Sir," he replied, "you have never seen Brentford."

Though his usual phrase for conversation was talk, yet he made a distinction; for when he once told me that he dined the day before at a friend's house, with "a very pretty company;" and I asked him if there was good conversation, he answered, "No, Sir; we had talk enough, but no conversation; there was nothing discussed."

Talking of the success of the Scotch in Lon-

1. The justness of this remark is confirmed by the following story, for which I am indebted to Lord Eloit:—A country parson, who was remarkable for quoting scraps of Latin in his sermons, having died, one of his parishioners was asked how he liked his successor; "He is a very good preacher," was his answer, "but no Latiner."—BOSWELL. This story is an old one. This "very good preacher" was, says Mr. Chalmers, the celebrated Dr. Edward Pocock, who had a living at Childry, near Oxford. One of his Oxford friends, as he travelled through Childry, inquiring, for his diversion, of some people, who was their minister? and how they liked him? received from them this answer: "Our parson is one Mr. Pocock, a plain, honest man; but, master," said they, "he is no Latiner."—Pocock's Life, sect. iii. Edward Pocock died 1691, æt. 87: ante, p. 586.—CROKER.

2. This prompt and sarcastic retort may not unaptly be compared with Sir Henry Wotton's celebrated answer to a priest in Italy, who asked him, "Where was your religion to be found before Luther?" "My religion was to be found then where yours is not to be found now, in the written word of God." But Johnson's admirable reply has a sharper edge, and perhaps more ingenuity, than that of Wotton.—MALONE. In Selden's Table Talk we have the following more witty reply made to this same question: "Where was America an hundred or six-score years ago? But Archbishop Bramhall's answer is still better. "Where it is now—as a garden before it is weeded and after it is weeded, is the same garden." See also Jeremy Taylor's Works, x. 192.—MARKLAND. There is another more homely, but even more just: "Where was your face before it was washed?"—CROKER, 1847.

3. When his friend Mr. Strahan, a native of Scotland, at his return from the Hebrides asked him, with a firm tone of voice, what he thought of his country? "That it is a very vile country to be sure, Sir;" returned for answer Dr. Johnson. "Well, Sir!" replies the other, somewhat mortified, "God made it." "Certainly he did," answers Dr. Johnson again; "but we must always remember that he made it for Scotchmen, and—comparisons are odious, Mr. Strahan—but God made hell." Piozzi.—CROKER.

don, he imputed it in a considerable degree to their spirit of nationality. "You know, Sir," said he, "that no Scotchman publishes a book, or has a play brought upon the stage, but there are five hundred people ready to applaud him."

He gave much praise to his friend Dr. Burney's elegant and entertaining Travels, and told Mr. Seward that he had them in his eye when writing his "Journey to the Western Islands of Scotland."

Such was his sensibility, and so much was he affected by pathetic poetry, that, when he was reading Dr. Beattie's "Hermit" in my presence, it brought tears into his eyes.<sup>1</sup>

He disapproved much of mingling real facts with fiction. On this account he censured a book entitled "Love and Madness."<sup>2</sup>

Mr. Hoole told him he was born in Moorfields, and had received part of his early instruction in Grub Street. "Sir," said Johnson, smiling, "you have been regularly educated." Having asked who was his instructor, and Mr. Hoole having answered, "My uncle, Sir, who was a tailor;" Johnson, recollecting himself, said, "Sir, I knew him: we called him the metaphysical tailor. He was of a club in Old Street, with me and George Psalmanazar, and some others: but pray, Sir, was he a good tailor?" Mr. Hoole having answered that he believed he was too mathematical, and used to draw squares and triangles on his shopboard, so that he did not excel in the cut of a coat.—"I am sorry for it," said Johnson, "for I would have every man to be master of his own business."

In pleasant reference to himself and Mr. Hoole, as brother authors, he often said, "Let you and I, Sir, go together, and eat a beef-steak in Grub Street."

Sir William Chambers, that great architect, whose works show a sublimity of genius<sup>3</sup>, and who is esteemed by all who know him, for his social, hospitable, and generous qualities, submitted the manuscript of his "Chinese Architecture" to Dr. Johnson's perusal. Johnson was much pleased with it, and said, "It wants no addition nor correction, but a few lines of introduction;" which he furnished, and Sir William adopted.<sup>4</sup>

He said to Sir William Scott, "The age is running mad after innovation; and all the business of the world is to be done in a new way; men are to be hanged in a new way; Tyburn itself is not safe from the fury of innovation." It having been argued that this was an improvement.—"No, Sir," said he, eagerly, "it is not an improvement: they object, that the old method drew together a number of spectators. Sir, executions are intended to draw spectators. If they do not draw spectators, they don't answer their purpose. The old method was most satisfactory to all parties; the public was gratified by a procession; the criminal<sup>5</sup> was supported by it. Why is all this to be swept away?" I perfectly agree with Dr. Johnson upon this head, and am persuaded that executions now, the solemn procession being discontinued, have not nearly the effect which they formerly had. Magistrates, both in London and elsewhere, have, I am afraid, in this had too much regard to their own ease.

Of Dr. Hurd, Bishop of Worcester, Johnson said to a friend,— "Hurd, Sir, is one of a set of men who account for every thing systematically; for instance, it has been a fashion to wear scarlet breeches; these men would tell you, that according to causes and effects, no other wear could at that time have been chosen." He, however, said of him at another time to the same gentleman, "Hurd, Sir, is a man whose acquaintance is a valuable acquisition."

That learned and ingenious prelate, it is well known, published, at one period of his life, "Moral and Political Dialogues," with a wofully Whiggish cast. Afterwards, his lordship, having thought better, came to see his error, and republished the work with a more constitutional spirit. Johnson, however, was unwilling to allow him full credit for his political conversion. I remember when his lordship declined the honour of being archbishop of Canterbury, Johnson said, "I am glad he did not go to Lambeth; for, after all, I fear he is a Whig in his heart."

Johnson's attention to precision and clearness in expression was very remarkable. He disapproved of a parenthesis; and I believe, in all his voluminous writings, not half a dozen of them will be found. He never used the <sup>1</sup> The particular passage which excited this strong emotion was, as I have heard from my father, the third stanza, "Tis night," &c. — J. BOSWELL, JUN. The fourth. — MARKLAND.

<sup>2</sup> A kind of novel founded on the story of Mr. Hackman and Miss Ray: see p. 628. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> I do not recollect any work of Sir William Chambers that can be said to exhibit "sublimity of genius." — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> The Hon. Horace Walpole, now Earl of Orford, thus bears testimony to this gentleman's merit as a writer: "Mr. Chambers's 'Treatise on Civil Architecture' is the most sensible book, and the most exempt from prejudices, that ever was written on that science." — Preface to Anecdotes of Painting in England. The introductory lines are these:

"It is difficult to avoid praising too little or too much. The boundless panegyrics which have been lavished upon the Chinese learning, policy, and arts, show with what power novelty attracts regard, and how naturally esteem swells into admiration. I am far from desiring to be numbered among the exaggerators of Chinese excellence. I consider them as great, or wise, only in comparison with the nations that surround them; and have no intention to place them in competition either with the ancients or with the moderns of this part of the world; yet they must be allowed to claim our notice as a distinct and very singular race of men; as the inhabitants of a region divided by its situation from all civilised countries, who have formed their own manners, and invented their own arts, without the assistance of example." — BOSWELL.

<sup>5</sup> What could Johnson mean by saying that the criminal was supported by the lingering torture of this cruel exhibition? Boswell, we know, was fond of these dreadful spectacles; and is not this another instance in which his personal propensities may be suspected of discolouring Johnson's opinions? — CROKER. The last execution at Tyburn was on the 7th November, 1783, and the first before Newgate on the 9th of the following December. — P. CUNNINGHAM.

phrases the former and the latter, having observed, that they often occasioned obscurity; he therefore contrived to construct his sentences so as not to have occasion for them, and would even rather repeat the same words, in order to avoid them. Nothing is more common than to mistake surnames, when we hear them carelessly uttered for the first time. To prevent this, he used not only to pronounce them slowly and distinctly, but to take the trouble of spelling them; a practice which I have often followed, and which I wish were general.

Such was the heat and irritability of his blood, that not only did he pare his nails to the quick, but scraped the joints of his fingers with a penknife, till they seemed quite red and raw.<sup>1</sup>

The heterogeneous composition of human nature was remarkably exemplified in Johnson. His liberality in giving his money to persons in distress was extraordinary. Yet there lurked about him a propensity to paltry saving. One day I owned to him, that "I was occasionally troubled with a fit of narrowness." "Why, Sir," said he, "so am I. But I do not tell it." He has now and then borrowed a shilling of me; and when I asked him for it again, seemed to be rather out of humour. A droll little circumstance once occurred; as if he meant to reprimand my minute exactness as a creditor, he thus addressed me;—"Boswell, lend me sixpence — not to be repaid."

This great man's attention to small things was very remarkable. As an instance of it, he one day said to me, "Sir, when you get silver in change for a guinea, look carefully at it: you may find some curious piece of coin."

Though a stern true-born Englishman, and fully prejudiced against all other nations, he had discernment enough to see, and candour enough to censure, the cold reserve too common among Englishmen towards strangers: "Sir," said he, "two men of any other nation who are shown into a room together, at a house where they are both visitors, will immediately find some conversation. But two Englishmen will probably go each to a different window, and remain in obstinate silence. Sir, we as yet do not enough understand the common rights of humanity."

Johnson was at a certain period of his life a good deal with the Earl of Shelburne, now Marquis of Lansdowne, as he doubtless could not but have a due value for that nobleman's activity of mind, and uncommon acquisitions of important knowledge, however much he might disapprove of other parts of his lordship's character, which were widely different from his own.

Maurice Morgann, Esq., author of the very ingenious "Essay on the Character of Falstaff", being a particular friend of his lordship, had once an opportunity of entertaining Johnson a day or two at Wycombe, when its lord was absent, and by him I have been favoured with two anecdotes.

One is not a little to the credit of Johnson's candour. Mr. Morgann and he had a dispute pretty late at night, in which Johnson would not give up, though he had the wrong side; and, in short, both kept the field. Next morning, when they met in the breakfasting-room, Dr. Johnson accosted Mr. Morgann thus: "Sir, I have been thinking on our dispute last night; — You were in the right."

The other was as follows: Johnson, for sport perhaps, or from the spirit of contradiction, eagerly maintained that Derrick had merit as a writer. Mr. Morgann argued with him directly, in vain. At length he had recourse to this device. "Pray, Sir," said he, "whether do you reckon Derrick or Smart<sup>4</sup> the best poet?" Johnson at once felt himself roused; and answered, "Sir, there is no settling the point of precedency between a louse and a flea."

Once, when checking my boasting too frequently of myself in company, he said to me, "Boswell, you often vaunt so much as to provoke ridicule. You put me in mind of a man who was standing in the kitchen of an inn with his back to the fire, and thus accosted the person next him. 'Do you know, Sir, who I am?' 'No, Sir,' said the other, 'I have not that advantage.' 'Sir,' said he, 'I am the great Twalmley, who invented the New Flood-gate Iron.'<sup>5</sup> The Bishop of Killaloe, on my repeating the story to him, defended Twalmley, by observing that he was entitled to the epithet of great; for Virgil in his group of worthies in the Elysian fields —

Ille manus ob patriam pugnando vulnera passi, &c.

[*"Here patriots live, who, for their country's good,
In fighting fields were prodigal of blood."*]

Dryden.

mentions

Inventas aut qui vitam excoluere per artes.

[*"And searching wits, of mere mechanic parts,
Who grace their age with new invented arts."*]

Ibid.

He was pleased to say to me one morning

<sup>1</sup> I know not why heat and irritability of blood should make a man pare his nails too close. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> I cannot discover when this intercourse could have happened; nor can I even guess. In 1765, when Johnson "engaged in politics with Hamilton," (anté, p. 168.) Lord Shelburne was but 20; nor can I discover that his Lordship had any connexion with Hamilton. See anté, p. 505. n. 3, 584. n. 5, and p. 715. n. 3. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> Johnson being asked his opinion of this Essay, answered,

"Why, Sir, we shall have the man come forth again: and as he has proved Falstaff to be no coward, he may prove Iago to be a very good character." — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> It has been asserted (European Mag., Sept. 1796, p. 160.) that the above comparison was made between Derrick and Boysie, and (if it be at all true) this is more likely. — CROKER.

<sup>5</sup> What the great Twalmley was so proud of having invented was neither more nor less than a kind of box-iron for smoothing linen. — BOSWELL.

when we were left alone in his study, "Boswell, I think I am easier with you than with almost any body."

He would not allow Mr. David Hume any credit for his political principles, though similar to his own; saying of him, "Sir, he was a Tory by chance."

His acute observation of human life made him remark, "Sir, there is nothing by which a man exasperates most people more than by displaying a superior ability of brilliancy in conversation. They seem pleased at the time; but their envy makes them curse him at their hearts."<sup>1</sup>

My readers will probably be surprised to hear that the great Dr. Johnson could amuse himself with so slight and playful a species of composition as a charade. I have recovered one which he made on Dr. Barnard, now Lord Bishop of Killaloe; who has been pleased for many years to treat me with so much intimacy and social ease, that I may presume to call him not only my right reverend, but my very dear friend. I therefore with peculiar pleasure give to the world a just and elegant compliment thus paid to his lordship by Johnson.

CHARADE.

"My first shuts out thieves from your house or your room,

My second expresses a Syrian perfume.

My whole is a man in whose converse is shared

The strength of a Bar and the sweetness of Nard."<sup>2</sup>

Johnson asked Richard Owen Cambridge, Esq. if he had read the Spanish translation of Sallust, said to be written by a prince of Spain, with the assistance of his tutor, who is professedly the author of a treatise annexed, on the Phœnician language.

Mr. Cambridge commended the work, particularly as he thought the translator understood his author better than is commonly the case with translators; but said he was disappointed in the purpose for which he borrowed the book; to see whether a Spaniard could be better furnished with inscriptions from monuments, coins, or other antiquities, which he might more probably find on a coast so immediately opposite to Carthage, than the antiquaries of any other countries. JOHNSON. "I am very sorry you were not gratified in your expectations." CAMBRIDGE. "The language would have been of little use, as there is no history existing in that tongue to balance the partial accounts which the Roman writers have left us." JOHNSON. "No, Sir. They have not been partial, they have told their own story without shame or regard to equitable treatment of their injured enemy; they had no compunction, no feeling for a Carthaginian. Why, Sir, they would never have borne Virgil's description of Eneas's treatment of Dido, if she had not been a Carthaginian."

I gratefully acknowledge this and other communications from Mr. Cambridge, whom, if a beautiful villa on the banks of the Thames a few miles distant from London, a numerous and excellent library, which he accurately knows and reads, a choice collection of pictures, which he understands and relishes, an easy fortune, an amiable family, an extensive circle of friends and acquaintance, distinguished by rank, fashion, and genius, a literary fame, various, elegant, and still increasing, colloquial talents rarely to be found, and, with all these means of happiness, enjoying, when well advanced in years, health and vigour of body, serenity and animation of mind, do not entitle to be addressed fortunate senex! I know not to whom, in any age, that expression could with propriety have been used. Long may he live to hear and to feel it!<sup>3</sup>

Johnson's love of little children, which he discovered upon all occasions, calling them "pretty dears," and giving them sweetmeats: was an undoubted proof of the real humanity and gentleness of his disposition.

His uncommon kindness to his servants, and serious concern, not only for their comfort in this world, but their happiness in the next, was another unquestionable evidence of what all, who were intimately acquainted with him, knew to be true.

Nor would it be just, under this head, to omit the fondness which he showed for animals which he had taken under his protection. I never shall forget the indulgence with which he treated Hodge, his cat; for whom I myself used to go out and buy oysters, let the servants, having that trouble, should take dislike to the poor creature. I am, unluckily one of those who have an antipathy to a cat, so that I am uneasy when in the room with one; and I own I frequently suffered a good deal from the presence of this same Hodge. I recollect him one day scrambling up Dr. Johnson's breast, apparently with much satisfaction, while my friend, smiling and whistling, rubbed down his back, and pulled him by the tail; and when I observed he was a fine cat, saying, "Why, yes, Sir, but I had cats whom I liked better than this;" and then, as if perceiving Hodge to be out of cou-

<sup>1</sup> This may be doubted. Johnson himself was, as we have seen, sometimes envious of the brilliancy of his friends; but, in general, surely persons of a brilliant conversation (if it be not sarcastic) are popular. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> As Mr. Boswell does not expressly state his authority for attributing this charade to Dr. Johnson, I take the liberty of doubting it. Johnson was by no means fond of Dr. Barnard, nor was he likely to have flattered any one in this coarse way; and the verses themselves are totally unlike his style and rhythm. If he did condescend to this trifling, it may, I think, have been a kind of reparation for his rude behaviour to Dr. Barnard before detailed, antè, p. 696. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>3</sup> Mr. Cambridge enjoyed all the blessings here enumerated for many years after this passage was written. He died his seat, near Twickenham, Sept. 17, 1802, in his eighty-sixth year. — MALONE. His villa was the large house next above Richmond Bridge, on the Middlesex side. — CROKER, 18-

tenance, adding, "But he is a very fine cat, a very fine cat indeed."

This reminds me of the ludicrous account which he gave Mr. Langton of the despicable state of a young gentleman of good family. "Sir, when I heard of him last, he was running about town shooting cats." And then, in a sort of kindly reverie, he bethought himself of his own favourite cat, and said, "But Hodge shan't be shot; no, no, Hodge shall not be shot."

He thought Mr. Beauclerk made a shrewd and judicious remark to Mr. Langton, who, after having been for the first time in company with a well-known wit about town, was warmly admiring and praising him, — "See him again," said Beauclerk.

His respect for the hierarchy, and particularly the dignitaries of the church, has been more than once exhibited in the course of this work. Mr. Seward saw him presented to the Archbishop of York<sup>1</sup>, and described his bow to an ARCHBISHOP as such a studied elaboration of homage, such an extension of limb, such a flexion of body, as have seldom or ever been equalled.

I cannot help mentioning with much regret, that by my own negligence I lost an opportunity of having the history of my family from its founder, Thomas Boswell, in 1504, recorded and illustrated by Johnson's pen. Such was his goodness to me, that when I presumed to solicit him for so great a favour, he was pleased to say, "Let me have all the materials you can collect, and I will do it both in Latin and English; then let it be printed, and copies of it be deposited in various places for security and preservation." I can now only do the best I can to make up for this loss, keeping my great master steadily in view. Family histories, like the imagines majorum of the ancients, excite to virtue; and I wish that they who really have blood, would be more careful to trace and ascertain its course. Some have affected to laugh at the history of the house of Yvery<sup>2</sup>; it would be well if many others would transmit their pedigrees to posterity, with the same accuracy and generous zeal with which the noble lord who compiled that work has honoured and perpetuated his ancestry.

On Thursday, April 10., I introduced to him, at his house in Bolt Court, the Honourable and Reverend William Stuart<sup>3</sup>, son of the Earl of Bute; a gentleman truly worthy of being known to Johnson; being, with all the advantages of high birth, learning, travel, and elegant manners, an exemplary parish priest in every respect.

After some compliments on both sides, the tour which Johnson and I had made to the Hebrides was mentioned. JOHNSON. "I got an acquisition of more ideas by it than by any thing that I remember. I saw quite a different system of life." BOSWELL. "You would not like to make the same journey again?" JOHNSON. "Why no, Sir; not the same: it is a tale told. Gravina, an Italian critic, observes, that every man desires to see that of which he has read; but no man desires to read an account of what he has seen: so much does description fall short of reality. Description only excites curiosity; seeing satisfies it. Other people may go and see the Hebrides." BOSWELL. "I should wish to go and see some country totally different from what I have been used to; such as Turkey, where religion and every thing else are different." JOHNSON. "Yes, Sir: there are two objects of curiosity, — the Christian world and the Mahometan world. All the rest may be considered as barbarous." BOSWELL. "Pray, Sir, is the 'Turkish Spy' a genuine book?" JOHNSON. "No, Sir: Mrs. Manley, in her life, says, that her father wrote the first two volumes: and in another book, 'Dunton's Life and Errors,'<sup>4</sup> we find that the rest was written by one Sault, at two guineas a sheet, under the direction of Dr. Midgeley."<sup>5</sup>

BOSWELL. "This has been a very factious reign, owing to the too great indulgence of government." JOHNSON. "I think so, Sir. What at first was lenity, grew timidity. Yet this is reasoning à posteriori, and may not be just. Supposing a few had at first been punished, I believe faction would have been crushed; but it might have been said, that it was a sanguinary reign. A man cannot tell à priori what will be best for government to do. This reign has been very unfortunate. We have had an unsuccessful war; but that does not prove that we have been ill governed. One side or other must prevail in war, as one or other must win at play. When we beat Louis, we were not better governed; nor were the French better governed when Louis beat us."

On Saturday, April 12., I visited him, in company with Mr. Windham, of Norfolk.

<sup>1</sup> The only two Archbishops of York during Seward's acquaintance with Johnson were Drummond and Markham, who died in 1776. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>2</sup> [A strange, and I think, in a great measure, fabulous genealogy of the Perceval family], written by John, Earl of Egmont, and printed (but not published) in 1742. — MALONE.

<sup>3</sup> At that time vicar of Luton, in Bedfordshire, where he lived for some years, and fully merited the character given of him in the text; he was afterwards Lord Archbishop of Armagh, and Primate of Ireland. — MALONE. And died May, 1822, in a very strange way, having, through the blunder of a servant, had poison, by mistake for medicine, administered to him by the hand of his lady. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> A work containing many curious biographical memoranda, reprinted, with notes, by Mr. Nichols, in 1818. — WRIGHT.

<sup>5</sup> "The Turkish Spy" was pretended to have been written originally in Arabic; from Arabic translated into Italian, and thence into English. The author of the work, which was originally written in Italian, was I. P. Marana, a Genoese, who died at Paris in 1693. Dunton says, that "Mr. William Bradshaw received from Dr. Midgeley forty shillings a sheet for writing part of the 'Turkish Spy'; but I do not find that he any where mentions Sault as engaged in that work." — MALONE. Aubrey's Letters, i. 223., say the first volume was by the Italian, the rest by Bradshaw. — P. CUNNINGHAM.

whom, though a Whig, he highly valued. One of the best things he ever said was to this gentleman; who, before he set out for Ireland as secretary to Lord Northampton, when lord lieutenant, expressed to the sage some modest and virtuous doubts, whether he could bring himself to practise those arts which it is supposed a person in that situation has occasion to employ. "Don't be afraid, Sir," said Johnson, with a pleasant smile; "you will soon make a very pretty rascal."<sup>1</sup>

He talked to-day a good deal of the wonderful extent and variety of London, and observed, that men of curious inquiry might see in it such modes of life as very few could even imagine. He in particular recommended to us to explore Wapping, which we resolved to do.<sup>2</sup>

Mr. Lowe, the painter, who was with him, was very much distressed that a large picture which he had painted was refused to be received into the Exhibition of the Royal Academy. Mrs. Thrale knew Johnson's character so superficially, as to represent him as unwilling to do small acts of benevolence; and mentions, in particular, that he would hardly take the trouble to write a letter in favour of his friends. The truth, however, is, that he was remarkable, in an extraordinary degree, for what she denies to him; and, above all, for this very sort of kindness, writing letters for those to whom his solicitations might be of service. He now gave Mr. Lowe the following, of which I was diligent enough, with his permission, to take copies at the next coffee-house, while Mr. Windham was so good as to stay by me.

JOHNSON TO REYNOLDS.

"April 12. 1783.

"SIR, — Mr. Lowe considers himself as cut off from all credit and all hope by the rejection of his picture from the Exhibition. Upon this work he has exhausted all his powers, and suspended all his expectations; and, certainly, to be refused an opportunity of taking the opinion of the public, is in itself a very great hardship. It is to be condemned without a trial.

"If you could procure the revocation of this incapacitating edict, you would deliver an unhappy man from great affliction. The council has sometimes reversed its own determination; and I hope that, by your interposition, this luckless picture may be got admitted. I am, &c., SAM. JOHNSON."

<sup>1</sup> This was in June, 1783, and I find in Mr. Windham's private diary (which it seems this conversation induced him to keep) the following memoranda of Dr. Johnson's advice: —

"I have no great timidity in my own disposition, and am no encourager of it in others. Never be afraid to think yourself fit for any thing for which your friends think you fit. You will become an able negotiator — a very pretty rascal. No one in Ireland wears even the mask of incorruption; no one professes to do for sixpence what he can get a shilling for doing. Set sail, and see where the winds and the waves will carry you. Every day will improve another. Dies diem docet, by observing at night where you failed in the day, and by resolving to fail so no more."

Mr. Windham's Diary proves what I believe the world never suspected, that he was hypochondriacal to an extraordinary degree: in fact, at times, crazy, and at all times liable to strange turns of mind. His hypochondriacal sensation he used to call the Fœt, and it was the cause of his

JOHNSON TO BARRY.

"April 12. 1783.

"SIR, — Mr. Lowe's exclusion from the Exhibition gives him more trouble than you and the other gentlemen of the council could imagine or intend. He considers disgrace and ruin as the inevitable consequence of your determination.

"He says, that some pictures have been received after rejection; and if there be any such precedent, I earnestly entreat that you will use your interest in his favour. Of his work I can say nothing; I pretend not to judge of painting, and this picture I never saw; but I conceive it extremely hard to shut out any man from the possibility of success; and therefore I repeat my request that you will propose the re-consideration of Mr. Lowe's case; and if there be any among the council with whom my name can have any weight, be pleased to communicate to them the desire of, Sir, your, &c.,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

Such intercession was too powerful to be resisted; and Mr. Lowe's performance was admitted at Somerset Place. The subject, as I recollect, was the Deluge, at that point of time when the water was verging to the top of the last uncovered mountain. Near to the spot was seen the last of the antediluvian race, exclusive of those who were saved in the ark of Noah. This was one of those giants, then the inhabitants of the earth, who had still strength to swim, and with one of his hands held aloft his child. Upon the small remaining dry spot appeared a famished lion, ready to spring at the child and devour it. Mr. Lowe told me that Johnson said to him, "Sir, your picture is noble and probable." "A compliment indeed," said Mr. Lowe, "from a man who cannot lie, and cannot be mistaken."<sup>3</sup>

About this time he wrote to Mrs. Lue Porter mentioning his bad health, and that he intended a visit to Lichfield. "It is," say he, "with no great expectation of amendment that I make every year a journey into the country; but it is pleasant to visit those whose kindness has been often experienced."

On April 18. (being Good Friday), I found him at breakfast, in his usual manner upon that day, drinking tea without milk, and eating a cross bun to prevent faintness; we went to St. Clement's church, as formerly. When we came home from church, he placed himself on one of the stone seats at his garden door, and resignation of the office of Secretary in Ireland, where seems to have been but a month or two. I suppose, however, that as Mr. Windham advanced in years, this disordered. 1. who knew him only in later life, never perceived any thing of it. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>2</sup> We accordingly carried our scheme into execution, October, 1792; but whether from that uniformity which I in modern times, in a great degree, spread through every part of the metropolis, or from our want of sufficient exertion, we were disappointed. — BOSWELL.

<sup>3</sup> Northcote says the execution of this picture was execrable. Life of Reynolds, ii. 139. Lowe had received a prize medal from the Academy in 1771, "through favour," Northcote says. He certainly never after showed any talent and had, I believe, more than once recourse to Johnson's interference to obtain admission for his works to the Exhibition. See ante, p. 605. Lowe died in 1793. — CROKER.

I took the other, and thus in the open air, and in a placid frame of mind, he talked away very easily. JOHNSON. "Were I a country gentleman, I should not be very hospitable; I should not have crowds in my house." BOSWELL. "Sir Alexander Dick tells me that he remembers having a thousand people in a year to dine at his house; that is, reckoning each person as one, each time that he dined there." JOHNSON. "That, Sir, is about three a day." BOSWELL. "How your statement lessens the idea!" JOHNSON. "That, Sir, is the good of counting. It brings every thing to a certainty, which before floated in the mind indefinitely." BOSWELL. "But Omne ignotum pro magifico est: one is sorry to have this diminished." JOHNSON. "Sir, you should not allow yourself to be delighted with error." BOSWELL. "Three a day seem but few." JOHNSON. "Nay, Sir, he who entertains three a day does very liberally. And if there is a large family, the poor entertain those three, for they eat what the poor would get; there must be superfluous meat; it must be given to the poor, or thrown out." BOSWELL. "I observe in London, that the poor go about and gather bones, which I understand are manufactured." JOHNSON. "Yes, Sir; they boil them, and extract a grease from them for greasing wheels and other purposes. Of the best pieces they make a mock ivory, which is used for hafts to knives, and various other things; the coarser pieces they burn and pound, and sell the ashes." BOSWELL. "For what purpose, Sir?" JOHNSON. "Why, Sir, for making a furnace for the chemists for melting iron. A paste made of burnt bones will stand a stronger heat than any thing else. Consider, Sir, if you are to melt iron, you cannot line your pot with brass, because it is softer than iron, and would melt sooner; nor with iron, for though malleable iron is harder than cast-iron, yet it would not do; but a paste of burnt bones will not melt." BOSWELL. "Do you know, Sir, I have discovered a manufacture to a great extent, of what you only piddle at — scraping and drying the peel of oranges? <sup>1</sup> At a place in Newgate Street there is a prodigious quantity prepared, which they sell to the distillers." JOHNSON. "Sir, I believe they make a higher thing out of them than a spirit; they make what is called orange-butter, the oil of the orange inspissated, which they mix perhaps with common pomatum, and make it fragrant. The oil does not fly off in the drying." BOSWELL. "I wish to have a good walled garden." JOHNSON. "I don't think it would be worth the expense to you. We compute, in England, a park wall at a thousand pounds a mile; now a garden wall must cost at least as much. You intend your trees should grow higher than a deer will leap. Now let us see; for a hundred pounds you could only have forty-four square yards <sup>2</sup>, which is very little; for two hundred pounds you may have eighty-four square yards, which is very well. But when will you get the value of two hundred pounds of walls, in fruit, in your climate? No, Sir; such contention with nature is not worth while. I would plant an orchard, and have plenty of such fruit as ripen well in your country. My friend, Dr. Madden, of Ireland, said, that 'In an orchard there should be enough to eat, enough to lay up, enough to be stolen, and enough to rot upon the ground.' Cherries are an early fruit; you may have them; and you may have the early apples and pears." BOSWELL. "We cannot have nonpareils." JOHNSON. "Sir, you can no more have nonpareils than you can have grapes." BOSWELL. "We have them, Sir; but they are very bad." JOHNSON. "Nay, Sir, never try to have a thing merely to show that you cannot have it. From ground that would let for forty shillings you may have a large orchard; and you see it costs you only forty shillings. Nay, you may graze the ground when the trees are grown up; you cannot, while they are young." BOSWELL. "Is not a good garden a very common thing in England, Sir?" JOHNSON. "Not so common, Sir, as you imagine. In Lincolnshire there is hardly an orchard; in Staffordshire, very little fruit." BOSWELL. "Has Langton no orchard?" JOHNSON. "No, Sir." BOSWELL. "How so, Sir?" JOHNSON. "Why, Sir, from the general negligence of the country. He has it not, because nobody else has it." BOSWELL. "A hothouse is a certain thing; I may have that." JOHNSON. "A hothouse is pretty certain; but you must first build it, then you must keep fires in it, and you must have a gardener to take care of it." BOSWELL. "But if I have a gardener at any rate?" JOHNSON. "Why, yes." BOSWELL. "I'd have it near my house; there is no need to have it in the orchard." JOHNSON. "Yes, I'd have it near my house. I would plant a great many currants; the fruit is good, and they make a pretty sweetmeat."

I record this minute detail, which some may think trifling, in order to show clearly how this great man, whose mind could grasp such large and extensive subjects, as he has shown in his literary labours, was yet well informed in the common affairs of life, and loved to illustrate them.

Mr. Walker, the celebrated master of elocution<sup>3</sup>, came in, and then we went up stairs into the study. I asked him if he had taught

<sup>1</sup> See anté, p. 440. — C.

<sup>2</sup> The Bishop of Ferns observes, that Mr. Boswell here mistakes forty-four square yards for forty-four yards square, and thus makes Johnson talk nonsense: the meaning is, that 100l. will give 176 running yards of park wall, which would inclose a garden, — not of forty-four square yards, which would be but a small closet; but of forty-four yards square — or about two-fifths of an acre, and so in proportion — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> He published several works on elocution and pronunciation, and died August 1. 1807, in the seventy-sixth year of his age. — CROKER.

many clergymen. JOHNSON. "I hope not."

WALKER. "I have taught only one, and he is the best reader I ever heard; not by my teaching, but by his own natural talents."

JOHNSON. "Were he the best reader in the world, I would not have it told that he was taught." Here was one of his peculiar prejudices. Could it be any disadvantage to the clergyman to have it known that he was taught an easy and graceful delivery?

BOSWELL. "Will you not allow, Sir, that a man may be taught to read well?"

JOHNSON. "Why, Sir, so far as to read better than he might do without being taught, yes. Formerly it was supposed that there was no difference in reading, but that one read as well as another."

BOSWELL. "It is wonderful to see old Sheridan as enthusiastic about oratory as ever."<sup>1</sup>

WALKER. "His enthusiasm as to what oratory will do, may be too great: but he reads well."

JOHNSON. "He reads well, but he reads low; and you know it is much easier to read low than to read high; for when you read high, you are much more limited, your loudest note can be but one, and so the variety is less in proportion to the loudness. Now some people have occasion to speak to an extensive audience, and must speak loud to be heard." WALKER. "The art is to read strong, though low."

Talking of the origin of language:—JOHNSON. "It must have come by inspiration. A thousand, nay a million of children could not invent a language. While the organs are pliable, there is not understanding enough to form a language; by the time that there is understanding enough, the organs are become stiff. We know that after a certain age we cannot learn to pronounce a new language. No foreigner, who comes to England when advanced in life, ever pronounces English tolerably well; at least such instances are very rare. When I maintain that language must have come by inspiration, I do not mean that inspiration is required for rhetoric, and all the beauties of language; for when once man has language, we can conceive that he may gradually form modifications of it. I mean only that inspiration seems to me to be necessary to give man the faculty of speech; to inform him that he may have speech; which I think he could no more find out without inspiration, than cows or hogs would think of such a faculty." WALKER. "Do you think, Sir, that there are any perfect synonymes in any language?"

JOHNSON. "Originally there were not; but by using words negligently, or in poetry, one word comes to be confounded with another."

He talked of Dr. Dodd. "A friend of mine,"

<sup>1</sup> "Mr. Sheridan, the father, is quite an enthusiast in recommending to the youth of the nation the study of oratory. According to him it is the one thing needful, the salvation of the nation, as every thing laudable and great depends upon it."—Knox's Wint. Even. ii. 271.—CROKER, 1847.

<sup>2</sup> I have been told that the lady was Dr. Dodd's relict; but if this were so, Dr. Johnson could not have been aware of it, said he, "came to me and told me that a lady<sup>2</sup> wished to have Dr. Dodd's picture in a bracelet, and asked me for a motto. I said, I could think of no better than Currat Lex. I was very willing to have him pardoned, that is, to have the sentence changed to transportation; but, when he was once hanged, I did not wish he should be made a saint."

Mrs. Burney, wife of his friend, Dr. Burney, came in, and he seemed to be entertained with her conversation.

Garrick's funeral was talked of as extravagantly expensive. Johnson, from his dislike to exaggeration, would not allow that it was distinguished by an extraordinary pomp. "Were there not six horses to each coach?" said Mrs. Burney. JOHNSON. "Madam, there were no more six horses than six phoenixes."<sup>3</sup>

Mrs. Burney wondered that some very beautiful new buildings should be erected in Moorfields, in so shocking a situation as between Bedlam and St. Luke's Hospital; and said she could not live there. JOHNSON. "Nay, Madam, you see nothing there to hurt you. You no more think of madness by having windows that look to Bedlam, than you think of death by having windows that look to a churchyard." Mrs. BURNLEY. "We may look to a churchyard, Sir; for it is right that we should be kept in mind of death." JOHNSON. "Nay, Madam, if you go to that, it is right that we should be kept in mind of madness, which is occasioned by too much indulgence of imagination. I think a very moral use may be made of these new buildings; I would have those who have heated imaginations live there, and take warning." Mrs. BURNLEY. "But, Sir, many of the poor people that are mad have become so from disease, or from distressing events. It is, therefore, not their fault, but their misfortune; and, therefore, to think of them is a melancholy consideration."

Time passed on in conversation till it was too late for the service of the church at three o'clock. I took a walk, and left him alone for some time; then returned, and we had coffee and conversation again by ourselves.

I stated the character of a noble friend of mine as a curious case for his opinion<sup>4</sup>:—"He is the most inexplicable man to me that I ever knew. Can you explain him, Sir? He is, I really believe, noble-minded, generous, and princely. But his most intimate friends may be separated from him for years, without his ever asking a question concerning them. He will meet them with a formality, a coldness, a stately indifference; but when they come close to him, and fairly engage him in conversation, they find him as easy, pleasant, for however he might disapprove of her wearing his picture he would hardly have afflicted her with such an answer.—See ante, p. 544. n. 2.—CROKER, 1835.

<sup>3</sup> There certainly were, and Johnson himself went in one of the coaches and six.—CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> Probably Lord Mountstuart, afterwards first Marquis of Bute.—CROKER.

and kind as they could wish. One then supposes that what is so agreeable will soon be renewed; but stay away from him for half a year, and he will neither call on you, nor send to inquire about you." JOHNSON. "Why, Sir, I cannot ascertain his character exactly, as I do not know him; but I should not like to have such a man for my friend. He may love study, and wish not to be interrupted by his friends: Amici fures temporis. He may be a frivolous man, and be so much occupied with petty pursuits that he may not want friends. Or he may have a notion that there is dignity in appearing indifferent, while he in fact may not be more indifferent at his heart than another."

We went to evening prayers at St. Clement's, at seven, and then parted.<sup>1</sup>

JOHNSON TO JOSEPH FOWKE.<sup>2</sup>

"April 19, 1783.

"DEAR SIR, — To show you that neither length of time, nor distance of place, withdraws you from my memory, I have sent you a little present<sup>3</sup>, which will be transmitted by Sir Robert Chambers.

"To your former letters I made no answer, because I had none to make. Of the death of the unfortunate man (meaning Nandoomar) I believe Europe thinks as you think; but it was past prevention; and it was not fit for me to move a question in public which I was not qualified to discuss, as the inquiry could then do no good; and I might have been silenced by a hardy denial of facts, which, if denied, I could not prove.

"Since we parted, I have suffered much sickness of body and perturbation of mind. My mind, if I do not flatter myself, is unimpaired, except that sometimes my memory is less ready; but my body, though by nature very strong, has given way to repeated labors.

"Genua libant, vastos quatit æger anhelitus artus.<sup>4</sup> This line might have been written on purpose for me. You will see, however, that I have not totally forsaken literature. I can apply better to books than I could in some more vigorous parts of my life — at least than I did; and I have one more reason for reading — that time has, by taking away my companions, left me less opportunity of conversation. I have led an inactive and careless life; it is time at last to be diligent: there is yet provision to be made for eternity.

"Let me know, dear Sir, what you are doing. Are you accumulating gold, or picking up diamonds? Or are you now sated with Indian wealth, and content with what you have? Have you vigour for bustle, or tranquillity for inaction? Whatever you do, I do not suspect you of pillaging or oppressing; and shall rejoice to see you return with a body unbroken, and a mind uncorrupted.

"You and I had hardly any common friends, and therefore I have few anecdotes to relate to you. Mr. Levett, who brought us into acquaintance, died suddenly at my house last year, in his seventy-eighth year, or about that age. Mrs. Williams, the blind lady, is still with me, but much broken by a very wearisome and obstinate disease. She is, however, not likely to die; and it would delight me if you would send her some petty token of your remembrance. You may send me one too.

"Whether we shall ever meet again in this

<sup>1</sup> The reader will recollect, that in the year 1775, when Dr. Johnson visited France, he was kindly entertained by the English Benedictine monks at Paris (see anté, p. 464.) One of that body, the Rev. James Compton, in the course of some conversation with him at that time, asked him, if any of them should become converts to the protestant faith, and should visit England, whether they might hope for a friendly reception from him: to which he warmly replied, "that he should receive such a convert most cordially." In consequence of this conversation, Mr. Compton, a few years afterwards, having some doubts concerning the religion in which he had been bred, was induced, by reading the 110th Number of "The Rambler" (ON REPENTANCE), to consider the subject more deeply; and the result of his inquiries was, a determination to become a protestant. With this view, in the summer of 1782, he returned to his native country, from whence he had been absent from his sixth to his thirty-fifth year; and on his arrival in London, very scantily provided with the means of subsistence, he immediately repaired to Bolt Court, to visit Dr. Johnson; and having informed him of his desire to be admitted into the Church of England, for this purpose solicited his aid to procure for him an introduction to the Bishop of London, Dr. Lenth. At the time of his first visit, Johnson was so much indisposed, that he could allow him only a short conversation of a few minutes; but he desired him to call again in the course of the following week. When Mr. Compton visited him a second time, he was perfectly recovered from his indisposition; received him with the utmost cordiality; and not only undertook the management of the business in which his friendly interposition had been requested, but with great kindness exerted himself in this gentleman's favour, with a view to his future subsistence, and immediately supplied him with the means of present support.

Finding that the proposed introduction to the Bishop of London had from some accidental causes been deferred, lest Mr. Compton, who then lodged at Highgate, should suppose himself neglected, he wrote him the following note: —

"October 6, 1782.

"SIR, — I have directed Dr. Vyse's letter to be sent to you, that you may know the situation of your business. Delays are incident to all affairs; but there appears nothing in your case of either superabundance or neglect. Dr. Vyse seems to wish you well. I am, &c., SAM. JOHNSON."

Mr. Compton having, by Johnson's advice, quitted Highgate, and settled in London, had now more frequent opportunities of visiting his friend, and profiting by his conversation and advice. Still, however, his means of subsistence being very scanty, Dr. Johnson kindly promised to afford him a decent maintenance, until by his own exertions he should be able to obtain a livelihood; which benevolent offer he accepted, and lived entirely at Johnson's expense till the end of January, 1783; in which month, having previously been introduced to Bishop Lenth, he was received into our communion in St. James's parish church. In the following April, the place of under-master of St. Paul's school having become vacant, his friendly protector did him a more essential service, by writing the following letter in his favour to the Mercers' Company, in whom the appointment of the under-master lay: —

"Bolt Court, Fleet Street, April 19, 1783.

"GENTLEMEN, — At the request of the Reverend Mr. James Compton, who now solicits your votes to be elected under-master of St. Paul's school, I testify with great sincerity, that he is, in my opinion, a man of abilities sufficient, and more than sufficient, for the duties of the office for which he is a candidate. I am, &c., SAM. JOHNSON.

Though this testimony in Mr. Compton's favour was not attended with immediate success, yet Johnson's kindness was not without effect; for his letter procured Mr. Compton so many well-wishers in the respectable company of mercers, that he was honoured, by the favour of several of its members, with more applications to teach Latin and French than he could find time to attend to. In 1796, the Rev. Mr. Gilbert, one of his majesty's French chaplains, having accepted a living in Guernsey, nominated Mr. Compton as his substitute at the French chapel of St. James's; which appointment, in April, 1811, he relinquished for a better in the French chapel at Bethnal Green. By the favour of Dr. Porteus, the late excellent Bishop of London, he was also appointed, in 1802, chaplain of the Dutch chapel at St. James's; a station which he still holds. — MALONE.

<sup>2</sup> See anté, p. 500. n. 2. — C.

<sup>3</sup> A collection of the Doctor's Works. — NICHOLS.

<sup>4</sup> "For each vast limb moves stiff and slow from age,
And thick short pantings shake the lab'ring sage."

Æneid v. 432. Pitt. — C.

world, who can tell? Let us, however, wish well to each other: prayers can pass the Line and the Tropics. I am, dear Sir, yours sincerely,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

CHAPTER LXXVI.

1783.

Population of London. — Natural Affection. — Self-defence. — Duelling. — Corpulency. — Government of India. — Reviewers. — Horace. — Sickness. — Liberty of Teaching. — "Alas." — Virgil. — Cant. — Hospitality. — Miss Burney. — Barry's Pictures. — Baxter's Works. — Devotion. — Johnson attacked with a Stroke of the Palsy. — Recovery. — Visit to Langton at Rochester.

Ox Sunday, April 20., being Easter-day, after attending solemn service at St. Paul's, I came to Dr. Johnson, and found Mr. Lowe, the painter, sitting with him. Mr. Lowe mentioned the great number of new buildings of late in London, yet that Dr. Johnson had observed, that the number of inhabitants was not increased.<sup>1</sup> JOHNSON. "Why, Sir, the bills of mortality prove that no more people die now than formerly; so it is plain no more live. The register of births proves nothing, for not one-tenth of the people of London are born there." BOSWELL. "I believe, Sir, a great many of the children born in London, die early." JOHNSON. "Why, yes, Sir." BOSWELL. "But those who do live are as stout and strong people as any. Dr. Price says, they must be naturally strong to get through." JOHNSON. "That is system, Sir. A great traveller observes, that it is said there are no weak or deformed people among the Indians; but he, with much sagacity, assigns the reason of this, which is, that the hardship of their life as hunters and fishers does not allow weak or diseased children to grow up. Now, had I been an Indian, I must have died early; my eyes would not have served me to get food. I, indeed, now could fish, give me English tackle; but had I been an Indian, I must have starved, or they would have knocked me on the head, when they saw I could do nothing." BOSWELL. "Perhaps, they would have taken care of you; we are told they are fond of oratory,—you would have talked to them." JOHNSON. "Nay, Sir, I should not have lived long enough to be fit to talk; I should have been dead before I was ten years old. Depend upon it, Sir, a savage, when he is hungry, will not carry about with him a looby of nine years old, who cannot help himself. They have no affection, Sir." BOSWELL. "I believe natural affection, of which we hear so much, is very small." JOHNSON. "Sir, natural affection is nothing: but affection from principle and established duty is sometimes wonderfully strong." LOWE. "A hen, Sir, will feed her chickens in preference to herself." JOHNSON. "But we don't know that the hen is hungry; let the hen be fairly hungry, and I'll warrant she'll peck the corn herself. A cock, I believe, will feed hens instead of himself: but we don't know that the cock is hungry." BOSWELL. "And that, Sir, is not from affection, but gallantry. But some of the Indians have affection." JOHNSON. "Sir, that they help some of their children is plain; for some of them live, which they could not do without being helped."

I dined with him; the company were Mrs. Williams, Mrs. Desmoulins, and Mr. Lowe. He seemed not to be well, talked little, grew drowsy soon after dinner, and retired; upon which I went away.

Having next day gone to Mr. Burke's seat in the country, from whence I was recalled by an express, that a near relation of mine had killed his antagonist in a duel, and was himself dangerously wounded<sup>2</sup>, I saw little of Dr. Johnson till Monday, April 28., when I spent a considerable part of the day with him, and introduced the subject which then chiefly occupied my mind. JOHNSON. "I do not see, Sir, that fighting is absolutely forbidden in Scripture; I see revenge forbidden, but not self-defence." BOSWELL. "The quakers say it is. 'Unto him that smiteth thee on one cheek, offer him also the other.'" JOHNSON. "But stay, Sir; the text is meant only to have the effect of moderating passion; it is plain that we are not to take it in a literal sense. We see this from the context, where there are other recommendations; which, I warrant you, the quaker will not take literally; as, for instance, 'From him that would borrow of thee turn thou not away.' Let a man whose credit is bad come to a quaker, and say, 'Well, Sir, lend me a hundred pounds;' he'll find him as unwilling as any other man. No, Sir; a man may shoot the man who invades his character, as he may shoot him who attempts to break into his house.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The city was hardly capable of increase; but, in fact, the population of the city has rapidly diminished by the migration of the citizens to the suburbs, and the conversion of so many dwelling houses into counting and warehouses: the population of the city, in 1801, was about 130,000, and, in 1841, only 82,000. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>2</sup> This remarkable duel was fought on Monday the 21st of April, 1783, between Mr. Cunningham, of the Scots Greys, wounded, and Mr. Biddell, of the Life Guards, killed. See Genl. Mag. 1783, p. 362. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> I think it necessary to caution my readers against concluding that, in this or any other conversation of Dr. Johnson, they have his serious and deliberate opinion on the subject of duelling. In my Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides anté, 387, it appears that he made this frank confession: "Nobody, at times, talks more laxly than I do;" and ibid p. 342: "He fairly owned he could not explain the rationality of duelling." We may therefore infer that he could not think that justifiable, which seems so inconsistent with the spirit of the Gospel. At the same time, it must be confessed, that, from the prevalent notions of honour, a gentleman who receives a challenge is reduced to a dreadful alternative. A remarkable instance of this is furnished by a clause in the will of the late Colonel Thomas, of the Guards:

So, in 1745, my friend, Tom Cumming, the quaker [p. 343.], said he would not fight, but he would drive an ammunition cart: and we know that the quakers have sent flannel waistcoats to our soldiers, to enable them to fight better." BOSWELL. "When a man is the aggressor, and by ill usage forces on a duel in which he is killed, have we not little ground to hope that he is gone to a state of happiness?" JOHNSON. "Sir, we are not to judge determinately of the state in which a man leaves this life. He may in a moment have repented effectually, and it is possible may have been accepted of God. There is in 'Camden's Remains' an epitaph upon a very wicked man, who was killed by a fall from his horse, in which he is supposed to say,

'Between the stirrup and the ground,
I mercy ask'd, I mercy found.'"<sup>1</sup>

BOSWELL. "Is not the expression in the burial-service — 'in the sure and certain hope of a blessed resurrection'<sup>2</sup> — too strong to be used indiscriminately, and, indeed, sometimes when those over whose bodies it is said have been notoriously profane?" JOHNSON. "It is sure and certain hope, Sir, not belief." I did not insist further; but cannot help thinking that less positive words would be more proper.<sup>3</sup>

Talking of a man who was grown very fat, so as to be incommoded with corpulency, he said, "He eats too much, Sir." BOSWELL. "I don't know, Sir; you will see one man fat, who eats moderately, and another lean, who eats a great deal." JOHNSON. "Nay, Sir, whatever may be the quantity that a man eats, it is plain that if he is too fat, he has eaten more than he should have done. One man may have a digestion that consumes food better than common; but it is certain that solidity is increased by putting something to it." BOSWELL. "But may not solids swell and be distended?" JOHNSON. "Yes, Sir, they may swell and be distended; but that is not fat."

We talked of the accusation against a gentleman<sup>4</sup> for supposed delinquencies in India.

JOHNSON. "What foundation there is for accusation I know not, but they will not get at him. Where bad actions are committed at so great a distance, a delinquent can obscure the evidence till the scent becomes cold; there is a cloud between, which cannot be penetrated; therefore all distant power is bad. I am clear that the best plan for the government of India is a despotic governor; for if he be a good man, it is evidently the best government; and supposing him to be a bad man, it is better to have one plunier than many. A governor whose power is checked lets others plunder, that he himself may be allowed to plunder; but if despotic, he sees that the more he lets others plunder, the less there will be for himself, so he restrains them; and though he himself plunders, the country is a gainer, compared with being plundered by numbers."

I mentioned the very liberal payment which had been received for reviewing; and as evidence of this, that it had been proved in a trial, that Dr. Shebbeare had received six guineas a sheet for that kind of literary labour. JOHNSON. "Sir, he might get six guineas for a particular sheet, but not communibus sheetibus." BOSWELL. "Pray, Sir, by a sheet of review, is it meant that it shall be all of the writer's own composition? or are extracts, made from the book reviewed, deducted?" JOHNSON. "No, Sir; it is a sheet, no matter of what." BOSWELL. "I think that is not reasonable." JOHNSON. "Yes, Sir, it is. A man will more easily write a sheet all his own, than read an octavo volume to get extracts." To one of Johnson's wonderful fertility of mind, I believe writing was really easier than reading and extracting; but with ordinary men the case is very different. A great deal, indeed, will depend upon the care and judgment with which extracts are made. I can suppose the operation to be tedious and difficult; but in many instances we must observe crude morsels cut out of books as if at random; and when a large extract is made from one place, it surely may be done with very little trouble. One, how-written the night before he fell in a duel, September 3. 1783: "In the first place, I commit my soul to Almighty God, in hopes of his mercy and pardon for the irreligious step I now (in compliance with the unwarrantable customs of this wicked world) put myself under the necessity of taking." — BOSWELL. Colonel Thomas was shot in a duel by Colonel Cosmo Gordon. See Genl. Mag. 1783, p. 801. — WRIGHT.

<sup>1</sup> In repeating this epitaph, Johnson improved it. The original runs thus: —

"Betwixt the stirrup and the ground, Mercy I ask'd, mercy I found." — MALONE.

<sup>2</sup> Mr. Boswell, quoting from memory, has interpolated the word "blessed." The words of the Liturgy are, "in sure and certain hope of the resurrection," &c. &c. L'Éstrange, in his "Alliance of Divine Offices," p. 302, observes, "These words import the faith of the congregation then present in the article of the resurrection. The plural, 'our vile bodies,' excludes the restraint to a singular number." The reformed liturgies have uniformly employed the same cautious language. In one of the prayers used in the burial service, in the first book of Edward VI., the following passage occurs: "We give thee hearty thanks for this thy servant, whom thou hast delivered, &c. &c. And, as we trust, hast brought his soul into sure consolation of rest." — MARKLAND.

<sup>3</sup> Upon this objection, the Rev. Mr. Ralph Churton, fellow of Brazenose College, Oxford, has favoured me with the following satisfactory observation: —

"The passage in the burial service does not mean the resurrection of the person interred, but the general resurrection; it is in sure and certain hope of the resurrection; not his resurrection. Where the deceased is really spoken of, the expression is very different, — 'as our hope is this our brother doth [rest in Christ]; a mode of speech consistent with every thing but absolute certainty that the person departed doth not rest in Christ, which no one can be assured of without immediate revelation from Heaven. In the first of these places also, 'eternal life' does not necessarily mean eternity of bliss, but merely the eternity of the state, whether in happiness or in misery, to ensue upon the resurrection; which is probably the sense of 'the life everlasting,' in the Apostles' Creed. See Wheatly and Bennet on the Common Prayer." — BOSWELL.

<sup>4</sup> No doubt Mr. Warren Hastings, to whose case two reports of a select committee of the House of Commons, drawn up by Mr. Burke, began about this time to excite public attention. — CROKER, 1847.

ever, I must acknowledge, might be led, from the practice of reviewers, to suppose that they take a pleasure in original writing; for we often find, that instead of giving an accurate account of what has been done by the author whose work they are reviewing, which is surely the proper business of a literary journal, they produce some plausible and ingenious conceits of their own, upon the topics which have been discussed.

Upon being told that old Mr. Sheridan, indignant at the neglect of his oratorical plans, had threatened to go to America: JOHNSON. "I hope he will go to America." BOSWELL. "The Americans don't want oratory." JOHNSON. "But we can want Sheridan."

On Monday, April 28., I found him at home in the morning, and Mr. Seward with him. Horace having been mentioned: BOSWELL. "There is a great deal of thinking in his works. One finds there almost every thing but religion." SEWARD. "He speaks of his returning to it, in his Ode Parcus Deorum cultor et infrequens." JOHNSON. "Sir, he was not in earnest; this was merely poetical." BOSWELL. "There are, I am afraid, many people who have no religion at all." SEWARD. "And sensible people, too." JOHNSON. "Why, Sir, not sensible in that respect. There must be either a natural or a moral stupidity, if one lives in a total neglect of so very important a concern." SEWARD. "I wonder that there should be people without religion." JOHNSON. "Sir, you need not wonder at this, when you consider how large a proportion of almost every man's life is passed without thinking of it. I myself was for some years totally regardless of religion. It had dropped out of my mind. It was at an early part of my life. Sickness brought it back, and I hope I have never lost it since." BOSWELL. "My dear Sir, what a man must you have been without religion! Why you must have gone on drinking, and swearing, and—" JOHNSON (with a smile). "I drank enough, and swore enough, to be sure." SEWARD. "One should think that sickness and the view of death would make more men religious." JOHNSON. "Sir, they do not know how to go about it: they have not the first notion. A man who has never had religion before, no more grows religious when he is sick, than a man who has never learnt figures can count when he has need of calculation."

I mentioned a worthy friend<sup>1</sup> of ours, whom we valued much, but observed that he was too ready to introduce religious discourse upon all occasions. JOHNSON. "Why, yes, Sir, he will introduce religious discourse without seeing whether it will end in instruction and improvement, or produce some profane jest. He would introduce it in the company of Wilkes, and twenty more such."

I mentioned Dr. Johnson's excellent distinction between liberty of conscience and liberty of teaching. JOHNSON. "Consider, Sir; if you have children whom you wish to educate in the principles of the church of England, and there comes a quaker who tries to pervert them to his principles, you would drive away the quaker. You would not trust to the pre-dominance of right which you believe is in your opinions; you will keep wrong out of their heads. Now the vulgar are the children of the state. If any one attempts to teach them doctrines contrary to what the state approves, the magistrate may and ought to restrain him." SEWARD. "Would you restrain private conversation, Sir?" JOHNSON. "Why, Sir, it is difficult to say where private conversation begins, and where it ends. If we three should discuss even the great question concerning the existence of a Supreme Being by ourselves, we should not be restrained; for that would be to put an end to all improvement. But if we should discuss it in the presence of ten boarding-school girls, and as many boys, I think the magistrate would do well to put us in the stocks, to finish the debate there."

Lord Hailes had sent him a present of a curious little printed poem, on repairing the university of Aberdeen, by David Malloch which he thought would please Johnson, as affording clear evidence that Mallet had appeared even as a literary character by the name of Malloch; his changing which to one of softer sound had given Johnson occasion to introduce him into his Dictionary, under the article Alias.<sup>2</sup> This piece was, I suppose, one of Mallet's first essays. It is preserved in his works, with several variations. Johnson having read aloud, from the beginning of it, where there were some commonplace assertions as to the superiority of ancient times:—"How false," said he, "is all this, to say that 'in ancient times learning was not a disgrace to peer, as it is now!' In ancient times a peer was as ignorant as any one else. He would have been angry to have it thought he could write his name. Men in ancient times dare to stand forth with a degree of ignorance with which nobody would now dare to stand forth. I am always angry when I hear ancient time praised at the expense of modern times. Ther

<sup>1</sup> Mr. Langton. Ante, pp. 262. 292.—CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> Malloch, as Mr. Bindley observes to me, "continued to write his name thus, after he came to London. His verses prefixed to the second edition of Thomson's 'Winter' are so subscribed, and so are his Letters written in London, and published a few years ago in 'The European Magazine;' but he soon afterwards adopted the alteration to Mallet, for he is so called in the list of subscribers to Savage's Miscellanies, printed in 1726; and thenceforward uniformly Mallet, in all his writings."—MALONE. A notion has been entertained, that no such exemplification of Alias is to be found in Johnson's Dictionary, and that the whole story was waggishly fabricated by Wilkes in the "North Britain." The real fact is, that it is not to be found in the folio or quarto editions, but was added by Johnson in his own octavo abridgment, in 1756.—J. BOSWELL, JUN. It still remains in the octavo editions, at least it is in mine of 1794.—CROKER.

is now a great deal more learning in the world than there was formerly; for it is universally diffused. You have, perhaps, no man who knows as much Greek and Latin as Bentley; no man who knows as much mathematics as Newton: but you have many more men who know Greek and Latin, and who know mathematics."

On Thursday, 1st May, I visited him in the evening along with young Mr. Burke. He said, "It is strange that there should be so little reading in the world, and so much writing. People in general do not willingly read, if they can have any thing else to amuse them. There must be an external impulse; emulation, or vanity, or avarice. The progress which the understanding makes through a book has more pain than pleasure in it. Language is scanty and inadequate to express the nice gradations and mixtures of our feelings. No man reads a book of science from pure inclination. The books that we do read with pleasure are light compositions, which contain a quick succession of events. However, I have this year read all Virgil through. I read a book of the Æneid every night, so it was done in twelve nights, and I had a great delight in it. The Georgics did not give me so much pleasure, except the fourth book. The Eclogues I have almost all by heart. I do not think the story of the Æneid interesting. I like the story of the Odyssey much better; and this not on account of the wonderful things which it contains; for there are wonderful things enough in the Æneid;—the ships of the Trojans turned to sea-nymphs,—the tree at Polydorus's tomb dropping blood. The story of the Odyssey is interesting, as a great part of it is domestic. It has been said there is pleasure in writing, particularly in writing verses. I allow you may have pleasure from writing after it is over, if you have written well<sup>1</sup>; but you don't go willingly to it again. I know, when I have been writing verses, I have run my finger down the margin, to see how many I had made, and how few I had to make."

He seemed to be in a very placid humour; and although I have no note of the particulars of young Mr. Burke's conversation, it is but justice to mention in general, that it was such that Dr. Johnson said to me afterwards, "He did very well indeed; I have a mind to tell his father."<sup>2</sup>

JOHNSON TO REYNOLDS.

"May 2. 1783.

"DEAR SIR,—The gentleman who waits on you with this is Mr. CRUKSHANKS, who wishes to succeed his friend Dr. Hunter as professor of anatomy in the Royal Academy. His qualifications are very generally known, and it adds dignity to the institution that such men<sup>3</sup> are candidates. I am, Sir, &c.,
"SAM. JOHNSON."

I have no minute<sup>4</sup>, of any interview with Johnson till Thursday, May 15th, when I find what follows: BOSWELL. "I wish much to be in parliament, Sir." JOHNSON. "Why, Sir, unless you come resolved to support any administration, you would be the worse for being in parliament, because you would be obliged to live more expensively." BOSWELL. "Perhaps, Sir, I should be the less happy for being in parliament. I never would sell my vote, and I should be vexed if things went wrong." JOHNSON. "That's cant, Sir. It would not vex you more in the House than in the gallery: public affairs vex no man." BOSWELL. "Have not they vexed yourself a little, Sir? Have not you been vexed by all the turbulence of this reign, and by that absurd vote of the House of Commons, 'That the influence of the crown has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished?'" JOHNSON. "Sir, I have never slept an hour less, nor eat an ounce less meat. I would have knocked the factious dogs on the head, to be sure; but I was not vexed." BOSWELL. "I declare, Sir, upon my honour, I did imagine I was vexed, and took a pride in it; but it was, perhaps, cant; for I own I neither eat less nor slept less." JOHNSON. "My dear friend, clear your mind of cant. You may talk as other people do; you may say to a man, 'Sir, I am your humble servant.' You are not his most humble servant. You may say, 'These are bad times; it is a melancholy thing to be reserved to such times.' You don't mind the times. You tell a man, 'I am sorry you had such bad weather the last day of your journey, and were so much wet.' You don't care sixpence whether he is wet or dry. You may talk in this manner; it is a mode of talking in society; but don't think foolishly."

I talked of living in the country. JOHNSON. "Don't set up for what is called hospitality;

"May 5. 1783.

"Saturday we had a dinner at home,—Mrs. Carter, Miss Hamilton, the Kennicotts, and Dr. Johnson. Poor Johnson exerted himself exceedingly; but he was very ill, and looked so dreadfully, that it quite grieved me. His sickness seems to have softened his mind, without having at all weakened it. I was struck with the mild radiance of this setting sun. We had but a small party of such of his friends as we knew would be most agreeable to him, and as we were all very attentive and paid him the homage he both expects and deserves, he was very communicative, and, of course, instructive and delightful in the highest degree." Mem. i. 280.
—CROKER, 1847.

<sup>1</sup> Dum pingit, fructu arte; postquam pinxerat, fructu fructu arti. [While he paints he enjoys his art; after painting he enjoys the fruit of his art.] — Seneca. — KEARNEY.

<sup>2</sup> Richard Burke died Aug. 2. 1794, in his thirty-fifth year. — MALONE. The fond partiality of his father (for such it must be admitted to have been) for his talents is now well known. Mr. Burke is reported, with a mixture of personal and paternal pride, to have remarked how extraordinary it was that Lord Chatham, Lord Holland, and he should each have had a son so superior to their fathers. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> Let it be remembered by those who accuse Dr. Johnson of illiberality, that both were Scotchmen. — BOSWELL.

<sup>4</sup> On the 3d of May Johnson dined with Mrs. Garrick, and Hannah More gives the following amiable account of him:—

it is a waste of time, and a waste of money : you are eaten up, and not the more respected for your liberality. If your house be like an inn, nobody cares for you. A man who stays a week with another makes him a slave for a week." BOSWELL. "But there are people, Sir, who make their houses a home to their guests, and are themselves quite easy." JOHNSON. "Then, Sir, home must be the same to the guests, and they need not come."

Here he discovered a notion common enough in persons not much accustomed to entertain company, that there must be a degree of elaborate attention, otherwise company will think themselves neglected: and such attention is no doubt very fatiguing. He proceeded: "I would not, however, be a stranger in my own country; I would visit my neighbours, and receive their visits; but I would not be in haste to return visits. If a gentleman comes to see me, I tell him he does me a great deal of honour. I do not go to see him, perhaps, for ten weeks; then we are very complaisant to each other. No, Sir, you will have much more influence by giving or lending money where it is wanted, than by hospitality."

On Saturday, May 17., I saw him for a short time. Having mentioned that I had that morning been with old Mr. Sheridan, he remembered their former intimacy with a cordial warmth, and said to me, "Tell Mr. Sheridan, I shall be glad to see him and shake hands with him." BOSWELL. "It is to me very wonderful that resentment should be kept up so long." JOHNSON. "Why, Sir, it is not altogether resentment that he does not visit me; it is partly falling out of the habit,—partly disgust, such as one has at a drug that has made him sick. Besides, he knows that I laugh at his oratory."

Another day I spoke of one of our friends, of whom he, as well as I, had a very high opinion. He expatiated in his praise; but added, "Sir, he is a cursed Whig, a bottomless Whig, as they all are now."<sup>1</sup>

I mentioned my expectations from the interest of an eminent person<sup>2</sup> then in power; adding, "But I have no claim but the claim of friendship; however, some people will go a great way from that motive." JOHNSON. "Sir, they will go all the way from that motive." A gentleman talked of retiring;—"Never think of that," said Johnson. The gentleman urged, "I should then do no ill." JOHNSON. "Nor no good either. Sir, it would be a civil suicide."

On Monday, May 26., I found him at tea, and the celebrated Miss Burney<sup>3</sup>, the author of "Evelina" and "Cecilia," with him. I asked if there would be any speakers in parliament, if there were no places to be obtained. JOHNSON. "Yes, Sir. Why do you speak here? Either to instruct and entertain, which is a benevolent motive; or for distinction, which is a selfish motive." I mentioned "Cecilia." JOHNSON. (with an air of animated satisfaction.) "Sir, if you talk of 'Cecilia,' talk on."

We talked of Mr. Barry's exhibition of his pictures. JOHNSON. "Whatever the hand may have done, the mind has done its part. There is a grasp of mind there which you find nowhere else."<sup>4</sup>

I asked whether a man naturally virtuous, or one who has overcome wicked inclinations, is the best. JOHNSON. "Sir, to you, the man who has overcome wicked inclinations is not the best. He has more merit to himself. I would rather trust my money to a man who has no hands, and so a physical impossibility to steal, than to a man of the most honest principles. There is a witty satirical story of Foote. He had a small bust of Garrick placed upon his bureau. 'You may be surprised,' said he, 'that I allow him to be so near my gold;—but you will observe he has no hands.'"

On Friday, May 29.<sup>5</sup>, being to set out for Scotland next morning, I passed a part of the day with him in more than usual earnestness, as his health was in a more precarious state than at any time when I had parted from him. He, however, was quick and lively, and critical, as usual I mentioned one who was a very learned man. JOHNSON. "Yes, Sir, he has a great deal of learning; but it never lies

<sup>1</sup> Mr. Burke, — who, however, proved himself, on the French Revolution, not to be a bottomless Whig, anté, p. 509. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> Probably Lord Mountstuart. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> Frances, afterwards Mad. D'Arbly, born in July, 1752, had published "Evelina," at the latter end of January, 1778, and "Cecilia" in the autumn of 1782. It was stated and believed that she was only seventeen when she surprised the world by her "Evelina;" it now appears that she was near twenty-seven — an important difference. — CROKER, 1831-47.

<sup>4</sup> In Mr. Barry's printed analysis or description of these pictures, he speaks of Johnson's character in the highest terms. — BOSWELL. They are still to be seen, in the great room of the Society of Arts in the Adelphi. — CROKER.

<sup>5</sup> Before Boswell left town he was negotiating another dinner with Dr. Johnson and Mr. Wilkes at the house of the latter; but Johnson was pre-engaged.

BOSWELL TO WILKES.

"Wednesday, May 21. 1783.

"Mr. Boswell's compliments to Mr. Wilkes. He rejoices to find he is so much better as to be abroad. He finds that it would not be unpleasant to Dr. Johnson to dine at Mr. Wilkes's. The thing would be so curiously benignant, it were a pity it should not take place. Nobody but Mr. Boswell should be asked to meet the doctor. Mr. Boswell goes for Scotland on Friday the 30th. If, then, a card were sent to the doctor on Monday, Tuesday, or Wednesday, without delay, it is to be hoped he would be fixed; and notice will be sent to Mr. Boswell."

BOSWELL TO MR. AND MISS WILKES.

"Mr. Boswell presents his best compliments to Mr. and Miss Wilkes; encloses Dr. Johnson's answer; and regrets much that so agreeable a meeting must be deferred till next year, as Mr. Boswell is to set out for Scotland in a few days. Hopes Mr. Wilkes will write to him there."

Enclosed.

"May 24. 1783.

"Dr. Johnson returns thanks to Mr. and Miss Wilkes for their kind invitation; but he is engaged for Tuesday to Sir Joshua Reynolds and for Wednesday to Mr. Paradise." — CROKER.

straight. There is never one idea by the side of another; 'tis all entangled: and then he drives it so awkwardly upon conversation!"

I stated to him an anxious thought, by which a sincere Christian might be disturbed, even when conscious of having lived a good life, so far as is consistent with human infirmity; he might fear that he should afterwards fall away, and be guilty of such crimes as would render all his former religion vain. Could there be, upon this awful subject, such a thing as balancing of accounts? Suppose a man who has led a good life for seven years commits an act of wickedness, and instantly dies; will his former good life have any effect in his favour? JOHNSON. "Sir, if a man has led a good life for seven years, and then is hurried by passion to do what is wrong, and is suddenly carried off, depend upon it he will have the reward of his seven years' good life: God will not take a catch of him. Upon this principle Richard Baxter believes that a suicide may be saved. 'If,' says he, 'it should be objected that what I maintain may encourage suicide, I answer, I am not to tell a lie to prevent it.'" BOSWELL. "But does not the text say, 'As the tree falls, so it must lie?'" JOHNSON. "Yes, Sir; as the tree falls: but,"—after a little pause—"that is meant as to the general state of the tree, not what is the effect of a sudden blast." In short, he interpreted the expression as referring to condition, not to position. The common notion, therefore, seems to be erroneous; and Shenstone's witty remark on divines trying to give the tree a jerk upon a death-bed, to make it lie favourably, is not well founded.<sup>1</sup>

I asked him what works of Richard Baxter's I should read. He said, "Read any of them; they are all good."

He said, "Get as much force of mind as you can. Live within your income. Always have something saved at the end of the year. Let your imports be more than your exports, and you'll never go far wrong."

I assured him, that in the extensive and various range of his acquaintance there never had been any one who had a more sincere respect and affection for him than I had. He said, "I believe it, Sir. Were I in distress, there is no man to whom I should sooner come than to you. I should like to come and have a cottage in your park, toddle about, live mostly on milk, and be taken care of by Mrs. Boswell. She and I are good friends now; are we not?"

Talking of devotion, he said, "Though it be true that 'God dwelleth not in temples made with hands,' yet in this state of being our minds are more piously affected in places appropriated to divine worship, than in others. Some people have a particular room in their houses where they say their prayers; of which I do not disapprove, as it may animate their devotion."

He embraced me, and gave me his blessing, as usual, when I was leaving him for any length of time. I walked from this door to-day with a fearful apprehension of what might happen before I returned.

JOHNSON TO THE RIGHT HON. W. WINDHAM.

"London, May 31. 1783.

"SIR, — The bringer of this letter is the father of Miss Philips<sup>2</sup>, a singer, who comes to try her voice on the stage at Dublin. Mr. Philips is one of my old friends; and as I am of opinion that neither he nor his daughter will do any thing that can disgrace their benefactors, I take the liberty of entreating you to countenance and protect them so far as may be suitable to your station<sup>3</sup> and character, and shall consider myself as obliged by any favourable notice which they shall have the honour of receiving from you. I am, Sir, &c.,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

The following is another instance of his active benevolence: —

JOHNSON TO REYNOLDS.

"June 2. 1783.

"DEAR SIR, — I have sent you some of my godson's performances, of which I do not pretend to form any opinion. When I took the liberty of mentioning him to you, I did not know what I have since been told, that Mr. Moser had admitted him among the students of the Academy. What more can be done for him, I earnestly entreat you to consider; for I am very desirous that he should derive some advantage from my connection with him. If you are inclined to see him, I will bring him to wait on you at any time that you shall be pleased to appoint. I am, Sir, &c.,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

<sup>1</sup> "When a tree is falling, I have seen the labourers, by a trivial jerk with a rope, throw it upon the spot where they would wish it to lie. Divines, understanding this text too literally, pretend, by a little interposition in the article of death, to regulate a person's everlasting happiness." Shenstone's Works, vol. ii. p. 297. I wonder Johnson did not remark that in the authorised version (agreeing with the Septuagint, the Vulgate, and the Geneva and Douay versions) the text is, "If the clouds be full of rain, they empty themselves upon the earth; and if the tree falls toward the south, or toward the north, there it shall be; and that the whole context, the authorised heading of the chapter, and the best commentators, Granger, Poole, Patrick, Henry, and Scott, — all concur that the object of the exhortation is charity, and that it has no reference whatsoever to the spiritual state of man, at or after death. Our earlier Bibles, which are followed by the Homily on Prayer, give, "Where the tree falls * * * there it lyeth;" and the Bishops' Bible adds a note, "In what state a man dyeth, in that he shall be judged." But this interpretation, though so frequently adopted, is, as I have said, rejected by the best commentators, and indeed seems, if not absolutely unintelligible, at least inconsistent with the whole scope of the chapter. — CROKER, 1831-47.

<sup>2</sup> Now the celebrated Mrs. CROKER. — BOSWELL. She died in October, 1805, æt. 45. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> Mr. Windham was at this time in Dublin, secretary to the Earl of Northington, then lord lieutenant of Ireland. — BOSWELL. He held this office a very short time, finding, or, as I believe, fancying, that it was too much for his nervous system. See ante, p. 721. n. 1. — CROKER, 1847.

[JOHNSON TO MRS. THRALE.

(Extract.)

"London, June 13. 1783.<sup>1</sup>

"Seward called on me yesterday. He is going — only for a few weeks — first to Paris, and then to Flanders, to contemplate the pictures of Claude Lorraine; and he asked me if that was not as good a way as any of spending time — that time which returns no more; of which, however, a great part seems to be very foolishly spent, even by the wisest and the best.

Poor Lawrence<sup>2</sup> and his youngest son died almost on the same day.]

— Letters.

My anxious apprehensions at parting with him this year proved to be but too well founded; for not long afterwards he had a dreadful stroke of the palsy, of which there are very full and accurate accounts in letters written by himself, to show with what composure of mind and resignation to the Divine will his steady piety enabled him to behave.

JOHNSON TO ALLEN.

"June 17. 1783.

"It has pleased God this morning to deprive me of the powers of speech; and as I do not know but that it may be his further good pleasure to deprive me soon of my senses, I request you will, on the receipt of this note, come to me, and act for me as the exigencies of my case may require. I am, &c.,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHNSON TO TAYLOR.

"June 17. 1783.

"DEAR SIR, — It has pleased God, by a paralytic stroke in the night, to deprive me of speech. I am very desirous of Dr. Heberden's assistance, as I think my case is not past remedy. Let me see you as soon as it is possible. Bring Dr. Heberden with you, if you can; but come yourself at all events. I am glad you are so well when I am so dreadfully attacked.

"I think that by a speedy application of stimulants much may be done. I question if a vomit, vigorous and rough, would not rouse the organs of speech to action. As it is too early to send, I will try to recollect what I can that can be suspected to have brought on this dreadful distress.

"I have been accustomed to bleed frequently for an asthmatic complaint; but have foreborne for some time by Dr. Pepys's persuasion, who perceived my legs beginning to swell. I sometimes alleviate a painful, or, more properly, an oppressive constriction of my chest, by opiates; and have lately taken opium frequently; but the last, or two last times, in smaller quantities. My largest dose is three grains, and last night I took but two. You will suggest these things (and they are all that I can call to mind) to Dr. Heberden. I am, &c.,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

Two days after he wrote thus to Mrs. Thrale: —

JOHNSON TO MRS. THRALE.

(Extract.)

"On Monday, the 16th, I sat for my picture [to Miss Reynolds], and walked a considerable way with little inconvenience. In the afternoon and evening I felt myself light and easy, and began to plan schemes of life. Thus I went to bed, and in a short time waked and sat up, as has been long my custom, when I felt a confusion and indistinctness in my head, which lasted, I suppose, about half a minute. I was alarmed, and prayed God, that however he might afflict my body, he would spare my understanding. This prayer, that I might try the integrity of my faculties, I made in Latin verse. The lines were not very good, but I knew them not to be very good: I made them easily, and concluded myself to be unimpaired in my faculties.

"Soon after I perceived that I had suffered a paralytic stroke, and that my speech was taken from me. I had no pain, and so little dejection in this dreadful state, that I wondered at my own apathy, and considered that perhaps death itself, when it should come, would excite less horror than seems now to attend it.

"In order to rouse the vocal organs, I took two drams. Wine has been celebrated for the production of eloquence. I put myself into violent motion, and I think repeated it; but all was vain. I then went to bed; and, strange as it may seem, I think slept. When I saw light, it was time to contrive what I should do. Though God stopped my speech, he left me my hand: I enjoyed a mercy which was not granted to my dear friend Lawrence, who now perhaps overlooks me as I am writing, and rejoices that I have what he wanted. My first note was necessarily to my servant, who came in talking, and could not immediately comprehend why he should read what I put into his hands.

"I then wrote a card to Mr. Allen, that I might have a discreet friend at hand, to act as occasion should require. In penning this note I had some difficulty: my hand, I knew not how or why, made wrong letters. I then wrote to Dr. Taylor to come to me, and bring Dr. Heberden; and I sent to Dr. Broeklesby, who is my neighbour.<sup>3</sup> My physicians are very friendly, and give me great hopes; but you may imagine my situation. I have so far recovered my vocal powers, as to repeat the Lord's Prayer with no imperfect articulation. My memory, I hope, yet remains as it was; but such an attack produces solicitude for the safety of every faculty."

— Letters.

<sup>1</sup> I cannot account for the date of this letter, mentioning the deaths of Dr. Lawrence, who died only that day at Canterbury, and of Mr. Lawrence, who died two days later. Mrs. Thrale's answer is liable to the same difficulty. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>2</sup> Dr. Lawrence, descended, as Sir Egerton Brydges informed me, from Milton's friend, was born in 1771, died in 1783, on the 12th of June. His son, the Reverend J. Lawrence, died on the 15th. Johnson had addressed a Latin ode to Dr. Lawrence (Works, i. 180.) on the illness of one of his sons, some years before. Another of his sons was Sir Soulden Lawrence, one of the judges of the King's Bench. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> He lived in Norfolk Street, in the Strand. — CROKER, 1847.

JOHNSON TO DAVIES

"June 18, 1783.

"DEAR SIR, — I have had, indeed, a very heavy blow; but God, who yet spares my life, I humbly hope will spare my understanding and restore my speech. As I am not at all helpless, I want no particular assistance, but am strongly affected by Mrs. Davies's tenderness; and when I think she can do me good, shall be very glad to call upon her. I had ordered friends to be shut out; but one or two have found the way in; and if you come you shall be admitted; for I know not whom I can see that will bring more amusement on his tongue, or more kindness in his heart. I am, &c.,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

It gives me great pleasure to preserve such a memorial of Johnson's regard for Mr. Davies, to whom I was indebted for my introduction to him.<sup>1</sup> He indeed loved Davies cordially, of which I shall give the following little evidence: — One day when he had treated him with too much asperity, Tom, who was not without pride and spirit, went off in a passion; but he had hardly reached home, when Frank, who had been sent after him, delivered this note: "Come, come, dear Davies. I am always sorry when we quarrel; send me word that we are friends."

[JOHNSON TO MRS. THRALE.

(Extracts.)

"June 20, 1783. — I think to send you for some time a regular diary. You will forgive the gross images that disease must necessarily present. Dr. Lawrence said that medical treatises should be always in Latin. I have had my head covered with one formidable diffusion of cantharides.

"I never had any distortion of the countenance but what Dr. Brocklesby called a little prolapsus, which went away the second day.

"I was this day directed to eat flesh, and I dined very copiously upon roasted lamb and boiled pease. I then went to sleep in a chair; and when I waked, I found Dr. Brocklesby sitting by me, and fell to talking with him in such a manner as made me glad, and I hope made me thankful. The doctor fell to repeating Juvenal's ninth satire; but I let him see that the province was mine.

"I am to take wine to-night, and hope it will do me good."

"June 21. — I had a comfortable and placid night. My physicians this morning thought my amendment not inconsiderable, and my friends who visited me said my look was sprightly and cheerful. My disease, whatever it was, seems collected into this one dreadful attack.

"To-day I received a letter of consolation from an unknown hand, kindly and piously, but not enthusiastically written."

"June 23. — My friends tell me that my powers of utterance improve daily, and Dr. Heberden declares he hopes to find me well to-morrow.

Palsies are more common than I thought. I have been visited by four friends, who have had each a stroke, and one of them two."

"June 28. — Your letter is just such as I desire, and as from you I hope always to deserve.

"The black dog<sup>2</sup> I hope always to resist, and in time to drive, though I am deprived of almost all those that used to help me. The neighbourhood is impoverished. I had once Richardson and Lawrence in my reach. Mrs. Allen is dead. My home has lost Levett; a man who took interest in every thing, and therefore ready at conversation. Mrs. Williams is so weak that she can be a companion no longer. When I rise, my breakfast is solitary; the black dog waits to share it. From breakfast to dinner he continues barking, except that Dr. Brocklesby for a little keeps him at a distance. Dinner with a sick woman you may venture to suppose not much better than solitary. After dinner, what remains but to count the clock, and hope for that sleep which I can scarce expect? Night comes at last, and some hours of restlessness and confusion bring me again to a day of solitude. What shall exclude the black dog from an habitation like this? If I were a little richer, I would perhaps take some cheerful female into the house.

"Last night fresh flies [cantharides] were put to my head, and hindered me from sleeping. To-day I fancy myself incommoded with heat.

"I have, however, watered the garden both yesterday and to-day, just as I watered the laurels in the island" [at Streatham].

"July 3. — Dr. Brocklesby yesterday dismissed the cantharides, and I can now find a soft place upon my pillow. Last night was cool, and I rested well; and this morning I have been a friend at a poetical difficulty. Here is now a glimpse of daylight again; but how near is the evening none can tell, and I will not prognosticate. We all know that from none of us it can be far distant: may none of us know this in vain!

"I went, as I took care to boast, on Tuesday [1st July] to the Club, and hear that I was thought to have performed as well as usual.

"I dined on fish, with the wing of a small turkey-chick, and left roast beef, goose, and venison-pie untouched. I live much on pease, and never had them so good for so long a time in any year that I can remember."

— Letters.

JOHNSON TO LOWE.<sup>2</sup>

"Friday, June 20, 1783.

"SIR, — You know, I suppose, that a sudden illness makes it impracticable to me to wait on Mr. Barry, and the time is short. If it be your opinion that the end can be obtained by writing, I am very willing to write, and, perhaps, it may do as well: it is, at least, all that can be expected at present from, Sir, your most humble servant,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

"If you would have me write, come to me: I order your admission."]

— Freeling MSS.<sup>1</sup> See anté, p. 640. n. 1. — C.<sup>2</sup> Amidst all this distress and danger, we see by this and some subsequent letters communicated by Mr. Markland, his indefatigable charity and kindness to his humble friends.<sup>1</sup> Poor Derrick, however, though he did not himself introduce me to Dr. Johnson, as he promised, had the merit of introducing me to Davies, the immediate introducer. — BOSWELL.

JOHNSON TO MRS. PORTER.

"London, June 25. 1783.

"DEAR MADAM, — Since the papers have given an account of my illness, it is proper that I should give my friends some account of it myself.

"Very early in the morning of the 16th<sup>1</sup> of this month I perceived my speech taken from me. When it was light I sat down and wrote such directions as appeared proper. Dr. Heberden and Dr. Brocklesby were called. Blisters were applied, and medicines given. Before night I began to speak with some freedom, which has been increasing ever since, so that I have now very little impediment in my utterance. Dr. Heberden took his leave this morning.

"Since I received this stroke I have in other respects been better than I was before, and hope yet to have a comfortable summer. Let me have your prayers.

"If writing is not troublesome, let me know whether you are pretty well, and how you have passed the winter and spring.

"Make my compliments to all my friends. I am, dear Madam, your most humble servant,
— Pearson MSS. "SAM. JOHNSON."]

JOHNSON TO BOSWELL.

"London, July 3. 1783.

"DEAR SIR, — Your anxiety about my health is very friendly and very agreeable with your general kindness. I have indeed had a very frightful blow. On the 17th of last month, about three in the morning, as near as I can guess, I perceived myself almost totally deprived of speech. I had no pain. My organs were so obstructed that I could say no, but could scarcely say yes. I wrote the necessary directions, for it pleased God to spare my hand, and sent for Dr. Heberden and Dr. Brocklesby. Between the time in which I discovered my own disorder, and that in which I sent for the doctors, I had, I believe, in spite of my surprise and solicitude, a little sleep, and nature began to renew its operations. They came and gave the directions which the disease required, and from that time I have been continually improving in articulation. I can now speak, but the nerves are weak, and I cannot continue discourse long; but strength, I hope, will return. The physicians consider me as cured. I was last Sunday at church. On Tuesday I took an airing to Hampstead, and dined with the Club, where Lord Palmerston was proposed, and, against my opinion, was rejected.<sup>2</sup> I designed to go next week with Mr. Langton to Rochester, where I purpose to stay about ten days, and then try some other air. I have many kind invitations. Your brother has very frequently inquired after me. Most of my friends have, indeed, been very attentive. Thank dear Lord Hailes for his present.

"I hope you found at your return every thing gay and prosperous, and your lady, in particular, quite recovered and confirmed. Pay her my respects. I am, dear Sir, &c., SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHNSON TO MRS. PORTER.

"London, July 5. 1783.

"DEAR MADAM, — The account which you give of your health is but melancholy. May it please God to restore you. My disease affected my speech, and still continues, in some degree, to obstruct my utterance; my voice is distinct enough for a while, but the organs being still weak are quickly weary; but in other respects I am, I think, rather better than I have lately been, and can let you know my state without the help of any other hand. In the opinion of my friends, and in my own, I am gradually mending. The physicians consider me as cured, and I had leave four days ago to wash the cantharides from my head. Last Tuesday I dined at the Club.

"I am going next week into Kent, and purpose to change the air frequently this summer: whether I shall wander so far as Staffordshire I cannot tell. I should be glad to come. Return my thanks to Mrs. Cobb, and Mr. Pearson, and all that have shown attention to me. Let us, my dear, pray for one another, and consider our sufferings as notices mercifully given us to prepare ourselves for another state.

"I live now but in a melancholy way. My old friend Mr. Levett is dead, who lived with me in the house, and was useful and companionable; Mrs. Desmoulins is gone away<sup>3</sup>; and Mrs. Williams is so much decayed, that she can add little to another's gratifications. The world passes away, and we are passing with it; but there is, doubtless, another world, which will endure for ever. Let us all fit ourselves for it. I am, &c., SAM. JOHNSON."

Such was the general vigour of his constitution, that he recovered from this alarming and severe attack with wonderful quickness<sup>4</sup>: so that in July he was able to make a visit to Mr. Langton at Rochester, where he passed about a fortnight, and made little excursions as easily as at any time of his life.

JOHNSON TO MRS. THRALE.

(Extracts.)

"London, July 23. 1783.

"I have been thirteen days at Rochester, and am now just returned. I came back by water in a common boat, twenty miles for a shilling; and when I landed at Billingsgate I carried my baggage myself to Cornhill before I could get a coach, and was not much incommoded."

"August 13. — Of this world, in which you present me as delighting to live, I can say little. Since I came home I have only been to church once to Burney's, once to Paradise's, and once to

<sup>1</sup> Mistake for 17th. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> His lordship was soon after chosen, and is now a member of the Club. — BOSWELL.

<sup>3</sup> She soon returned, and attended him in his last illness. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>4</sup> During his illness Mr. Murphy visited him, and found him reading Dr. Watson's Chemistry: articulating with difficulty, he said, "From this book he who knows nothing may learn a great deal, and he who knows will be pleased to find his knowledge recalled to his mind in a manner highly pleasing." Life, p. 121. Murphy adds, that in the month of August he set out for Lichfield on a visit to Miss Luc Porter; and in his way back paid his respects to Dr. Adam at Oxford. But it seems certain that he did not in this interval go to Lichfield, and there is barely time for a short excursion to Oxford. — CROKER.

Reynolds's. With Burney I saw Dr. Rose, his new relation, with whom I have been many years acquainted. If I discovered no reliques of disease, I am glad; but Fanny's trade is fiction.<sup>1</sup>

"I have since partaken of an epidemical disorder; but common evils produce no dejection.

"Paradise's company, I fancy, disappointed him; I remember nobody. With Reynolds was the Archbishop of Tuam, a man coarse of voice and inelegant of language.<sup>2</sup>

"I am now broken with disease, without the alleviation of familiar friendship or domestic society; I have no middle state between clamour and silence, between general conversation and self-tormenting solitude. Levett is dead, and poor Williams is making haste to die: I know not if she will ever come out of her chamber.

"I am now quite alone; but let me turn my thoughts another way."

"August 20. — This has been a day of great emotion; the office of the communion for the sick has been performed in poor Mrs. Williams's chamber. At home I see almost all my companions dead or dying. At Oxford I have just lost Wheeler, the man with whom I most delighted to converse. The sense of my own diseases, and the sight of the world sinking round me, oppress me perhaps too much. I hope that all these admonitions will not be vain, and that I shall learn to die as dear Williams is dying, who was very cheerful before and after this awful solemnity, and seems to resign herself with calmness and hope upon eternal mercy.

"I read your last kind letter with great delight; but when I came to love and honour, what sprung into my mind? — How loved, how honoured once, wails thee not.

"I sat to Mrs. Reynolds yesterday for my picture, perhaps the tenth time; and I sat for three hours with the patience of mortal born to bear."

"August 26. — Things stand with me much as they have done for some time. Mrs. Williams fancies now and then that she grows better, but her vital powers appear to be slowly burning out. Nobody thinks, however, that she will very soon be quite wasted; and as she suffers me to be of very little use to her, I have determined to pass some time with Mr. Bowles, near Salisbury, and have taken a place for Thursday.

"Some benefit may be perhaps received from change of air, some from change of company, and some from mere change of place. It is not easy to grow well in a chamber where one has long been sick, and where every thing seen, and every person speaking, revives and impresses images of pain. Though it be true that no man can run away from himself, yet he may escape from many causes of senselessness. That the mind is its own place, is the boast of a fallen angel that had learned to die.<sup>3</sup> External locality has great effects, at least upon all embodied beings. I hope this little journey will afford me at last some suspense of melancholy."]

— Letters.

CHAPTER LXXVII.

1783.

Visit to Heale. — Death of Mrs. Williams. — Conversation. — French Literature. — Dr. Priestley. — Caudour. — Mrs. Siddons. — Mrs. Porter. — Kitty Clive. — Mrs. Pritchard. — John Philip Kemble. — George Anne Bellamy. — Lord Carlisle's Tragedy. — Unconstitutional Influence of the Scotch Peers — Old Horses. — Mickle's "Lusiad." — Ossian. — Rudes for the Essex Head Club.

IN August he went as far as the neighbourhood of Salisbury, to Heale, the seat of William Bowles, Esq., a gentleman whom I have heard him praise for exemplary religious order in his family. In his diary I find a short but honourable mention of this visit: — "August 28., I came to Heale without fatigue. 30th. I am entertained quite to my mind."

JOHNSON TO BROCKLESBY.

"Heale, near Salisbury, Aug. 29. 1783.

"DEAR SIR, — Without appearing to want a just sense of your kind attention, I cannot omit to give an account of the day which seemed to appear in some sort perilous. I rose at five, and went out at six; and having reached Salisbury about nine, went forward a few miles in my friend's chariot. I was no more wearied with the journey, though it was a high-hung, rough coach, than I should have been forty years ago. We shall now see what air will do. The country is all a plain; and the house in which I am, so far as I can judge from my window, for I write before I have left my chamber, is sufficiently pleasant.

"Be so kind as to continue your attention to Mrs. Williams. It is great consolation to the well, and still greater to the sick, that they find themselves not neglected; and I know that you will be desirous of giving comfort, even where you have no great hope of giving help.

"Since I wrote the former part of the letter, I find that by the course of the post I cannot send it before the 31st. I am, &c., SAM. JOHNSON."

While he was here, he had a letter from Dr. Brocklesby, acquainting him of the death of Mrs. Williams, which affected him a good deal. Though for several years her temper had not been complacent, she had valuable qualities, and her departure left a blank in his house. Upon this occasion he, according to his habitual course of piety, composed a prayer.<sup>4</sup>

I shall here insert a few particulars concerning him, with which I have been favoured by one of his friends.

"He had once conceived the design of writing the Life of Oliver Cromwell, saying that he

<sup>1</sup> Miss Fanny Burney, the novelist, had, it seems, given that Johnson feared was too favourable an account of him, CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> Hon. Jos. Deane Bourke, afterwards Earl of Mayo. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> Par. Lost, b. l. 1. 254.

<sup>4</sup> Prayers and Meditations, p. 226. — B. In his letter to Miss Susannah Thrale, Sept. 9, he thus writes: —

"Pray show mamma this passage of a letter from Dr. Brocklesby: — 'Mrs. Williams, from mere inattention, has at length paid the great debt to nature, about three o'clock this thought it must be highly curious to trace his extraordinary rise to the supreme power from so obscure a beginning. He at length laid aside his scheme, on discovering that all that can be told of him is already in print; and that it is impracticable to procure any authentic information in addition to what the world is already in possession of.<sup>1</sup>

"He had likewise projected, but at what part of his life is not known, a work to show how small a quantity of REAL FICTION there is in the world; and that the same images, with very little variation, have served all the authors who have ever written."

"His thoughts in the latter part of his life were frequently employed on his deceased friends. He often muttered these or such like sentences: 'Poor man! and then he died.'"

"Speaking of a certain literary friend, 'He is a very pompous puzzling fellow,' said he: 'he lent me a letter once that somebody had written to him, no matter what it was about; but he wanted to have the letter back, and expressed a mighty value for it: he hoped it was to be met with again; he would not lose it for a thousand pounds. I laid my hand upon it soon afterwards, and gave it him. I believe I said I was very glad to have met with it. Oh, then he did not know that it signified any thing. So you see, when the letter was lost it was worth a thousand pounds, and when it was found it was not worth a farthing.'"

"The style and character of his conversation is pretty generally known: it was certainly conducted in conformity with a precept of Lord Bacon, but it is not clear, I apprehend, that this conformity was either perceived or intended by Johnson. The precept alluded to is as follows: 'In all kinds of speech, either pleasant, grave, severe, or ordinary, it is convenient to speak leisurely, and rather drawlingly than hastily: because hasty speech confounds the memory, and oftentimes, besides the unseemliness, drives a man either to stammering, nonplus, or harping on that which should follow whereas a slow speech confirmeth the memory addeth a conceit of wisdom to the hearers, beside a seemliness of speech and countenance.'<sup>2</sup> Dr. Johnson's method of conversation was certainly calculated to excite attention, and to amuse and instruct (as it happened), without wearying or confusing his company. He was always most perfectly clear and perspicuous; and his language was so accurate, and his sentences so neatly constructed that his conversation might have been all printed without any correction. At the same time, it was easy and natural; the accuracy of it had no appearance of labour, constraint, or stiffness: he seemed more correct than others by the force of habit, and the customary exercises of his powerful mind."

"He spoke often in praise of French literature. 'The French are excellent in this,' he would say 'they have a book on every subject.' From what he had seen of them he denied them the praise of superior politeness, and mentioned, with very visible disgust, the custom they have of spitting on the floors of their apartments. 'This,' said the doctor, 'is as gross a thing as can well be done; and of wonders how any man, or set of men, can persist so offensive a practice for a whole day together, one should expect that the first effort towards civilization would remove it even among savages.'"

"Baxter's 'Reasons of the Christian Religion' he thought contained the best collection of evidences of the divinity of the Christian system."

"Chymistry was always an interesting pursuit with Dr. Johnson. Whilst he was in Wiltshire, he attended some experiments that were made by a physician at Salisbury on the new kinds of air. In the course of the experiments frequent mention being made of Dr. Priestley, Dr. Johnson knitted his brows, and in a stern manner inquired, 'Why do we hear so much of Dr. Priestley?'<sup>3</sup> He was v morning (Sept. 6.). She died without a struggle, retaining her faculties entire to the very last; and, as she expressed it, having set her house in order, was prepared to leave it at the last summons of nature."

In his letter to Mrs. Thrale, Sept. 22., he adds:—

"Poor Williams has, I hope, seen the end of her afflictions. She acted with prudence, and she bore with fortitude. She has left me.

'Thou thy weary task hast done,
Home art gone, and ta'en thy wages.'

Had she had good-humour and prompt elocution, her universal curiosity and comprehensive knowledge would have made her the delight of all that knew her. She left her little to your charity-school."—MALONE.

<sup>1</sup> Mr. Malone observes, "This, however, was entirely a mistake, as appears from the Memoirs published by Mr. Noble. Had Johnson been furnished with the materials which the industry of that gentleman has procured, and with others which it is believed are yet preserved in manuscript, he would, without doubt, have produced a most valuable and curious history of Cromwell's life."—BOSWELL. I may add, that, had Johnson given us a Life of Cromwell, we should not have been disgusted in numberless instances with—"My Lord Protector" and "My Lady PROTECTRESS;" and certainly the brutal ruffian who presided in the bloody assembly that murdered their sovereign would have been characterised by very different epithets than those which are applied to him in this work, where we find him described as "the BOLD and DETERMINED Bradshaw."—MALONE.

<sup>2</sup> Hints for Civil Conversation.—Bacon's Works, 4to. vol. i. p. 571.—MALONE.

<sup>3</sup> I do not wonder at Johnson's displeasure when the name of Dr. Priestley was mentioned; for I know no writer who has been suffered to publish more pernicious doctrines. I shall instance only three. First, Matriculation; by which mind is denied to human nature; which, if believed, it deprive us of every elevated principle. Secondly, Necessity; or the doctrine that every action, whether good or bad, is included in an unchangeable and unavoidable system, a notion utterly subversive of moral government. Thirdly, that we have no reason to think that the future world (which, as he is pleased to inform us, will be adapted to our improved nature) will be materially different from this; which, if believed, would sink wretched mortals into despondency, as they could no longer hope for "the rest that remaineth for the people of God," or for that happiness which is revealed to us as something beyond our present concepts, but would feel themselves doomed to a continuation of the uneasy state under which they now groan. I say nothing of the petulant intemperance with which he dares to insult the venerable establishments of his country. As a specimen of his writings, I shall quote the following passage, which appears to me equally absurd and impious, and which I have been retorted upon him by the men who were persecuted for burning his house. "I cannot," says he, "be a necessarian [meaning necessitarian], hate any man, he so I consider him as being, in all respects, just what God has made him to be; and also as doing, with respect to me, no good but what he was expressly designed and appointed to do, and being the only cause, and men nothing more than the instruments in his hands to execute all his pleasure."—Illustrations of Philosophical Necessity, p. 111. The Reverend Mr. Parr, in a late tract, appears to suppose that Dr. Johnson was not only endured, but almost solicited, an interview with Dr. Priestley. In justice to Dr. Johnson, I declare my firm belief that he never did. My illustrious friend was particularly resolute in not giving countenance to men whose worth he considered as pernicious to society. I was present at Oxford when Dr. Price, even before he had rendered himself so generally obnoxious by his zeal for the French revolution, came into a company where Johnson was, who instantly left the room. Much more would he have reprobated Dr.

properly answered, 'Sir, because we are indebted to him for these important discoveries.' On this Dr. Johnson appeared well content; and replied, 'Well, well, I believe we are; and let every man have the honour he has merited.'

"A friend was one day, about two years before his death, struck with some instance of Dr. Johnson's great candour. 'Well, Sir,' said he, 'I will always say that you are a very candid man.' 'Will you?' replied the doctor; 'I doubt then you will be very singular. But, indeed, Sir,' continued he, 'I look upon myself to be a man very much misunderstood. I am not an un candid, nor am I a severe man. I sometimes say more than I mean, in jest; and people are apt to believe me serious; however, I am more candid than I was when I was younger. As I know more of mankind, I expect less of them, and am ready now to call a man a good man upon easier terms than I was formerly.'"

[JOHNSON TO BARBER.]

"Heale, Sept. 16. 1783.

"DEAR FRANCIS,—I rather wonder that you have never written; but that is now not necessary, for I purpose to be with [you] on Thursday before dinner. As Thursday is my birth-day, I would have a little dinner got, and would have you invite Mrs. Desmoulins, Mrs. Davis that was about Mrs. Williams, and Mr. Allen and Mrs. Gardiner. I am, yours, &c.. SAM. JOHNSON."

—Harwood MSS.

On his return from Heale he wrote to Dr. Burney:—

"I came home on the 18th of September, at noon, to a very disconsolate house. You and I are lost our friends; but you have more friends at home. My domestic companion is taken from me, he is much missed, for her acquisitions were many, and her curiosity universal; so that she partook of every conversation. I am not well enough to go such out; and to sit, and eat or fast alone, is very tedious. I always mean to send my compliments to all the ladies."

[JOHNSON TO MRS. MONTAGU.<sup>2</sup>

"September 22. 1783.

"MADAM,—That respect which is always due to beneficence makes it fit that you should be informed, otherwise than by the papers, that, on the 11th of this month, died your pensioner, Anna Williams, of whom it may be truly said, that she received your bounty with gratitude, and enjoyed it with propriety. You perhaps have still her sayers.

"You have, Madam, the satisfaction of having alleviated the sufferings of a woman of great merit, both intellectual and moral. Her curiosity was universal, her knowledge was very extensive, and she sustained forty years of misery with steady fortitude. Thirty years and more she had been my companion, and her death has left me very desolate.

"That I have not written sooner, you may impute to absence, to ill health, to any thing rather than want of regard to the benefactress of my departed friend. I am, Madam, your most humble servant,
SAM. JOHNSON."

—Montagu MSS.

His fortitude and patience met with severe trials during this year. The stroke of the palsy has been related circumstantially; but he was also afflicted with the gout, and was besides troubled with a complaint which not only was attended with immediate inconvenience, but threatened him with a surgical operation, from which most men would shrink. The complaint was a sarcocele, which Johnson bore with uncommon firmness, and was not at all frightened while he looked forward to amputation. He was attended by Mr. Pott and Mr. Cruikshank. I have before me a letter of the 30th of July, this year, to Mr. Cruikshank, in which he says, "I am going to put myself into your hands;" and another, accompanying a set of his "Lives of the Poets," in which he says, "I beg your acceptance of these volumes, as an acknowledgment of the great favours which you have bestowed on, Sir, your most obliged and most humble servant." I have in my possession several more letters from him to Mr. Cruikshank, and also to Dr. Mudge at Plymouth, which it would be improper to insert, as they are filled with unpleasing technical details. I shall, however, extract from his letters to Dr. Mudge such passages as show either a felicity of expression, or the undaunted state of his mind.

"My conviction of your skill, and my belief of your friendship, determine me to entreat your opinion and advice. In this state I with great earnestness desire you to tell me what is to be done. Excision is doubtless necessary to the cure, and I know not any means of palliation. The operation is doubtless painful; but is it dangerous? The pain I hope to endure with decency; but I am loath to put life into much hazard. By representing the gout as an antagonist to the palsy, you have said enough to make it welcome. This is not strictly the first fit, but I hope it is as good as the first; not object to the change of expression"—the mode of expression being a disingenuous surrender of the whole question, leaving Dr. Parr without a shadow of excuse for his misrepresentation.—CROKER.

<sup>1</sup> I have thought it worth while to preserve this note (not included in my former edition), to show that Johnson had now overcome the reluctance to keeping his birthday (anté, p. 634. n. 1), or at least could indulge his more intimate friends with that celebration.—CROKER, 1817.

<sup>2</sup> As Miss Williams enjoyed a pension from Mrs. Montagu, Johnson thought himself bound to acquaint her with the death of the object of her charity. This pension was in truth an indirect benefaction to Johnson himself, and was probably so meant by the delicate and courteous charity of that excellent lady.—CROKER, 1831—47.

for it is the second that ever confined me; and the first was ten years ago, much less fierce and fiery than this. Write, dear Sir, what you can to inform or encourage me. The operation is not delayed by any fears or objections of mine."

JOHNSON TO LANGTON.

"London, Sept. 29. 1783.

"DEAR SIR, — You may very reasonably charge me with insensibility of your kindness and that of Lady Rothes, since I have suffered so much time to pass without paying any acknowledgment. I now, at last, return my thanks; and why I did it not sooner I ought to tell you. I went into Wiltshire as soon as I well could, and was there much employed in palliating my own malady. Disease produces much selfishness. A man in pain is looking after ease, and lets most other things go as chance shall dispose of them. In the mean time I have lost a companion (Mrs. Williams), to whom I have had recourse for domestic amusement for thirty years, and whose variety of knowledge never was exhausted; and now return to a habitation vacant and desolate. I carry about a very troublesome and dangerous complaint, which admits no cure but by the surgical knife. Let me have your prayers. I am, &c., "SAM. JOHNSON."

Happily the complaint abated without his being put to the torture of amputation. But we must surely admire the manly resolution which he discovered while it hung over him.

In a letter to the same gentleman he writes, "The gout has within these four days come upon me with a violence which I never experienced before. It made me helpless as an infant." And in another, having mentioned Mrs. Williams, he says, — "whose death following that of Levett has now made my house a solitude. She left her little substance to a charity-school.<sup>1</sup> She is, I hope, where there is neither darkness<sup>2</sup>, nor want, nor sorrow."

I wrote to him, begging to know the state of his health, and mentioned that "Baxter's Anacreon, which is in the library at Auchinleck, was, I find, collated by my father in 1727 with the MS. belonging to the University of Leyden, and he has made a number of notes upon it. Would you advise me to publish a new edition of it?" His answer was dated September 30.

"You should not make your letters such rarities, when you know, or might know, the uniform state of my health. It is very long since I heard from you; and that I have not answered is a very insufficient reason for the silence of a friend. Your Anacreon is a very uncommon book: neither London nor Cambridge can supply a copy of that edition. Whether it should be reprinted, you cannot do better than consult Lord Hailes. Besides my constant and radical disease, I have been for these ten days much harassed with the gout; but that has now remitted. I hope God will yet grant me a little longer life, and make me less unfit to appear before him."

[JOHNSON TO MISS REYNOLDS.

"October 1. 1783.

"DEAR MADAM, — I am very ill indeed, and to my former illness is superadded the gout. I am now without shoes, and I have been lately almost motionless.

"To my other afflictions is added solitude. Mrs. Williams, a companion of thirty years, is gone. It is a comfort to me to have you near me. I am, Madam, your most humble servant,
— Reynolds MSS. "SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHNSON TO MRS. THRALE.

(Extracts.)

"London, October 6. 1783.

"I yet sit without shoes, with my foot upon a pillow, but my pain and weakness are much abated, and I am no longer crawling upon two sticks. To the gout my mind is reconciled by another letter from Mr. Mudge, in which he vehemently urges the excision, and tells me that the gout will secure me from every thing paralytic. If this be true, I am ready to say to the arthritic pains, Deh! veniti ogni di, durate un anno.<sup>3</sup>

"My physician in ordinary is Dr. Brocklesby, who comes almost every day; my surgeon, in Mr. Pott's absence, is Mr. Cruikshank, the present reader in Dr. Hunter's school. Neither of them, however, do much more than look and talk. The general health of my body is as good as you have ever known it — almost as good as I can remember.

"The carriage which you supposed made rough by my weakness was the common Salisbury stage high hung, and driven to Salisbury in a day. was not fatigued.

"Mr. Pott has been out of town, but I expect to see him soon, and will then tell you something of the main affair, of which there seems now to be better prospect.

"This afternoon I have given [tea] to Mr. Cholmondeley, Mrs. Way Lady Sheffield's relation, Mr. Kindersley<sup>4</sup> the describer of Indian manners, and another anonymous lady.

"As Mrs. Williams received a pension from Mr. Montagu, it was fit to notify her death. The account has brought me a letter not only civil but tender; so I hope peace is proclaimed." [p. 575.]

"October 9. Two nights ago Mr. Burke sat with me a long time. He seems much pleased with I

Se al venir vostro, principe sen vanno,
Deh! venga ogni di, durate un anno; — which Johnson himself translated —

If at your coming princes disappear,
Comets, come every day and stay a year.

See Piozzi's Anecdotes, p. 53. — CROKER

<sup>4</sup> N. E. Kindersley, Esq., of the East India Company, who afterwards published "Specimens of His Literature." — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>1</sup> To the "Ladies' Charity School," in King Street, Snow Hill, instituted in 1702, and where Mrs. Williams's portrait is still to be seen, with the notice of her benefactions thus recorded on the walls: —
"1783. Mrs. Anna Williams, by gift in the 3 per cent. Stock, 200*l*."

"1784. Also by her will, in cash, &c.," 157*l*. 14*s*. — P. CUNNINGHAM.

<sup>2</sup> In allusion to her blindness. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> The last line of an epigrammatic distich of an Italian poet on the Duke of Modena's running away from a comet.

journey. We had both seen Stonehenge this summer for the first time. I told him that the view had enabled me to confute two opinions which have been advanced about it. One, that the materials are not natural stones, but an artificial composition hardened by time. This notion is as old as Camden's time; and has this strong argument to support it, that stone of that species is nowhere to be found. The other opinion, advanced by Dr. Charlton, is, that it was erected by the Danes.

"Mr. Bowles made me observe, that the transverse stones were fixed on the perpendicular supporters by a knob formed on the top of the upright stone, which entered into a hollow cut in the crossing stone. This is a proof that the enormous edifice was raised by a people who had not yet the knowledge of mortar<sup>1</sup>; which cannot be supposed of the Danes, who came hither in ships, and were not ignorant certainly of the arts of life. This proves also the stones not to be factitious; for they that could mould such durable masses could do much more than make mortar, and could have continued the transverse from the upright part with the same paste.

"You have doubtless seen Stonehenge; and if you have not, I should think it a hard task to make an adequate description.

"It is in my opinion to be referred to the earliest habitation of the island, as a druidical monument of, at least, two thousand years; probably the most ancient work of man upon the island. Salisbury cathedral and its neighbour Stonehenge are two eminent monuments of art and rudeness, and may show the first essay and the last perfection in architecture."

— Letters.

JOHNSON TO MISS REYNOLDS.

"London, October 27. 1783.

"MY DEAREST DEAR, — I am able enough to write, for I have now neither sickness nor pain; only the gout has left my ancles somewhat weak.

"While the weather favours you, and the air does you good, stay in the country: when you come home, I hope we shall often see one another, and enjoy that friendship to which no time is likely to put an end on the part of, Madam, your most humble servant,
SAM. JOHNSON."]

— Reyn. MSS.

He this autumn received a visit from the celebrated Mrs. Siddons. He gives this account of it in one of his letters to Mrs. Thrale (Oct. 27.) : —

"Mrs. Siddons, in her visit to me, behaved with great modesty and propriety, and left nothing behind her to be censured or despised. Neither praise nor money, the two powerful corruptors of mankind, seem to have deprived her. I shall be glad to see her again. Her brother Kemble<sup>2</sup> calls on me, and pleases me very well. Mrs. Siddons and I talked of plays; and she told me her intention of exhibiting this winter the characters of Constance, Catharine, and Isabella<sup>3</sup>, in Shakspeare."

Mr. Kemble has favoured me with the following minute of what passed at this visit : —

"When Mrs. Siddons came into the room, there happened to be no chair ready for her, which he observing said, with a smile, 'Madam, you who so often occasion a want of seats to other people, will the more easily excuse the want of one yourself.'

"Having placed himself by her, he, with great good humour, entered upon a consideration of the English drama; and, among other inquiries, particularly asked her which of Shakspeare's characters she was most pleased with. Upon her answering that she thought the character of Queen Catharine, in Henry the Eighth, the most natural: 'I think so too, Madam,' said he; 'and whenever you perform it, I will once more hobble out to the theatre myself.' Mrs. Siddons promised she would do herself the honour of acting his favourite part for him; but many circumstances happened to prevent the representation of King Henry the Eighth during the doctor's life.<sup>4</sup>

"In the course of the evening he thus gave his opinion upon the merits of some of the principal performers whom he remembered to have seen upon the stage. 'Mrs. Porter in the vehemence of rage, and Mrs. Clive in the sprightliness of humour, I have never seen equalled. What Clive did best, she did better than Garrick; but could not do half so many things well: she was a better romper than any I ever saw in nature. Pritchard, in common life, was a vulgar idiot; she would talk of her gown: but, when she appeared upon the stage, seemed to be inspired by gentility and understanding. I once talked with Colley Cibber, and thought him ignorant of the principles of his art. Garrick, Madam, was no declaimer; there was not one of his own scene-shifters who could not have spoken To be or not to be better than he did; yet he was the only actor I ever saw, whom I could call a master both in tragedy and comedy; though I liked him best in comedy. A true conception of character, and natural expression of it, were his distinguished excellences.' Having expatiated, with his usual force and eloquence, on Mr. Garrick's extraordinary eminence as an actor, he concluded with this compliment to his social talents: And after all, Madam, I thought him less to be envied on the stage than at the head of a table."

<sup>1</sup> Surely not. We who have the use of mortar use what are called mortices; similar in principle at least to the knobs and hollows of Stonehenge. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> This great actor and amiable and accomplished man left the stage in 1816, and died 26th February, 1823, at Lausanne. In his own day he had no competitor in any walk of tragedy; and those (of whom I knew several) who remembered Barry, Mossop, Henderson, and Garrick, admitted, that in characters of high tragic dignity, such as Hamlet, Coriolanus, Alexander, Cato, he excelled all his predecessors, almost as much as his sister did all actresses in the female characters of the same heroic class. I never saw any that approached to either. She, it is agreed, was never excelled, and he by Garrick alone, and by Garrick only in his universality. In such characters as I have mentioned, those who had seen both preferred Kemble, whose countenance and figure were more suited to those parts. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> Isabella in Shakspeare's Measure for Measure. Mrs. Siddons had made her first remarkable appearance in Isabella in the Fatal Marriage. She had before appeared in the season of 1775 with little success, then retired, and reappeared as above stated in 1782. — CROKER, 1831-47.

<sup>4</sup> It was acted many years after with critical attention to historical accuracy, and with great success. Mrs. Siddons played Catharine; Mr. Kemble, Wolsey; Mr. Charles Kemble, Cromwell. There is an interesting picture, by Harlow (since engraved), of the trial scene, with portraits of all the performers. — CROKER.

Johnson, indeed, had thought more upon the subject of acting than might be generally supposed. Talking of it one day to Mr. Kemble, he said, "Are you, Sir, one of those enthusiasts who believe yourself transformed into the very character you represent?" Upon Mr. Kemble's answering, that he had never felt so strong a persuasion himself<sup>1</sup>, "To be sure not, Sir," said Johnson; "the thing is impossible. And if Garrick really believed himself to be that monster, Richard the Third, he deserved to be hanged every time he performed it."

My worthy friend, Mr. John Nichols, was present when Mr. Henderson, the actor, paid a visit to Dr. Johnson, and was received in a very courteous manner. See Gent. Mag. June 1791.—I found among Dr. Johnson's papers the following letter to him, from the celebrated Mrs. Bellamy:—

"No. 10. Duke Street, St. James's, May 11. 1783.

"SIR, — The flattering remembrance of the partiality you honoured me with some years ago, as well as the humanity you are known to possess, has encouraged me to solicit your patronage at my benefit. By a long Chancery suit, and a complicated train of unfortunate events, I am reduced to the greatest distress; which obliges me, once more, to request the indulgence of the public. Give me leave to solicit the honour of your company, and to assure you, if you grant my request, the gratification I shall feel from being patronised by Dr. Johnson will be infinitely superior to any advantage that may arise from the benefit; as I am, with the profoundest respect, Sir, your most obedient, humble servant, G. A. BELLAMY."

I am happy in recording these particulars, which prove that my illustrious friend lived to think much more favourably of players than he appears to have done in the early part of his life.<sup>2</sup>

JOHNSON TO MRS. PORTER.

"Boit Court, Fleet Street, Nov. 10. 1783.

"DEAR MADAM, — The death of poor Mr. Porter, of which your maid has sent me an account, must have very much surprised you. The death of a friend is almost always unexpected: we do not love to think of it, and therefore are not prepared for its coming. He was, I think, a religious man, and therefore that his end was happy.

"Death has likewise visited my mournful habitation. Last month died Mrs. Williams, who had been to me for thirty years in the place of a sister her knowledge was great, and her conversation pleasing. I now live in cheerless solitude.

"My two last years have passed under the pressure of successive diseases. I have lately had the gout with some severity. But I wonderfully escaped the operation which I mentioned, and am upon the whole restored to health beyond my own expectation.

"As we daily see our friends die round us, we that are left must cling closer, and, if we can do nothing more, at least pray for one another; and remember, that as others die we must die too, and prepare ourselves diligently for the last great trial. I am, Madam, yours affectionately, &c.,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

[JOHNSON TO MRS. THRALE.

(Extract.)

"London, November 13. 1783.

"Since you have written to me with the attention and tenderness of ancient time<sup>3</sup>, your letters give me a great part of the pleasure which a life of solitude admits. You will never bestow any share of your good-will on one who deserves better. Those that have loved longest love best. A sudden blaze of kindness may by a single blast of coldness be extinguished; but that fondness which length of time has connected with many circumstances and occasions, though it may for a while be depressed by disgust or resentment, with or without a cause is hourly revived by accidental recollection. To those that have lived long together, every thing heard and every thing seen recalls some pleasure communicated or some benefit conferred, some petty quarrel or some slight endearment. Esteem of great powers, or amiable qualities newly discovered, may embroil a day or a week, but a friendship of twenty years is interwoven with the texture of life. A friend may be often found and lost; but an old friend never can be found, and nature has provided that he cannot easily be lost.]
— Letters.

A pleasing instance of the generous attention of one of his friends has been discovered by the publication of Mrs. Thrale's Collection of Letters. In a letter to one of the Miss Thrales he writes:

"A friend, whose name I will tell you when your mamma has tried to guess it, sent to my physician to inquire whether this long train of illness

<sup>1</sup> Mr. Kemble repeated this to me thirty years later, adding that the occasion on which he had felt himself the most affected — the most personally touched — was in playing the last scene of The Stranger with Mrs. Siddons. Her pathos, he said, in that part quite overcame him, but he always endeavoured to restrain any impulses which might interfere with his previous study of his part. Sir Joshua Reynolds, in the Dialogues before-mentioned (p. 601. n. 2.) makes Johnson say that "Garrick left nothing to chance; every gesture, every expression of countenance, and variation of voice, was settled in his closet before he set his foot upon the stage." But this must not be understood too literally. A great actor prepares in his study, positions, attitudes, the particular mode of uttering certain passages, and even the tone which is to be adopted; and having once ascertained, both by thought and experience, what is best, he will naturally adhere to that, however often he may play the part; but it is equally certain, that there is a large portion of the merit of a great theatrical exhibition which is not reducible to any rule, and which depends, not only on the general powers of the performer, but on his health, his spirits, and other personal circumstances of the moment, which may tend to encourage or restrain his powers. And it may be safely affirmed, that although no actor ever fancies himself Othello or any actress Calista, yet emotions excited by the actor must constitute a great part of the charm which distinguishes on the stage excellence from mediocrity. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> Johnson's dislike to players in early life was nothing more than a general resentment of the superior celebrity, which actors obtained over scholars, and some special jealousy of Garrick's sudden elevation. After his own success in the world, and particularly after Garrick's retirement he began "to think more favourably of them." — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> This is the first letter in which we perceive a serious coldness towards Mrs. Thrale, but it is clear from the letter of the 26th April, ante, that it had existed some time prior to this date. — CROKER.

had brought me into difficulties for want of money, with an invitation to send to him for what occasion required. I shall write this night to thank him, having no need to borrow."

And afterwards, in a letter to Mrs. Thrale:

"Since you cannot guess, I will tell you, that the generous man was Gerard Hamilton. I returned him a very thankful and respectful letter."
-- Letters.

I applied to Mr. Hamilton, by a common friend, and he has been so obliging as to let me have Johnson's letter to him upon this occasion, to adorn my collection.

JOHNSON TO HAMILTON.

"Nov. 19. 1783.

"DEAR SIR, — Your kind inquiries after my affairs, and your generous offers, have been communicated to me by Dr. Brocklesby. I return thanks with great sincerity, having lived long enough to know what gratitude is due to such friendship; and entreat that my refusal may not be imputed to sullenness or pride. I am, indeed, in no want. Sickness is, by the generosity of my physicians, of little expense to me. But if any unexpected exigence should press me, you shall see, dear Sir, how cheerfully I can be obliged to so much liberality. I am, Sir, your, &c.,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

I find in this, as in former years, notices of his kind attention to Mrs. Gardiner, who, though in the humble station of a tallow-chandler upon Snow Hill, was a woman of excellent good sense, pious, and charitable.<sup>1</sup> She told me she had been introduced to him by Mrs. Masters<sup>2</sup>, the poetess, whose volumes he revised, and, it is said, illuminated here and there with a ray of his own genius. Mrs. Gardiner was very zealous for the support of the Ladies' Charity School, in the parish of St. Sepulchre. It is confined to females; and, I am told, it afforded a hint for the story of "Betty Broom" in "The Idler." Johnson this year, I find, obtained for it a sermon from the late Bishop of St. Asaph, Dr. Shipley, whom he, in one of his letters to Mrs. Thrale, characterises as "knowing and conversable;" and whom all who knew his lordship, even those who differed from him in politics, remember with much respect.

The Earl of Carlisle having written a tragedy, entitled "The Father's Revenge," some of his lordship's friends applied to Mrs. Chapone, to prevail on Dr. Johnson to read and give his opinion of it, which he accordingly did, in a letter to that lady. Sir Joshua Reynolds having informed me that this letter was in Lord Carlisle's possession, though I was not fortunate enough to have the honour of being known to his lordship, trusting to the general courtesy of literature, I wrote to him, requesting the favour of a copy of it, and to be permitted to insert it in my Life of Dr. Johnson. His lordship was so good as to comply with my request, and has thus enabled me to enrich my work with a very fine piece of writing, which displays both the critical skill and politeness of my illustrious friend; and perhaps the curiosity which it will excite may induce the noble and elegant author to gratify the world by the publication<sup>3</sup> of a performance of which Dr. Johnson has spoken in such terms.

JOHNSON TO MRS. CHAPONE.

"Nov. 28. 1783.

"MADAM, — By sending the tragedy to me a second time<sup>4</sup>, I think that a very honourable distinction has been shown me; and I did not delay the perusal, of which I am now to tell the effect.

"The construction of the play is not completely regular; the stage is too often vacant, and the scenes are not sufficiently connected. This, however, would be called by Dryden only a mechanical defect; which takes away little from the power of the poem, and which is seen rather than felt.

"A rigid examiner of the diction might, perhaps, wish some words changed, and some lines more vigorously terminated. But from such petty imperfections what writer was ever free?

"The general form and force of the dialogue is of more importance. It seems to want that quickness of reciprocation which characterises the English drama, and is not always sufficiently fervid or animated.

"Of the sentiments, I remember not one that I wished omitted. In the imagery I cannot forbear to distinguish the comparison of joy succeeding grief to light rushing on the eye accustomed to darkness.<sup>5</sup> It seems to have all that can be desired to make it please. It is new, just, and delightful.

"With the characters, either as conceived or preserved, I have no fault to find; but was much inclined to congratulate a writer, who, in defiance of prejudice and fashion, made the archbishop a good man, and scorned all thoughtless applause, which a vicious churchman would have brought him.

"The catastrophe is affecting. The father and daughter both culpable, both wretched, and both penitent, divide between them our pity and our sorrow.

"Thus, Madam, I have performed what I did not willingly undertake, and could not decently refuse. The noble writer will be pleased to remember that sincere criticism ought to raise no resentment, because judgment is not under the control of will; but involuntary criticism, as it has

<sup>1</sup> In his will Dr. Johnson left her a book "at her election, to keep as a token of remembrance." — MALONE. She was one of his oldest friends (anté, p. 78.), attended him in his last illness, and she herself died in 1789, æt. 74. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> See anté, p. 78. — C.

<sup>3</sup> A few copies only of this tragedy have been printed, and given to the author's friends. — BOSWELL.

<sup>4</sup> Dr. Johnson having been very ill when the tragedy was first sent to him, had declined the consideration of it. — BOSWELL.

<sup>5</sup> "I could have borne my woes; that stranger, Joy,
Wounds while it smiles: — the long imprison'd wretch,
Emerging from the night of his damp cell, [flings
Shrieks from the sun's bright beams; and that which Gladness o'er all, to him is agony." — BOSWELL.

still less of choice, ought to be more remote from possibility of offence. I am, &c.,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

[JOHNSON TO MRS. PORTER.

"London, Nov. 29. 1783.

"DEAR MADAM, — You may perhaps think me negligent that I have not written to you again upon the loss of your brother; but condolences and consolations are such common and such useless things, that the omission of them is no great crime; and my own diseases occupy my mind and engage my care. My nights are miserably restless, and my days, therefore, are heavy. I try, however, to hold up my head as high as I can.

"I am sorry that your health is impaired: perhaps the spring and the summer may, in some degree, restore it; but if not, we must submit to the inconveniences of time, as to the other dispensations of Eternal Goodness. Pray for me, and write to me, or let Mr. Pearson write for you. I am, &c., — Pearson MSS.

"SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHNSON TO MISS REYNOLDS.

"December 23. 1783.

"DEAREST MADAM, — You shall doubtless be very welcome to me on Christmas day. I shall not dine alone, but the company will all be people whom we can stay with or leave. I will expect you at three, if I hear no more. I am this day a little better. I am, dear Madam, your most humble servant,

SAM. JOHNSON.

"I mean, do not be later than three; for as I am afraid I shall not be at church, you cannot come too soon."]

— Reynolds MSS.

I consulted him on two questions of a very different nature: one, Whether the unconstitutional influence exercised by the peers of Scotland in the election of the representatives of the commons, by means of fictitious qualifications, ought not to be resisted; the other, What in propriety and humanity should be done with old horses unable to labour. I gave him some account of my life at Auchinleck; and expressed my satisfaction that the gentlemen of the county had, at two public meetings, elected me their præses or chairman.

JOHNSON TO BOSWELL.

"London, Dec. 24. 1783.

"DEAR SIR, — Like all other men who have great friends, you begin to feel the pangs of neglected merit; and all the comfort that I can give you is, by telling you that you have probably more pangs to feel, and more neglect to suffer. You have, indeed, begun to complain too soon; and I hope I am the only confidant of your discontent. Your friends have not yet had leisure to gratify personal kindness; they have hitherto been busy in strengthening their ministerial interest. If a vacancy happens in Scotland, give them early intelligence: and as you can serve government as powerfully as any of your probable competitors, you may make in some sort a warrantable claim.

"Of the exaltations and depressions of your mind you delight to talk, and I hate to hear. Drive all such fancies from you.

"On the day when I received your letter, I think, the foregoing page was written; to which one disease or another has hindered me from making any additions. I am now a little better. But sickness and solitude press me very heavily. I could bear sickness better, if I were relieved from solitude.

"The present dreadful confusion of the public ought to make you wrap yourself up in your hereditary possessions, which, though less than you may wish, are more than you can want; and in an hour of religious retirement return thanks to God, who has exempted you from any strong temptation to faction, treachery, plunder, and disloyalty.

"As your neighbours distinguish you by such honours as they can bestow, content yourself with your station, without neglecting your profession. Your estate and the courts will find you full employment, and your mind well occupied will be quiet.

"The usurpation of the nobility, for they apparently usurp all the influence they gain by fraud and misrepresentation, I think it certainly lawful, perhaps your duty, to resist. What is not their own, they have only by robbery.

"Your question about the horses gives me more perplexity. I know not well what advice to give you. I can only recommend a rule which you do not want: give as little pain as you can. I suppose that we have a right to their service while their strength lasts; what we can do with them afterwards, I cannot so easily determine. But let us consider. Nobody denies that man has a right first to milk the cow, and to shear the sheep, and then to kill them for his table. May he not, by parity of reason, first work a horse, and then kill him the easiest way, that he may have the means of another horse, or food for cows and sheep? Man is influenced in both cases by different motives of self-interest. He that rejects the one must reject the other. I am, &c.,

SAM. JOHNSON."

"A happy and pious Christmas; and many happy years to you, your lady, and children."

The late ingenious Mr. Mickle, some time before his death, wrote me a letter concerning Dr. Johnson, in which he mentions, —

"I was upwards of twelve years acquainted with him, was frequently in his company, always talked with ease to him, and can truly say, that I never received from him one rough word."

In this letter he relates his having, while engaged in translating the Lusiad, had a dispute of considerable length with Johnson, who, as usual, declaimed upon the misery and corruption of a sea life, and used this expression: — "It had been happy for the world, Sir, if your hero, Gama, Prince Henry of Portugal, and Columbus, had never been born, or that their schemes had never gone farther than their own imaginations."

"This sentiment," says Mr. Mickle, "which is to be found in his 'Introduction to the World Displayed,' I, in my Dissertation prefixed to the Lusiad, have controverted; and though authors are said to be bad judges of their own works, I am no ashamed to own to a friend, that that dissertation is my favourite above all that I ever attempted in prose. Next year, when the Lusiad was published, I waited on Dr. Johnson, who addressed me with one of his good-humoured smiles: — "Well, you have remembered our dispute about Prince Henry, and have cited me too. You have done your part very well indeed: you have made the best of your argument; but I am not convinced yet."

"Before publishing the Lusiad, I sent Mr. Hoole a proof of that part of the introduction in which I make mention of Dr. Johnson, yourself, and other well-wishers to the work, begging it might be shown to Dr. Johnson. This was accordingly done; and in place of the simple mention of him which I had made, he dictated to Mr. Hoole the sentence as it now stands.

"Dr. Johnson told me in 1772, that, about twenty years before that time, he himself had a design to translate the Lusiad, of the merit of which he spoke highly, but had been prevented by a number of other engagements."

Mr. Mickle reminds me in this letter of a conversation at dinner one day at Mr. Hoole's with Dr. Johnson, when Mr. Nicol, the king's bookseller, and I, attempted to controvert the maxim, "Better that ten guilty should escape, than one innocent person suffer," and were answered by Dr. Johnson with great power of reasoning and eloquence. I am very sorry that I have no record of that day: but I well recollect my illustrious friend's having ably shown, that unless civil institutions ensure protection to the innocent, all the confidence which mankind should have in them would be lost.

I shall here mention what, in strict chronological arrangement, should have appeared in my account of last year; but may more properly be introduced here, the controversy having not been closed till this. The Reverend Mr. Shaw, [p. 528.] a native of one of the Hebrides, having entertained doubts of the authenticity of the poems ascribed to Ossian, divested himself of national bigotry; and having travelled in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland, and also in Ireland, in order to furnish himself with materials for a Gaelic Dictionary, which he afterwards compiled, was so fully satisfied that Dr. Johnson was in the right upon the question, that he candidly published a pamphlet, stating his conviction, and the proofs and reasons on which it was founded. A person at Edinburgh, of the name of Clark, answered this pamphlet with much zeal, and much abuse of its author. Johnson took Mr. Shaw under his protection, and gave him his assistance in writing a reply, which has been admired by the best judges, and by many been considered as conclusive. A few paragraphs, which sufficiently mark their great author, shall be selected: —

"My assertions are, for the most part, purely negative: I deny the existence of Fingal, because in a long and curious peregrination through the Gaelic regions I have never been able to find it.

What I could not see myself, I suspect to be equally invisible to others; and I suspect with the more reason, as among all those who have seen it no man can show it.

"Mr. Clark compares the obstinacy of those who disbelieve the genuineness of Ossian to a blind man who should dispute the reality of colours, and deny that the British troops are clothed in red. The blind man's doubt would be rational, if he did not know by experience that others have a power which he himself wants: but what perspicacity has Mr. Clark which Nature has withheld from me or the rest of mankind?

"The true state of the parallel must be this: — Suppose a man, with eyes like his neighbours, was told by a boasting corporal, that the troops, indeed, wore red clothes for their ordinary dress, but that every soldier had likewise a suit of black velvet, which he puts on when the king reviews them. This he thinks strange, and desires to see the fine clothes, but finds nobody in forty thousand men that can produce either coat or waistcoat. One, indeed, has left them in his chest at Port Mahon; another has always heard that he ought to have velvet clothes somewhere; and a third has heard somebody say that soldiers ought to wear velvet. Can the inquirer be blamed if he goes away believing that a soldier's red coat is all that he has?

"But the most obdurate incredulity may be shamed or silenced by facts. To overpower contradictions, let the soldier show his velvet coat, and the Fingalist the original of Ossian.

"The difference between us and the blind man is this: the blind man is unconvinced, because he cannot see: and we because, though we can see, we find nothing that can be shown."

Notwithstanding the complication of disorders under which Johnson now laboured, he did not resign himself to despondency and discontent, but with wisdom and spirit endeavoured to console and amuse his mind with as many innocent enjoyments as he could procure. Sir John Hawkins has mentioned the cordiality with which he insisted that such of the members of the old club in Ivy Lane as survived should meet again and dine together, which they did, twice at a tavern, and once at his house.

[JOHNSON TO HAWKINS.

"Bolt Court, Nov. 22. 1783.

"DEAR SIR, — As Mr. Ryland was talking with me of old friends and past times, we warmed ourselves into a wish, that all who remained of the Club should meet and dine at the house which once was Horseman's, in Ivy-lane. I have undertaken to solicit you, and therefore desire you to tell on what day next week you can conveniently meet your old friends. I am, Sir, your most humble servant,
SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHNSON TO HAWKINS.

"December 3. 1783.

"DEAR SIR, — In perambulating Ivy-lane, Mr. Ryland found neither our landlord Horseman nor his successor. The old house is shut up, and he liked not the appearance of any near it: he therefore bespoke our dinner at the Queen's Arms, in St. Paul's Churchyard, where, at half an hour after three, your company will be desired to-day by those who remain of our former society. Your humble servant,

SAM. JOHNSON.<sup>1</sup>

JOHNSON TO MRS. THRALE.

(Extract.)

"London, 13th December, 1783. — I dined about a fortnight ago with three old friends. We had not met together for thirty years, and one of us thought the others grown very old. In the thirty years two of our set have died. Our meeting may be supposed to be somewhat tender."] — Letters.

In order to ensure himself society in the evening for three days in the week, he instituted a club at the Essex Head, in Essex Street, then kept by Samuel Greaves, an old servant of Mr. Thrale's.

JOHNSON TO REYNOLDS.

"December 4. 1783.

"DEAR SIR, — It is inconvenient to me to come out; I should else have waited on you with an account of a little evening club which we are establishing in Essex Street, in the Strand, and of which you are desired to be one. It will be held at the Essex Head, now kept by an old servant of Thrale's. The company is numerous, and, as you will see by the list, miscellaneous. The terms are lax, and the expenses light. Mr. Barry was adopted by Dr. Brocklesby, who joined with me in forming the plan. We meet thrice a week, and he who misses forfeits twopence. If you are willing to become a member, draw a line under your name. Return the list. We meet for the first time on Monday, at eight. I am, &c.,

SAM. JOHNSON."

It did not suit Sir Joshua<sup>2</sup> to be one of this club. But when I mention only Mr. Daines Barrington, Dr. Brocklesby, Mr. Murphy, Mr. John Nichols, Mr. Cooke<sup>3</sup>, Mr. Joddrell, Mr. Paradise, Dr. Horsey, Mr. Windham<sup>4</sup>, I shall sufficiently obviate the misrepresentation of it by Sir John Hawkins, as if it had been a low alehouse association<sup>5</sup>, by which Johnson was degraded. Johnson himself, like his namesake Old Ben, composed the rules of his club.<sup>6</sup>

In the end of this year he was seized with a spasmodic asthma of such violence, that he was confined to the house in great pain, being sometimes obliged to sit all night in his chair, a recumbent posture being so hurtful to his respiration, that he could not endure lying in bed; and there came upon him at the same time that oppressive and fatal disease, a dropsy. It was a very severe winter, which probably aggravated his complaints; and the solitude in which Mr. Levett and Mrs. Williams had left him rendered his life very gloomy. Mrs. Desmoulins, who still lived, was herself so <sup>1</sup> "With this invitation," says Hawkins, "I cheerfully complied, and met, at the time and place appointed, all who could be mustered of our society, namely, Johnson, Mr. Ryland, and Mr. Payne of the Bank. When we were collected, the thought that we were so few occasioned some melancholy reflections, and I could not but compare our meeting, at such an advanced period of life as it was to us all, to that of the four old men in the 'Senile Colloquium' of Erasmus. We dined, and in the evening regaled with coffee. At ten we broke up, much to the regret of Johnson, who proposed staying; but finding us inclined to separate, he left us, with a sigh that seemed to come from his heart, lamenting that he was retiring to solitude and cheerless meditation. "Johnson had proposed a meeting like this once a month, and we had one more; but, the time approaching for a third, he began to feel a return of some of his complaints, and signified a wish that we would dine with him at his own house; and accordingly we met there, and were very cheerfully entertained by him." — Life, p. 562. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> Johnson himself, by the mention of Barry the painter, seems to have anticipated (as he very naturally might) some reluctance on the part of Sir Joshua. Indeed, the violence of Barry's temper, and the absurdity of his conduct, rendered him no very agreeable companion; but towards Sir Joshua, his behaviour had been particularly offensive. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> A biographical notice of Mr. Cooke, who died April 3. 1824. will be found in the Gentleman's Magazine for that month; and some account of Mr. Joddrell is given in Nichols's Lit. Anec. vol. viii. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> I was in Scotland when this club was founded, and during all the winter. Johnson, however, declared I should be a member, and invented a word upon the occasion: "Boswell," said he, "is a very clubbable man." When I came to town I was proposed by Mr. Barrington, and chosen. I believe there are few societies where there is better conversation or more decorum. Several of us resolved to continue it after our great founder was removed by death. Other members were added; and now, about eight years since that loss, we go on happily. — BOSWELL. Johnson had already invented clubbable for Sir J. Hawkins. See anté, p. 164. n. 1. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>5</sup> Miss Hawkins candidly says, "Boswell was well justified in his resentment of my father's designation of this as a straw-penny club at an alehouse. I am sorry my father permitted himself to be so pettish on the subject. Homely speaking, I dare say he did not like being passed over." — Mém. vol. ii. p. 104. — CROKER.

6

"RULES.

"To-day deep thoughts with me resolve to drench
In mirth, which after no repenting draws." — MILTON.

"The club shall consist of four and twenty.

"The meetings shall be on the Monday, Thursday, and Saturday of every week; but in the week before Easter there shall be no meeting.

"Every member is at liberty to introduce a friend once a week, but not oftener.

"Two members shall oblige themselves to attend in their turn every night from eight to ten, or procure two to attend in their room.

"Every member present at the club shall spend at least sixpence; and every member who stays away shall forfeit threepence. (sic.)

"The master of the house shall keep an account of the absent members; and deliver to the president of the night a list of the forfeits incurred.

"When any member returns after absence, he shall immediately lay down his forfeits; which if he omits to do, the president shall require.

"There shall be no general reckoning, but every man shall adjust his own expenses.

"The night of indispensable attendance will come to every member once a month. Whoever shall for three months together omit to attend himself, or by substitution, nor shall make any apology in the fourth month, shall be considered as having abdicated the club.

"When a vacancy is to be filled, the name of the candidate, and of the member recommending him, shall stand in the club-room three nights. On the fourth he may be chosen by ballot; six members at least being present, and two-thirds of the ballot being in his favour; or the majority, should the numbers not be divisible by three.

"The master of the house shall give notice, six days before, to each of those members whose turn of necessary attendance is come.

"The notice may be in these words: — 'Sir, On — the — of —, will be your turn of presiding at the Essex Head. Your company is therefore earnestly requested.'

"One penny shall be left by each member for the waiter."

Johnson's definition of a club, in this sense, in his Dictionary, is, "An assembly of good fellows, meeting under certain conditions." — BOSWELL.

very ill, that she could contribute very little to his relief. He, however, had none of that unsocial shyness which we commonly see in people afflicted with sickness. He did not hide his head from the world, in solitary abstraction; he did not deny himself to the visits of his friends and acquaintances; but at all times when he was not overcome by sleep, was as ready for conversation as in his best days.<sup>1</sup>

CHAPTER LXXVIII.

1784.

Burton's Books. — Alderman Clark. — Correspondence. — Dr. Gillespie. — Drs. Cullen, Hope, and Monro. — Divine Interposition. — Lord Monboddo. — Dr. Ross. — George Stevens. — Mrs. Montagu. — Burke's Conversation. — Foote. — The Empress of Russia. — Mrs. Thrale. — Ecclesiastical Discipline. — Fear of Death. — Capel Loft. — Thomas à Kempis. — Dr. Douglas. — Editions of Horace. — Charles Fox.

AND NOW I am arrived at the last year of the life of SAMUEL JOHNSON; a year in which, although passed in severe indisposition, he nevertheless gave many evidences of the continuance of those wondrous powers of mind which raised him so high in the intellectual world. His conversation and his letters of this year were in no respect inferior to those of former years. The following is a remarkable proof of his being alive to the most minute curiosities of literature.

JOHNSON TO MR. DILLY,

Bookseller, in the Poultry.

"Jan 6. 1784.

"SIR, — There is in the world a set of books which used to be sold by the booksellers on the bridge<sup>2</sup>, and which I must entreat you to procure me. They are called Burton's Books<sup>3</sup>; the title of one is 'Admirable Curiosities, Rarities, and Wonders in England.' I believe there are about five or six of them; they seem very proper to allure backward readers; be so kind as to get them for me, and send me them with the best printed edition of 'Baxter's Call to the Unconverted.' I am, &c.,
"SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHNSON TO PERKINS.

"Jan. 21. 1784.

"DEAR SIR, — I was very sorry not to see you when you were so kind as to call on me; but to disappoint friends, and if they are not very good-natured, to disoblige them, is one of the evils of sickness. If you will please to let me know which of the afternoons in this week I shall be favoured with another visit by you and Mrs. Perkins, and the young people, I will take all the measures that I can to be pretty well at that time. I am, &c.,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

His attention to the Essex Head Club appears from the following letter to Mr. Alderman Clark, a gentleman for whom he deservedly entertained a great regard.<sup>4</sup>

JOHNSON TO CLARK.

"Jan 27. 1784.

"DEAR SIR, — You will receive a requisition, according to the rules of the club, to be at the house as president of the night. This turn comes once a month, and the member is obliged to attend, or send another in his place. You were inrolled in the club by my invitation, and I ought to introduce you; but as I am hindered by sickness, Mr. Hoole will very properly supply my place as introducer, or yours as president. I hope in milder weather to be a very constant attendant. I am, Sir, &c.,
SAM. JOHNSON.

"You ought to be informed that the forfeits began with the year, and that every night of non-attendance incurs the mulct of threepence, that is, ninepence a-week."

On the 8th of January I wrote to him, anxiously inquiring as to his health, and enclosing my "Letter to the People of Scotland on the Present State of the Nation." "I trust," said I, "that you will be liberal enough to make allowance for my differing from you on two points, [the Middlesex election and the American war,] when my general principles of government are according to your own heart, and when, at a crisis of doubtful event, I stand forth with honest zeal as an ancient and faithful Briton. My reason for introducing those two points was, that as my opinions with regard to them had been declared at the periods when they were least favourable, I might have the credit of a man who is not a worshipper of ministerial power."

[BOSWELL TO REYNOLDS.

"Edinburgh, 6th February, 1784.

"MY DEAR SIR, — I long exceedingly to hear from you. Sir William Forbes brought me good accounts of you, and Mr. Temple sent me very pleasing intelligence concerning the fair Palmeria<sup>5</sup>. But a line or two from yourself is the next thing to seeing you.

"My anxiety about Dr. Johnson is truly great.

<sup>1</sup> On the 30th Dec., Dr. and Miss Fanny Burney visited him. On parting he grasped her hand and said, "The blister I have tried for my breath has betrayed some very bad tokens, but I will not terrify myself by talking of them. Ah, priez Dieu pour moi!" This was the only time he ever addressed her in French, and she thought he did so that some other persons who were in the room might not hear this injunction. — Life of Burney, l. 863. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>2</sup> Old London Bridge, once covered on both hands with shops and houses over them. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>3</sup> These books are much more numerous than Johnson supposed. — MALONE. Mr. Malone adds a list of 29 of them. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>4</sup> My venerable friend Mr. Clark, who had contributed some information to my first edition, died at Chertsey, Jan. 16. 1831, æt. 93. — CROKER.

<sup>5</sup> No doubt Miss Palmer, afterwards Lady Thomond, Sir Joshua's niece. — CROKER.

I had a letter from him within these six weeks, written with his usual acuteness and vigour of mind. But he complained sadly of the state of his health; and I have been informed since that he is worse. I intend to be in London next month, chiefly to attend upon him with respectful affection. But, in the mean time, it will be a great favour done me, if you, who know him so well, will be kind enough to let me know particularly how he is.

"I hope Mr. Dilly conveyed to you my Letter on the State of the Nation, from the Author. I know your political principles, and indeed your settled system of thinking upon civil society and subordination, to be according to my own heart; and therefore I doubt not you will approve of my honest zeal. But what monstrous effects of party do we now see! I am really vexed at the conduct of some of our friends.<sup>1</sup>

"Amidst the conflict our friend of Port Eliot is with much propriety created a peer. But why, O why did he not obtain the title of Baron Mahogany? (p. 680.) Genealogists and heralds would have had curious work of it to explain and illustrate that title. I ever am, with sincere regard, my dear Sir, your affectionate humble servant,
— Reynolds MSS. "JAMES BOSWELL."]

JOHNSON TO BOSWELL.

"Feb. 11. 1784.

"DEAR SIR, — I hear of many inquiries which your kindness has disposed you to make after me. I have long intended you a long letter, which perhaps the imagination of its length hindered me from beginning. I will, therefore, content myself with a shorter.

"Having promoted the institution of a new club in the neighbourhood, at the house of an old servant of Thrale's, I went thither to meet the company, and was seized with a spasmodic asthma, so violent, that with difficulty I got to my own house, in which I have been confined eight or nine weeks, and from which I know not when I shall be able to go even to church. The asthma, however, is not the worst. A dropsy gains ground upon me; my legs and thighs are very much swollen with water, which I should be content if I could keep there; but I am afraid that it will soon be higher. My nights are very sleepless and very tedious, and yet I am extremely afraid of dying.

"My physicians try to make me hope that much of my malady is the effect of cold, and that some degree at least of recovery is to be expected from vernal breezes and summer suns. If my life is prolonged to autumn, I should be glad to try a warmer climate; though how to travel with a diseased body, without a companion to conduct me, and with very little money, I do not well see. Ramsay has recovered his limbs in Italy; and Fielding was sent to Lisbon, where, indeed, he died; but he was, I believe, past hope when he went. Think for me what I can do.

"I received your pamphlet, and when I write again may perhaps tell you some opinion about it; but you will forgive a man struggling with disease his neglect of disputes, politics, and pamphlets. Let me have your prayers. My compliments to your lady and young ones. Ask your physicians about my case: and desire Sir Alexander Dick to write me his opinion. I am, dear Sir, &c.,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHNSON TO MRS. PORTER.

"Feb. 23. 1784.

"MY DEAREST LOVE, — I have been extremely ill of an asthma and dropsy, but received by the mercy of God sudden and unexpected relief last Thursday<sup>2</sup>, by the discharge of twenty pints of water. Whether I shall continue free, or shall fall again, cannot be told. Pray for me. Death, my dear, is very dreadful; let us think nothing worth our care but how to prepare for it: what we know amiss in ourselves let us make haste to amend, and put our trust in the mercy of God and the intercession of our Saviour. I am, &c.,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHNSON TO BOSWELL.

"London, Feb. 27. 1784.

"DEAR SIR, — I have just advanced so far towards recovery as to read a pamphlet; and you may reasonably suppose that the first pamphlet which I read was yours. I am very much of your opinion, and, like you, feel great indignation at the indecency with which the king is every day treated. Your paper contains very considerable knowledge of history and of the constitution, very properly produced and applied. It will certainly raise your character<sup>3</sup>, though perhaps it may not make you a minister of state.

I desire you to see Mrs. Stewart once again, and tell her, that in the letter-case was a letter relating to me, for which I will give her, if she is willing to give it me, another guinea.<sup>4</sup> The letter is of consequence only to me. I am, dear Sir, &c.,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

In consequence of Johnson's request that I should ask our physicians about his case, and desire Sir Alexander Dick to send his opinion, I transmitted him a letter from that very amiable baronet, then in his eighty-first year, with his faculties as entire as ever, and mentioned his expressions to me in the note accompanying it, — "With my most affectionate wishes for Dr. Johnson's recovery, in which his friends, his country, and all mankind have so deep a stake;" and at the same time a full

<sup>1</sup> Messrs. Fox and Burke. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> See post, p. 753. Mr. Boswell's statement of this extraordinary relief: Hawkins's is still more circumstantial and curious. — Life, 563. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>3</sup> "Letter to the People of Scotland on the present State of the Nation." I sent it to Mr. Pitt, with a letter, in which I thus expressed myself: — "My principles may appear to you too monarchical; but I know and am persuaded they are not inconsistent with the true principles of liberty. Be this as it may, you, Sir, are now the prime minister, called by the sovereign to maintain the rights of the crown, as well as those of the people, against a violent faction. As such, you are entitled to the warmest support of every good subject in every department." He answered, "I am extremely obliged to you for the sentiments you do me the honour to express, and have observed with great pleasure the zealous and able support given to the cause of the public in the work you were so good to transmit to me." — BOSWELL.

<sup>4</sup> See anté, p. 641, and the Appendix. — CROKER.

opinion upon his case by Dr. Gillespie, who, like Dr. Cullen, had the advantage of having passed through the gradations of surgery and pharmacy, and by study and practice had attained to such skill, that my father settled on him two hundred pounds a year for five years, and fifty pounds a year during his life, as an honorarium to secure his particular attendance. The opinion was conveyed in a letter to me, beginning, "I am sincerely sorry for the bad state of health your very learned and illustrious friend, Dr. Johnson, labours under at present."

JOHNSON TO BOSWELL.

"London, March 2. 1784.

"DEAR SIR, — Presently after I had sent away my last letter, I received your kind medical packet. I am very much obliged both to you and to your physicians for your kind attention to my disease. Dr. Gillespie has sent me an excellent consilium medicum, all solid practical experimental knowledge. I am at present, in the opinion of my physicians (Dr. Heberden and Dr. Brocklesby), as well as my own, going on very hopefully. I have just begun to take vinegar of squills. The powder hurt my stomach so much that it could not be continued.

"Return Sir Alexander Dick my sincere thanks for his kind letter; and bring with you the rhubarb<sup>1</sup> which he so tenderly offers me. I hope dear Mrs. Boswell is now quite well, and that no evil, either real or imaginary, now disturbs you. I am, &c.,
SAM. JOHNSON."

I also applied to three of the eminent physicians who had chairs in our celebrated school of medicine at Edinburgh, Doctors Cullen, Hope, and Monro, to each of whom I sent the following letter:—

"March 7. 1784.

"DEAR SIR, — Dr. Johnson has been very ill for some time; and in a letter of anxious apprehension he writes to me, 'Ask your physicians about my case.'

"This, you see, is not authority for a regular consultation: but I have no doubt of your readiness to give your advice to a man so eminent, and who in his Life of Garth, has paid your profession a just and elegant compliment: 'I believe every man has found in physicians great liberality and dignity of sentiment, very prompt effusions of beneficence, and willingness to exert a lucrative art where there is no hope of lucre.'

"Dr. Johnson is aged seventy-four. Last summer he had a stroke of the palsy, from which he recovered almost entirely. He had, before that, been troubled with a catarrhus cough. This winter he was seized with a spasmodic asthma, by which he has been confined to his house for about three months. Dr. Brocklesby writes to me, that upon the least admission of cold, there is such a constriction upon his breast, that he cannot lie down in his bed, but is obliged to sit up all night, and gets rest, and sometimes sleep, only by means of laudanum and syrup of poppies; and that there are cedematous tumours in his legs and thighs. Dr. Brocklesby trusts a good deal to the return of mild weather. Dr. Johnson says that a dropsy gains ground upon him; and he seems to think that a warmer climate would do him good. I understand he is now rather better, and is using vinegar of squills. I am, &c.,

JAMES BOSWELL."

All of them paid the most polite attention to my letter and its venerable object. Dr. Cullen's words concerning him were, "It would give me the greatest pleasure to be of any service to a man whom the public properly esteem, and whom I esteem and respect as much as I do Dr. Johnson." Dr. Hope's, "Few people have a better claim on me than your friend, as hardly a day passes that I do not ask his opinion about this or that word." Dr. Monro's, "I most sincerely join you in sympathising with that very worthy and ingenious character, from whom his country has derived much instruction and entertainment."

Dr. Hope corresponded with his friend Dr. Brocklesby. Doctors Cullen and Monro wrote their opinions and prescriptions to me, which I afterwards carried with me to London, and, so far as they were encouraging, communicated to Johnson. The liberality on one hand, and grateful sense of it on the other, I have great satisfaction in recording.

[JOHNSON TO MRS. PORTER.

"Bolt-court, 10th March, 1784.

"MY DEAREST LOVE, — I will not suppose that it is for want of kindness that you did not answer my last letter; and I therefore write again to tell you that I have, by God's great mercy, still continued to grow better. My asthma is seldom troublesome, and my dropsy has ran itself almost away, in a manner which my physician says is very uncommon.

"I have been confined from the 14th of December, and shall not soon venture abroad; but I have this day dressed myself as I was before my sickness.

"If it be inconvenient to you to write, desire Mr. Pearson to let me know how you do, and how you have passed this long winter. I am now not without hopes that we shall once more see one another.

"Make my compliments to Mrs. Cobb and Miss Adey, and to all my friends, particularly to Mr. Pearson. I am, my dear, your most humble servant,
SAM. JOHNSON."

— Pearson MSS.

JOHNSON TO MRS. GASTRELL AND MISS ASTON.

"Bolt-court, 11th March, 1784.

"DEAR LADIES, — The kind and speedy answer with which you favoured me to my last letter encourages me to hope that you will be glad to hear again that my recovery advances. My disorders are an asthma and dropsy. The asthma gives me gold medal by the Society of London for the Encouragement of Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce. — BOSWELL.

<sup>1</sup> From his garden at Prestonfield, where he cultivated that plant with such success, that he was presented with a

no great trouble when I am not in motion, and the water of the dropsy has passed away in so happy a manner, by the goodness of God, as Dr. Heberden declares himself not to have known more than four times in all his practice. I have been confined to the house from December the 14th, and shall not venture out till the weather is settled; but I have this day dressed myself as before I became ill. Join with me in returning thanks, and pray for me that the time now granted me may not be ill spent.

“Let me now, dear ladies, have some account of you. Tell me how you have endured this long and sharp winter, and give me hopes that we may all meet again with kindness and cheerfulness. I am, dear ladies, your most humble servant,
— Pemb. MSS. SAM. JOHNSON.”

JOHNSON TO BOSWELL.

“London, March 18. 1784.

“DEAR SIR, — I am too much pleased with the attention which you and your dear lady<sup>1</sup> show to my welfare, not to be diligent in letting you know the progress which I make towards health. The dropsy, by God’s blessing, has now run almost totally away by natural evacuation: and the asthma, if not irritated by cold, gives me little trouble. While I am writing this I have not any sensation of debility or disease. But I do not yet venture out, having been confined to the house from the 13th of December, now a quarter of a year.

“When it will be fit for me to travel as far as Auchinleck I am not able to guess; but such a letter as Mrs. Boswell’s might draw any man not wholly motionless a great way. Pray tell the dear lady how much her civility and kindness have touched and gratified me.

“Our parliamentary tumults have now begun to subside, and the king’s authority is in some measure re-established. Mr. Pitt will have great power<sup>2</sup>; but you must remember that what he has to give must, at least for some time, be given to those who gave, and those who preserve his power. A new minister can sacrifice little to esteem or friendship: he must, till he is settled, think only of extending his interest.

“If you come hither through Edinburgh, send for Mrs. Stewart [p. 641.], and give from me another guinea for the letter in the old case, to which I shall not be satisfied with my claim till she gives it me. Please to bring with you Baxter’s Anacron; and if you procure heads of Hector Boece, the historian, and Arthur Johnston<sup>3</sup>, the poet, I will put them in my room; or any other of the fathers of Scottish literature.

“I wish you an easy and happy journey, and hope I need not tell you that you will be welcome to, dear Sir, your, &c., SAM. JOHNSON.”

[JOHNSON TO MRS. THRALE.<sup>5</sup>

“London, 20th March, 1784.

“MADAM, — Your last letter had something of tenderness. The accounts which you have had of my danger and distress were I suppose not aggravated. I have been confined ten weeks with an asthma and dropsy. But I am now better. God has in his mercy granted me a reprieve; for how much time his mercy must determine.

“Write to me no more about dying with a grace. When you feel what I have felt in approaching eternity — in fear of soon hearing the sentence of which there is no revocation — you will know the folly: my wish is that you may know it sooner. The distance between the grave and the remotest part of human longevity is but a very little; and of that little no path is certain. You know all this, and I thought that I knew it too; but I know it now with a new conviction. May that new conviction not be vain!

“I am now cheerful. I hope this approach to recovery is a token of the Divine mercy. My friends continue their kindness. I give a dinner to-morrow. I am, Madam, your, &c.,
— Letters. “SAM. JOHNSON.”]

I wrote to him, March 28., from York, informing him that I had a high gratification in the triumph of monarchical principles over aristocratical influence, in that great county, in an address to the king; that I was thus far on my way to him, but that news of the dissolution of parliament having arrived, I was to hasten back to my own county, where I had carried an address to his majesty by a great majority, and had some intention of being a candidate to represent the county in parliament.

JOHNSON TO BOSWELL.

“London, March 30. 1784.

“DEAR SIR, — You could do nothing so proper as to hasten back when you found the parliament dissolved. With the influence which your address must have gained you, it may reasonably be expected that your presence will be of importance, and your activity of effect.

“Your solicitude for me gives me that pleasure which every man feels from the kindness of such a friend; and it is with delight I relieve it by telling that Dr. Brocklesby’s account is true, and that I am, by the blessing of God, wonderfully relieved.

“You are entering upon a transaction which requires much prudence. You must endeavour to oppose without exasperating; to practise temporary hostility, without producing enemies for life. This is, perhaps, hard to be done; yet it has been done by many, and seems most likely to be effected by opposing merely upon general principles, without descending to personal or particular censures or objections. One thing I must enjoin you, which is seldom observed in the conduct of elections; I must entreat you to be scrupulous in the use of strong liquors. One night’s drunkenness may defeat the labours of forty days well employed. Be firm,

<sup>1</sup> Who had written him a very kind letter. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> Mr. Boswell does not give us his letter, to which this is an answer; but it is clear that he expressed some too sanguine hopes of preferment from Mr. Pitt, whose favour, as we have just seen, he had endeavoured to propitiate. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> See anté, pp. 156. 294. — CROKER.

<sup>5</sup> I think it necessary to Johnson’s personal history to continue extracts of his correspondence with Mrs. Thrale to its conclusion. — CROKER.

but not clamorous; be active, but not malicious; and you may form such an interest, as may not only exalt yourself, but dignify your family.

"We are, as you may suppose, all busy here. Mr. Fox resolutely stands for Westminster, and his friends say will carry the election.<sup>1</sup> However that be, he will certainly have a seat. Mr. Hoole has just told me, that the city leans towards the king.

"Let me hear, from time to time, how you are employed, and what progress you make. Make dear Mrs. Boswell, and all the young Boswells, the sincere compliments of, Sir, your affectionate humble servant, &c.,
SAM. JOHNSON."

To Mr. Langton he wrote with that cordiality which was suitable to the long friendship which had subsisted between him and that gentleman.

JOHNSON TO LANGTON.

(Extracts.)

"March 27. Since you left me I have continued, in my own opinion, and in Dr. Brocklesby's, to grow better, with respect to all my formidable and dangerous distempers; though, to a body battered and shaken as mine has lately been, it is to be feared that weak attacks may be sometimes mischievous. I have, indeed, by standing carelessly at an open window, got a very troublesome cough, which it has been necessary to appease by opium, in larger quantities than I like to take, and I have not found it give way so readily as I expected: its obstinacy, however, seems at last disposed to submit to the remedy, and I know not whether I should then have a right to complain of any morbid sensation. My asthma is, I am afraid, constitutional and incurable; but it is only occasional, and, unless it be excited by labour or by cold, gives me no molestation, nor does it lay very close siege to life; for Sir John Floyer, whom the physical race consider as author of one of the best books upon it, panted on to ninety, as was supposed. And why were we content with supposing a fact so interesting of a man so conspicuous? Because he corrupted, at perhaps seventy or eighty, the register, that he might pass for younger than he was. He was not much less than eighty, when to a man of rank, who modestly asked his age, he answered, 'Go look;' though he was in general a man of civility and elegance. The ladies, I find, are at your house all well, except Miss Langton, who will probably soon recover her health by light suppers. Let her eat at dinner as she will, but not take a full stomach to bed. Pay my sincere respects to dear Miss Langton in Lincolnshire; let her know that I mean not to break our league of friendship, and that I have a set of Lives for her, when I have the means of sending it."

"April 8. I am still disturbed by my cough, but what thanks have I not to pay, when my cough is the most painful sensation that I feel? and from that I expect hardly to be released, while winter continues to gripe us with so much pertinacity. The year has now advanced eighteen days beyond the equinox, and still there is very little remission of the cold. When warm weather comes, which surely must come at last, I hope it will help both me and your young lady. The man so busy about addresses is neither more nor less than our own Boswell, who had come as far as York towards London, but turned back on the dissolution, and is said now to stand for some place. Whether to wish him success his best friends hesitate. Let me have your prayers for the completion of my recovery. I am now better than I ever expected to have been. May God add to his mercies the grace that may enable me to use them according to his will. My compliments to all."

"April 13. I had this evening a note from Lord Portmore<sup>2</sup> desiring that I would give you an account of my health. You might have had it with less circumspection. I am, by God's blessing, I believe, free from all morbid sensations, except a cough, which is only troublesome. But I am still weak, and can have no great hope of strength till the weather shall be softer. The summer, if it be kindly, will, I hope, enable me to support the winter. God, who has so wonderfully restored me, can preserve me in all seasons. Let me inquire in my turn after the state of your family, great and little. I hope Lady Rothes and Miss Langton are both well. That is a good basis of content. Then how goes George on with his studies? How does Miss Mary? And how does my own Jenny? I think I owe Jenny a letter, which I will take care to pay. In the mean time tell her that I acknowledge the debt. Be pleased to make my compliments to the ladies. If Mrs. Langton comes to London, she will favour me with a visit, for I am not well enough to go out."

JOHNSON TO OZIAS HUMPHRY.<sup>3</sup>

"April 5. 1784.

"SIR, — Mr. Hoole has told me with what benevolence you listened to a request which I was almost afraid to make, of leave to a young painter<sup>4</sup> to attend you from time to time in your painting-room, to see your operations, and receive your instructions. The young man has perhaps good parts, but has been without a regular education.

<sup>1</sup> Mr. Fox was returned for Westminster, after a sharp election and a tedious scrutiny. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> To which Johnson returned this answer: —

"Dr. Johnson acknowledges with great respect the honour of Lord Portmore's notice. He is better than he was; and will, as his Lordship directs, write to Mr. Langton." — BOSWELL.

<sup>3</sup> The eminent painter, representative of the ancient family of Homfrey (now Humphry) in the west of England; who, as appears from their ariens which they have invariably used, have been (as I have seen authenticated by the best authority) one of those among the knights and esquires of honour, who are represented by Holmshed as having issued from the Tower of London on coursers apparelled for the Justes, accompanied by ladies of honour, leading every one a knight, with a chain of gold, passing through the streets of London into Smithfield, on Sunday, at three o'clock in the afternoon, being the first Sunday after Michaelmas, in the fourteenth year of King Richard the Second. This family once enjoyed large possessions, but, like others, have lost them in the progress of ages. Their blood, however, remains to them well ascertained; and they may hope, in the revolution of events, to recover that rank in society for which, in modern times, fortune seems to be an indispensable requisite. — BOSWELL. Mr. Humphry died in 1810, æt. 68. His eminence as a painter was a good-natured error of Boswell's. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> Son of Mr. Samuel Paterson, ante, p. 238. n. 2. — CROKER.

He is my godson, and therefore I interest myself in his progress and success, and shall think myself much favoured if I receive from you a permission to send him.

"My health is, by God's blessing, much restored, but I am not yet allowed by my physicians to go abroad; nor, indeed, do I think myself yet able to endure the weather. I am, Sir, &c.,

SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHNSON TO HUMPHRY.

"April 10. 1784.

"SIR,—The bearer is my godson, whom I take the liberty of recommending to your kindness; which I hope he will deserve by his respect to your excellence, and his gratitude for your favours. I am, Sir, &c.,

SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHNSON TO HUMPHRY.

"May 31. 1784.

"SIR,—I am very much obliged by your civilities to my godson, but must beg of you to add to them the favour of permitting him to see you paint, that he may know how a picture is begun, advanced, and completed. If he may attend you in a few of your operations, I hope he will show that the benefit has been properly conferred, both by his proficiency and his gratitude. At least I shall consider you as enlarging your kindness to, Sir, &c.,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHNSON TO TAYLOR,

Ashbourne.

"London, Easter Monday, April 12. 1784.

"DEAR SIR,—What can be the reason that I hear nothing from you? I hope nothing disables you from writing. What I have seen, and what I have felt, gives me reason to fear every thing. Do not omit giving me the comfort of knowing, that after all my losses, I have yet a friend left.

"I want every comfort. My life is very solitary and very cheerless. Though it has pleased God wonderfully to deliver me from the dropsy, I am yet very weak, and have not passed the door since the 13th of December. I hope for some help from warm weather, which will surely come in time.

"I could not have the consent of the physicians to go to church yesterday; I therefore received the holy sacrament at home, in the room where I communicated with dear Mrs. Williams, a little before her death. O my friend, the approach of death is very dreadful! I am afraid to think on that which I know I cannot avoid. It is vain to look round and round for that help which cannot be had. Yet we hope and hope, and fancy that he who has lived to-day may live to-morrow. But let us learn to derive our hope only from God.

"In the mean time, let us be kind to one another. I have no friend now living but you<sup>3</sup> and Mr. Hector, that was the friend of my youth. Do not neglect, dear Sir, yours affectionately,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHNSON TO MRS. THRALE.

(Extract.)

"London, 15th April, 1784. — Yesterday I had the pleasure of giving another dinner to the remainder of the old club. We used to meet weekly about the year 1750, and we were as cheerful as in former times: only I could not make quite so much noise; for since the paralytic affliction, my voice is sometimes weak.

"Metcalf [p. 710.] and Crutchley<sup>2</sup>, without knowing each other, are both members of Parliament for Horsham. Mr. Cator [p. 767.] is chosen for Ipswich.

"But a sick man's thoughts soon turn back upon himself. I am still very weak, though my appetite is keen, and my digestion potent; and I gratify myself more at table than ever I did at my own cost before. I have now an inclination to luxury, which even your table did not excite; for till now my talk was more about the dishes than my thoughts. I remember you commended me for seeming pleased with my dinners when you had reduced your table. I am able to tell you with great veracity that I never knew when the reduction began, nor should have known that it was made had not you told me. I now think and consult to-day what I shall eat to-morrow. This disease will likewise, I hope, be cured. For there are other things—how different! which ought to predominate in the mind of such a man as I: but in this world the body will have its part; and my hope is, that it shall have no more—my hope, but not my confidence; I have only the timidity of a Christian to determine, not the wisdom of a Stoic to secure me."

"April 19. — I received this morning your magnificent fish, and in the afternoon your apology for not sending it. I have invited the Hooles and Miss Burney to dine upon it to-morrow.

"The club which has been lately instituted is at Sam's; and there was I when I was last out of the house. But the people whom I mentioned in my letter are the remnant of a little club that used to meet in Ivy-lane about three and thirty years ago, out of which we have lost Hawkesworth and Dyer—the rest are yet on this side the grave."

"London, 21st April, 1784. — I make haste to send you intelligence, which, if I do not flatter myself, you will not receive without some degree of pleasure. After a confinement of one hundred and twenty-nine days, more than the third part of a year, and no inconsiderable part of human life, I this day returned thanks to God in St. Clement's church for my recovery; a recovery, in my seventy-fifth year, from a distemper which few in the vigour of youth are known to surmount; a recovery, of which neither myself, my friends, nor my physicians, had any hope; for though they flattered me with some continuance of life, they never supposed that I could cease to be dropsical. The dropsy, however, is quite vanished; and the asthma so much mitigated, that I walked to-day with a more easy respiration than I have known, I think, for perhaps two years past. I hope the mercy that lightens my days will assist me to use them well.

"The Hooles, Miss Burney, and Mrs. Hall (Wesley's sister) feasted yesterday with me very

<sup>1</sup> Taylor died February 19. 1788, and Hector, 2d Sept. 1791, æt. 85. — MALONE.

<sup>2</sup> Jeremiah Crutchley, Esq., had been one of the intimates

at Streatham, and was one of Mr. Thrale's executors. He continued in the House of Commons till 1802. — CROKER, 1847.

cheerfully on your noble salmon. Mr. Allen could not come, and I sent him a piece, and a great tail is still left.

"Dr. Broeklesby forbids the club [Sam's] at present, not caring to venture the chillness of the evening; but I purpose to show myself on Saturday at the Academy's feast.<sup>1</sup> I cannot publish my return to the world more effectually; for, as the Frenchman says, tout le monde s'y trouvera.

"For this occasion I ordered some clothes; and was told by the tailor, that when he brought me a sick dress, he never expected to make me any thing of any other kind. My recovery is indeed wonderful."

"London, 26th April, 1784. — On Saturday I showed myself again to the living world at the Exhibition: much and splendid was the company, but, like the Doge of Genoa at Paris, I admired nothing but myself. I went up all the stairs to the pictures without stopping to rest or to breathe,

'In all the madness of superfluous health.'

The Prince of Wales had promised to be there; but when we had waited an hour and a half, sent us word that he could not come.

Mrs. Davenant<sup>2</sup> called to pay me a guinea, but I gave two for you. Whatever reasons you have for frugality, it is not worth while to save a guinea a year by withdrawing it from a public charity.

"Mr. Howard called on me a few days ago, and gave me the new edition, much enlarged, of his Account of Prisons. He has been to survey the prisons on the continent; and in Spain he tried to penetrate the dungeons of the Inquisition, but his curiosity was very imperfectly gratified. At Madrid, they shut him quite out; at Valladolid, they showed him some public rooms."

JOHNSON TO MRS. PORTER.

"London, April 26, 1784.

"MY DEAR, — I write to you now, to tell you that I am so far recovered that on the 21st I went to church to return thanks, after a confinement of more than four long months.

"My recovery is such as neither myself nor the physicians at all expected, and is such as that very few examples have been known of the like. Join with me, my dear love, in returning thanks to God.

Dr. Vyse has been with (me) this evening; he tells me that you likewise have been much disordered, but that you are now better. I hope that we shall some time have a cheerful interview. In the mean time let us pray for one another. I am, Madam, your humble servant, SAM. JOHNSON."

[DR. JOHNSON TO MISS REYNOLDS.

"Bolt-court, 30th April, 1784.

"DEAR MADAM, — Mr. Allen has looked over the papers<sup>3</sup>, and thinks that one hundred copies will come to five pounds.

"Fifty will cost 4l. 10s., and five and twenty will cost 4l. 5s. It seems therefore scarcely worth while to print fewer than a hundred.

"Suppose you printed two hundred and fifty at 6l. 10s., and, without my name, tried the sale, which may be secretly done. You would then see the opinion of the public without hazard, if nobody knows but I. If any body else is in the secret, you shall not have my consent to venture. I am, dear Madam, your most affectionate and most humble servant,

— Reyn. MSS.

What follows is a beautiful specimen of his gentleness and complacency to a young lady, his godchild, one of the daughters of his friend Mr. Langton, then, I think, in her seventh year. He took the trouble to write it in a large round hand, nearly resembling printed characters, that she might have the satisfaction of reading it herself. The original lies before me, but shall be faithfully restored to her; and I dare say will be preserved by her as a jewel, as long as she lives.<sup>4</sup>

JOHNSON TO MISS JANE LANGTON,

In Rochester, Kent.

"May 10, 1781.

"MY DEAREST MISS JENNY, — I am sorry that your pretty letter has been so long without being answered; but, when I am not pretty well, I do not always write plain enough for young ladies. I am glad, my dear, to see that you write so well, and hope that you mind your pen, your book, and your needle, for they are all necessary. Your books will give you knowledge, and make you respected; and your needle will find you useful employment when you do not care to read. When you are a little older, I hope you will be very diligent in learning arithmetic; and, above all, that through your whole life you will carefully say your prayers and read your Bible. I am, my dear, &c.,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

On Wednesday, May 5., I arrived in London, and next morning had the pleasure to find Dr. Johnson greatly recovered. I but just saw him; for a coach was waiting to carry him to Islington, to the house of his friend the Reverend Mr. Strahan, where he went sometimes for the benefit of good air, which, notwithstanding his having formerly laughed at the general opinion upon the subject, he now acknowledged was conducive to health.

One morning afterwards, when I found him alone, he communicated to me, with solemn earnestness, the very remarkable circumstance which had happened in the course of his illness, when he was much distressed by the dropsy. He had shut himself up, and employed a day in particular exercises of religion, fasting, humiliation, and prayer. On a sudden he ob-

<sup>1</sup> The Exhibition dinner of the Royal Academy, then given in the upper rooms in Somerset House. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> A cousin of Mrs. Thrale's, Hester Lynch Salisbury Colman, married to Mr. Davenant, who afterwards assumed the name of Corbet, and was created a baronet. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> Perhaps Miss Reynolds's "Essay on Taste." See ante, pp. 697—706. Malone was misled by the inaccurate copy of the letter in p. 697. into thinking it had been then printed. Northote (ii. 115.), adopts this error. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> It is so. I have seen it very lately, framed and glazed, in the possession of the respectable and amiable lady to whom it was addressed. It is written in a large hand, very fair and legible; Miss Langton was then seven years old. See ante, p. 565. n. 2. — CROKER, 1817.

tained extraordinary relief, for which he looked up to Heaven with grateful devotion. He made no direct inference from this fact; but from his manner of telling it, I could perceive that it appeared to him as something more than an incident in the common course of events. For my own part, I have no difficulty to avow that cast of thinking, which, by many modern pretenders to wisdom, is called superstitions. But here I think even men of dry rationality may believe, that there was an intermediate<sup>1</sup> interposition of Divine Providence, and that the "fervent prayer of this righteous man" availed.<sup>2</sup>

On Sunday, May 9., I found Colonel Vallancy<sup>3</sup>, the celebrated antiquary and engineer of Ireland, with him. On Monday, the 10th, I dined with him at Mr. Paradise's, where was a large company; Mr. Bryant, Mr. Joddrel<sup>4</sup>, Mr. Hawkins Browne, &c. On Thursday, the 13th, I dined with him at Mr. Joddrel's, with another large company; the Bishop of Exeter [Dr. Ross], Lord Monboddo, Mr. Murphy, &c. I was sorry to observe Lord Monboddo avoid any communication with Dr. Johnson. I flattered myself that I had made them very good friends; but unhappily his lordship had resumed and cherished a violent prejudice against my illustrious friend, to whom I must do the justice to say, there was on his part not the least anger, but a good-humoured sportiveness. Nay, though he knew of his lordship's indisposition towards him, he was even kindly; as appeared from his inquiring of me after him, by an abbreviation of his name, "Well, how does Monny?"

On Saturday, May 15., I dined with him at Dr. Brocklesby's, where were Colonel Vallancy, Mr. Murphy, and that ever-cheerful companion, Mr. Devaynes, apothecary to his majesty.<sup>5</sup> Of these days, and others on which I saw him, I have no memorials, except the general recollection of his being able and animated in conversation, and appearing to relish society as much as the youngest man. I find only these three small particulars: When a person was mentioned, who said, "I have lived fifty-one years in this world without having had ten minutes of uneasiness;" he exclaimed, "The man who says so lies: he attempts to impose on human credulity." The Bishop of Exeter in vain observed, that men were very different. His lordship's manner was not impressive; and I learnt afterwards, that Johnson did not find out that the person who talked to him was a prelate; if he had, I doubt not that he would have treated him with more respect; for, once talking of George Psalmanazar, whom he revered for his piety, he said, "I should as soon think of contradicting a bishop." One of the company provoked him greatly by doing what he could least of all bear, which was, quoting something of his own writing, against what he then maintained. "What, Sir," cried the gentleman, "do you say to —

"The busy day, the peaceful night,
Unfelt, uncounted, glided by?"<sup>7</sup>

Johnson, finding himself thus presented as giving an instance of a man who had lived without uneasiness, was much offended, for he looked upon such a quotation as unfair: his anger burst out in an unjustifiable retort insinuating that the gentleman's remark was a sally of ebriety: "Sir, there is one passion I would advise you to command; when you have drunk out that glass, don't drink another." Here was exemplified what Goldsmith said of him, with the aid of a very witty image from one of Cibber's comedies: "There is no arguing with Johnson: for if his pistol misses fire, he knocks you down with the butt end of it."

Another was this: when a gentleman<sup>8</sup> of eminence in the literary world was violently censured for attacking people by anonymous paragraphs in newspapers, he, from the spirit of contradiction, as I thought, took up his defence, and said, "Come, come, this is not so terrible a crime; he means only to vex them a little. I do not say that I should do it; but there is a great difference between him and me: what is fit for Hephæstion is not fit for Alexander." Another, when I told him that a young and handsome countess had said to me, "I should think that to be praised by Dr. Johnson would make one a fool all one life;" and that I answered, "Madam, I shall make him a fool to-day, by repeating this to him;" he said, "I am too old to be made a fool: but if you say I am made a fool, I shall <sup>1</sup> So in all the editions, though the meaning of the term intermediate does not seem quite clear. Perhaps Mr. Boswell may have meant immediate. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> Upon this subject there is a very fair and judicious remark in the Life of Dr. Abernethy, in the first edition of the Biographia Britannica, which I should have been glad to see in his Life, which has been written for the second edition of that valuable work. "To deny the exercise of a particular providence in the Deity's government of the world is certainly impious, yet nothing serves the cause of the sorer more than incautious forward zeal in determining the particular instances of it." In confirmation of my sentiments, I am also happy to quote that sensible and elegant writer, Mr. Melmoth, in Letter VIII. of his collection, published under the name of Fitzosborne, "We may safely assert, that the belief of a particular Providence is founded upon such probable reasons as may well justify our assent. It would scarce, therefore, be wise to renounce an opinion which affords so firm a support to the soul in those seasons wherein she stands in most need of assistance, merely because it is not possible, in questions of this kind, to solve every difficult which attends them." — BOSWELL.

<sup>3</sup> Afterwards General Vallancy; an ingenious man, but somewhat of a visionary on Irish antiquities. He died 1812, ret. 92. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> Richard Paul Joddrel, Esq., formerly M.P. for Seaford died Jan. 26, 1831, aged 86. He was the last survivor of Johnson's Essex Street club. — CROKER.

<sup>5</sup> Indeed his friends seem to have, as it were, celebrated his recovery by a round of dinners, for he wrote on the 13 to Mrs. Thrale: — "Now I am broken loose, my friends see willing enough to see me. On Monday I dined with Paradise; Tuesday, Hoole; Wednesday, Dr. Taylor; to-day with Joddrel; Friday, Mrs. Garrick; Saturday, Dr. Brocklesby; next Monday, Dilly." — CROKER.

<sup>6</sup> Most probably Mr. Boswell himself, who has more than once applied the same quotation on similar occasions. — CROKER.

<sup>7</sup> Verses on the death of Mr. Levett. — BOSWELL.

<sup>8</sup> George Steevens. — CROKER.

not deny it. I am much pleased with a compliment, especially from a pretty woman."

On the evening of Saturday, May 15., he was in fine spirits at our Essex Head Club. He told us, "I dined yesterday at Mrs. Garrick's with Mrs. Carter<sup>1</sup>, Miss Hannah More, and Fanny Burney. Three such women are not to be found: I know not where I could find a fourth, except Mrs. Lennox, who is superior to them all." BOSWELL. "What! and you them all to yourself, Sir?" JOHNSON. "I had them all, as much as they were had; but it might have been better had there been more company there." BOSWELL. "Might not Mrs. Montagu have been a fourth?" JOHNSON. "Sir, Mrs. Montagu does not make a trade of her wit: but Mrs. Montagu is a very extraordinary woman: she has a constant stream of conversation, and it is always impregnated; it has always meaning." BOSWELL. "Mr. Burke has a constant stream of conversation." JOHNSON. "Yes, Sir; if a man were to go by chance at the same time with Burke under a shed to shun a shower, he would say, 'this is an extraordinary man.' If Burke should go into a stable to see his horse dressed, the ostler would say, 'we have had an extraordinary man here.'" BOSWELL. "Foote was a man who never failed in conversation. If he had gone into a stable—" JOHNSON. "Sir, if he had gone into a stable, the ostler would have said, 'here has been a comical fellow; but he would not have respected him.'" BOSWELL. "And, Sir, the ostler would have answered him,—would have given him as good as he brought, as the common saying is." JOHNSON. "Yes, Sir; and Foote would have answered the ostler. When Burke does not descend to be merry, his conversation is very superior indeed. There is no proportion between the powers which he shows in serious talk and in jocularly. When he lets himself down to that he is in the kennel." I have in another place [p. 273.] opposed, and I hope with success, Dr. Johnson's very singular and erroneous notion as to Mr. Burke's pleasantry. Mr. Windham now said low to me, that he differed from our great friend in this observation; for that Mr. Burke was often very happy in his merriment. It would not have been right for either of us to have contradicted Johnson at this time, in a society all of whom did not know and value Mr. Burke as much as we did. It might have occasioned something more rough, and at any rate would probably have checked the flow of Johnson's good humour. He called to us with a sudden air of exultation, as the thought started into his mind, "O! Gentlemen, I must tell you a very great thing. The Empress of Russia has ordered the 'Rambler' to be translated into the Russian language<sup>2</sup>; so I shall be read on the banks of the Wolga. Horace boasts that his fame would extend as far as the banks of the Rhone; now the Wolga is farther from me than the Rhone was from Horace." BOSWELL. "You must certainly be pleased with this, Sir." JOHNSON. "I am pleased, Sir, to be sure. A man is pleased to find he has succeeded in that which he has endeavoured to do."

One of the company mentioned his having seen a noble person driving in his carriage, and looking exceedingly well, notwithstanding his great age. JOHNSON. "Ah, Sir, that is nothing. Bacon observes, that a stout healthy old man is like a tower undermined."

On Sunday, May 16., I found him alone: he talked of Mrs. Thrale with much concern, saying, "Sir, she has done every thing wrong since Thrale's bridle was off her neck;" and was proceeding to mention some circumstances which have since been the subject of public discussion<sup>3</sup>, when he was interrupted by the arrival of Dr. Douglas, now Bishop of Salisbury.

Dr. Douglas, upon this occasion, refuted a mistaken notion which is very common in Scotland, that the ecclesiastical discipline<sup>4</sup> of the Church of England, though duly enforced, is insufficient to preserve the morals of the clergy, inasmuch as all delinquents may be screened by appealing to the convocation, which being never authorised by the king to sit for the despatch of business, the appeal never can be heard. Dr. Douglas observed, that this was founded upon ignorance; for that the bishops have sufficient power to maintain discipline, and that the sitting of the convocation was wholly immaterial in this respect, it being not a court of judicature, but like a parliament, to make canons and regulations as times may require.

Johnson, talking of the fear of death, said, "Some people are not afraid, because they look upon salvation as the effect of an absolute decree, and think they feel in themselves the marks of sanctification. Others, and those the most rational in my opinion, look upon salvation as conditional; and as they never can be but the elation discovered by Johnson, in the belief that it was true, showed a noble ardour for literary fame. — BOSWELL.

<sup>1</sup> This learned and excellent lady, so often mentioned in this volume, died at her house in Clarges Street, Feb. 19. 1766, in her eighty-ninth year. — MALONE. The letters of these three ladies, posthumously published, have confirmed, and indeed, increased the reputation of Mrs. Carter and Hannah More, while they have wholly extinguished that of Madame D'Arblay; but this indeed had been waiving ever since her two first novels, which, clever as they were, owed a great deal of their extraordinary success to the strange representation, that had been somehow made, of the author's being ten years younger than she really was. Ante, 732, n. 3. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>2</sup> I have since heard that the report was not well founded;

<sup>3</sup> See anté, p. 510, n. 3. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> Since the abolition of the High Commission Court in 1610, proceedings against clergymen for ecclesiastical offences (happily, in this country, of rare occurrence, when compared with the number of the clergy) have been conducted by the same rules as are observed in other criminal cases in the spiritual courts. That inconveniences have attended their application to such suits is not a recent complaint, but some modern cases show the necessity of some early and effectual remedy. — MARKLAND.

sure that they have complied with the conditions, they are afraid."

In one of his little manuscript diaries about this time I find a short notice, which marks his amiable disposition more certainly than a thousand studied declarations. "Afternoon spent cheerfully and elegantly, I hope without offence to God or man; though in no holy duty, yet in the general exercise and cultivation of benevolence."

On Monday, May 17., I dined with him at Mr. Dilly's, where were Colonel Vallancy, the Reverend Dr. Gibbons, and Mr. Capel Loft, who, though a most zealous Whig, has a mind so full of learning and knowledge, and so much exercised in various departments, and withal so much liberality, that the stupendous powers of the literary Goliath, though they did not frighten this little David of popular spirit, could not but excite his admiration. There was also Mr. Braithwaite of the Post-office, that amiable and friendly man, who, with modest and unassuming manners, has associated with many of the wits of the age. Johnson was very quiescent<sup>1</sup> to-day. Perhaps, too, I was indolent. I find nothing more of him in my notes, but that when I mentioned that I had seen in the king's library sixty-three editions of my favourite Thomas à Kempis, — amongst which it was in eight languages, Latin, German, French, Italian, Spanish, English, Arabic, and Armenian, — he said he thought it unnecessary to collect many editions of a book, which were all the same, except as to the paper and print; he would have the original, and all the translations, and all the editions which had any variations in the text. He approved of the famous collection of editions of Horace by Douglas<sup>2</sup>, mentioned by Pope, who is said to have had a closet filled with them; and he added, "every man should try to collect one book in that manner, and present it to a public library."

On Tuesday, May 18., I saw him for a short time in the morning. I told him that the mob had called out, as the king passed<sup>3</sup>, "No Fox, no Fox!" which I did not like. He said, "They were right, Sir." I said, I thought not; for it seemed to be making Mr. Fox the king's competitor. There being no audience, so that there could be no triumph in a victory, he fairly agreed with me. I said it might do very well, if explained thus: "Let us have no Fox," understanding it as a prayer to his Majesty not to appoint that gentleman minister.

CHAPTER LXXIX.

1784.

Departed Friends. — Argument. — Testimony. — Helen Maria Williams. — Knottling. — Oxford — Newton on the Prophecies. — Nonjurors. — Infidel Writers. — Church of Rome. — Whig and Tory. — Miss Adams. — Fox and Pitt. — Radcliffe's Travelling Fellowships. — Prayer. — Jeremy Taylor. — Iffley. — Dr. Nowell. — Rev. Henry Bate. — John Henderson. — Balance of Misery.

On Wednesday, May 19., I sat a part of the evening with him, by ourselves. I observed that the death of our friends might be a consolation against the fear of our own dissolution, because we might have more friends in the other world than in this. He perhaps felt this as a reflection upon his apprehension as to death, and said, with heat, "How can a man know where his departed friends are, or whether they will be his friends in the other world? How many friendships have you known formed upon principles of virtue? Most friendships are formed by caprice or by chance — mere confederacies in vice or league in folly."

We talked of our worthy friend Mr. Langton. He said, "I know not who will go to heaven if Langton does not. Sir, I could almost say Sit anima mea cum Langtono." I mentioned a very eminent friend as a virtuous man. JOHNSON. "Yes, Sir; but ——— has not the evangelical virtue of Langton ———, I am afraid, would not scruple to pick up a wench."<sup>4</sup>

He however charged Mr. Langton with what he thought want of judgment upon an interesting occasion. "When I was ill," said he, "I desired he would tell me sincerely what he thought my life was faulty. Sir, I brought me a sheet of paper, on which he has written down several texts of Scripture re-

<sup>1</sup> He was probably not at his ease under the disputatious whiggism of Capel Loft, with which his state of health indisposed him to combat. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>2</sup> The mention by Pope is in the following lines of the Dunciad, and the subjoined note: —

"Bid me with Pollio sup, as well as dine,
There all the learned shall at the labour stand,
And Douglas lend his soft obstetric hand.

"Douglas, a physician of great learning and no less taste; above all, curious in what related to Horace; of whom he collected every edition, translation, and comment, to the number of several hundred volumes." — Dunciad, b. iv. l. 392. Dr. James Douglas was born in Scotland in 1675, and died in London in 1742. He published some medical works. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> To open parliament. The Westminster election had concluded only the day before in favour of Mr. Fox, who return, however, was delayed by the requisition for scrutiny. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> As Boswell has seldom, if ever, applied the term "eminent friend," except to Mr. Burke or Sir Joshua Reynolds, it may not be unnecessary to remind the reader that this time Mr. Burke was fifty-four, and Sir Joshua sixty-two years of age, and that the good taste and moral propriety both forbid our believing that there could have been a ground for so offensive a supposition against either; but particularly as against Mr. Burke — a married man, of exemplary piety, and, as Boswell admits, and all the world knows, remarkable for the most "oracery and amiable domestic habits." Anti, p. 626. We shall see by and by (post, Dec. 2, 1784) still more culpable instance of Boswell's indelicacy and indiscretion in dealing with such matters. — CROKER, 1831—47.

commending Christian charity. And when I questioned him what occasion I had given for such an animalversion, all that he could say amounted to this, — that I sometimes contradicted people in conversation. Now what harm does it do to any man to be contradicted?" BOSWELL. "I suppose he meant the manner of doing it; roughly and harshly." JOHNSON. "And who is the worse for that?" BOSWELL. "It hurts people of weaker nerves." JOHNSON. "I know no such weak-nerved people." Mr. Burke, to whom I related this conference, said, "It is well if, when a man comes to die, he has nothing heavier upon his conscience than having been a little rough in conversation."

Johnson, at the time when the paper was presented to him, though at first pleased with the attention of his friend, whom he thanked in an earnest manner, soon exclaimed in a loud and angry tone, "What is your drift, Sir?" Sir Joshua Reynolds pleasantly observed, that it was a scene for a comedy, to see a penitent get into a violent passion and belabour his confessor.<sup>1</sup>

I have preserved no more of his conversation at the times when I saw him during the rest of this month, till Sunday, the 30th of May, when I met him in the evening at Mr. Hoole's, where there was a large company both of ladies and gentlemen. Sir James Johnston happened to say that he paid no regard to the arguments of counsel at the bar of the House of Commons, because they were paid for speaking. JOHNSON. "Nay, Sir, argument is argument. You cannot help paying regard to their arguments if they are good. If it were testimony, you might disregard it, if you knew that it were purchased. There is a beautiful image in Bacon<sup>2</sup> upon this subject. Testimony is like an arrow shot from a long-bow; the force of it depends on the strength of the hand that draws it. Argument is like an arrow from a cross-bow, which has equal force though shot by a child."<sup>3</sup>

He had dined that day at Mr. Hoole's, and Miss Helen Maria Williams being expected in the evening, Mr. Hoole put into his hands her beautiful "Ode on the Peace."<sup>4</sup> Johnson read it over, and when this elegant and accomplished young lady<sup>5</sup> was presented to him, he took her by the hand in the most courteous manner, and repeated the finest stanza of her poem. This was the most delicate and pleasing compliment he could pay. Her respectable friend, Dr. Kippis, from whom I had this anecdote, was standing by, and was not a little gratified.

Miss Williams told me, that the only other time she was fortunate enough to be in Dr. Johnson's company, he asked her to sit down by him, which she did; and upon her inquiring how he was, he answered, "I am very ill indeed, Madam. I am very ill even when you are near me; what should I be were you at a distance?"

["JOHNSON TO MISS REYNOLDS.

"May 28, 1784.

"MADAM, — You do me wrong by imputing my omission to any captious punctiliousness. I have not yet seen Sir Joshua, and, when I do see him, I know not how to serve you. When I spoke upon your affairs<sup>6</sup> to him, at Christmas, I received no encouragement to speak again.

"But we shall never do business by letters. We must see one another.

"I have returned your papers, [pp. 697, 706.] and am glad that you laid aside the thought of printing them. I am, Madam, your most humble servant,
— REYN. MSS. "SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHNSON TO DR. HAMILTON.<sup>7</sup>

"Bolt Court, June 4, 1783.

"REVEREND SIR, — Be pleased to excuse this application from a stranger in favour of one who has very little ability to speak for herself. The <sup>1</sup> After all, I cannot but be of opinion, that as Mr. Langton was seriously requested by Dr. Johnson to mention what appeared to him erroneous in the character of his friend, he was bound as an honest man to intimate what he really thought, which he certainly did in the most delicate manner; so that Johnson himself, when in a quiet frame of mind, was pleased with it. The texts suggested are now before me, and I shall quote a few of them. "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth." — Matt. v. 5. "I therefore, the prisoner of the Lord, beseech you that ye walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye are called, with all lowliness and meekness, with long-suffering forbearing one another in love." — Ephes. v. 1, 2. "And above all these things, put on charity, which is the bond of perfectness." — Col. iii. 14. "Charity suffereth long, and is kind; charity envieth not; charity vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up, doth not behave itself unseemly, is not easily provoked." — 1 Cor. xiii. 4, 5. — BOSWELL.

<sup>2</sup> Dr. Johnson's memory deceived him. The passage referred to is not Bacon's, but Boyle's, and may be found, with a slight variation, in Johnson's Dictionary, under the word Crossbow. — So happily selected are the greater part of the examples in that incomparable work, that if the most striking passages found in it were collected by one of our modern bookmakers, under the title of "The Beauties of Johnson's Dictionary," they would form a very pleasing and popular volume. — MALONE.

<sup>3</sup> Dr. Moore, in his Life of Smollett, professes to relate this circumstance (at which he was present) with more "precision" than Boswell; but it is satisfactory to find that his statement proves the accuracy of Boswell's narration, as well as the superiority of his style of reporting. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> The peace made by that very able statesman the Earl of Shelburne, now Marquis of Lansdowne, which may fairly be considered as the foundation of all the prosperity of Great Britain since that time, — BOSWELL.

<sup>5</sup> In the first edition of my work, the epithet amiable was given. "I was sorry to be obliged to strike it out; but I could not in justice suffer it to remain, after this young lady had not only written in favour of the savage anarchy with which France has been visited, but had (as I have been informed by good authority) walked, without horror, over the ground at the Thuilleries when it was strewed with the naked bodies of the faithful Swiss Guards, who were barbarously massacred for having bravely defended, against a crew of ruffians, the monarch whom they had taken an oath to defend. From Dr. Johnson she could now expect not endearment, but repulsion." — BOSWELL. Miss Williams, like many other early enthusiasts of the French revolution, had latterly altered her opinion very considerably. She died in 1828, æt. 65. — CROKER.

<sup>6</sup> No doubt, pecuniary affairs, similar to those mentioned ante, p. 623, n. 1. I preserve all these notes as proofs of Johnson's active benevolence towards his friends, and the reliance they had on his kindness. — CROKER.

<sup>7</sup> This and the following notes, addressed to the Rev. Dr. Hamilton, Vicar of St. Martin's in the Fields, are published from the originals, in the possession of his son; who observes, that "they are of no further interest, than as showing the unhappy woman who waits on you with this, has been known to me many years. She is the daughter of a clergyman of Leicestershire, who by an unhappy marriage is reduced to solicit a refuge in the workhouse of your parish, to which she has a claim by her husband's settlement.

Her case admits of little deliberation; she is turned out of her lodging into the street. What my condition allows me to do for her I have already done, and having no friend, she can have recourse only to the parish. I am, reverend Sir, &c.,
— MSS. "SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHNSON TO DR. HAMILTON.

"Bolt Court, Feb. 11. 1784.

"SIR, — My physicians endeavour to make me believe that I shall sometime be better qualified to receive visits from men of elegance and civility like yours.

"Mrs. Pellè shall wait upon you, and you will judge what will be proper for you to do. I once more return you my thanks, and am, Sir, &c.,
— MSS. "SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHNSON TO DR. HAMILTON.

June 2. 1784.

"SIR, — You do every thing that is liberal and kind. Mrs. Pellè is a bad manager for herself, but I will employ a more skilful agent, one Mrs. Gardiner, who will wait on you and employ Pellè's money to the best advantage. Mrs. Gardiner will wait on you.

"I return you, Sir, sincere thanks for your attention to me. I am ill, but hope to come back better<sup>1</sup>, and to be made better still by your conversation. I am, Sir, &c.,
— MSS. "SAM. JOHNSON."

He had now a great desire to go to Oxford, as his first jaunt after his illness. We talked of it for some days, and I had promised to accompany him. He was impatient and fretful to-night, because I did not at once agree to go with him on Thursday. When I considered how ill he had been, and what allowance should be made for the influence of sickness upon his temper, I resolved to indulge him, though with some inconvenience to myself, as I wished to attend the musical meeting in honour of Handel, in Westminster Abbey, on the following Saturday.

In the midst of his own diseases and pains, he was ever compassionate to the distresses of others, and actively earnest in procuring them aid, as appears from a note to Sir Joshua Reynolds, of June, in these words: — goodness of Johnson's heart, and the spirit with which he entered into the cause and interests of an individual in distress, when he was almost on the bed of sickness and death himself." — WRIGHT.

<sup>1</sup> Dr. Johnson left town on the following morning, with Boswell, for Oxford. — WRIGHT.

<sup>2</sup> The following note from Miss Reynolds shows that he was not a solicitor for the poor of his own acquaintance only. It seems to have been given to some poor woman as an introduction to Dr. Johnson: —

"Dover Street, July 9.

"MY GOOD SIR, — I could not forbear to communicate to the poor woman the hope you had given me of using your

JOHNSON TO REYNOLDS.

"I am ashamed to ask for some relief for a poor man, to whom I hope I have given what I can I expected to spare. The man importunes me, and the blow goes round. I am going to try another air on Thursday."<sup>2</sup>

On Thursday, June 3., the Oxford post coach took us up in the morning at Bolt Court. The other two passengers were Mrs. Beresford and her daughter, two very agreeable ladies from America; they were going to Worcestershire, where they then resided. Frank had been sent by his master the day before to take places for us; and I found from the way-bill that Dr. Johnson had made our names be put down. Mrs. Beresford, who had read in it whispered me, "Is this the great Dr. Johnson?" I told her it was; so she was then prepared to listen. As she soon happened to mention, in a voice so low that Johnson did not hear it, that her husband had been a member of the American Congress, I cautioned her to beware of introducing that subject, as she must know how very violent Johnson was against the people of that country. He talked a great deal; but I am sorry I have preserved little of the conversation. Miss Beresford was so much charmed, that she said to me aside, "How he does talk! Every sentence is an essay." She amused herself in the coach with knotting. He would scarcely allow this species of employment any merit. "Next to mere idleness," said he, "I think knotting is to be reckoned in the scale of insignificance; though I once attempted to learn knotting: Dempster's sister (looking to me) endeavoured to teach me it, but I made no progress."

I was surprised at his talking without reserve in the public post coach of the state of his affairs: "I have," said he, "about the world, I think, above a thousand pounds, which I intend shall afford Frank an annuity of seventy pounds a year." Indeed, his openness with people at a first interview was remarkable. He said once to Mr. Langton, "I think I am like Squire Richard<sup>3</sup> in 'The Journey to London,' I'm never strange in a strange place. He was truly social. He strongly censured what is much too common in England among persons of condition, — maintaining an absolute silence when unknown to each other; as, for instance, when occasionally brought together in a room before the master or mistress of the interest with your friends to raise her a little sum to enable her to see her native country again; nor could I refuse to write a line to procure her the pleasure of the confirmation of that hope.

"I am, and always have been, very troublesome to you but you are, and always have been, very good to your obliged humble servant,
— FRANCES REYNOLDS."

<sup>3</sup> The remark is made by Miss Jenny, and not by her brother. From its smartness it would have been ill suited to one who was originally described in the dramatic person as "a mere whelp." — MARKLAND.

house has appeared. "Sir, that is being so uncivilised as not to understand the common rights of humanity."

At the inn where we stopped he was exceedingly dissatisfied with some roast mutton which we had for dinner. The ladies, I saw, wondered to see the great philosopher, whose wisdom and wit they had been admiring all the way, get into ill-humour from such a cause. He scolded the waiter, saying, "It is as bad as bad can be: it is ill-fed, ill-killed, ill-kept, and ill-drest."

He bore the journey very well, and seemed to feel himself elevated as he approached Oxford, that magnificent and venerable seat of learning, orthodoxy, and Toryism. Frank came in the heavy coach, in readiness to attend him; and we were received with the most polite hospitality at the house of his old friend Dr. Adams, Master of Pembroke College, who had given us a kind invitation. Before we were set down, I communicated to Johnson my having engaged to return to London directly for the reason I have mentioned, but that I would hasten back to him again. He was pleased that I had made this journey merely to keep him company. He was easy and placid with Dr. Adams, Mrs. and Miss Adams, and Mrs. Kennicott, widow of the learned Hebræan, who was here on a visit. He soon despatched the inquiries that were made about his illness and recovery by a short and distinct narrative, and then assuming a gay air, repeated from Swift, —

"Nor think on our approaching ills,
And talk of spectacles and pills."

Dr. Newton, the Bishop of Bristol, having been mentioned, Johnson, recollecting the manner in which he had been censured by that prelate<sup>1</sup>, thus retaliated: — "Tom knew he should be dead before what he has said of me would appear. He durst not have printed it while he was alive." Dr. ADAMS. "I believe his 'Dissertations on the Prophecies' is his great work." JOHNSON. "Why, Sir, it is Tom's great work; but how far it is great, or how much of it is Tom's, are other questions. I fancy a considerable part of it was borrowed." Dr. ADAMS. "He was a very successful man." JOHNSON. "I don't think so, Sir. He did not get very high. He was late in getting what he did get; and he did not get it by the best means. I believe he was a gross flatterer."

I fulfilled my intention by going to London, and returned to Oxford on Wednesday the 9th of June, when I was happy to find myself again in the same agreeable circle at Pembroke College, with the comfortable prospect of making some stay. Johnson welcomed my return with more than ordinary glee.

He talked with great regard of the Honourable Archibald Campbell, whose character he had given at the Duke of Argyll's table when we were at Inverary, and at this time wrote out for me, in his own hand, a fuller account of that learned and venerable writer, which I have published in its proper place. [p. 389.] Johnson made a remark this evening which struck me a good deal. "I never," said he, "knew a nonjuror who could reason."<sup>2</sup> Surely he did not mean to deny that faculty to many of their writers — to Hickeys, Brett, and other eminent divines of that persuasion; and did not recollect that the seven bishops, so justly celebrated for their magnanimous resistance of arbitrary power, were yet nonjurors<sup>3</sup> to the new government. The nonjuring clergy of Scotland, indeed, who, excepting a few, have lately, by a sudden stroke, cut off all ties of allegiance to the house of Stuart, and resolved to pray for our present lawful sovereign by name, may be thought to have confirmed this

<sup>1</sup> Dr. Newton, in his account of his own Life, after animadverting upon Mr. Gibbon's History, says, —

"Dr. Johnson's 'Lives of the Poets' afforded more amusement; but candour was much hurt and offended at the malevolence that predominates in every part. Some passages, it must be allowed, are judicious and well written, but make not sufficient compensation for so much spleen and ill-humour. Never was any biographer more sparing of his praise, or more abundant in his censures. He seemingly delights more in exposing blemishes, than in recommending beauties: slightly passes over excellences, enlarges upon imperfections, and, not content with his own severe reflections, revives old scandal, and produces large quotations from the forgotten works of former critics. His reputation was so high in the republic of letters, that it wanted not to be raised upon the ruins of others. But these essays, instead of raising a higher idea than was before entertained of his understanding, have certainly given the world a worse opinion of his temper. The bishop was therefore the more surprised and concerned for his townsman, for he respected him not only for his genius and learning, but valued him much for the more amiable part of his character — his humanity and charity, his morality and religion."

The last sentence we may consider as the general and permanent opinion of Bishop Newton; the remarks which precede it must, by all who have read Johnson's admirable work, be imputed to the disgust and peevishness of old age. I wish they had not appeared, and that Dr. Johnson had not been provoked by them to express himself not in respectful terms of a prelate whose labours were certainly of considerable advantage both to literature and religion. — BOSWELL.

<sup>2</sup> The Rev. Mr. Agutter has favoured me with a note of a dialogue between Mr. John Henderson (post, p. 763.) and Dr. Johnson on this topic, as related by Mr. Henderson, and it is evidently so authentic that I shall here insert it: — HENDERSON. "What do you think, Sir, of William Law?" JOHNSON. "William Law, Sir, wrote the best piece of parenetic divinity; but William Law was no reasoner." HENDERSON. "Jeremy Collier, Sir?" JOHNSON. "Jeremy Collier fought without a rival, and therefore could not claim the victory." Mr. Henderson mentioned Ken and Kettlewell; but some objections were made; at last he said, "But, Sir, what do you think of Lesley?" JOHNSON. "Charles Lesley I had forgotten. Lesley was a reasoner, and a reasoner who was not to be reasoned against." BOSWELL. Charles was the son of Dr. John Leslie, Bishop of Clogher in Ireland. He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin. Though zealous against popery and King James's popish measures, he could not reconcile his conscience to the oaths to William and Mary, and so became a nonjuror, of which party he was one of the chief literary and theological supports and ornaments. After many years of exile, he returned to his native country, and died in 1729, at his own house at Glasgow, in the county of Monaghan, where his descendants have continued to reside. The present possessor, Mr. Charles Powell Leslie, his great grandson, has represented that county in several parliaments. — CROKER, 1831.

<sup>3</sup> Mr. Boswell is mistaken; two of the seven bishops, viz. Lloyd, of St. Asaph's, and Trelawney, of Bristol, transferred after the Revolution to Exeter and Winchester, were not nonjurors. — CROKER.

remark: as it may be said, that the divine indefeasible hereditary right which they professed to believe, if ever true, must be equally true still. Many of my readers will be surprised when I mention that Johnson assured me he had never in his life been in a nonjuring meeting-house.

Next morning at breakfast, he pointed out a passage in Savage's "Wanderer," saying, "These are fine verses." "If," said he, "I had written with hostility of Warburton in my Shakspeare, I should have quoted this couplet:—

'Here Learning, blinded first, and then beguiled, Looks dark as Ignorance, as Frenzy wild.'

You see they'd have fitted him to a T," (smiling.) Dr. ADAMS. "But you did not write against Warburton." JOHNSON. "No, Sir, I treated him with great respect, both in my preface and in my notes."<sup>1</sup>

Mrs. Kennicott spoke of her brother, the Reverend Mr. Chamberlayne, who had given up great prospects in the Church of England<sup>2</sup> on his conversion to the Roman Catholic faith. Johnson, who warmly admired every man who acted from a conscientious regard to principle, erroneous or not, exclaimed fervently, "God bless him."

Mrs. Kennicott, in confirmation of Dr. Johnson's opinion that the present was not worse than former ages, mentioned that her brother assured her there was now less infidelity on the continent than there had been<sup>3</sup>; Voltaire and Rousseau were less read. I asserted, from good authority, that Hume's infidelity was certainly less read. JOHNSON. "All infidel writers drop into oblivion when personal connexions and the floridness of novelty are gone; though now and then a foolish fellow, who thinks he can be witty upon them, may bring them again into notice. There will sometimes start up a college joker, who does not consider that what is a joke in a college will not do in the world. To such defenders of religion I would apply a stanza of a poem which I remember to have seen in some old collection:—

'Henceforth be quiet and agree,
Each kiss his empty brother:
Religion seems a foe like thee,
But dreads a friend like t'other.'

The point is well, though the expression is not correct: one, and not thee, should be opposed to t'other.<sup>4</sup>

On the Roman Catholic religion he said, "If you join the papists externally, they will not interrogate you strictly as to your belief in their tenets. No reasoning papist believes every article of their faith. There is one side on which a good man might be persuaded to embrace it. A good man of a timorous disposition, in great doubt of his acceptance with God, and pretty credulous, may be glad to be of a church where there are so many helps to get to heaven.<sup>5</sup> I would be a papist if I could. I have fear enough; but an obstinate rationality prevents me. I shall never be a papist, unless on the near approach of death, of which I have a very great terror. I wonder that women are not all papists." BOSWELL. "They are not more afraid of death than men are." JOHNSON. "Because they are less wicked." Dr. ADAMS. "They are more pious." JOHNSON. "No, hang 'em, they are not more pious. A wicked fellow is the most pious when he takes to it. He'll beat you all at piety."

He argued in defence of some of the peculiar tenets of the church of Rome. As to the giving the bread only to the laity, he said, "They may think, that in what is merely ritual<sup>6</sup>, deviations from the primitive mode may be admitted on the ground of convenience; and I think they are as well warranted to make this alteration, as we are to substitute sprinkling in the room of the ancient baptism.<sup>7</sup> As to the invocation of saints, he said, "Though I do not think it

<sup>1</sup> See anté, p. 54.—C.

<sup>2</sup> Mr. Hallam informs me that there is here an inaccuracy. Mr. George Chamberlayne was a clerk in the Treasury, and never was in the Church of England. He became a Romish priest, and died in London within the last twenty years. The catastrophe of his elder brother, Edward Chamberlayne (see anté, p. 686. n. 4) makes me suspect something of mental aberration in this case, as there certainly has been in numerous similar conversions.—CROKER, 1835—47.

<sup>3</sup> The Revolution would seem to negative this opinion, but I incline to believe that it was true. Infidelity may have been on the decrease, when the political hurricane arose and swept all into the chaos of anarchy and atheism.—CROKER, 1831—47.

<sup>4</sup> I have inserted the stanza as Johnson repeated it from memory; but I have since found the poem itself, in "The Foundling Hospital for Wit," printed at London, 1749. It is as follows:—

"EPGRAM, occasioned by a religious dispute at Bath.

"On reason, faith, and mystery high,
Two wits harangue the table;
B—y believes he knows not why,
N— swears 'tis all a fable.

Peace, coxcombs, peace! and both agree!

N—, kiss thy empty brother;

Religion laughs at foes like thee;

And dreads a friend like t'other."—BOSWELL.

The disputants alluded to in this epigram are supposed to have been Beau Nash and Bentley, the son of the doctor and the friend of Walpole, who, however, was a man of considerable, though desultory, abilities.—CROKER.

<sup>5</sup> This facility however, it may in their last moments delude the timorous and credulous, is, as Jeremy Taylor observes, proportionably injurious if previously calculated upon. When addressing a convert to the Romish church, he says, "If I had a mind to live an evil life, and yet hope for heaven at last, I would be of your religion above any in the world."—Works, vol. xi. p. 190.—CROKER.

<sup>6</sup> Bishop Elington very justly observed that the sacrament is not merely ritual. Had it been an institution of the church of Rome, they might have modified it; but it was so solemn and specific ordinance of our Saviour himself, which no church could justifiably alter.—CROKER.

<sup>7</sup> I do not recollect any scriptural authority that primitive baptism should necessarily be by immersion. From the Acts, ii. 41., it may be inferred that 3000 persons were baptized in Jerusalem in one day, and the jailor of Philippi and his family were baptized hastily at night, and, as it would seem, within the purlieus of the prison (Acts, xvi. 33.)

authorised, it appears to me, that 'the communion of saints' in the Creed means the communion with the saints in heaven, as connected with 'the holy catholic church.'<sup>1</sup> He admitted the influence of evil spirits upon our minds, and said, "Nobody who believes the New Testament can deny it."

I brought a volume of Dr. Hurd the Bishop of Worcester's Sermons, and read to the company some passages from one of them, upon this text, "Resist the Devil, and he will flee from you." James, iv. 7. I was happy to produce so judicious and elegant a supporter<sup>2</sup> of a doctrine which I know not why, should, in this world of imperfect knowledge, and therefore of wonder and mystery in a thousand instances, be contested by some with an unthinking assurance and flippancy.

After dinner, when one of us talked of there being a great enmity between Whig and Tory: — JOHNSON. "Why, not so much, I think, unless when they come into competition with each other. There is none when they are only common acquaintance, none when they are of different sexes. A Tory will marry into a Whig family, and a Whig into a Tory family, without any reluctance. But, indeed, in a matter of much more concern than political tenets, and that is religion, men and women do not concern themselves much about difference of opinion; and ladies set no value on the moral character of men who pay their addresses to them: the greatest profligate will be as well received as the man of the greatest virtue, and this by a very good woman, by a woman who says her prayers three times a day." Our ladies endeavoured to defend their sex from this charge; but he roared them down! "No, no, a lady will take Jonathan Wild as readily as St. Austin, if he has threepence more; and, what is worse, her parents will give her to him. Women have a perpetual envy of our vices: they are less vicious than we, not from choice, but because we restrict them; they are the slaves of order and fashion; their virtue is of more consequence to us than our own, so far as concerns this world."

Miss Adams mentioned a gentleman of licentious character, and said, "Suppose I had a mind to marry that gentleman, would my parents consent?" JOHNSON. "Yes, they'd consent, and you'd go. You'd go, though they did not consent." Miss ADAMS. "Perhaps their opposing might make me go." JOHNSON. "Oh, very well; you'd take one whom you think a bad man, to have the pleasure of vexing your parents. You put me in mind of Dr. Barrowby<sup>3</sup>, the physician, who was very fond of swine's flesh. One day, when he was eating it, he said, 'I wish I was a Jew.' — 'Why so?' said somebody; 'the Jews are not allowed to eat your favourite meat.' — 'Because,' said he, 'I should then have the gust of eating it, with the pleasure of sinning.'" — JOHNSON then proceeded in his declamation.

Miss Adams soon afterwards made an observation that I do not recollect, which pleased him much: he said with a good-humoured smile, "That there should be so much excellence united with so much depravity, is strange."

Indeed this lady's good qualities, merit, and accomplishments, and her constant attention to Dr. Johnson, were not lost upon him. She happened to tell him that a little coffee-pot, in which she had made him coffee, was the only thing she could call her own. He turned to her with a complacent gallantry: — "Don't say so, my dear: I hope you don't reckon my heart as nothing."<sup>4</sup>

I asked him if it was true, as reported, that he had said lately, "I am for the King against Fox; but I am for Fox against Pitt." JOHNSON. "Yes, Sir; the King is my master; but I do not know Pitt; and Fox is my friend."

"Fox," added he, "is a most extraordinary man: here is a man (describing him in strong

These baptisms could hardly have been by immersion. — CROKER.

<sup>1</sup> Waller, in his "Divine Poesie," canto first, has the same thought finely expressed: —

"The church triumphant and the church below
In songs of praise their present union show;
Their joys are full, our expectation long;
In life we differ, but we join in song:
Angels and we, assisted by this art,
May sing together, though we dwell apart."

— BOSWELL.

<sup>2</sup> The sermon thus opens: —

"That there are angels and spirits good and bad: that at the head of these last there is one more considerable and malignant than the rest, who in the form or under the name of a serpent was deeply concerned in the fall of man, and whose head, as the prophetic language is, the Son of Man was one day to bruise; that this evil spirit, though that prophecy be in part completed, has not yet received his death's wound, but is still permitted, for ends unsearchable to us, and in ways which we cannot particularly explain, to have a certain degree of power in this world hostile to its virtue and happiness, and sometimes exerted with too much success; all this is so clear from Scripture, and no believer, unless he be first of all spoiled by philosophy and vain deceit, can possibly entertain a doubt of it."

Having treated of possessions, his lordship says, —

"As I have no authority to affirm that there are now any such, so neither may I presume to say with confidence that there are not any." "But then, with regard to the influence of evil spirits at this day upon the souls of men, I shall take leave to be a great deal more peremptory. (Then, having stated the various proofs, he adds) All this, I say, is so manifest to every one who reads the Scriptures, that, if we respect their authority, the question concerning the reality of the demonic influence upon the minds of men is clearly determined."

Let it be remembered, that these are not the words of an antiquated or obscure enthusiast, but of a learned and polite prelate, now alive; and were spoken not to a vulgar congregation, but to the Honourable Society of Lincoln's Inn. His lordship in this sermon explains the words "deliver us from evil," in the Lord's Prayer, as signifying a request to be protected from "the evil one," that is, the Devil. This is well illustrated in a short but excellent Commentary by my late worthy friend the Reverend Dr. Lort, of whom it may truly be said, Multis ille bonis Jethibus occidit. It is remarkable that Waller, in his "Reflections on the several Petitions in that sacred Form of Devotion," has understood this in the same sense: — terms of objection in some respects according as he apprehended, but which exalted his abilities the more) who has divided the kingdom with Caesar: so that it was a doubt whether the nation should be ruled by the sceptre of George the Third, or the tongue of Fox."

"Guard us from all temptations of the FOE." — BOSWELL.

<sup>3</sup> Dr. Barrowby died in 1758, the senior member of the college of physicians. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> Miss Adams married, in July, 1788, Benjamin Hyett, Esq., of Painswick, Gloucestershire. — Hall. — CROKER.

Dr. Wall, physician at Oxford, drank tea with us. Johnson had in general a peculiar pleasure in the company of physicians, which was certainly not abated by the conversation of this learned, ingenious, and pleasing gentleman. Johnson said, "It is wonderful how little good Radcliffe's travelling fellowships have done. I know nothing that has been imported by them; yet many additions to our medical knowledge might be got in foreign countries. Inoculation, for instance, has saved more lives than war destroys; and the cures performed by the Peruvian bark are innumerable. But it is in vain to send our travelling physicians to France and Italy and Germany, for all that is known there is known here. I'd send them out of Christendom; I'd send them among barbarous nations."

On Friday, June 11, we talked at breakfast of forms of prayer. JOHNSON. "I know of no good prayers but those in the 'Book of Common Prayer.'" DR. ADAMS (in a very earnest manner.) "I wish, Sir, you would compose some family prayers." JOHNSON. "I will not compose prayers for you, Sir, because you can do it for yourself. But I have thought of getting together all the books of prayers which I could, selecting those which should appear to me the best, putting out some, inserting others, adding some prayers of my own, and prefixing a discourse on prayer." We all now gathered about him, and two or three of us at a time joined in pressing him to execute this plan. He seemed to be a little displeas'd at the manner of our importunity, and in great agitation called out, "Do not talk thus of what is so awful. I know not what time God will allow me in this world. There are many things which I wish to do." Some of us persisted, and Dr. Adams said, "I never was more serious about any thing in my life." JOHNSON. "Let me alone — let me alone — I am overpowered." And then he put his hands before his face, and reclined for some time upon the table.<sup>1</sup>

I mentioned Jeremy Taylor's using, in his forms of prayer, "I am the chief of sinners," and other such self-condemning expressions.<sup>2</sup> "Now," said I, "this cannot be said with truth by every man, and therefore is improper for a general printed form. I myself cannot say that I am the worst of men; I will not say so." JOHNSON. "A man may know, that physically, that is, in the real state of things, he is not the worst man; but that morally he may be so. Law [p. 15.] observes, 'that every man knows something worse of himself, than he is sure of in others.' You may not have committed such crimes as some men have done; but you do not know against what degree of light they have sinned. Besides, Sir, 'the chief of sinners' is a mode of expression for 'I am a great sinner.' So St. Paul, speaking of our SAVIOUR's having died to save sinners, says, 'of whom I am the chief:' yet he certainly did not think himself so bad as Judas Iscariot." BOSWELL. "But, Sir, Taylor means it literally, for he founds a conceit upon it. When praying for the conversion of sinners, and of himself in particular, he says, 'LORD, thou wilt not leave thy chief work undone.'"<sup>3</sup> JOHNSON. "I do not approve of figurative expressions in addressing the Supreme Being; and I never use them. Taylor gives a very good advice: 'Never lie in your prayers; never confess more than you really believe; never promise more than you mean to perform.'" I recollected this precept in his 'Golden Grove'; but his example for prayer contradicts his precept.

Dr. Johnson and I went in Dr. Adams's coach to dine with Dr. Nowell, Principal of St. Mary Hall, at his villa at Ifley, on the banks of the Isis, about two miles from Oxford. While we were upon the road, I had the resolution to ask Johnson whether he thought that the roughness of his manner had been an advantage or not, and if he would not have done more good if he had been more gentle. I proceeded to answer myself thus: "Perhaps it has been of advantage, as it has given weight to what you said; you could not, perhaps, have talked with such authority without it." JOHNSON. "No, Sir; I have done more good as I am. Obscenity and impiety have always been repressed in my company." BOSWELL. "True, Sir; and that is more than can be said of every bishop. Greater liberties have been taken in the presence of a bishop, though a very good man, from his being milder, and therefore not commanding such awe. Yet, Sir, many people who might have been benefited by your conversation have been frightened away. A worthy friend of ours has told me, that he has often been afraid to talk to you." JOHNSON. "Sir, he need not have been afraid, if he had any thing rational to say.<sup>4</sup> If he had not, it was better he did not talk."

Dr. Nowell is celebrated for having preached

<sup>1</sup> Yet he had at this time composed all the prayers (except one) which Dr. Strahan afterwards published, as he — I am satisfied unwarrantably — stated, by Dr. Johnson's express desire. See post, p. 792. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> This expression is undoubtedly to be found in a prayer of Bishop Taylor's (see his Works, xv. p. 302.); but the spirit of such expressions is not, as Boswell would lead us to suppose, a characteristic of Taylor's prayers. — MARKLAND.

<sup>3</sup> Boswell probably quoted from memory, and the quotation may not be perfectly accurate. If Taylor, somewhere in his voluminous works, has employed the expression "God's chief work," did he not mean to apply it either to mankind in general, or to the redemption? In confirmation of the last supposition, we may refer to the following passage in one of his prayers: — "I beg of thee by all the parts of our redemption, and thy infinite mercy, in which thou pleassest thyself above all the works of the creation." (iv. 485.) — MARKLAND.

<sup>4</sup> The words of Erasmus may be applied to Johnson: "Quil ingenium, sensum, dictionem hominis noverant, multis non a sermon before the House of Commons, on the 30th of January, 1772, full of high Tory sentiments, for which he was thanked as usual, and printed it at their request; but, in the midst of that turbulence and faction which disgraced a part of the present reign, the thanks were afterwards ordered to be expunged. This strange conduct sufficiently exposes itself; and Dr. Nowell will ever have the honour which is due to a lofty friend of our monarchical constitution. Dr. Johnson said to me, "Sir, the court will be very much to blame if he is not promoted."<sup>1</sup> I told this to Dr. Nowell; and asserting my humbler, though not less zealous, exertions in the same cause, I suggested, that whatever return we might receive, we should still have the consolation of being, like Butler's steady and generous royalist, —

"True as the dial to the sun,
Although it be not shone upon."

We were well entertained and very happy at Dr. Nowell's, where was a very agreeable company; and we drank "Church and King" after dinner, with true Tory cordiality.

We talked of a certain clergyman<sup>2</sup> of extraordinary character, who, by exerting his talents in writing on temporary topics, and displaying uncommon intrepidity, had raised himself to affluence. I maintained that we ought not to be indignant at his success; for merit of every sort was entitled to reward. JOHNSON. "Sir, I will not allow this man to have merit. No, Sir; what he has is rather the contrary: I will, indeed, allow him courage; and on this account we so far give him credit. We have more respect for a man who robs boldly on the highway, than for a fellow who jumps out of a ditch, and knocks you down behind your back. Courage is a quality so necessary for maintaining virtue, that it is always respected, even when it is associated with vice."

I censured the coarse invectives which were become fashionable in the House of Commons, and said, that if members of parliament must attack each other personally in the heat of debate, it should be done more genteelly. JOHNSON. "No, Sir; that would be much worse. Abuse is not so dangerous when there is no vehicle of wit and delicacy, no subtle conveyance. The difference between coarse and refined abuse is as the difference between being bruised by a club, and wounded by a poisoned arrow." — I have since observed his position elegantly expressed by Dr. Young: —

"As the soft plume gives swiftness to the dart,
Good breeding sends the satire to the heart."<sup>3</sup>

On Saturday, June 12., there drank tea with us at Dr. Adams's, Mr. John Henderson, student of Pembroke College, celebrated for his wonderful acquirements in alchemy, judicial astrology, and other abstruse and curious learning<sup>4</sup> — and the Reverend Herbert Croft, who, I am afraid, was somewhat mortified by Dr. Johnson's not being highly pleased with some "Family Discourses" which he had printed; they were in too familiar a style to be approved of by so many a mind. I have no note of this evening's conversation, except a single fragment. When I mentioned Thomas Lord Lyttelton's vision, the prediction of the time of his death, and its exact fulfilment: — JOHNSON. "It is the most extraordinary thing that has happened in my day. I heard it with my own ears, from his uncle, Lord Westcote. I am so glad to have every evidence of the spiritual world, that I am willing to believe it." DR. ADAMS. "You have evidence enough; good evidence, which needs not such support." JOHNSON. "I like to have more."<sup>5</sup>

Mr. Henderson, with whom I had sauntered in the venerable walks of Merton College, and found him a very learned and pious man, supped with us. Dr. Johnson surprised him not a little, by acknowledging with a look of horror, that he was much oppressed by the fear of death. The amiable Dr. Adams suggested that God was infinitely good: — JOHNSON. "That he is infinitely good, as far as the perfection of his nature will allow, I certainly believe; but it is necessary for good upon the offenduntur, quibus graviter erant offendendi, qui hæc ignorarunt." [Those who should know the genius, sense, and phraseology of the man would not be offended by many things; which might grievously offend those who were ignorant of those circumstances.] — KEARNEY.

<sup>1</sup> See ant., p. 229. Dr. Nowell died 1801, æt. 73, in St. Mary Hall, of which he had been thirty-seven years principal, without having received any preferment. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>2</sup> The Rev. Henry Bate, who, in 1784, took the name of Dudley, was created a baronet in 1815, and died in 1824, without issue. He became first known to the world for a rather unclerical exhibition of personal prowess in a Vauxhall squabble (see Lond. Mag. for 1773, p. 461.); he was afterwards actively connected with the public press; and in consequence of something that appeared in the Morning Post, of which he was the proprietor, and was supposed to reflect on Lady Strathmore, he was involved in a duel (or pretended duel, Gent. Mag. 1810, p. 183. 1828, p. 496.) with Mr. Robinson Stoney, who soon after married the lady, and took the name of Bowes. He afterwards quarrelled with his co-proprietors in the Post, one of whom, Joseph Richardson, he wounded in another duel, and set up the Morning Herald. He subsequently obtained considerable church preferment, became an active and respectable magistrate, and the latter portion of his life was amiable and decorous. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> The feather does not give swiftness, but only serves to guide the arrow; so that Young's allusion is incorrect. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> See an account of him, in a sermon by the Rev. Mr. Agutter. — BOSWELL. He was a young man of extraordinary abilities, but of strange habits and manners. He was supposed to be well read in books which no one else reads. He took his bachelor's degree, but never got out into the world, having died in college in 1788. — Hall. It appears (Hannah More's Life, vol. i. p. 194.) that Henderson was sent to college by Dean Tucker, aided by a subscription. — CROKER.

<sup>5</sup> A correct account of Lord Lyttelton's supposed vision may be found in Nash's "History of Worcestershire." — MALONE. There were two supposed appearances, one of a spectre to Lord Lyttelton announcing his death three days before the event, and another of Lord Lyttelton himself to his friend Mr. Miles Peter Andrews, (then at his partner Mr. Pison's at Dartford,) about the hour that his lordship died in London. The whole story is told in the Gent. Mag. 1818, i. 597, with details which substantially agree with what I have heard Mr. Andrews himself relate more than once — but always reluctantly, and with an evidently solemn conviction of its truth. See also Gent. Mag. 1816, ii. 422. — CROKER, 1847.

whole, that individuals should be punished. As to an individual, therefore, he is not infinitely good; and as I cannot be sure that I have fulfilled the conditions on which salvation is granted, I am afraid I may be one of those who shall be damned." (Looking dismally.)

Dr. ADAMS. "What do you mean by damned?"

JOHNSON (passionately and loudly). "Sent to hell, Sir, and punished everlastingly. Dr.

ADAMS. "I don't believe that doctrine." JOHNSON. "Hold, Sir: do you believe that some will be punished at all?" Dr. ADAMS. "Being excluded from heaven will be a punishment; yet there may be no great positive suffering."

JOHNSON. "Well, Sir, but if you admit any degree of punishment, there is an end of your argument for infinite goodness simply considered; for infinite goodness would inflict no punishment whatever. There is not infinite goodness physically considered: morally there is."

BOSWELL. "But may not a man attain to such a degree of hope as not to be uneasy from the fear of death?"

JOHNSON. "A man may have such a degree of hope as to keep him quiet. You see I am not quiet, from the vehemence with which I talk; but I do not despair." Mrs. ADAMS. "You seem, Sir, to forget the merits of our Redeemer."

JOHNSON. "Madam, I do not forget the merits of my Redeemer; but my Redeemer has said that he will set some on his right hand and some on his left."—He was in gloomy agitation, and said "I'll have no more on't."

—If what has now been stated should be urged by the enemies of Christianity, as if its influence on the mind were not benignant, let it be remembered, that Johnson's temperament was melancholy, of which such direful apprehensions of futurity are often a common effect. We shall presently see, that when he approached nearer to his awful change, his mind became tranquil, and he exhibited as much fortitude as becomes a thinking man in that situation.

From the subject of death we passed to discourse of life, whether it was upon the whole more happy or miserable. Johnson was decidedly for the balance of misery: in confirmation of which I maintained that no man would choose to lead over again the life which he had experienced. Johnson acceded to that opinion in the strongest terms. This is an inquiry often made: and its being a subject of disquisition is a proof that much misery presses upon human feelings; for those who are conscious of a felicity of existence would never hesitate to accept of a repetition of it. I have met with very few who would. I have heard Mr. Burke make use of a very ingenious and plausible argument on this subject: "Every man," said he, "would lead his life over again; for every man is willing to go on and take an addition to his life, which, as he grows older, he has no reason to think will be better, or even so good as what has preceded." I imagine, however, the truth is, that there is a deceitful hope that the next part of life will be free from the pains, and anxieties, and sorrows, which we have already felt. We are for wise purposes "condemned to Hope's delusive mine," as Johnson finely says; and I may also quote the celebrated lines of Dryden, equally philosophical and poetical:—

"When I consider life, 't is all a cheat,
Yet, fool'd with hope, men favour the deceit —
Trust on, and think to-morrow will repay:
To-morrow's falser than the former day;
Lies worse; and, while it says we shall be blest
With some new joys, cuts off what we possess.
Strange cozenage! none would live past years again;
Yet all hope pleasure in what yet remain;
And from the dregs of life think to receive
What the first sprightly running could not give."<sup>1</sup>

It was observed to Dr. Johnson, that it seemed strange that he, who has so often delighted his company by his lively and brilliant conversation, should say he was miserable.

JOHNSON. "Alas! it is all outside; I may be cracking my joke, and cursing the sun. Sun, how I hate thy beams!" I knew not well what to think of this declaration; whether to hold it as a genuine picture of his mind<sup>2</sup>, or as the effect of his persuading himself, contrary to fact, that the position which he had assumed as to human unhappiness was true. We may apply to him a sentence in Mr. Greville's "Maxims, Characters, and Reflections;"<sup>3</sup> a book which is entitled to much more praise than it has received: "Aristarchus is charming; how full of knowledge, of sense, of sentiment. You get him with difficulty to your supper; and after having delighted every body and himself for a few hours, he is obliged to return home; he is finishing his treatise, to prove that unhappiness is the portion of man."<sup>4</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Aurengzebe, act iv. sc. 1. BOSWELL. Auté, p. 218. — C.

<sup>2</sup> Yet there is no doubt that a man may appear very gay in company, who is sad at heart. His merriment is like the sound of drums and trumpets in a battle, to drown the groans of the wounded and dying. — BOSWELL.

<sup>3</sup> Fulke Greville, Esq., of Wellbury, in Wilts, the husband of the authoress of the "Ode to Indifference." — MARLAND.

<sup>4</sup> Here followed a very long note, or rather dissertation, by the Rev. Mr. Churton, on the subject of Johnson's opinion of the misery of human life, which I have thought will be read most conveniently in the Appendix; and, indeed, I only insert it there that my readers may have all Boswell. — CROKER.

CHAPTER LXXX.

1784.

Milton. — Anonymous Writings. — Pope. — David Lewis. — Sackville Parker. — Cook's Voyages. — Barristers. — Lord Hale. — Attornies. — Puns. — "Tommy Townshend." — "The Rehearsal." — Painting. — Cross Readings. — Last Dinner at the Club. — Italy. — Free Will. — Miss Seward. — Lord Chesterfield. — Carleton's Memoirs. — Intuition and Sagacity. — Lord Thurlow. — Country Life. — Mrs. Piozzi's "Anecdotes."

ON Sunday, 13th June, our philosopher was calm at breakfast. There was something exceedingly pleasing in our leading a college life, without restraint and with superior elegance, in consequence of our living in the master's house, and having the company of ladies. Mrs. Kenneicott related, in his presence, a lively saying of Dr. Johnson to Miss Hannah More, who had expressed a wonder that the poet who had written "Paradise Lost," should write such poor sonnets: "Milton, Madam, was a genius that could cut a Colossus from a rock, but could not carve heads upon cherry-stones."

We talked of the casuistical question, "Whether it was allowable at any time to depart from truth?" JOHNSON. "The general rule is, that truth should never be violated, because it is of the utmost importance to the comfort of life that we should have a full security by mutual faith; and occasional inconveniences should be willingly suffered, that we may preserve it. There must, however, be some exceptions. If, for instance, a murderer should ask you which way a man is gone, you may tell him what is not true, because you are under a previous obligation not to betray a man to a murderer." BOSWELL. "Supposing the person who wrote Junius were asked whether he was the author, might he deny it?" JOHNSON. "I don't know what to say to this. If you were sure that he wrote Junius, would you, if he denied it, think as well of him afterwards? Yet it may be urged that what a man has no right to ask, you may refuse to communicate; and there is no other effectual mode of preserving a secret, and an important secret, the discovery of which may be very hurtful to you, but a flat denial; for if you are silent, or hesitate, or evade, it will be held equivalent to a confession. But stay, Sir, here is another case. Supposing the author had told me confidentially that he had written Junius, and I were asked if he had, I should hold myself at liberty to deny it, as being under a previous promise, express or implied, to conceal it. Now what I ought to do for the author, may I not do for myself? But I deny the lawfulness of telling a lie to a sick man, for fear of alarming him.<sup>1</sup> You have no business with consequences; you are to tell the truth. Besides, you are not sure what effect your telling him that he is in danger may have. It may bring his distemper to a crisis, and that may cure him. Of all lying, I have the greatest abhorrence of this, because I believe it has been frequently practised on myself."

I cannot help thinking that there is much weight in the opinion of those who have held that truth, as an eternal and immutable principle, ought upon no account whatever to be violated, from supposed previous or superior obligations, of which every man being to judge for himself, there is great danger that we too often, from partial motives, persuade ourselves that they exist; and probably, whatever extraordinary instances may sometimes occur, where some evil may be prevented by violating this noble principle, it would be found that human happiness would, upon the whole, be more perfect were truth universally preserved.

In the notes to the "Dunciad," we find the following verses addressed to Pope<sup>2</sup>:

- "While malice, Pope, denies thy page
Its own celestial fire;
While critics, and while bards in rage,
Admiring, won't admire:
- "While wayward pens thy worth assail,
And envious tongues decry;
These times, though many a friend bewail,
These times bewail not I.
- "But when the world's loud praise is thine,
And spleen no more shall blame;
When with thy Homer thou shalt shine
In one establish'd fame —
- "When none shall rail, and every lay
Devote a wreath to thee;
That day (for come it will) that day
Shall I lament to see."

It is surely not a little remarkable that they should appear without a name. Miss Seward, knowing Dr. Johnson's almost universal and minute literary information, signified a desire that I should ask him who was the author. He was prompt with his answer:—"Why, Sir, they were written by one Lewis, who was either under-master or an usher of Westminster-school and published a Miscellany, in which 'Grongar Hill' first came out."<sup>3</sup> John-

<sup>1</sup> See on this point, Sir Henry Hallford's Essays, p. 79., and Archbishop Secker's Sermons, vol. v. 153. — MARKLAND.

<sup>2</sup> The annotator calls them "amiable verses." — BOSWELL. The annotator was Pope himself. — CHURCH.

<sup>3</sup> Lewis's verses addressed to Pope (as Mr. Bindley suggests to me) were first published in a collection of Pieces in Verse and Prose on occasion of "The Dunciad," 8vo. 1729. They are there called an Epigram. In that miscellany the beautiful poem "Away, let nought to love displeasing," (reprinted in Percy's Reliques, l. iii. 14.) first appeared; and is there said to be a translation from the Ancient British. Lewis was author of "Philip of Macedon," a tragedy, published in 1727, and dedicated to Pope; and in 1730 he published a second volume of miscellaneous poems. As Dr. Johnson settled in London not long after the verses addressed to Pope first appeared, he probably then obtained some information concern-son praised them highly, and repeated them with a noble animation. In the twelfth line, instead of "one established fame," he repeated "one unclouded flame," which he thought was the reading in former editions; but I believe was a flash of his own genius. It is much more poetical than the other.

On Monday, 14th June, and Tuesday, 15th, Dr. Johnson and I dined, on one of them, I forget which, with Mr. Mickle, translator of the "Lusiad," at Wheatley, a very pretty country place a few miles from Oxford; and on the other with Dr. Wetherell, Master of University College. From Dr. Wetherell's he went to visit Mr. Sackville Parker, the bookseller; and when he returned to us gave the following account of his visit, saying, "I have been to see my old friend, Sack. Parker; I find he has married his maid; he has done right. She had lived with him many years in great confidence, and they had mingled minds; I do not think he could have found any wife that would have made him so happy. The woman was very attentive and civil to me; she pressed me to fix a day for dining with them, and to say what I liked, and she would be sure to get it for me. Poor Sack! he is very ill indeed.<sup>1</sup> We parted as never to meet again. It has quite broken me down." This pathetic narrative was strangely diversified with the grave and earnest defence of a man's having married his maid. I could not but feel it as in some degree ludicrous.

In the morning of Tuesday, 15th of June, while we sat at Dr. Adams's, we talked of a printed letter from the Reverend Herbert Croft, to a young gentleman who had been his pupil, in which he advised him to read to the end of whatever books he should begin to read. JOHNSON. "This is surely a strange advice; you may as well resolve that whatever men you happen to get acquainted with, you are to keep to them for life. A book may be good for nothing; or there may be only one thing in it worth knowing; are we to read it all through? These Voyages, (pointing to the three large volumes of 'Voyages to the South Sea' which were just come out) who will read them through? A man had better work his way before the mast than read them through; they will be eaten by rats and mice, before they are read through. There can be little entertainment in such books; one set of savages is like another." BOSWELL. "I do not think the people of Otaheite can be reckoned savages."

ing their author, David Lewis, whom he has described as an usher of Westminster-school; yet the Dean of Westminster, who has been pleased to make some inquiry on this subject, has not found any vestige of his having ever been employed in this situation. A late writer ("Environns of London," iv. 171.) supposed that the following inscription in the churchyard of the church of Low Leyton, in Essex, was intended to commemorate this poet: "Sacred to the memory of David Lewis, Esq., who died the 8th day of April, 1760, aged 77 years; a great favourite of the Muses, as his many excellent pieces in poetry sufficiently testify."

<sup>1</sup> *Inspired verse may on this marble live,
But can no honour to thy ashes give.*"—

JOHNSON. "Don't cant in defence of savages." BOSWELL. "They have the art of navigation." JOHNSON. "A dog or cat can swim." BOSWELL. "They carve very ingeniously." JOHNSON. "A cat can scratch, and a child with a nail can scratch." I perceived this was none of the mollia tempora fandi; so desisted.

Upon his mentioning that when he came to college he wrote his first exercise twice over, but never did so afterwards:—MISS ADAMS. "I suppose, Sir, you could not make them better?" JOHNSON. "Yes, Madam, to be sure, I could make them better. Thought is better than no thought." MISS ADAMS. "Do you think, Sir, you could make your Ramblers better?" JOHNSON. "Certainly I could." BOSWELL. "I'll lay a bet, Sir, you cannot." JOHNSON. "But I will, Sir, if I choose. I shall make the best of them you shall pick out, better." BOSWELL. "But you may add to them. I will not allow of that." JOHNSON. "Nay, Sir, there are three ways of making them better; putting out, adding, or correcting."

During our visit at Oxford, the following conversation passed between him and me on the subject of my trying my fortune at the English bar. Having asked whether a very extensive acquaintance in London, which was very valuable, and of great advantage to a man at large, might not be prejudicial to a lawyer, by preventing him from giving sufficient attention to his business? JOHNSON. "Sir, you will attend to business as business lays hold of you. When not actually employed, you may see your friends as much as you do now. You may dine at a club every day, and sup with one of the members every night; and you may be as much at public places as one who has seen them all would wish to be. But you must take care to attend constantly in Westminster Hall; both to mind your business, as it is almost all learnt there (for nobody reads now), and to show that you want to have business. And you must not be too often seen at public places, that competitors may not have it to say, 'He is always at the playhouse or at Ranelagh, and never to be found at his chambers.' And, Sir, there must be a kind of solemnity in the manner of a professional man. I have nothing particular to say to you on the subject. All this I should say to any one; I should have said it to Lord Thurlow twenty years ago."

The profession may probably think this re-

But it appears to me improbable that this monument was erected for the author of the verses to Pope, and of the tragedy already mentioned: the language both of the dedication prefixed to that piece, and of the dedication addressed to the Earl of Shaftesbury, and prefixed to the Miscellanies, 1730, denoting a person who moved in a lower sphere than this Essex squire seems to have done.—MALONE. The addition of Esquire in this inscription is surely no evidence that Lewis was what is called a country Squire.—CROKER, 1847

<sup>1</sup> Parker, however, survived Johnson twelve years, dying at Oxford in his eighty-ninth year, Dec. 10. 1796.—MALONE.

<sup>2</sup> Cook's Voyages.—CROKER.

presentation of what is required in a barrister who would hope for success, to be much too indulgent; but certain it is, that as some of the lawyers of this age who have risen high have by no means thought it absolutely necessary to submit to that long and painful course of study which a Plowden, a Coke, and a Hale considered as requisite. My respected friend, Mr. Langton, has shown me, in the handwriting of his grandfather, a curious account of a conversation which he had with Lord Chief Justice Hale<sup>1</sup>, in which that great man tells him, "That for two years after he came to the inn of court, he studied sixteen hours a day; however, his lordship added, that by this intense application he almost brought himself to his grave, though he were of a very strong constitution, and after reduced himself to eight hours; but that he would not advise any body to so much; that he thought six hours a day, with attention and constancy, was sufficient; that a man must use his body as he would his horse, and his stomach; not tire him at once, but rise with an appetite."

"The wits of Charles found easier ways to fame,"

On Wednesday, June 16., Dr. Johnson and I returned to London: he was not well to-day, and said very little, employing himself chiefly in reading Euripides. He expressed some displeasure at me for not observing sufficiently the various objects upon the road. "If I had your eyes, Sir," said he, "I should count the passengers." It was wonderful how accurate his observation of visual objects was, notwithstanding his imperfect eyesight, owing to a habit of attention. That he was much satisfied with the respect paid to him at Dr. Adams's is thus attested by himself: "I returned last night from Oxford, after a fortnight's abode with Dr. Adams, who treated me as well as I could expect or wish; and he that contents a sick man, a man whom it is impossible to please, has surely done his part well."<sup>2</sup>

After his return to London from this excursion, I saw him frequently, but have few memorandums; I shall therefore here insert some particulars which I collected at various times.

The Reverend Mr. Astle, of Ashbourne, in Derbyshire, brother to the learned and ingenious Thomas Astle, Esq., was from his early years known to Dr. Johnson, who obligingly advised him as to his studies, and recommended to him the following books, of which a list which he has been pleased to communicate lies before me, in Johnson's own handwriting:—

"Universal History (ancient)—Rollin's Ancient History—Puffendorf's Introduction to History—

Vertot's History of Knights of Malta—Vertot's Revolution of Portugal—Vertot's Revolution of Sweden—Carte's History of England—Present State of England—Geographical Grammar—Prideaux's Connexion—Nelson's Feasts and Fasts—Duty of Man—Gentleman's Religion—Clarendon's History—Watts's Improvement of the Mind—Watts's Logic—Nature Displayed—Lowth's English Grammar—Blackwall on the Classics—Sherlock's Sermons—Burnet's Life of Hale—Dupin's History of the Church—Shuckford's Connexions—Law's Serious Call—Walton's Complete Angler—Sandys's Travels—Sprat's History of the Royal Society—England's Gazetteer—Goldsmith's Roman History—Some Commentaries on the Bible."

It having been mentioned to Dr. Johnson that a gentleman who had a son whom he imagined to have an extreme degree of timidity, resolved to send him to a public school, that he might acquire confidence: "Sir," said Johnson, "this is a preposterous expedient for removing his infirmity; such a disposition should be cultivated in the shade. Placing him at a public school is forcing an owl upon day."

Speaking of a gentleman whose house was much frequented by low company: "Rags, Sir," said he, "will always make their appearance where they have a right to do it."

Of the same gentleman's mode of living, he said, "Sir, the servants, instead of doing what they are bid, stand round the table in idle clusters, gaping upon the guests; and seem as unfit to attend a company, as to steer a man of war."

A dull country magistrate gave Johnson a long, tedious account of his exercising his criminal jurisdiction, the result of which was his having sentenced four convicts to transportation. Johnson, in an agony of impatience to get rid of such a companion, exclaimed, "I heartily wish, Sir, that I were a fifth."

Johnson was present when a tragedy was read, in which there occurred this line:

"Who rules o'er freemen should himself be free."

The company having admired it much, "I cannot agree with you," said Johnson: "it might as well be said,

"Who drives fat oxen should himself be fat."

He was pleased with the kindness of Mr. Cator, who was joined with him in Mr. Thrale's important trust, and thus describes him: "There is much good in his character, and much usefulness in his knowledge." He found a cordial salace at that gentleman's seat at Beckenham, in Kent, which is indeed one of the finest places at which I ever was a guest; and where I find more and more a hospitable welcome.

<sup>1</sup> This interesting conversation is given at length, in Seaward's "Anecdotes of distinguished Persons," vol. iv. p. 489.—MARKLAND.

<sup>2</sup> He adds, "I went in the common vehicle, with very little fatigue, and came back, I think, with less."—CROKER.

Johnson seldom encouraged general censure of any profession; but he was willing to allow a due share of merit to the various departments necessary in civilised life. In a splenetic, sarcastical, or jocular frame of mind, however, he would sometimes utter a pointed saying of that nature. One instance has been mentioned [p. 219.], where he gave a sudden satirical stroke to the character of an attorney. The too indiscriminate admission to that employment, which requires both abilities and integrity, has given rise to injurious reflections, which are totally inapplicable to many very respectable men who exercise it with reputation and honour.

Johnson having argued for some time with a pertinacious gentleman; his opponent, who had talked in a very puzzling manner, happened to say, "I don't understand you, Sir;" upon which Johnson observed, "Sir, I have found you an argument; but I am not obliged to find you an understanding."

Talking to me of Horry Walpole (as Horace, now Earl of Orford, was often called), Johnson allowed that he got together a great many curious little things, and told them in an elegant manner. Mr. Walpole thought Johnson a more amiable character after reading his Letters to Mrs. Thrale: but never was one of the true admirers of that great man.<sup>1</sup> We may suppose a prejudice conceived, if he ever heard Johnson's account to Sir George Staunton, that when he made speeches in parliament for the Gentleman's Magazine, "he always took care to put Sir Robert Walpole in the wrong, and to say every thing he could against the electorate of Hanover." The celebrated Heroic Epistle, in which Johnson is satirically introduced, has been ascribed both to Mr. Walpole and Mr. Mason. One day at Mr. Courtenay's, when a gentleman expressed his opinion that there was more energy in that poem than could be expected from Mr. Walpole; Mr. Warton, the late laureate, observed,

"It may have been written by Walpole, and buckram'd by Mason."<sup>2</sup>

He disapproved of Lord Hailes, for having modernised the language of the ever memorable John Hales of Eton<sup>3</sup>, in an edition which his lordship published of that writer's works. "An author's language, Sir," said he, "is a characteristic part of his composition, and is also characteristic of the age in which he writes. Besides, Sir, when the language is changed, we are not sure that the sense is the same. No, Sir: I am sorry Lord Hailes has done this."

Here it may be observed, that his frequent use of the expression, No, Sir, was not always to intimate contradiction: for he would say so when he was about to enforce an affirmative proposition which had not been denied, as in the instance last mentioned. I used to consider it as a kind of flag of defiance; as if he had said, "Any argument you may offer against this is not just. No, Sir, it is not." It was like Falstaff's "I deny your major."<sup>4</sup>

Sir Joshua Reynolds having said that he took the altitude of a man's taste by his stories and his wit, and of his understanding by the remarks which he repeated; being always sure that he must be a weak man who quotes common things with an emphasis as if they were oracles;—Johnson agreed with him; and Sir Joshua having also observed that the real character of a man was found out by his amusements, Johnson added, "Yes, Sir; no man is a hypocrite in his pleasures."

I have mentioned Johnson's general aversion to a pun. He once, however, endured one of mine. When we were talking of a numerous company in which he had distinguished himself highly, I said, "Sir, you were a cod surrounded by smelts. Is not this enough for you? at a time too when you were not fishing for a compliment?" He laughed at this with a complacent approbation. Old Mr. Sheridan observed, upon my mentioning it to him, "He liked your compliment so well, he was willing to take it with pun sauce." For my own part, I think no in-

<sup>1</sup> In his Posthumous Works he has spoken of Johnson in the most contemptuous manner!—MALONE. In a letter to Mr. Cole, published since Mr. Malone's death, Walpole says, "I have no thirst to know the rest of my contemporaries, from the absurd bombast of Dr. Johnson down to the silly Dr. Goldsmith. Though the latter changeling has had bright gleams of parts, and the former had sense till he changed it for words and sold it for a pension."—27th April, 1773. The expression is smart and epigrammatic, but has, as relates to Johnson, little meaning. Johnson's sense and verbosity were contemporaneous. Indeed, his later works have fewer hard words than his first publications; so that at least he did not "change sense for words." As to the pension, it has been shown that Johnson did not sell his principles for it; but, at all events, he did not "sell his sense" in the meaning of parting with it. And the Quarterly Review on Walpole's Memoirs (March, 1822) proves that though he talked and wrote in strains of high disinterestedness, he was the last man who ought to have charged another with any scandal change either of principles or language. As to Goldsmith, Walpole had before happily characterised him as an "inspired idiot." In his recently published Memoirs of George III., in which he, according to his wont, abuses every body, he took occasion, on the subject of the pamphlet on the Falkland Islands, to draw the following caricature of Johnson:—

"With a lumber of learning and some strong parts, Johnson was an odious and mean character. By principle a Jacobite arrogant, self-sufficient, and overbearing by nature; ungrateful through pride, and of feminine bigotry; he had prostituted his pen to party even in a dictionary, and had afterwards, for a pension, contradicted his own definitions. His manners were sordid, supercilious, and brutal; his style ridiculously bombastic and vicious; and, in one word, with all the pedantry he had all the gigantic littleness of a country schoolmaster."—Memoirs, iv. 297.—CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> I have already said, anté, p. 325. n. 4, that my opinion is rather that Walpole supplied the points, and Mason the poetry.—CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> John Hales, fellow of Eton, was an eminent scholar and divine, and a suffering loyalist under the Commonwealth; but I think he owes the title of ever memorable, by which he is distinguished, to his being, by the partiality of a friend-editor, Bishop Pearson, so styled in the title-page to his Golden Remains, published in 1659.—CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> Sir James Mackintosh remembers that while spending the Christmas of 1793 at Beaconsfield, Mr. Burke said to him "Johnson showed more powers of mind in company than in his writings; but he argued only for victory; and when he had neither a paradox to defend, nor an antagonist to crush he would preface his assent with Why, no, Sir."—CROKER.

nocent species of wit or pleasantry should be suppressed; and that a good pun may be admitted among the smaller excellencies of lively conversation.

Had Johnson treated at large De Claris Oratoribus, he might have given us an admirable work. When the Duke of Bedford attacked the ministry as vehemently as he could, for having taken upon them to extend the time for the importation of corn, Lord Chatham, in his first speech in the House of Lords, boldly avowed himself to be an adviser of that measure. "My colleagues," said he, "as I was confined by indisposition, did me the signal honour of coming to the bedside of a sick man, to ask his opinion. But, had they not thus condescended, I should have taken up my bed and walked, in order to have delivered that opinion at the Council-board." Mr. Langton, who was present, mentioned this to Johnson, who observed, "Now, Sir, we see that he took these words as he found them, without considering, that though the expression in Scripture, Take up thy bed and walk, strictly suited the instance of the sick man restored to health and strength, who would of course be supposed to carry his bed with him, it could not be proper in the case of a man who was lying in a state of feebleness, and who certainly would not add to the difficulty of moving at all, that of carrying his bed."<sup>1</sup>

When I pointed out to him in the newspaper one of Mr. Grattan's animated and glowing speeches in favour of the freedom of Ireland, in which this expression occurred (I know not if accurately taken): "We will persevere, till there is not one link of the English chain left to clank upon the rags of the meanest beggar in Ireland!"—"Nay, Sir," said Johnson, "don't you perceive that one link cannot clank?"

Mrs. Thrale has published, as Johnson's, a kind of parody or counterpart of a fine poetical passage in one of Mr. Burke's speeches on American taxation. It is vigorously but somewhat coarsely executed; and, I am inclined to suppose, is not quite correctly exhibited. I hope he did not use the words "vile agents" for the Americans in the House of Parliament; and if he did so, in an extempore effusion, I wish the lady had not committed it to writing.

Mr. Burke uniformly showed Johnson the greatest respect; and—when Mr. Townshend, now Lord Sydney, at a period when he was conspicuous in opposition, threw out some reflection in parliament upon the grant of a pension to a man of such political principles as Johnson—Mr. Burke, though then of the same party with Mr. Townshend, stood warmly forth in defence of his friend, to whom, he justly observed, the pension was granted solely on account of his eminent literary merit. I am well assured, that Mr. Townshend's attack upon Johnson was the occasion of his "hitching in a rhyme;" for that in the original copy of Goldsmith's character of Mr. Burke, in his "Retaliation," another person's name stood in the couplet where Mr. Townshend is now introduced:

"Though fraught with all learning yet straining his throat,
To persuade Tommy Townshend to lend him a vote."<sup>2</sup>

It may be worth remarking, among the minutiae of my collection, that Johnson was once drawn to serve in the militia, the trained bands of the city of London, and that Mr. Rackstrow, of the museum in Fleet Street, was his colonel. It may be believed he did not serve in person; but the idea, with all its circumstances, is certainly laughable. He upon that occasion provided himself with a musket, and with a sword and belt, which I have seen hanging in his closet.

He was very constant to those whom he once employed, if they gave him no reason to be displeased. When somebody talked of being imposed on in the purchase of tea and sugar, and such articles: "That will not be the case," said he, "if you go to a stately shop, as I always do. In such a shop it is not worth their while to take a petty advantage."

An author of most anxious and restless vanity<sup>3</sup> being mentioned;—"Sir," said he, "there is not a young sapling upon Parnassus more severely blown about by every wind of criticism than that poor fellow."

The difference, he observed, between a well-bred and an ill-bred man is this: "One immediately attracts your liking, the other your aversion. You love the one till you find reason to hate him; you hate the other till you find reason to love him."

The wife of one of his acquaintance had fraudulently made a purse for herself out of her husband's fortune. Feeling a proper compunction in her last moments, she confessed how much she had secreted; but before she could tell where it was placed, she was seized with a convulsive fit and expired. Her husband said, he was more hurt by her want of confidence in him, than by the loss of his money. "I told him," said Johnson, "that he should console himself; for perhaps the money might be found, and he was sure that his wife was gone."<sup>4</sup>

A foppish physician once reminded Johnson of his having been in company with him on a

<sup>1</sup> Lord Chatham may have meant to say, in his strong hyperbolical style, that his desire to do that great duty would have operated a miracle on him; so that Johnson's remark seems hypercritical. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> I rather believe that it was in consequence of his persisting in clearing the gallery of the House of Commons, in spite of the earnest remonstrances of Burke and Fox, one evening when Garrick was present. — Macmillan. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> Probably Mr. Perceval Stockdale. See ante, p. 213. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> Lady Knight tells this story in the European Mag. 1759, but does not call the lady the wife of one of his acquaintance. — CROKER.

former occasion: "I do not remember it, Sir." The physician still insisted; adding that he that day wore so fine a coat that it must have attracted his notice. "Sir," said Johnson, "had you been dipped in Pactolus, I should not have noticed you."

He seemed to take a pleasure in speaking in his own style; for when he had carelessly missed it, he would repeat the thought translated into it. Talking of the comedy of "The Rehearsal," he said, "It has not wit enough to keep it sweet." This was easy;—he therefore caught himself, and pronounced a more round sentence: "It has not vitality enough to preserve it from putrefaction."

He censured a writer of entertaining travels for assuming a feigned character, saying (in his sense of the word), "He carries out one lie; we know not how many he brings back."<sup>1</sup> At another time, talking of the same person, he observed, "Sir, your assent to a man whom you have never known to falsify is a debt; but after you have known a man to falsify, your assent to him then is a favour."

Though he had no taste for painting, he admired much the manner in which Sir Joshua Reynolds treated of his art, in his "Discourses to the Royal Academy." He observed one day of a passage in them, "I think I might as well have said this myself;" and once when Mr. Langton was sitting by him, he read one of them very eagerly, and expressed himself thus: "Very well, Master Reynolds; very well, indeed. But it will not be understood."

When I observed to him that Painting was so far inferior to Poetry, that the story or even emblem which it communicates must be previously known, and mentioned as a natural and laughable instance of this, that a little miss, on seeing a picture of Justice with the scales, had exclaimed to me, "See, there's a woman selling sweetmeats;" he said, "Painting, Sir, can illustrate, but cannot inform."

No man was more ready to make an apology when he had censured unjustly than Johnson. When a proof-sheet of one of his works was brought to him, he found fault with the mode in which a part of it was arranged, refused to read it, and in a passion, desired that the compositor<sup>2</sup> might be sent to him. The compositor was Mr. Manning, a decent sensible man, who had composed about one half of his "Dictionary," when in Mr. Strahan's printing-house; and a great part of his "Lives of the Poets," when in that of Mr. Nichols; and who

(in his seventy-seventh year) when in Mr. Baldwin's printing-house, composed a part of the first edition of this work concerning him. By producing the manuscript, he at once satisfied Dr. Johnson that he was not to blame. Upon which Johnson candidly and earnestly said to him, "Mr. Compositor, I ask your pardon; Mr. Compositor, I ask your pardon, again and again."

His generous humanity to the miserable was almost beyond example. The following instance is well attested: coming home late one night, he found a poor woman lying in the street, so much exhausted that she could not walk; he took her upon his back and carried her to his house, where he discovered that she was one of those wretched females who had fallen into the lowest state of vice, poverty, and disease. Instead of harshly upbraiding her, he had her taken care of with all tenderness for a long time, at a considerable expense, till she was restored to health, and endeavoured to put her into a virtuous way of living.<sup>3</sup>

He thought Mr. Caleb Whitefoord singularly happy in hitting on the signature of Papyrius Cursor to his ingenious and diverting Cross Readings of the newspapers<sup>4</sup>; it being a real name of an ancient Roman, and clearly expressive of the thing done in this lively conceit.

He once in his life was known to have uttered what is called a bull: Sir Joshua Reynolds, when they were riding together in Devonshire, complained that he had a very bad horse, for that even when going down hill he moved slowly step by step. "Ay," said Johnson, "and when he goes up hill he stands still."

He had a great aversion to gesticulating in company. He called once to a gentleman who offended him in that point, "Don't attitudinise." And when another gentleman thought he was giving additional force to what he uttered by expressive movements of his hand, Johnson fairly seized them, and held them down.

An author of considerable eminence<sup>5</sup> having engrossed a good share of the conversation in the company of Johnson, and having said nothing but what was trifling and insignificant, Johnson, when he was gone, observed to us "It is wonderful what a difference there sometimes is between a man's powers of writing and of talking. — writes with great spirit, but is a poor talker: had he held his tongue, you might have supposed him to have been restrained by modesty; but he has spoken

<sup>1</sup> I suppose the Reverend Martin Sherlock, an Irish clergyman, who published, in 1781, his own travels under the title of "Letters of an English Traveller, translated from the French," which Johnson calls a lie. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>2</sup> Compositor in the printing-house means, the person who adjusts the types in the order in which they are to stand for printing; and arranges what is called the form, from which an impression is taken. — BOSWELL.

<sup>3</sup> The circumstance therefore alluded to in Mr. Courtenay's "Poetical Character" of him is strictly true. My informant was Mrs. Desmoulins, who lived many years in Dr. Johnson's house. — BOSWELL.

<sup>4</sup> He followed his Cross Readings by a still more witty paper on the Errors of the Press. These two laughable essays are preserved in the "Foundling Hospital for Wit." — CROKER.

<sup>5</sup> This was Sir Richard Musgrave, an Irish Baronet, author of a History of the Rebellion of 1798, whom I knew intimately, and who had, it must be confessed, a great eagerness of manner. One day, when Sir Richard was urging me with singular warmth to write the lives of the prose writers and getting up to enforce his suit, Johnson coldly replied "Sit down, Sir." — Pizzoni, p. 225. — CROKER.

<sup>6</sup> Probably Dr. Robertson. Ante, p. 611. n. 2. — CROKER.

reat deal to-day, and you have heard what suff it was."

A gentleman having said that a congé d'élire is not, perhaps, the force of a command, but may be considered only as a strong recommendation:—"Sir," replied Johnson, who overheard him, "it is such a recommendation, as if I should throw you out of a two-pair-of-airs window, and recommend to you to fall off."<sup>1</sup>

Mr. Steevens, who passed many a social hour with him during their long acquaintance, which commenced when they both lived in the Temple, has preserved a good number of particulars concerning him, most of which are to be found in the department of Apophthegms<sup>2</sup>, &c. in the collection of "Johnson's Works." But he has been pleased to favour me with the following, which are original:—

"One evening, previous to the trial of Baretta, consultation of his friends was held at the house of Mr. Cox, the solicitor, in Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane. Among others present were Mr. Burke and Dr. Johnson, who differed in sentiments concerning the tendency of some part of the defence the prisoner was to make. When the meeting was over, Mr. Steevens observed that the question between him and his friend had been agitated with their too much warmth. 'It may be so, Sir,' replied the doctor, 'for Burke and I should have been of one opinion if we had had no audience.'<sup>3</sup>

"Dr. Johnson once assumed a character in which perhaps even Mr. Boswell never saw him. His curiosity having been excited by the praises bestowed on the celebrated Torrè's fireworks at Marybone Gardens, he desired Mr. Steevens to accompany him thither. The evening had proved showery, and soon after the few people present were assembled, public notice was given that the conductors of the wheels, suns, stars, &c. were so thoroughly water-soaked that it was impossible any part of the exhibition should be made. 'This is a mere excuse,' says the doctor, 'to save their crackers a more profitable company. Let us both hold our sticks and threaten to break those coloured raps that surround the orchestra, and we shall soon have our wishes gratified. The core of the fireworks cannot be injured; let the different pieces be touched in their respective centres, and they will set their offices as well as ever.' Some young men, who overheard him, immediately began the violence he had recommended, and an attempt was speedily made to fire some of the wheels which appeared to have received the smallest damage; but to little purpose were they lighted, for most of them completely failed. The author of 'The Rambler,' however, may be considered on this occasion as the ring-leader of a successful riot, though not as a skilful pyrotechnist.

"It has been supposed that Dr. Johnson, so far as fashion was concerned, was careless of his appearance in public. But this is not altogether true, as the following slight instance may show:—Goldsmith's last comedy was to be represented during some court-mourning<sup>4</sup>, and Mr. Steevens appointed to call on Dr. Johnson, and carry him to the tavern where he was to dine with other of the poet's friends. The doctor was ready dressed, but in coloured clothes; yet being told that he would find every one else in black, received the intelligence with a profusion of thanks, hastened to change his attire, all the while repeating his gratitude for the information that had saved him from an appearance so improper in the front row of a front box. 'I would not,' added he, 'for ten pounds have seemed so retrograde to any general observance.'

"He would sometimes find his dislikes on very slender circumstances. Happening one day to mention Mr. Flexman, a dissenting minister, with some compliment to his exact memory in chronological matters; the doctor replied, 'Let me hear no more of him, Sir. That is the fellow who made the index to my Ramblers, and set down the name of Milton thus:—Milton, Mr. John.'

Mr. Steevens adds to this testimony:

"It is unfortunate, however, for Johnson, that his particularities and frailties can be more distinctly traced than his good and amiable exertions. Could the many bounties he studiously concealed, the many acts of humanity he performed in private, be displayed with equal circumstantiality, his defects would be so far lost in the blaze of his virtues, that the latter only would be regarded."

Though, from my very high admiration of Johnson, I have wondered that he was not courted by all the great and all the eminent persons of his time, it ought fairly to be considered, that no man of humble birth, who lived entirely by literature, in short, no author by profession, ever rose in this country into that personal notice which he did. In the course of this work a numerous variety of names has been mentioned, to which many might be added. I cannot omit Lord and Lady Lucan, at whose house he often enjoyed all that an elegant table and the best company can contribute to happiness: he found hospitality united with extraordinary accomplishments, and embellished with charms of which no man could be insensible.

On Tuesday, June 22, I dined with him at the Literary Club, the last time of his being in that respectable society. The other members present were the Bishop of St. Asaph, Lord Eliot, <sup>1</sup> This has been printed in other publications "fall to the pound." But Johnson himself gave me the true expression, which he had used as above; meaning that the recommendation left as little choice in the one case as the other. — SWELL.

<sup>2</sup> This is Hawkins's collection of Anecdotes. Several of them I have already given in their proper places, and regret that I have not room for all. — CROKER, 1817.

<sup>3</sup> What an extraordinary assertion, that in a matter in which the life and death — nay, the ignominious death — of a friend was at stake, he still talked for victory! I have seen so much reason to distrust anecdotes told from memory, particularly by one in whom those who knew him best placed the least confidence, (ant., p. 590, 717.), that I hesitate to give implicit credit to this story. Dr. Johnson, no doubt, too often talked for victory, but not, it is to be hoped, on so serious an occasion. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> "She Stoops to Conquer," first acted in March, 1773, during a court-mourning for the king of Sardinia. — CROKER.

Lord Palmerston, Dr. Fordyce, and Mr. Malone. He looked ill, but had such a manly fortitude, that he did not trouble the company with melancholy complaints. They all showed evident marks of kind concern about him, with which he was much pleased, and he exerted himself to be as entertaining as his indisposition allowed him.

The anxiety of his friends to preserve so estimable a life as long as human means might be supposed to have influence, made them plan for him a retreat from the severity of a British winter to the mild climate of Italy. This scheme was at last brought to a serious resolution at General Paoli's, where I had often talked of it. One essential matter, however, I understood, was necessary to be previously settled, which was obtaining such an addition to his income as would be sufficient to enable him to defray the expense in a manner becoming the first literary character of a great nation, and, independent of all his other merits, the author of the "Dictionary of the English Language." The person to whom I above all others thought I should apply to negotiate this business was the Lord Chancellor, because I knew that he highly valued Johnson, and that Johnson highly valued his lordship, so that it was no degradation of my illustrious friend to solicit for him the favour of such a man. I have mentioned [p. 717.] what Johnson said of him to me when he was at the bar; and after his lordship was advanced to the seals, he said of him, "I would prepare myself for no man in England but Lord Thurlow. When I am to meet with him, I should wish to know a day before." How he would have prepared himself, I cannot conjecture. Would he have selected certain topics, and considered them in every view, so as to be in readiness to argue them at all points? And what may we suppose those topics to have been? I once started the curious inquiry to the great man who was the subject of this compliment: he smiled, but did not pursue it.<sup>1</sup>

I first consulted with Sir Joshua Reynolds, who perfectly coincided in opinion with me; and I therefore, though personally very little known to his lordship, wrote to him, stating the case, and requesting his good offices for Dr. Johnson. I mentioned that I was obliged to set out for Scotland early in the following week, so that if his lordship should have any commands for me as to this pious negotiation, he would be pleased to send them before that time, otherwise Sir Joshua Reynolds would give all attention to it."<sup>2</sup>

[BOSWELL TO LORD THURLOW.

"General Paoli's, Upper Seymour Street, Portman Square, June 24. 1784.

"MY LORD,—Dr. Samuel Johnson, though wonderfully recovered from a complication of dangerous illness, is by no means well, and I have reason to think that his valuable life cannot be preserved long without the benignant influence of a southern climate.

"It would therefore be of very great moment were he to go to Italy before winter sets in; and know he wishes it much. But the objection is that his pension of three hundred pounds a year would not be sufficient to defray his expense, ar make it convenient for M. Sastres, an ingenious and worthy native of that country, and a teacher of Italian here, to accompany him.

"As I am well assured of your lordship's regard for Dr. Johnson, I presume, without his knowledge, so far to indulge my anxious concern for him, as to intrude upon your lordship with the suggestion, being persuaded that if a representation of the matter were made to his majesty by proper authority, the royal bounty would be extended in a suitable manner.

"Your lordship, I cannot doubt, will forgive me for taking this liberty. I even flatter myself you will approve of it. I am to set out for Scotland on Monday morning, so that if your lordship should have any commands for me as to this pious negotiation, you will be pleased to send them before that time. But Sir Joshua Reynolds, with whom I have consulted, will be here, and will gladly give all attention to it. I am, &c., —Reyn. MSS. "JAMES BOSWELL."

This application was made not only without any suggestion on the part of Johnson himself but was utterly unknown to him, nor had the smallest suspicion of it. Any insinuation therefore, which since his death have been thrown out, as if he had stooped to ask what were superfluous, are without any foundation. But, had he asked it, it would not have been superfluous; for though the money he had saved proved to be more than his friends imagined, or than I believe he himself, in his carelessness concerning worldly matters, knew it to be, had he travelled upon the continent, an augmentation of his income would by no means have been unnecessary.

On Wednesday, June 23., I visited him the morning, after having been present at a shocking sight<sup>3</sup> of fifteen men executed before <sup>1</sup> As this was not said to Mr. Boswell himself, I venture to disbelieve that it was said at all. It is very nearly nonsense, and the kind of nonsense the least like any thing that Dr. Johnson could say. Mr. Boswell, it seems, repeated the story to Lord Thurlow, and his Lordship "smiled"—perhaps at so direct and awkward an attempt at flattery.—CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> It is strange that Sir John Hawkins should have related that the application was made by Sir Joshua Reynolds, when he could so easily have been informed of the truth by inquiring of Sir Joshua. Sir John's carelessness to ascertain facts is very remarkable.—BOSWELL. Mr. Boswell is, as usual, unjust towards Hawkins. Johnson's own letter of thanks to Lord Thurlow mentions Sir Joshua as the channel of communication on the subject, and does not allude to Boswell, so that Hawkins had no reason to suspect that Boswell had any thing to do with it; and we shall see, by and by, the reason to suspect that Sir Joshua did not wish that Boswell's name should appear in the transaction. I cannot guess why Mr. Boswell did not print his own letter to Lord Thurlow, which is now given from a copy in his hand, in the Reynolds Papers.—CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> A shocking sight indeed!—but Mr. Boswell was not of enjoying those shocking sights, which yet, he said, "elicited his mind."—CROKER.

Newgate. I said to him, I was sure that human life was not machinery, that is to say, a chain of fatality planned and directed by the Supreme Being, as it had in it so much wickedness and misery, so many instances of both, as that by which my mind was now clouded. Were it machinery, it would be better than it is in these respects, though less noble, as not being a system of moral government. He agreed with me now, as he always did, upon the great question of the liberty of the human will, which has been in all ages perplexed with so much sophistry: "But, Sir, as to the doctrine of necessity, no man believes it. If a man should give me arguments that I do not see, though I could not answer them, should I believe that I do not see?" It will be observed, that Johnson at all times made the just distinction between doctrines contrary to reason, and doctrines above reason.

Talking of the religious discipline proper for unhappy convicts, he said, "Sir, one of our regular clergy will probably not impress their minds sufficiently: they should be attended by a methodist preacher<sup>1</sup>, or a popish priest." Let me however observe, in justice to the Reverend Mr. Vilette, who has been ordinary of Newgate for no less than eighteen years, in the course of which he has attended many hundreds of wretched criminals, that his earnest and humane exhortations have been very effectual. His extraordinary diligence is highly praiseworthy, and merits a distinguished reward.<sup>2</sup>

On Thursday, June 24., I dined with him at Mr. Dilly's, where were the Rev. Mr. (now Dr.) Knox, master of Tunbridge School, Mr. Smith, vicar of Southill, Dr. Beattie, Mr. Pinkerton, author of various literary performances<sup>3</sup>, and the Rev. Dr. Mayo. At my desire old Mr. Sheridan was invited, as I was earnest to have Johnson and him brought together again by chance, that a reconciliation might be effected. Mr. Sheridan happened to come early, and having learnt that Dr. Johnson was to be there, went away; so I found, with sincere regret, that my friendly intentions were hopeless.<sup>4</sup> I recollect nothing that passed this day, except Johnson's quickness, who, when Dr. Beattie observed, as something remarkable which had happened to him, that he had chanced to see both No. 1. and No. 1000. of the hackney-coaches, the first and the last —

"Why, Sir," said Johnson, "there is an equal chance for one's seeing those two numbers as any other two." He was clearly right; yet the seeing of the two extremes, each of which is in some degree more conspicuous than the rest, could not but strike one in a stronger manner than the sight of any other two numbers. — Though I have neglected to preserve his conversation, it was perhaps at this interview that Dr. Knox formed the notion of which he has exhibited in his "Winter Evenings."

On Friday, June 25., I dined with him at General Paoli's, where, he says in one of his letters to Mrs. Thrale, "I love to dine." There was a variety of dishes much to his taste, of all which he seemed to me to eat so much, that I was afraid he might be hurt by it; and I whispered to the General my fear, and begged he might not press him. "Alas!" said the General, "see how very ill he looks; he can live but a very short time. Would you refuse any slight gratifications to a man under sentence of death? There is a humane custom in Italy, by which persons in that melancholy situation are indulged with having whatever they like best to eat and drink, even with expensive delicacies."

I showed him some verses on Lichfield by Miss Seward, which I had that day received from her, and had the pleasure to hear him approve of them. He confirmed to me the truth of a high compliment which I had been told he had paid to that lady, when she mentioned to him "The Columbiade," an epic poem by Madame du Boecage:—"Madam, there is not any thing equal to your description of the sea round the North Pole, in your Ode on the Death of Captain Cook."

[I have thus quoted a compliment paid by Dr. Johnson to one of this lady's poetical pieces, and I have withheld his opinion of herself, thinking that she might not like it. I am afraid that it has reached her by some other means, and thus we may account for the various attacks made by her on her venerable townsman since his decease; some avowed, and with her own name — others, I believe, in various forms and under several signatures. What are we to think of the scraps of letters between her and Mr. Hayley, impotently attempting to undermine the noble pedestal on which public opinion has placed Dr. Johnson?<sup>5</sup>]

<sup>1</sup> A friend of mine happened to be passing by a field congregation in the environs of London, when a methodist preacher quoted this passage with triumph. — BOSWELL.

<sup>2</sup> I trust that the City of London, now happily in unison with the court, will have the justice and generosity to obtain preferment for this reverend gentleman, now a worthy old servant of that magnificent corporation. — BOSWELL. This wish was not gratified. Mr. Vilette died in April, 1799, having been nearly thirty years chaplain of Newgate. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> The well-known John Pinkerton, who died in 1826, and whose Correspondence has since been published. — CROKER.
<sup>4</sup> Perhaps Boswell's intentions were friendly, though I doubt whether he did not wish to be witness of a contest; he certainly appears to have contributed, at least by his indiscretions, to keep up the animosity. — CROKER.

<sup>5</sup> This passage is an extract from Mr. Boswell's controversy with Miss Seward. — Gentleman's Magazine, 1793, p. 191., and the following specimens of these strange scraps will amuse the reader, and more than justify Mr. Boswell's censure of Miss Seward.

"MISS SEWARD TO MR. HAYLEY.

"1782.

"You have seen Dr. Johnson's 'Lives of the Poets;' they have excited your generous indignation; a heart like Mr. Hayley's would shrink back astonished to perceive a mind so enriched with the power of genius, capable of such cool malignity. Yet the Gentleman's Magazine praised these unworthy efforts to blight the laurels of undoubted fame. O that the venom may fall where it ought! — that the breath of public contempt may blow it from the beautiful wreaths,"

[JOHNSON TO MRS. THRALE.

(Extract.)

"London, June 26. 1784.

"A message came to me yesterday to tell me that Macbean is dead, after three days of illness. He was one of those who, as Swift says, stood as a screen between me and death. He has, I hope, made a good exchange. He was very pious; he was very innocent; he did no ill; and of doing good a continual tenour of distress allowed him few opportunities; he was very highly esteemed in the [Charter] house."

— Letters.

On Sunday, June 27., I found him rather better. I mentioned to him a young man who was going to Jamaica with his wife and children, in expectation of being provided for by two of her brothers settled in that island, one a clergyman and the other a physician. JOHNSON. "It is a wild scheme, Sir, unless he has a positive and deliberate invitation. There was a poor girl, who used to come about me, who had a cousin in Barbadoes, that, in a letter to her, expressed a wish she should come out to that island, and expatiated on the comforts and happiness of her situation. The poor girl went out: her cousin was much surprised, and asked her how she could think of coming. 'Because,' said she, 'you invited me.'—'Not I,' answered the cousin. The letter was then produced. 'I see it is true,' said she, 'that I did invite you: but I did not think you would come.' They lodged her in an out-house, where she passed her time miserably; and as soon as she had an opportunity she returned to England. Always tell this when you hear of people going abroad to relations upon a notion of being well received. In the case which you mention, it is probable the clergyman spends all he gets, and the physician does not know how much he is to get."

We this day dined at Sir Joshua Reynolds's, with General Paoli, Lord Eliot (formerly Mr. Eliot, of Port Eliot), Dr. Beattie, and some other company. Talking of Lord Chesterfield;—JOHNSON. "His manner was exquisitely elegant, and he had more knowledge than I expected." BOSWELL. "Did you fill, Sir, his conversation to be of a superior style?" JOHNSON. "Sir, in the conversation which I had with him I had the best right to superiority, for it was upon philology and literature." Lord Eliot, who had travelled at the same time with Mr. Stanhope, Lord Chesterfield's natural son, justly observed, that it was strange that a man who showed he had so much affection for his son as Lord Chesterfield did, by writing so many long and anxious letters to him, almost all of them when he was secretary of state, which certainly was a proof of great goodness of disposition, should endeavour to make his son a rascal. His Lordship told me that Foote had intended to bring on the stage a father who had thus tutored his son, and to show the son an honest man to every one else, but praising his father's maxims upon him, and cheating him. JOHNSON. "I am much pleased with the design; but I think there was no occasion to make the son honest at all. No; he should be a consummate rogue: the contrast between honesty and knavery would be the stronger. It should be contrived so that the father should be the only sufferer by the son's villainy, and thus there would be poetical justice."

He put Lord Eliot in mind of Dr. Warburton's tutor, and he was also tutor to the Peterborough family. Pray, my lord, do you recollect any particulars that he told you of Lord Peterborough? He is a favourite of mine<sup>3</sup>, and is not enough known; his character has been only ventilated in party pamphlets." Lord Eliot said, if Dr. Johnson would be so good as to ask him any questions, he would tell what he could recollect. Accordingly some things were mentioned. "But," said his lordship, "the best account of Lord Peterborough that I have happened to meet with is in 'Captain Carleton's Memoirs.' Carleton was descended of an ancestor<sup>4</sup> who distinguished himself at the siege of Derry. He was an officer; and, what was rare at that time, had some knowledge of engineering. Johnson said, he had never heard of the bk.

&c. &c. "I turn from this comet in literature (Dr. Johnson) to its SON, — Mr. Hayley!"

"MR. HAYLEY TO MISS SEWARD.

"5th August.

"I have read the 'Lives of the Poets' with as much indignation as you can give me credit for — with a strange mixture of detestation and delight. As his language, to give the devil his due, is frequently sublime and enriched with certain diabolical graces of his own, I continue to listen to him, whenever he speaks, with an equal mixture of admiration and abhorrence."

Hayley seems to have been puzzled between his real admiration of Johnson and his wish to appear to share the indignation of his fair correspondent, who evidently did not like the expression of "delight" and "admiration" with which Hayley had qualified his censure. She therefore artfully enough seeks to enlist him more thoroughly in her cause by insinuating that Johnson, who was then at Lichfield, and whom, after Churchill, she calls "Inimæ Pomposo," had spoken coldly of Hayley's poetry, while she "kept an indignant silence." This partly succeeds, and Hayley's reply is a little more satisfactory to the ireful lady.

"October 25. Your account of Pomposo delights — that noble leviantian who lashes the troubled waters — a sublime but mischievous storm of turbulence and mud."

But she was still dissatisfied:—"I am dubious," she says, "about the epithet noble;" and then she proceeds with a long see-saw galimatias of praise and dispraise, of civility and charity on the one hand, and of his acrimony, envy, malignity, bigotry, and superstition, on the other. Mr. Hayley attempted to ridicule Johnson in the character of Rumble in one of his dull rhyming comedies, and a Dialogue of the Dead, which was dead-born. — CROKER.

<sup>1</sup> Johnson said that he had once seen Mr. Stanhope, and Chesterfield's son, at Dodsley's shop, and was so much struck with his awkward manner and appearance, that he could not help asking Mr. Dodsley who he was. — Hawk. Apology — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> See ante, p. 217. n. 2. — C.

<sup>3</sup> See ante, p. 670. n. 3; his observation on Pope's bi- friends. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> This is an anachronism. Carleton himself was in James's sea-fights long prior to the siege of Derry. His amusing Memoirs were republished in 1808, in a new volume. — CROKER, 1835.

Lord Eliot had it at Port Eliot; but, after a good deal of inquiry, procured a copy in London, and sent it to Johnson, who told Sir Joshua Reynolds that he was going to bed when it came, but was so much pleased with it, that he sat up till he had read it through, and found in it such an air of truth, that he could not doubt of its authenticity; adding, with a smile (in allusion to Lord Eliot's having recently been raised to the peerage), "I did not think a young lord could have mentioned to me a book in the English history that was not known to me."

An addition to our company came after we went up to the drawing-room; Dr Johnson seemed to rise in spirits as his audience increased. He said, he wished Lord Orford's pictures<sup>1</sup> and Sir Ashton Lever's museum<sup>2</sup> might be purchased by the public, because both the money, and the pictures, and the curiosities would remain in the country; whereas if they were sold into another kingdom, the nation would indeed get some money, but would lose the pictures and curiosities, which it would be desirable we should have for improvement in taste and natural history. The only question was, as the nation was much in want of money, whether it would not be better to take a large price from a foreign state?

He entered upon a curious discussion of the difference between intuition and sagacity; one being immediate in its effect, the other requiring a circuitous process; one, he observed, was the eye of the mind, the other the nose of the mind.<sup>3</sup>

A young gentleman<sup>4</sup> present took up the argument against him, and maintained that no man ever thinks of the nose of the mind, not adverting that though that figurative sense seems strange to us, as very unusual, it is truly not more forced than Hamlet's "In my mind's eye, Horatio." He persisted much too long, and appeared to Johnson as putting himself forward as his antagonist with too much presumption; upon which he called to him in a loud tone, "What is it you are contending for, if you be contending?" — And afterwards, imagining that the gentleman retorted upon him with a kind of smart drollery, he said, "Mr. *****, it does not become you to talk so to me. Besides, ridicule is not your talent; you have there neither intuition nor sagacity." — The gentleman protested that he intended no improper freedom, but had the greatest respect for Dr. Johnson. After a short pause, during which we were somewhat uneasy; — JOHNSON. "Give me your hand, Sir. You were too tedious, and I was too short." Mr. *****. "Sir, I am honoured by your attention in any way." JOHNSON. "Come, Sir, let's have no more of it. We offended one another by our contention; let us not offend the company by our compliments."

He now said, he wished much to go to Italy, and that he dreaded passing the winter in England. I said nothing; but enjoyed a secret satisfaction in thinking that I had taken the most effectual measures to make such a scheme practicable.

On Monday, June 28, I had the honour to receive from the Lord Chancellor the following letter:

LORD THURLOW TO MR. BOSWELL.

"SIR, — I should have answered your letter immediately, if (being much engaged when I received it) I had not put it in my pocket, and forgot to open it till this morning.

"I am much obliged to you for the suggestion; and I will adopt and press it as far as I can. The best argument, I am sure, and I hope it is not likely to fail, is Dr. Johnson's merit. But it will be necessary, if I should be so unfortunate as to miss seeing you, to converse with Sir Joshua on the sum it will be proper to ask, — in short, upon the means of setting him out. It would be a reflection on us all if such a man should perish for want of the means to take care of his health. Yours, &c.,
"THURLOW."

This letter gave me very high satisfaction; I next day went and showed it to Sir Joshua Reynolds, who was exceedingly pleased with it. He thought that I should now communicate the negotiation to Dr. Johnson, who might afterwards complain if the attention with which he had been honoured should be too long concealed from him. I intended to set out for Scotland next morning; but Sir Joshua cordially insisted that I should stay another day, that Johnson and I might dine with him, that we three might talk of his Italian tour, and, as Sir Joshua expressed himself, "have it all out."

I hastened to Johnson, and was told by him that he was rather better to-day. BOSWELL. "I am very anxious about you, Sir, and particularly that you should go to Italy for the winter, which I believe is your own wish." JOHNSON. "It is, Sir." BOSWELL. "You have no objection, I presume, but the money it would require." JOHNSON. "Why, no, Sir." Upon which I gave him a particular

<sup>1</sup> The fine Houghton collection, which was sold to the Empress. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> Sir Ashton Lever was knighted by George the Third. He died in 1788. His celebrated museum (valued before a committee of the House of Commons at 53,000*l*) was disposed of, in 1784, by a private lottery, to Mr. Parkinson, who removed it to Albion-place, Blackfriars-bridge, where it was for many years open as an exhibition. The several articles of which it was composed were afterwards sold separately by auction. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> These illustrations were probably suggested by the radical meaning of the words; intuition, in Latin, properly belongs to sight, and sagacity to smell. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> The epithet "young" was added after the two first editions, and the "*****" substituted instead of a dash —, which makes it pretty clear that young Mr. Burke was meant. — CROKER.

account of what had been done, and read to him the Lord Chancellor's letter. He listened with much attention; then warmly said, "This is taking prodigious pains about a man." "O, Sir," said I, with most sincere affection, "your friends would do every thing for you." He paused, — grew more and more agitated, — till tears started into his eyes, and he exclaimed with fervent emotion, "God bless you all!" I was so affected that I also shed tears. After a short silence, he renewed and extended his grateful benediction, "God bless you all, for JESUS CHRIST'S sake." We both remained for some time unable to speak. He rose suddenly and quitted the room, quite melted in tenderness. He staid but a short time, till he had recovered his firmness; soon after he returned I left him, having first engaged him to dine at Sir Joshua Reynolds's next day.

I never was again under that roof which I had so long revered.

On Wednesday, June 30., the friendly confidential dinner with Sir Joshua Reynolds took place, no other company being present. Had I known that this was the last time that I should enjoy in this world the conversation of a friend whom I so much respected, and from whom I derived so much instruction and entertainment, I should have been deeply affected. When I now look back to it, I am vexed that a single word should have been forgotten.

Both Sir Joshua and I were so sanguine in our expectations, that we expatiated with confidence on the liberal provision which we were sure would be made for him, conjecturing whether munificence would be displayed in one large donation, or in an ample increase of his pension. He himself caught so much of our enthusiasm as to allow himself to suppose it not impossible that our hopes might in one way or other be realised. He said that he would rather have his pension doubled than a grant of a thousand pounds. "For," said he, "though probably I may not live to receive as much as a thousand pounds, a man would have the consciousness that he should pass the remainder of his life in splendour, how long soever it might be." Considering what a moderate proportion an income of six hundred pounds a-year bears to innumerable fortunes in this country, it is worthy of remark, that a man so truly great should think it splendour.

As an instance of extraordinary liberality of friendship, he told us that Dr. Brocklesby had upon this occasion offered him a hundred a year for his life.<sup>1</sup> A grateful tear started into his eye, as he spoke this in a faltering tone.

Sir Joshua and I endeavoured to flatter his imagination with agreeable prospects of happiness in Italy. "Nay," said he, "I must not expect much of that; when a man goes to Italy merely to feel how he breathes the air he can enjoy very little."

Our conversation turned upon living in the country, which Johnson, whose melancholy mind required the dissipation of quick successive variety, had habituated himself to consider as a kind of mental imprisonment. "Yet, Sir," said I, "there are many people who are content to live in the country." JOHNSON. "Sir, it is in the intellectual world as in the physical world; we are told by natural philosophers that a body is at rest in the place that is fit for it; they who are content to live in the country are fit for the country."

Talking of various enjoyments, I argued that a refinement of taste was a disadvantage as they who have attained to it must be seldomer pleased than those who have no nice discrimination, and are therefore satisfied with every thing that comes in their way. JOHNSON. "Nay, Sir, that is a paltry notion. Endeavour to be as perfect as you can in ever respect."

I accompanied him in Sir Joshua Reynolds's coach to the entry of Bolt Court. He asked me whether I would not go with him to his house; I declined it, from an apprehension that my spirits would sink. We bade adieu to each other affectionately in the carriage. When he had got down upon the foot pavement he called out, "Fare you well!" and, without looking back, sprang away with a kind of pathetic briskness, if I may use that expression which seemed to indicate a struggle to conceal uneasiness, and impressed me with a foreboding of our long, long separation.

I remained one day more in town, to have the chance of talking over my negotiations with the Lord Chancellor; but the multiplicity of his lordship's important engagements did not allow of it; so I left the management of the business in the hands of Sir Joshua Reynolds.

Soon after this time Dr. Johnson had the mortification of being informed by Mrs. Thral that "what she supposed he never believed was true: namely, that she was actually going to marry Signor Piozzi, an Italian music master.

<sup>1</sup> It should be recollected that the amiable and accomplished man who made this generous offer to the Tory champion was a keen Whig; and it is stated in the Biographical Dictionary, that he pressed Johnson in his last illness to remove to his house for the more immediate convenience of medical advice. Dr. Brocklesby died in 1797, at. 76. He was a very intimate friend of the celebrated Charles Towshend, as well as of Mr. Burke, to whom he had bequeathed 1000*l.* in his will; but recollecting that he might outlive his friend, or that the legacy might fall when

Mr. Burke did not want it, he requested him to accept from his living hand, "ut pignus anticitia." Doctor Brocklesby's name was the subject of one of Mr. Burke's play puns. There was, cotemporary with him, in London, a quack who called himself Doctor Rock. One day Mr. Burke called Brocklesby Doctor Rock, and on his taking so offence at this disreputable appellation, Burke undertook to prove algebraically that Rock was his proper name, that "Rock - b = Rock," or "Brock less b, makes Rock." Q. E. — CROKER.

["MRS. PIOZZI TO JOHNSON.

"Bath, June 30. 1784.

"MY DEAR SIR, — The enclosed is a circular letter, which I have sent to all the guardians; but our friendship demands somewhat more: it requires that I should beg your pardon for concealing from you a connexion which you must have heard of by many, but I suppose never believed. Indeed, my dear Sir, it was concealed only to save us both needless pain. I could not have borne to reject that counsel it would have killed me to take, and I only tell it you now because all is irrevocably settled, and out of your power to prevent. I will say, however, that the dread of your disapprobation has given me some anxious moments, and though, perhaps, I am become by many privations the most independent woman in the world, I feel as if acting without a parent's consent till you write kindly to your faithful servant,
H. L. P." ]
— Letters.

He endeavoured to prevent it, but in vain.

["JOHNSON TO MRS. PIOZZI.

"London, July 8. 1784.

"DEAR MADAM, — What you have done, however I may lament it, I have no pretence to resent, as it has not been injurious to me; I therefore breathe out one sigh more of tenderness, perhaps useless, but at least sincere.

"I wish that God may grant you every blessing, that you may be happy in this world for its short continuance, and eternally happy in a better state; and whatever I can contribute to your happiness I am very ready to repay, for that kindness which soothed twenty years of a life radically wretched.

"Do not think slightly of the advice which I now presume to offer. Prevail upon M. Piozzi to settle in England: you may live here with more dignity than in Italy, and with more security: your rank will be higher, and your fortune more under your own eye. I desire not to detail all my reasons, but every argument of prudence and interest is for England, and only some phantoms of imagination seduce you to Italy.

"I am afraid, however, that my counsel is vain; yet I have eased my heart by giving it.

"When Queen Mary took the resolution of sheltering herself in England, the Archbishop of St. Andrew's, attempting to dissuade her, attended on her journey; and when they came to the irremediable stream that separated the two kingdoms, walked by her side into the water, in the middle of which he seized her bridle, and with earnestness proportioned to her danger and his own affection pressed her to return. The queen went forward. If the parallel reaches thus far, may it go no farther. The tears stand in my eyes.

"I am going into Derbysire, and hope to be followed by your good wishes, for I am, with great affection, your, &c.,
SAM. JOHNSON.

"Any letters that come for me hither will be sent me." ]
— Letters.

If she would publish the whole of the correspondence that passed between Dr. Johnson and her on the subject, we should have a full view of his real sentiments. As it is, our judgment must be biassed by that characteristic specimen which Sir John Hawkins has given us.<sup>2</sup>

["About the middle of 1784, he was, to appearance, so well, that both himself and his friends hoped that he had some years to live. He had recovered from the paralytic stroke of the last year to such a degree, that, saving a little difficulty in his articulation, he had no remains of it; he had also undergone a slight fit of the gout, and conquered an oppression on his lungs, so as to be able, as himself told me, to run up the whole staircase of the Royal Academy, on the day of the annual dinner there. In short, to such a degree of health was he restored, that he forgot all his complaints: he resumed sitting to Opie for his picture, which had been begun the year before, but, I believe, was never finished, and accepted an invitation to the house of a friend at Ashbourne in Derbyshire, proposing to stay there till towards the end of the summer, and, in his return, to visit Mrs. Porter, his daughter-in-law, and others of his friends, at Lichfield.

"A few weeks before his setting out, he was made uneasy by a report that the widow of his friend Mr. Thrale was about to dispose of herself in marriage to a foreigner, a singer by profession, and with him to quit the kingdom. Upon this occasion, he took the alarm, and to prevent a degradation of herself, and, what as executor of her husband was more his concern, the desertion of her children, wrote to her, she then being at Bath, a letter, of which the following spurious copy was inserted in the Gentleman's Magazine for December, 1784:—

"MADAM, — If you are already ignominiously married, you are lost beyond all redemption; — if you are not, permit me one hour's conversation, to convince you that such a marriage must not take place. If, after a whole hour's reasoning, you should not be convinced, you will still be at liberty to act as you think proper. I have been extremely ill, and am still ill; but if you grant me the audience I ask, I will instantly take a post-chaise and attend you at Bath. Pray do not refuse this favour to a man who hath so many years loved and honoured you."

"That this letter is spurious, as to the language, I have Johnson's own authority for saying; but, in respect of the sentiments, he avowed it, in a declaration to me, that not a sentence of it was his, but yet that it was an adumbration of one that he wrote upon the occasion. It may therefore be suspected,

<sup>1</sup> In the lady's own publication of the correspondence, this letter is given as from Mrs. Piozzi, and is signed with the initial of her new name; Dr. Johnson's answer is also addressed to Mrs. Piozzi, and both the letters allude to the matter as past — hers as "settled," his as "done;" yet it appears by the periodical publications of the day, that the marriage did not take place until the 25th July, and Madame D'Arbly dates it "at the end of July." I know not how to account for this but by supposing that Mrs. Piozzi, to avoid Johnson's importunities, wished him to understand as done that which was only settled to be done. Any reader who is curious about this miserable mésalliance will find it most acrimoniously discussed in Baret's Strictures in the European Magazine for 1788. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> Boswell had given but the last sentence of the following extract. I give the whole passage. — CROKER.

that some one who had heard him repeat the contents of the letter had given it to the public in the form in which it appeared.

"What answer was returned to his friendly monition I know not, but it seems that it was succeeded by a letter<sup>1</sup> of greater length, written, as it afterwards appeared, too late to do any good, in which he expressed an opinion, that the person to whom it was addressed had forfeited her fame. The answer to this I have seen: it is written from Bath, and contains an indignant vindication as well of her conduct as her fame, an inhibition of Johnson from following her to Bath, and a farewell, concluding — 'Till you have changed your opinion of [Piozzi] let us converse no more.'

"From the style of the letter, a conclusion was to be drawn that baffled all the powers of reasoning and persuasion :

"One argument she summ'd up all in,
The thing was done and past recalling;"<sup>2</sup> which being the case, he contented himself with reflecting on what he had done to prevent that which he thought one of the greatest evils that could befall the progeny of his friend, the alienation of the affections of their mother. He looked upon the desertion of children by their parents, and the withdrawing from them that protection, that mental nutriment, which, in their youth, they are capable of receiving, the exposing them to the snares and temptations of the world, and the solicitations and deceits of the artful and designing, as most unnatural; and in a letter on the subject to me, written from Ashbourne, thus delivered his sentiments:]

"'Poor Thrale! I thought that either her virtue or her vice,' (meaning, as I understood, by the former, the love of her children, and by the latter, her pride,) 'would have restrained her from such a marriage. She is now become a subject for her enemies to exult over, and for her friends, if she has any left, to forget or pity.'

It must be admitted that Johnson derived a considerable portion of happiness from the comforts and elegancies which he enjoyed in Mr. Thrale's family; but Mrs. Thrale assures us he was indebted for these to her husband alone, who certainly respected him sincerely. Her words are, "Veneration for his virtue, reverence for his talents, delight in his conversation, and habitual endurance of a yoke my husband first put upon me, and of which he contentedly bore his share for sixteen or seventeen years, made me go on so long with Mr. Johnson; but the perpetual confinement I will own to have been terrifying in the first years of our friendship, and irksome in the last; nor could I pretend to support it without help, when my coadjutor was no more." Alas! how different is this from the declarations which I have heard Mrs. Thrale make in his lifetime, without a single murmur against any peculiarities, or against any one circumstance which attended their intimacy!

As a sincere friend of the great man whose life I am writing, I think it necessary to guard my readers against the mistaken notion of Dr. Johnson's character, which this Lady's "Anecdotes" of him suggest; for, from the very nature and form of her book, "it lends deception lighter wings to fly."

"Let it be remembered," says an eminent critic<sup>3</sup>, "that she has comprised in a small volume all that she could recollect of Dr. Johnson in twenty years, during which period, doubtless, some severe things were said by him: and they who read the book in two hours naturally enough suppose that his whole conversation was of this complexion. But the fact is, I have been often in his company, and never once heard him say a severe thing to any one; and many others can attest the same. When he did say a severe thing, it was generally extorted by ignorance pretending to knowledge, or by extreme vanity or affectation.

"Two instances of inaccuracy," adds he, "are peculiarly worthy of notice.

"It is said, 'that natural roughness of his manner so often mentioned would, notwithstanding the regularity of his notions, burst through them all from time to time; and he once bade a very celebrated lady [Hannah More], who praised him with too much zeal perhaps, or perhaps too strong an emphasis (which always offended him), consider what her flattery was worth before she choked him with it.'

"Now let the genuine anecdote be contrasted with this. — The person thus represented as being harshly treated, though a very celebrated lady, was then just come to London from an obscure situation in the country. At Sir Joshua Reynolds's one evening, she met Dr. Johnson. She very soon began to pay her court to him in the most fulsome strain. 'Spare me, I beseech you, dear Madam,' was his reply. She still laid it on. 'Pray, Madam,' let us have no more of this,' he rejoined. Not paying any attention to these warnings, she continued still her eulogy. At length, provoked by this indelicate and vain obtrusion of compliments, he exclaimed, 'Dearest Lady, consider with yourself what your flattery is worth, before you bestow it so freely.'

"How different does this story appear, when accompanied with all those circumstances which <sup>1</sup> It appears as if Hawkins (who had not had the advantage of seeing the correspondence published by Mrs. Piozzi) had made some confusion about these letters. It is clear that the first of the series must have been, not Johnson's remonstrance, but her announcement, dated Bath, June 30, which we have just seen. To that Johnson may have replied by the letter, the contents of which are adumbrated in the Gentleman's Magazine. To this she probably rejoined by the letter which Hawkins says that he saw, to which Johnson's of the 8th of July, given above, may have been the reply. Hawkins thinks that there were three letters from Dr. Johnson, whereas it seems probable that there were but two, of which one only is preserved. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> Pope and Swift's Miscellanies, "Phyllis, or the Progress of Love." — BOSWELL.

<sup>3</sup> Who has been pleased to furnish me with his remarks. — BOSWELL.

This "critic" is no doubt Mr. Malone, whose MS. notes on Mrs. Piozzi's "Anecdotes" contain the germs of these criticisms. Several of his similar animadversions have been already noticed, with my reasons for differing essentially from both Boswell and Malone in their estimate of Mrs. Piozzi's work. Mr. Malone's notes were communicated to me by Mr. Markland, who purchased the volume at the sale of the library of the late James Boswell, junior, in 1825. — CROKER.

really belong to it, but which Mrs. Thrale either did not know, or has suppressed!

"She says, in another place, 'One gentleman, however, who dined at a nobleman's house in his company, and that of Mr. Thrale, to whom I was obliged for the anecdote, was willing to enter the lists in defence of King William's character; and having opposed and contradicted Johnson two or three times, petulantly enough, the master of the house began to feel uneasy, and expect disagreeable consequences; to avoid which he said, loud enough for the doctor to hear, 'Our friend has no meaning now in all this, except just to relate at club to-morrow how he teased Johnson at dinner to-day; this is all to do himself honour.'—'No, upon my word,' replied the other, 'I see no honour in it, whatever you may do.'—'Well, Sir,' returned Mr. Johnson sternly, 'if you do not see the honour, I am sure I feel the disgrace.'"

"This is all sophisticated. Mr. Thrale was not in the company, though he might have related the story to Mrs. Thrale. A friend, from whom I had the story, was present; and it was not at the house of a nobleman. On the observation being made by the master of the house on a gentleman's contradicting Johnson, that he had talked for the honour, &c., the gentleman muttered in a low voice, 'I see no honour in it;' and Dr. Johnson said nothing: so all the rest (though bien troué) is mere garnish."

I have had occasion several times, in the course of this work, to point out the incorrectness of Mrs. Thrale as to particulars which consisted with my own knowledge. But indeed she has, in flippant terms enough, expressed her disapprobation of that anxious desire of authenticity which prompts a person who is to record conversations to write them down at the moment. Unquestionably, if they are to be recorded at all, the sooner it is done the better. This lady herself says,

"To recollect, however, and to repeat the sayings of Dr. Johnson, is almost all that can be done by the writers of his life; as his life, at least since my acquaintance with him, consisted in little else than talking, when he was not employed in some serious piece of work."

She boasts of her having kept a commonplace book; and we find she noted, at one time or other, in a very lively manner, specimens of the conversation of Dr. Johnson, and of those who talked with him; but had she done it recently, they probably would have been less erroneous, and we should have been relieved from those disagreeable doubts of their authenticity with which we must now pursue them.

She says of him, —

<sup>1</sup> Mrs. Piozzi may have been right or wrong as to the degree in which Dr. Johnson's indolence operated on those occasions; but at least she was sincere, for she did not conceal from Johnson himself that she thought him negligent in doing small favours; and Mr. Boswell's own work affords several instances in which Johnson exhibits and avows the contradictions in his character which are here imputed to Mrs. Piozzi as total misrepresentations. The truth seems to be that to all the little idle matters about which Mrs. Piozzi teased him, probably too often, he was very indifferent; and she describes him as she found him. — CROKER.

"He was the most charitable of mortals, without being what we call an active friend. Admirable at giving counsel, no man saw his way so clearly: but he would not stir a finger for the assistance of those to whom he was willing enough to give advice. And again, on the same page, 'If you wanted a slight favour, you must apply to people of other dispositions; for not a step would Johnson move to obtain a man a vote in a society, to repay a compliment which might be useful or pleasing, to write a letter of request, &c., or to obtain a hundred pounds a year more for a friend who perhaps had already two or three. No force could urge him to diligence, no importunity could conquer his resolution to stand still."

It is amazing that one who had such opportunities of knowing Dr. Johnson should appear so little acquainted with his real character. I am sorry this lady does not advert, that she herself contradicts the assertion of his being obstinately defective in the petites morales, in the little endearing charities of social life in conferring smaller favours; for she says,

"Dr. Johnson was liberal enough in granting literary assistance to others, I think; and innumerable are the prefaces, sermons, lectures, and dedications which he used to make for people who begged of him."

I am certain that a more active friend has rarely been found in any age. This work, which I fondly hope will rescue his memory from obloquy, contains a thousand instances of his benevolent exertions in almost every way that can be conceived; and particularly in employing his pen with a generous readiness for those to whom its aid could be useful. Indeed his obliging activity in doing little offices of kindness, both by letters and personal application, was one of the most remarkable features in his character; and for the truth of this I can appeal to a number of his respectable friends: Sir Joshua Reynolds, Mr. Langton, Mr. Hamilton, Mr. Burke, Mr. Windham, Mr. Malone, the Bishop of Dromore, Sir William Scott, Sir Robert Chambers. And can Mrs. Thrale forget the advertisements which he wrote for her husband at the time of his election contest; the epitaphs on him and her mother; the playful and even trifling verses for the amusement of her and her daughters, his corresponding with her children, and entering into their minute concerns, which shows him in the most amiable light? <sup>1</sup>

She relates —

"That Mr. Cholmondeley <sup>2</sup> unexpectedly rode up to Mr. Thrale's carriage, in which Mr. Thrale, <sup>2</sup> George James Cholmondeley, Esq., grandson of George, third Earl of Cholmondeley, and one of the commissioners of excise; a gentleman respected for his abilities and elegance of manners. — BOSWELL. He was the son of the Mrs. Cholmondeley [p. 349, n. 3.] so often mentioned. When I spoke to him a few years before his death upon this point, I found him very sore at being made the topic of such a debate, and very unwilling to remember any thing about either the offence or the apology. He died in Feb. 1831, at 79. — CROKER, 1847.

and she, and Dr. Johnson were travelling; that he paid them all his proper compliments; but observing that Dr. Johnson, who was reading, did not see him, 'tapped him gently on the shoulder.' 'Tis Mr. Cholmondeley,' says my husband, 'Well, Sir — and what if it is Mr. Cholmondeley?' says the other, sternly, just lifting his eyes a moment from his book, and returning to it again with renewed avidity."

This surely conveys a notion of Johnson, as if he had been grossly rude to Mr. Cholmondeley, a gentleman whom he always loved and esteemed. If, therefore, there was an absolute necessity for mentioning the story at all, it might have been thought that her tenderness for Dr. Johnson's character would have disposed her to state anything that could soften it. Why then is there a total silence as to what Mr. Cholmondeley told her? — that Johnson, who had known him from his earliest years, having been made sensible of what had doubtless a strange appearance, took occasion, when he afterwards met him, to make a very courteous and kind apology. There is another little circumstance which I cannot but remark. Her book was published in 1785; she had then in her possession a letter from Dr. Johnson, dated in 1777, which begins thus: "Cholmondeley's story shocks me, if it be true, which I can hardly think, for I am utterly unconscious of it: I am very sorry, and very much ashamed." Why then publish the anecdote? Or, if she did, why not add the circumstances, with which she was well acquainted?

In his social intercourse she thus describes him: —

"Ever musing till he was called out to converse, and conversing till the fatigue of his friends, or the promptitude of his own temper to take offence, consigned him back again to silent meditation."

Yet in the same book she tells us, —

"He was, however, seldom inclined to be silent when any moral or literary question was started; and it was on such occasions that, like the sage in 'Rasselas,' he spoke, and attention watched his lips; he reasoned, and conviction closed his periods."

His conversation, indeed, was so far from ever fatiguing his friends, that they regretted when it was interrupted or ceased, and could exclaim in Milton's language,

"With thee conversing, I forget all time."

I certainly, then, do not claim too much in behalf of my illustrious friend in saying, that however smart and entertaining Mrs. Thrale's "Anecdotes" are, they must not be held as good evidence against him; for wherever an instance of harshness and severity is told, I beg leave to doubt its perfect authenticity; for though there may have been some foundation for it, yet, like that of his reproof to the "very celebrated lady," it may be so exhibited in the narration as to be very unlike the real fact.

The evident tendency of the following anecdote is to represent Dr. Johnson as extremely deficient in affection, tenderness, or even common civility.

"When I one day lamented the loss of a first cousin killed in America, — Prithce, my dear (said he), have done with canting; how would the world be the worse for it, I may ask, if all your relations were at once spitted like larks, and roasted for Presto's supper? — Presto was the dog that lay under the table while we talked."

I suspect this too of exaggeration and distortion. I allow that he made her an angry speech; but let the circumstances fairly appear, as told by Mr. Baretti<sup>1</sup>, who was present: —

"Mrs. Thrale, while supping very heartily upon larks, laid down her knife and fork, and abruptly exclaimed, 'O, my dear Johnson! do you know what has happened? The last letters from abroad have brought us an account that our poor cousin's head was taken off by a cannon-ball.' Johnson, who was shocked both at the fact and her light unfeeling manner of mentioning it, replied, 'Madam, it would give you very little concern if all your relations were spitted like those larks, and dressed for Presto's supper.'<sup>2</sup>

It is with concern that I find myself obliged to animadvert on the inaccuracies of Mrs. Piozzi's "Anecdotes," and perhaps I may be thought to have dwelt too long upon her little collection. But as from Johnson's long residence under Mr. Thrale's roof, and his intimacy with her, the account which she has given of him may have made an unfavourable and unjust impression, my duty, as a faithful biographer, has obliged me reluctantly to perform this unpleasing task.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Baretti's evidence is worth nothing against Mrs. Piozzi. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> Upon mentioning this to my friend Mr. Wilkes, he, with his usual readiness, pleasantly matched it with the following sentimental anecdote. He was invited by a young man of fashion at Paris to sup with him and a lady, who had been for some time his mistress, but with whom he was going to part. He said to Mr. Wilkes that he really felt very much for her, she was in such distress, and that he meant to make her a present of two hundred louis-d'ors. Mr. Wilkes observed the behaviour of mademoiselle, who sighed, indeed, very pitiously, and assumed every pathetic air of grief, but ate no less than three French pigeons, which are as large as English partridges, besides other things. Mr. Wilkes whispered the gentleman, "We often say in England, ex*cessive sorrow is exceeding dry, but I never heard excessive sorrow is exceeding hungry.* Perhaps one hundred will do." The gentleman took the hint. — BOSWELL.

<sup>3</sup> Instead of answering seriatim (as I had done in my first edition) Boswell's objections to Mrs. Piozzi's anecdotes, I will here finally state my opinion that, although after her deplorable marriage, she had lost much of her reverence and all her affection for her guide, philosopher, and friend, and was therefore disposed to give a harsh unfavourable colour to his character, and though her reports are rambling, slipshod, and often inaccurate in expressions and details, they are never, I believe, intentionally nor substantially untrue, nor at all liable to the sweeping imputations that Boswell and Malone make against them. — CROKER, 1847.

CHAPTER LXXXI.

1784.

Projected Tour to Italy. — Reynolds. — Thurlow. — Rev. Mr. Bagshaw. — Excursion to Staffordshire and Derbyshire. — Correspondence. — Air Balloons. — Last Visit to Lichfield. — Uttoxeter. — The Learned Pig. — Last Visit to Oxford. — Return to London. — Ancient Universal History. — Imitations of Johnson's Style.

HAVING left the pious negotiation, as I called it, in the best hands, I shall here insert what relates to it. Johnson wrote to Sir Joshua Reynolds on July 6. as follows:—

"I am going, I hope, in a few days, to try the air of Derbyshire, but hope to see you before I go. Let me, however, mention to you what I have much at heart. If the Chancellor should continue his attention to Mr. Boswell's request, and confer with you on the means of relieving my languid state, I am very desirous to avoid the appearance of asking money upon false pretences. I desire you to represent to his lordship, what, as soon as it is suggested, he will perceive to be reasonable,—that, if I grow much worse, I shall be afraid to leave my physicians, to suffer the inconveniences of travel, and pine in the solitude of a foreign country;—that, if I grow much better, of which indeed there is now little appearance, I shall not wish to leave my friends and my domestic comforts, for I do not travel for pleasure or curiosity; yet if I should recover, curiosity would revive. In my present state I am desirous to make a struggle for a little longer life, and hope to obtain some help from a softer climate. Do for me what you can."

He wrote to me July 26. :—

"I wish your affairs could have permitted a longer and continued exertion of your zeal and kindness. They that have your kindness may want your ardour. In the meantime I am very feeble and very dejected."

By a letter from Sir Joshua Reynolds I was informed that the Lord Chancellor had called on him, and acquainted him that the application had not been successful; but that his lordship, after speaking highly in praise of Johnson, as a man who was an honour to his country, desired Sir Joshua to let him know, that on granting a mortgage<sup>1</sup> of his pension, he should draw on his lordship to the amount of five or six hundred pounds, and that his lordship explained the meaning of the mortgage to be, that he wished the business to be conducted in such a manner, that Dr. Johnson should appear to be under the least possible obligation. Sir Joshua mentioned that he had by the same post communicated all this to Dr. Johnson.

How Johnson was affected upon the occasion will appear from what he wrote to Sir Joshua Reynolds:—

"Ashbourne, Sept. 9.

"Many words I hope are not necessary between you and me, to convince you what gratitude is excited in my heart by the Chancellor's liberality, and your kind offices. I have enclosed a letter to the Chancellor, which, when you have read it, you will be pleased to seal with a head, or any other general seal, and convey it to him: had I sent it directly to him, I should have seemed to overlook the favour of your intervention."

TO THE LORD HIGH CHANCELLOR.<sup>2</sup>

"September, 1784.

"MY LORD,—After a long and not inattentive observation of mankind, the generosity of your lordship's offer raises in me not less wonder than gratitude. Bounty, so liberally bestowed, I should gladly receive, if my condition made it necessary; for, to such a mind, who would not be proud to own his obligations? But it has pleased God to restore me to so great a measure of health, that if I should now appropriate so much of a fortune destined to do good, I could not escape from myself the charge of advancing a false claim. My journey to the Continent, though I once thought it necessary, was never much encouraged by my physicians; and I was very desirous that your lordship should be told of it by Sir Joshua Reynolds as an event very uncertain; for if I grew much better, I should not be willing, if much worse, not able, to migrate. Your lordship was first solicited without my knowledge; but, when I was told that you were pleased to honour me with your patronage, I did not expect to hear of a refusal; yet, as I have had no long time to brood hope, and have not rioted in imaginary opulence, this cold reception has been scarce a disappointment; and, from your lordship's kindness, I have received a benefit, which only men like you are able to bestow. I shall now live mihi carior, with a higher opinion of my own merit. I am, my Lord, &c.,

SAM. JOHNSON."

Upon this unexpected failure I abstain from presuming to make any remarks, or to offer any conjectures.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> This offer has in the first view of it the appearance rather of a commercial than a gratuitous transaction; but Sir Joshua clearly understood at the making it that Lord Thurlow designedly put it in that form. He was fearful that Johnson's high spirit would induce him to reject it as a donation, but thought that in the way of loan it might be accepted."—Hawkins's Life, p. 571.—CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> Sir Joshua Reynolds, on account of the excellence both of the sentiment and expression of this letter, took a copy of it, which he showed to some of his friends; one of whom [Lady Incon, it is said.—C.] who admitted it, being allowed to peruse it leisurely at home, a copy was made, and found its way into the newspapers and magazines. It was transcribed with some inaccuracies. I print it from the original draft in Johnson's own handwriting.—BOSWELL.

<sup>3</sup> This affair soon became a topic of conversation, and it was stated that the cause of the failure was the refusal of the King himself, but from the following letter it appears that the matter was never mentioned to his Majesty; that, as time pressed, Lord Thurlow proposed the before-mentioned arrangement as from himself—running the risk of obtaining the King's subsequent approbation when he should have an opportunity of mentioning it to his Majesty. This affords some, and yet not a satisfactory, explanation of the device suggested by Lord Thurlow of Johnson's giving him a mortgage on his pension. But it still seems very strange that Boswell, who evidently was much pained at the idea that the Having, after repeated reasonings, brought Dr. Johnson to agree to my removing to London, and even to furnish me with arguments in favour of what he had opposed; I wrote to him, requesting he would write them for me. He was so good as to comply, and I shall extract that part of his letter to me, as a proof how well he could exhibit a cautious yet encouraging view of it.

JOHNSON TO BOSWELL.

"June 11. 1784.

"I remember, and entreat you to remember, that virtus est vitium fugere, the first approach to riches is security from poverty. The condition upon which you have my consent to settle in London is, that your expense never exceeds your annual income. Fixing this basis of security, you cannot be hurt, and you may be very much advanced. The loss of your Scottish business, which is all that you can lose, is not to be reckoned as any equivalent to the hopes and possibilities that open here upon you. If you succeed, the question of prudence is at an end; every body will think that done right which ends happily; and though your expectations, of which I would not advise you to talk too much, should not be totally answered, you can hardly fail to get friends who will do for you all that your present situation allows you to hope; and if, after a few years, you should return to Scotland, you will return with a mind supplied by various conversation, and many opportunities of inquiry, with much knowledge, and materials for reflection and instruction."

[JOHNSON TO DR. ADAMS.

"London, 11th June (July). 1784.

"DEAR SIR, — I am going into Staffordshire and Derbyshire in quest of some relief, of which my need is not less than when I was treated at your house with so much tenderness.

"I have now received the collations for Xenophon, which I have sent you with the letters that relate to them. I cannot at present take any part in the work, but I would rather pay for a collation of Oppian than see it neglected; for the French-

King had been the obstacle, where there has been kept in ignorance of the real state of the case, as by the following letter, which I found in the Reynolds papers, it appears he was.

"LORD THURLOW TO SIR J. REYNOLDS.

"Thursday, Nov. 18. 1784.

"DEAR SIR, — My choice, if that had been left me, would certainly have been that the matter should not have been talked of at all. The only object I regarded was my own pleasure, in contributing to the health and comfort of a man whom I venerate sincerely and highly for every part, without exception, of his exalted character. This you know I proposed to do, as it might be without any expense—in all events at a rate infinitely below the satisfaction I proposed to myself. It would have suited the purpose better if nobody had heard of it, except Dr. Johnson, you, and J. Boswell. But the chief objection to the rumour is, that his Majesty is supposed to have refused it. Had that been so, I should not have communicated the circumstance. It was impossible for me to take the King's pleasure on the suggestion I presumed to move. I am an untoward solicitor. The time seemed to press, and I chose rather to take on myself the risk of his Majesty's concurrence than delay a journey which might conduce to Dr. Johnson's health and comfort.

"But these are all trifles, and scarce deserve even this cursory explanation. The only question of any worth is whether Dr. Johnson has any wish to go abroad, or other occasion for my assistance. Indeed he should give me credit men act with great liberality. Let us not fall below them.

"I know not in what state Dr. Edwards left his book.<sup>1</sup> Some of his emendations seemed to me to (be) irrefragably certain, and such, therefore, as ought not to be lost. His rule was not (to) change the text; and, therefore, I suppose he has left notes to be subjoined. As the book is posthumous, some account of the editor ought to be given.

"You have now the whole process of the correspondence before you. When the prior is answered, let some apology be made for me.<sup>2</sup>

"I was forced to divide the collation, but as it is paged, you will easily put every part in its proper place.

"Be pleased to convey my respects to Mrs. and Miss Adams. I am, Sir, your most humble servant,
"SAM. JOHNSON."

Let us now contemplate Johnson thirty years after the death of his wife, still retaining for her all the tenderness of affection.

JOHNSON TO THE REV. MR. BAGSHAW,

At Fromley.

"July 12. 1784.

"SIR, — Perhaps you may remember, that in the year 1753 you committed to the ground my dear wife. I now entreat your permission to lay a stone upon her; and have sent the inscription, that, if you find it proper, you may signify your allowance.

"You will do me a great favour by showing the place where she lies, that the stone may protect her remains.

"Mr. Ryland<sup>3</sup> will wait on you for the inscription [p. 77. n. 4], and procure it to be engraved. You will easily believe that I shrink from this mournful office. When it is done, if I have strength remaining, I will visit Bromley once again, and pay you part of the respect to which you have a right from, reverend Sir, your most humble servant,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

On the same day he wrote to Mr. Langton:—

"I cannot but think that in my languid and for perfect simplicity, when I treat this as merely a pleasure afforded me, and accept it accordingly: any reluctance, if he examines himself thoroughly, will certainly be found to rest, in some part or other, upon a doubt of the disposition with which I offer it.

I am, &amp;c.

"THURLOW."

That this letter was kept by Boswell's knowledge is certain, by his obvious reversion at thinking that the refusal had come from the King—that it was designedly kept from him is rendered probable by the following curious circumstance. On the face of the original letter his name has been obliterated with so much care that but for the different colour of the ink and some other small circumstances, it would not have been discoverable; it is artfully done, and the sentence appears to run, "except Dr. Johnson, you, and I"—"Boswell" being erased. This looks like an un candid trick, to defraud Boswell of his merit in this matter: but by whom the obliteration was made I cannot guess.—CROKER.

<sup>1</sup> His Xenophon. See anté, p. 621.—C.

<sup>2</sup> I suppose the prior of the Benedictines in Paris (anté, p. 460. n. 2), who seem to have made, at Johnson's request, a collation of Xenophon with some copy of their own, and to have proposed a collation of Oppian, but for what precise purpose does not appear.—CROKER, 1847.

<sup>3</sup> Mr. Ryland was one of his oldest friends, and had probably been an acquaintance of his wife's. (See anté, pp. 58. 78.). Mr. Ryland died July 24. 1798, ætat. 81.—CROKER.

anxious state, I have some reason to complain that I receive from you neither inquiry nor consolation. You know how much I value your friendship, and with what confidence I expect your kindness, if I wanted any act of tenderness that you could perform; at least, if you do not know it, I think your ignorance is your own fault. Yet how long is it that I have lived almost in your neighbourhood without the least notice?—I do not, however, consider this neglect as particularly shown to me; I hear two of your most valuable friends make the same complaint. But why are all thus overlooked? You are not oppressed by sickness, you are not distracted by business; if you are sick, you are sick of leisure:—and allow yourself to be told, that no disease is more to be dreaded or avoided. Rather to do nothing than to do good, is the lowest state of a degraded mind. Boileau says to his pupil,

‘Que les vers ne soient pas votre éternel emploi,
Cultivez vos amis.’—

That voluntary debility which modern language is content to term indolence will, if it is not counteracted by resolution, render in time the strongest faculties lifeless, and turn the flame to the smoke of virtue.—I do not expect or desire to see you, because I am much pleased to find that your mother stays so long with you, and I should think you neither elegant nor grateful if you did not study her gratification. You will pay my respects to both the ladies, and to all the young people.—I am going northward for a while, to try what help the country can give me; but if you write, the letter will come after me.”

Next day he set out on a jaunt to Staffordshire and Derbyshire, flattering himself that he might be in some degree relieved.

During his absence from London he kept up a correspondence with several of his friends, from which I shall select what appears to me proper for publication, without attending nicely to chronological order.

TO DR. BROCKLESBY he writes, —

“Ashbourne, July 20.

“The kind attention which you have so long shown to my health and happiness makes it as much a debt of gratitude as a call of interest to give you an account of what befalls me, when accident removes me from your immediate care. The journey of the first day was performed with very little sense of fatigue: the second day brought me to Lichfield without much lassitude; but I am afraid that I could not have borne such violent agitation for many days together. Tell Dr. Heberden, that in the coach I read ‘Ciceronianus,’ which I concluded as I entered Lichfield. My affection and understanding went along with Erasmus, except that once or twice he somewhat unskillfully entangles Cicero’s civil or moral with his rhetorical character.—I staid five days at Lichfield, but, being unable to walk, had no great pleasure; and yesterday (19th) I came hither, where I am to try what air and attention can perform.—Of any improvement in my health I cannot yet please myself with the perception. * * * * *

The asthma has no abatement. Opiates stop the fit, so as that I can sit and sometimes lie easy, but they do not now procure me the power of motion; and I am afraid that my general strength of body does not increase. The weather indeed is not benign; but how low is he sunk whose strength depends upon the weather! I am now looking into Floyer<sup>1</sup>, who lived with his asthma to almost his ninetieth year. His book, by want of order, is obscure; and his asthma, I think, not of the same kind with mine. Something, however, I may perhaps learn.—My appetite still continues keen enough; and what I consider as a symptom of radical health, I have a voracious delight in raw summer fruit, of which I was less eager a few years ago.—You will be pleased to communicate this account to Dr. Heberden, and if any thing is to be done, let me have your joint opinion.—Now—abite, cura!—let me inquire after the club.”<sup>2</sup>

“July 31st.—Not recollecting that Dr. Heberden might be at Windsor, I thought your letter long in coming. But you know nocturna petuntur, the letter which I so much desired tells me that I have lost one of my best and tenderest friends.<sup>3</sup> My comfort is, that he appeared to live like a man that had always before his eyes the fragility of our present existence, and was therefore, I hope, not unprepared to meet his Judge.—Your attention, dear Sir, and that of Dr. Heberden, to my health, is extremely kind. I am loth to think that I grow worse; and cannot fairly prove even to my own partiality that I grow much better.”

“Aug. 5.—I return you thanks, dear Sir, for your unwearied attention both medicinal and friendly, and hope to prove the effect of your care by living to acknowledge it.”

“Aug. 12.—Pray be so kind as to have me in your thoughts, and mention my case to others as you have opportunity. I seem to myself neither to gain nor lose strength. I have lately tried milk, but have yet found no advantage, and am afraid of it merely as a liquid. My appetite is still good, which I know is dear Dr. Heberden’s criterion of the vis vite.—As we cannot now see each other, do not omit to write, for you cannot think with what warmth of expectation I reckon the hours of a post day.”

“Aug. 14.—I have hitherto sent you only melancholy letters: you will be glad to hear some better account. Yesterday the asthma remitted, perceptibly remitted, and I moved with more ease than I have enjoyed for many weeks. May God continue his mercy! This account I would not delay, because I am not a lover of complaints or complainers; and yet I have, since we parted, uttered nothing till now but terror and sorrow. Write to me, dear Sir.”

“Aug. 16.—Better, I hope, and better. My respiration gets more and more ease and liberty. I went to church yesterday, after a very liberal dinner, without any inconvenience; it is indeed no long walk, but I never walked it without difficulty, since I came, before. * * * * * The intention was only to overpower the seeming vis inertie of the pectoral and pulmonary muscles.—I am favoured with a degree of ease that very much delights me, and do not despair of another race up the stairs of the Academy. — If I were, however, of a humour to see, or to show, the state of my body, on the dark side, I might say,

<sup>1</sup> Sir John Floyer, M.D. See anté, p. 7.—CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> Sams, at the Essex Head, Essex Street.—BOSWELL.

<sup>3</sup> Mr. Allen, the printer.—BOSWELL.

‘ Quid te exempta juvat spinis de pluribus una ? ’

The nights are still sleepless, and the water rises, though it does not rise very fast. Let us, however, rejoice in all the good that we have. The remission of one disease will enable nature to combat the rest. — The squills I have not neglected; for I have taken more than a hundred drops a day, and one day took two hundred and fifty, which, according to the popular equivalent of a drop to a grain, is more than half an ounce. I thank you, dear Sir, for your attention in ordering the medicines; your attention to me has never failed. If the virtue of medicines could be enforced by the benevolence of the prescriber, how soon should I be well ! ”

“ August 19. — The relaxation of the asthma still continues, yet I do not trust it wholly to itself, but soothe it now and then with an opiate. I not only perform the act of respiration with less labour, but I can walk with fewer intervals of rest, and with greater freedom of motion. I never thought well of Dr. James’s compounded medicines; his ingredients appear to me sometimes inefficacious and trifling, and sometimes heterogeneous and destructive of each other. This prescription exhibits a composition of about three hundred and thirty grains, in which there are four grains of emetic tartar, and six drops [of] thebaic tincture. He that writes thus surely writes for show. The basis of his medicine is the gum ammoniacum, which dear Dr. Lawrence used to give, but of which I never saw any effect. We will, if you please, let this medicine alone. The squills have every suffrage, and in the squills we will rest for the present. ”

“ Aug. 21. — The kindness which you show by having me in your thoughts upon all occasions will, I hope, always fill my heart with gratitude. Be pleased to return my thanks to Sir George Baker<sup>1</sup>, for the consideration which he has bestowed upon me. Is this the balloon that has been so long expected, this balloon<sup>2</sup> to which I subscribed, but without payment? It is pity that philosophers have been disappointed, and shame that they have been cheated; but I know not well how to prevent either. Of this experiment I have read nothing: where was it exhibited? and who was the man that ran away with so much money? Continue, dear Sir, to write often, and more at a time; for none of your prescriptions operate to their proper uses more certainly than your letters operate as cordials. ”

“ August 26. — I suffered you to escape last post without a letter, but you are not to expect such indulgence very often; for I write not so much because I have any thing to say, as because I hope for an answer; and the vacancy of my life here makes a letter of great value. I have here little company and little amusement; and, thus abandoned to the contemplation of my own miseries, I am something gloomy and depressed: this too I resist as I can, and find opium, I think, useful; but I seldom take more than one grain. Is not this strange weather? Winter absorbed the spring, and now autumn is come before we have had summer. But let not our kindness for each other imitate the inconstancy of the seasons. ”

“ Sept. 2. — Mr. Windham has been here to see me; he came, I think, forty miles out of his way, and staid about a day and a half; perhaps I make the time shorter than it was. Such conversation I shall not have again till I come back to the regions of literature; and there Windham is inter stellas Luna minores. ”

He then mentions the effects of certain medicines, as taken, and adds, —

“ Nature is recovering its original powers, and the functions returning to their proper state. God continue his mercies, and grant me to use them rightly ! ”

“ Sept. 9. — Do you know the Duke and Duchess of Devonshire? And have you ever seen Chatsworth? I was at Chatsworth on Monday: I had seen it before, but never when its owners were at home; I was very kindly received, and honestly pressed to stay; but I told them that a sick man is not a fit inmate of a great house. But I hope to go again some time. ”

“ Sept. 11. — I think nothing grows worse, but all rather better, except sleep, and that of late has been at its old pranks. Last evening, I felt what I had not known for a long time, an inclination to walk for amusement; I took a short walk, and came back again neither breathless nor fatigued. This has been a gloomy, frigid, ungenial summer; but of late it seems to mend; I hear the heat sometimes mentioned, but I do not feel it :

‘ Præterea minimus gelido jam in corpore sanguis Febre calet solâ. ’<sup>4</sup>

I hope, however, with good help, to find means of supporting a winter at home, and to hear and tell at the Club what is doing, and what ought to be doing, in the world. I have no company here, and shall naturally come home hungry for conversation. To wish you, dear Sir, more leisure, would not be kind; but what leisure you have, you must bestow upon me. ”

“ Sept. 16. — I have now let you alone for a long time, having indeed little to say. You charge me somewhat unjustly with luxury. At Chatsworth, you should remember that I have eaten but once; and the doctor, with whom I live, follows a milk diet. I grow no fatter, though my stomach, if it be not disturbed by physic, never fails me. I now grow weary of solitude, and think of removing next week to Lichfield, a place of more society, but otherwise of less convenience. When I am settled, I shall write again. Of the hot weather that you

<sup>1</sup> The eminent physician, who was created a Baronet in 1776, and died June 1809, ætat. 88. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> Does Dr. Johnson here allude to the unsuccessful attempt made, in 1784, by De Moret, who was determined to anticipate Lunardi in his first experiment in England? “ Moret attempted to inflate his balloon with rarefied air, but by some accident in the process it sunk upon the fire; and the populace, who regarded the whole as an imposture, rushing in, completely destroyed the machine. ” — Brayley’s Londiniana, vol. ii. p. 162. notc. — MARKLAND.

<sup>3</sup> It is remarkable that so good a Latin scholar as Johnson should have been so inattentive to the metre, as by mistake to have written stellas instead of ignes. — BOSWELL.

<sup>4</sup> “ Add that a fever only warms his veins,
And thaws the little blood which yet remains. ”

Juv. Sat. x. 217. Gifford. — C.

mentioned, we have [not] had in Derbyshire very much; and for myself I seldom feel heat, and suppose that my frigidity is the effect of my distemper — a supposition which naturally leads me to hope that a hotter climate may be useful. But I hope to stand another English winter."

"Lichfield, Sept. 29. — On one day I had three letters about the air-balloon<sup>1</sup>: yours was far the best, and has enabled me to impart to my friends in the country an idea of this species of amusement. In amusement, mere amusement, I am afraid it must end, for I do not find that its course can be directed so as that it should serve any purposes of communication; and it can give no new intelligence of the state of the air at different heights, till they have ascended above the height of mountains, which they seem never likely to do. I came hither on the 27th. How long I shall stay, I have not determined. My dropsy is gone, and my asthma is much remitted, but I have felt myself a little declining these two days, or at least to-day; but such vicissitudes must be expected. One day may be worse than another; but this last month is far better than the former; if the next should be as much better than this, I shall run about the town on my own legs."

"Oct. 6. — The fate of the balloon I do not much lament: to make new balloons is to repeat the jest again. We now know a method of mounting into the air, and, I think, are not likely to know more. The vehicles can serve no use till we can guide them; and they can gratify no curiosity till we mount with them to greater heights than we can reach without; till we rise above the tops of the highest mountains, which we have yet not done. We know the state of the air in all its regions, to the top of Teneriffe, and therefore learn nothing from those who navigate a balloon below the clouds. The first experiment, however, was bold, and deserved applause and reward: but since it has been performed, and its event is known, I had rather now find a medicine that can ease an asthma."

"Oct. 25. — You write to me with a zeal that animates and a tenderness that melts me. I am not afraid either of a journey to London, or a residence in it. I came down with little fatigue, and am now not weaker. In the smoky atmosphere I was delivered from the dropsy, which I consider as the original and radical disease. The town is my element<sup>2</sup>: there are my friends, there are my books, to which I have not yet bid farewell, and there are my amusements. Sir Joshua told me long ago, that my vocation was to public life; and I hope still to keep my station, till God shall bid me Go in peace."

<sup>1</sup> Lunardi had ascended from the Artillery Ground on the 15th of this month; and as it was the first ascent in a balloon which had been witnessed in England, it was not surprising that very general interest was excited by the spectacle, and that so many allusions should be made to it by Johnson and his correspondents. The late Lord Teutonia, whilst a student at Oxford, obtained a prize in this year, for his Latin verses entitled Globus Ærestaticus. — MARKLAND.

<sup>2</sup> His love of London continually appears. In a letter from him to Mrs. Smart, wife of his friend the poet, which is published in a well-written life of him, prefixed to an edition of his poems, in 1791, there is the following sentence: "To one that has passed so many years in the pleasures and opulence of London, there are few places that can give much delight." Once upon reading that line in the curious epitaph quoted in "The Spectator," —

JOHNSON TO MR. HOOLE.

"Ashbourne, Aug. 7.

"Since I was here, I have two little letters from you, and have not had the gratitude to write. But every man is most free with his best friends, because he does not suppose that they can suspect him of intentional incivility. One reason for my omission is, that being in a place to which you are wholly a stranger, I have no topics of correspondence. If you had any knowledge of Ashbourne, I could tell you of two Ashbourne men, who, being last week condemned at Derby to be hanged for robbery, went and hanged themselves in their cell. But this, however it may supply us with talk, is nothing to you. Your kindness, I know, would make you glad to hear some good of me, but I have not much good to tell: if I grow not worse, it is all that I can say. I hope Mrs. Hoole receives more help from her migration. Make her my compliments, and write again to, dear Sir, your affectionate servant."

"Aug. 13. — I thank you for your affectionate letter. I hope we shall both be the better for each other's friendship, and I hope we shall not very quickly be parted. Tell Mr. Nichols that I shall be glad of his correspondence when his business allows him a little remission; though to wish him less business, that I may have more pleasure, would be too selfish. To pay for seats at the balloon is not very necessary, because in less than a minute they who gaze at a mile's distance will see all that can be seen. About the wings, I am of your mind: they cannot at all assist it, nor I think regulate its motion. I am now grown somewhat easier in my body, but my mind is sometimes depressed. About the Club I am in no great pain. The forfeitures go on, and the house, I hear, is improved for our future meetings. I hope we shall meet often and sit long."

"Sept. 4. — Your letter was indeed long in coming, but it was very welcome. Our acquaintance has now subsisted long, and our recollection of each other involves a great space, and many little occurrences which melt the thoughts to tenderness. Write to me, therefore, as frequently as you can. I hear from Dr. Brocklesby and Mr. Ryland that the Club is not crowded. I hope we shall enliven it when winter brings us together."

JOHNSON TO DR. BURNEY.

"August 2.

"The weather, you know, has not been balmy. I am now reduced to think, and am at least content to talk, of the weather. Pride must have a fall.<sup>3</sup> I have lost dear Mr. Allen; and wherever he laughed, and said, "I do not wonder at this. It would have been strange if, born in London, he had died in New England." — BOSWELL.

"Born in New England, did in London die," —

<sup>3</sup> There was no information for which Dr. Johnson was less grateful than for that which concerned the weather. It was in allusion to his impatience with those who were reduced to keep conversation alive by observations on the weather, that he applied the old proverb to himself. If any one of his intimate acquaintance told him it was hot or cold, wet or dry, windy or calm, he would stop them by saying, "Poh! poh! you are telling us that of which none but men in a mine or a dungeon can be ignorant. Let us bear with patience, or enjoy in quiet, elementary changes, whether for the better or the worse, as they are never secrets." — BURNEY.

I turn, the dead or the dying meet my notice, and force my attention upon misery and mortality. Mrs. Burney's escape from so much danger, and her ease after so much pain, throws, however, some radiance of hope upon the gloomy prospect. May her recovery be perfect, and her continuance long! I struggle hard for life. I take physic and take air: my friend's chariot is always ready. We have run this morning twenty-four miles, and could run forty-eight more. But who can run the race with death?"

"Sept. 4." — [Concerning a private transaction, in which his opinion was asked, and after giving it, he makes the following reflections, which are applicable on other occasions.] "Nothing deserves more compassion than wrong conduct with good meaning; than loss or obloquy suffered by one who, as he is conscious only of good intentions, wonders why he loses that kindness which he wishes to preserve; and not knowing his own fault — if, as may sometimes happen, nobody will tell him — goes on to offend by his endeavours to please. I am delighted by finding that our opinions are the same. You will do me a real kindness by continuing to write. A post-day has now been long a day of recreation."

"Nov. 1. — Our correspondence paused for want of topics. I had said what I had to say on the matter proposed to my consideration, and nothing remained but to tell you that I waked or slept, that I was more or less sick. I drew my thoughts in upon myself, and supposed yours employed upon your book. That your book has been delayed I am glad, since you have gained an opportunity of being more exact. Of the caution necessary in adjusting narratives there is no end. Some tell what they do not know, that they may not seem ignorant, and others from mere indifference about truth. All truth is not, indeed, of equal importance: but if little violations are allowed, every violation will in time be thought little; and a writer should keep himself vigilantly on his guard against the first temptations to negligence or supineness. I had ceased to write, because respecting you I had no more to say, and respecting myself could say little good. I cannot boast of advancement; and in case of convalescence it may be said, with few exceptions, Non progredi est regredi. I hope I may be excepted. My great difficulty was with my sweet Fanny<sup>1</sup>, who, by her artifice of inserting her letter in yours, had given me a precept of frugality which I was not at liberty to neglect; and I know not who were in town under whose cover I could send my letter. I rejoice to hear that you are so well, and have a delight particularly sympathetic in the recovery of Mrs. Burney."

JOHNSON TO LANGTON.

"August 25.

"The kindness of your last letter, and my omission to answer it, begin to give you, even in my opinion, a right to recriminate, and to charge me with forgetfulness for the absent. I will therefore delay no longer to give an account of myself, and wish I could relate what would please either myself or my friend. On July 13. I left London, partly in hope of help from new air and change of place, and partly excited by the sick man's impatience of the present. I got to Lichfield in a stage vehicle, with very little fatigue, in two days, and had the consolation<sup>2</sup> to find that since my last visit my three old acquaintances are all dead. — July 20. I went to Ashbourne, where I have been till now. The house in which we live is repairing. I live in too much solitude, and am often deeply dejected. I wish we were nearer, and rejoice in your removal to London. A friend at once cheerful and serious is a great acquisition. Let us not neglect one another for the little time which Providence allows us to hope. Of my health I cannot tell you, what my wishes persuaded me to expect, that it is much improved by the season or by remedies. I am sleepless; my legs grow weary with a very few steps, and the water breaks its boundaries in some degree. The asthma, however, has remitted: my breath is still much obstructed, but is more free than it was. Nights of watchfulness produce torpid days. I read very little, though I am alone; for I am tempted to supply in the day what I lost in bed. This is my history; like all other histories, a narrative of misery. Yet I am so much better than in the beginning of the year, that I ought to be ashamed of complaining. I now sit and write with very little sensibility of pain or weakness; but when I rise, I shall find my legs betraying me. Of the money which you mentioned I have no immediate need: keep it, however, for me, unless some exigence requires it. Your papers I will show you certainly when you would see them; but I am a little angry at you for not keeping minutes of your own acceptum et expensum, and think a little time might be spared from Aristophanes for the res familiares. Forgive me, for I mean well. I hope, dear Sir, that you and Lady Rothes and all the young people, too many to enumerate, are well and happy. God bless you all."

JOHNSON TO WINDHAM.

August.

"The tenderness with which you have been pleased to treat me through my long illness, neither health nor sickness can, I hope, make me forget; and you are not to suppose that after we parted you were no longer in my mind. But what can a sick man say, but that he is sick? His thoughts are necessarily concentrated in himself: he neither receives nor can give delight; his inquiries are after alleviations of pain, and his efforts are to catch some momentary comfort. Though I am now in the neighbourhood of the Peak, you must expect no account of its wonders, of its hills, its waters, its caverns, or its mines; but I will tell you, dear Sir, what I hope you will not hear with less satisfaction, that, for about a week past, my asthma has been less afflictive."

"Lichfield, Oct. 2.<sup>3</sup> — I believe you had been

He says "pride must have a fall," in allusion to his own former assertions, that the weather had no effect on human health. See Idler, No. 11, and anti, p. 111. and 146. — CROKER.

<sup>1</sup> The celebrated Miss Fanny Burney. — BOSWELL.

<sup>2</sup> Mr. Malone thought that consolation was not the proper word, or that some epithet like sad or mournful was wanted before it: but I rather think that Johnson used the expression in sad irony. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>3</sup> Between these two letters Mr. Windham had visited him at Ashbourn. — CROKER, 1847.

long enough acquainted with the phenomena of sickness not to be surprised that a sick man wishes to be where he is not, and where it appears to every body but himself that he might easily be, without having the resolution to remove. I thought Ashbourne a solitary place, but did not come hither till last Monday. I have here more company, but my health has for this last week not advanced; and in the languor of disease how little can be done! Whither or when I shall make my next remove, I cannot tell; but I entreat you, dear Sir, to let me know from time to time where you may be found, for your residence is a very powerful attractive to, Sir, your most humble servant."

JOHNSON TO PERKINS.

"Lichfield, Oct. 4.

"I cannot but flatter myself that your kindness for me will make you glad to know where I am, and in what state. I have been struggling very hard with my diseases. My breath has been very much obstructed, and the water has attempted to encroach upon me again. I passed the first part of the summer at Oxford, afterwards I went to Lichfield, thence to Ashbourne in Derbyshire, and a week ago I returned to Lichfield. My breath is now much easier, and the water is in a great measure run away, so that I hope to see you again before winter. Please make my compliments to Mrs. Perkins, and to Mr. and Mrs. Barelay. I am, &c."

JOHNSON TO G. W. HAMILTON.

"Lichfield, Oct. 20.

"Considering what reason<sup>1</sup> you gave me in the spring to conclude that you took part in whatever good or evil might befall me, I ought not to have omitted so long the account which I am now about to give you. My diseases are an asthma and a dropsy, and what is less curable, seventy-five. Of the dropsy, in the beginning of the summer, or in the spring, I recovered to a degree which struck with wonder both me and my physicians: the asthma now is likewise for a time very much relieved. I went to Oxford, where the asthma was very tyrannical, and the dropsy began again to threaten me; but reasonable physic stopped the inundation: I then returned to London, and in July took a resolution to visit Staffordshire and Derbyshire, where I am yet struggling with my disease. The dropsy made another attack, and was not easily ejected, but at last gave way. The asthma suddenly remitted in bed on the 13th of August, and though now very oppressive, is, I think, still something gentler than it was before the remission. My limbs are miserably debilitated, and my nights are sleepless and tedious. When you read this, dear Sir, you are not sorry that I wrote no sooner. I will not prolong my complaints. I hope still to see you in a happier hour, to talk over what we have often talked, and perhaps to find new topics of merriment, or new incitements to curiosity. I am, &c."

<sup>1</sup> No doubt Mr. Hamilton's generous offer, antè, p. 742., though Johnson mentions as of the spring, what really happened in November. — CROKER.

JOHNSON TO PARADISE.

"Lichfield, Oct. 27.

"Though in all my summer's excursion I have given you no account of myself, I hope you think better of me than to imagine it possible for me to forget you, whose kindness to me has been too great and too constant not to have made its impression on a harder breast than mine. Silence is not very culpable, when nothing pleasing is suppressed. It would have alleviated none of your complaints to have read my vicissitudes of evil. I have struggled hard with very formidable and obstinate maladies; and though I cannot talk of health, think all praise due to my Creator and Preserver for the continuance of my life. The dropsy has made two attacks, and has given way to medicine; the asthma is very oppressive, but that has likewise once remitted. I am very weak and very sleepless; but it is time to conclude the tale of misery. I hope, dear Sir, that you grow better, for you have likewise your share of human evil, and that your lady and the young charmers are well."

JOHNSON TO GEORGE NICOL.<sup>2</sup>

"Ashbourne, August 19.

"Since we parted, I have been much oppressed by my asthma, but it has lately been less laborious. When I sit I am almost at ease; and I can walk, though yet very little, with less difficulty for this week past than before. I hope I shall again enjoy my friends, and that you and I shall have a little more literary conversation. Where I now am, every thing is very liberally provided for me but conversation. My friend is sick himself, and the reciprocation of complaints and groans affords not much of either pleasure or instruction. What we have not at home this town does not supply; and I shall be glad of a little imported intelligence, and hope that you will bestow, now and then, a little time on the relief and entertainment of, Sir, yours, &c."

JOHNSON TO CRUKSHANK.

"Ashbourne, Sept. 4.

"Do not suppose that I forget you: I hope I shall never be accused of forgetting my benefactors. I had, till lately, nothing to write but complaints upon complaints of miseries upon miseries; but within this fortnight I have received great relief. Have your lectures any vacation? If you are released from the necessity of daily study, you may find time for a letter to me. — [In this letter he states the particulars of his case.] — In return for this account of my health, let me have a good account of yours, and of your prosperity in all your undertakings."

JOHNSON TO T. DAVIES.

"August 11.

"The tenderness with which you always treat me makes me culpable in my own eyes for having omitted to write in so long a separation. I had, indeed, nothing to say that you could wish to hear. All has been hitherto misery accumulated upon misery, disease corroborating disease, till yesterday my asthma was perceptibly and unexpectedly mitigated. I am much comforted with this short relief, and am willing to flatter myself that it may continue and improve. I have at present such a degree of ease as not only may admit the comforts but the duties of life. Make my compliments to Mrs. Davies. — Poor dear Allen! — he was a good man."

<sup>2</sup> Bookseller to his Majesty. — BOSWELL.

JOHNSON TO REYNOLDS.

"Ashbourne, July 12.

"The tenderness with which I am treated by my friends makes it reasonable to suppose that they are desirous to know the state of my health, and a desire so benevolent ought to be gratified. — I came to Lichfield in two days without any painful fatigue, and on Monday came hither, where I purpose to stay and try what air and regularity will effect. I cannot yet persuade myself that I have made much progress in recovery. My sleep is little, my breath is very much encumbered, and my legs are very weak. The water has increased a little, but has again run off. The most distressing symptom is want of sleep."

"Aug. 19. — Having had since our separation little to say that could please you or myself by saying, I have not been lavish of useless letters; but I flatter myself that you will partake of the pleasure with which I can now tell you that, about a week ago, I felt suddenly a sensible remission of my asthma, and consequently a greater lightness of action and motion. — Of this grateful alleviation I know not the cause, nor dare depend upon its continuance; but while it lasts I endeavour to enjoy it, and am desirous of communicating, while it lasts, my pleasure to my friends. — Hitherto, dear Sir, I had written before the post, which stays in this town but a little while, brought me your letter. Mr. Davies seems to have represented my little tendency to recover in terms too splendid. I am still restless, still weak, still watery, but the asthma is less oppressive. — Poor Ramsay!<sup>1</sup> On which side soever I turn, mortality presents its formidable frown. I left three old friends at Lichfield when I was last there, and now found them all dead. I no sooner lost sight of dear Allan, than I am told that I shall see him no more. That we must all die, we always knew; I wish I had sooner remembered it. Do not think me intrusive or importunate, if I now call, dear Sir, on you to remember it."

"Sept. 2. — I am glad that a little favour from the court has intercepted your furious purposes.<sup>2</sup> I could not in any case have approved such public violence of resentment, and should have considered any who encouraged it as rather seeking sport for themselves than honour for you. Resentment gratifies him who intended an injury, and pains him unjustly who did not intend it. But all this is now superfluous. — I still continue, by God's mercy, to mend. My breath is easier, my nights are quieter, and my legs are less in bulk and stronger in use. I have, however, yet a great deal to overcome before I can yet attain even an old man's health. — Write, do write to me now and then. We are now old acquaintance, and perhaps few people have lived so much and so long together with less cause of complaint on either side. The retrospection of this is very pleasant, and I hope we shall never think on each other with less kindness."

"Sept. 9. — I could not answer your letter before this day, because I went on the sixth to Chatsworth, and did not come back till the post was gone. Many words, I hope, are not necessary between you and me to convince you what gratitude is excited in my heart by the chancellor's liberality and your kind offices. I did not indeed expect that what was asked by the chancellor would have been refused<sup>3</sup>; but since it has, we will not tell that any thing has been asked. — I have enclosed a letter to the chancellor, which, when you have read it, you will be pleased to seal with a head or other general seal, and convey it to him. Had I sent it directly to him, I should have seemed to overlook the favour of your intervention. — My last letter told you of my advance in health, which, I think, in the whole still continues. Of the hydropic tumour there is now very little appearance: the asthma is much less troublesome, and seems to remit something day after day. I do not despair of supporting an English winter. — At Chatsworth, I met young Mr. Burke, who led me very commodiously into conversation with the duke and duchess. We had a very good morning. The dinner was public."

"Sept. 18. — I flattered myself that this week would have given me a letter from you, but none has come. Write to me now and then, but direct your next to Lichfield. — I think, and I hope am sure, that I still grow better. I have sometimes good nights, but am still in my legs weak, but so much mended, that I go to Lichfield in hope of being able to pay my visits on foot, for there are no coaches. — I have three letters this day, all about the balloon: I could have been content with one. Do not write about the balloon, whatever else you may think proper to say."

"Oct. 2. — I am always proud of your approbation, and therefore was much pleased that you liked my letter [antè, p. 781.]. When you copied it, you invaded the chancellor's right rather than mine. — The refusal I did not expect, but I had never thought much about it, for I doubted whether the chancellor had so much tenderness for me as to ask. He, being keeper of the king's conscience ought not to be supposed capable of an improper petition. — All is not gold that glitters, as we have often been told; and the adage is verified in your place and my favour<sup>4</sup>; but if what happens does not make us richer, we must bid it welcome if it

<sup>1</sup> Ramsay, who died August 10, 1784, at. 71. — BOSWELL. Antè, p. 579, n. 3. — C.

<sup>2</sup> This no doubt refers to the intention of Sir Joshua to resign the chair of the Academy: a purpose which, though at this time abandoned, he executed in Feb. 1790; but he resumed the chair again within a month. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> See antè, p. 772. et seq. There is much obscurity in this matter. It appears that Sir Joshua understood Lord Thurlow in his verbal communication (antè, p. 780.) to have represented his request as rejected, though in the letter of the 18th of November he says the contrary. Perhaps the solution may be, that Lord Thurlow happened at the moment to be as he often was, on bad terms with Mr. Pitt, in whose specific department the increase of a pension would be, and that he did not like to speak to him on the subject. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> Johnson seems to have imagined, as Boswell did, that the objection was from the King, which we have seen was not the fact. — CROKER.

makes us wiser. — I do not at present grow better, nor much worse. My hopes, however, are somewhat abated, and a very great loss is the loss of hope; but I struggle as I can."

[JOHNSON TO DR. HEBERDEN

"Lichfield, 13th October, 1784.

"Though I doubt not but Dr. Brocklesby would communicate to you any incident in the variation of my health which appeared either curious or important, yet I think it time to give you some account of myself.

"Not long after the first great efflux of the water, I attained as much vigour of limbs and freedom of breath, that without rest or intermission, I went with Dr. Brocklesby to the top of the painters' Academy. This was the greatest degree of health that I have obtained, and this, if it could continue, were perhaps sufficient; but my breath soon failed, and my body grew weak.

"At Oxford (in June) I was much distressed by shortness of breath, so much that I never attempted to scale the Library: the water gained upon me, but by the use of squills was in a great measure driven away.

"In July I went to Lichfield, and performed the journey with very little fatigue in the common vehicle, but found no help from my native air. I then removed to Ashbourne, in Derbyshire, where for some time I was oppressed very heavily by the asthma; and the dropsy had advanced so far, that I could not without great difficulty button me at my knees. * * *

"No hydropical humour has been lately visible. The relaxation of my breath has not continued as it was at first, but neither do I breathe with the same angustia and distress as before the remission. The summary of my state is this:

"I am deprived, by weakness and the asthma, of the power of walking beyond a very short space.

"I draw my breath with difficulty upon the least effort, but not with suffocation or pain.

"The dropsy still threatens, but gives way to medicine.

"The summer has passed without giving me any strength.

"My appetite is, I think, less keen than it was, but not so abated as that its decline can be observed by any but myself.

"Be pleased to think on me sometimes. I am, Sir, your most obliged and most humble servant,
— MS. "SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHNSON TO JOHN NICHOLS.<sup>1</sup>

"Lichfield, Oct. 20.

"When you were here, you were pleased, as I am told, to think my absence an inconvenience. I should certainly have been very glad to give so skilful a lover of antiquities any information about my native place, of which, however, I know not much, and have reason to believe that not much is known. — Though I have not given you any amusement, I have received amusement from you. At Ashbourne, where I had very little company, I had the luck to borrow 'Mr. Bowyer's Life;' a book so full of contemporary history, that a literary man must find some of his old friends. I thought that I could, now and then, have told you some hints worth your notice; and perhaps we may talk a life over. I hope we shall be much together; you must now be to me what you were before, and what dear Mr. Allen was besides. He was taken unexpectedly away; but I think he was a very good man. — I have made little progress in recovery. I am very weak and very sleepless; but I live on and hope."

[JOHNSON TO HAWKINS.

"Lichfield, 7th November, 1784.

"I am relapsing into the dropsy very fast, and shall make such haste to town that it will be useless to write to me; but when I come, let me have the benefit of your advice, and the consolation of your company."]
— Life.

This various mass of correspondence, which I have thus brought together, is valuable, both as an addition to the store which the public already has of Johnson's writings, and as exhibiting a genuine and noble specimen of vigour and vivacity of mind, which neither age nor sickness could impair or diminish.

It may be observed, that his writing in every way, whether for the public or privately to his friends, was by fits and starts; for we see frequently that many letters are written on the same day. When he had once overcome his aversion to begin, he was, I suppose, desirous to go on, in order to relieve his mind from the uneasy reflection of delaying what he ought to do.

While in the country, notwithstanding the accumulation of illness which he endured, his mind did not lose its powers. He translated an ode of Horace [lib. iv. ode vii.], which is printed in his works, and composed several prayers. I shall insert one of them, which is so wise and energetic, so philosophical and so pious, that I doubt not of its affording consolation to many a sincere Christian, when in a state of mind to which I believe the best are sometimes liable.

"Against inquisitive and perplexing Thoughts.

"O Lord, my maker and protector, who hast

<sup>1</sup> Communicated to me by Dr. Heberden, jun. — CROKER. "Dr. Johnson being asked in his last illness what physician he had sent for — 'Dr. Heberden,' replied he, 'ultimus Romanorum — the last of our learned physicians.'" — Nichols's Ance. vol. vi. 598. — MARKLAND. I do not believe this anecdote. Mr. Nichols does not give any authority, nor is it stated to whom or when exactly it was said; and I cannot think that Johnson could have thus insulted the other eminent medical friends who crowded to his bedside, whom he gratefully called his "benefactors," and particularly the learned as well as generous Brocklesby. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>2</sup> This very respectable man, who contributed so largely to the literary and topographical history of his country, died in 1826, at the advanced age of eighty-two. "His long life," as his friend and biographer, Mr. Alexander Chalmers, has truly observed, "was spent in the promotion of useful knowledge." The Life of Bowyer, to which Johnson refers, was republished in 1812-15, with large additions, in nine vols. 8vo., under the title of "Literary Anecdotes of the Eighteenth Century." It is a storehouse of facts and dates, and every man interested in literary biography must own the vast obligations which are due to its indefatigable compiler. — MARKLAND. The last six volumes are of comparatively little value for want of an index. — CROKER, 1847.

graciously sent me into this world to work out my salvation, enable me to drive from me all such unquiet and perplexing thoughts as may mislead or hinder me in the practice of those duties which thou hast required. When I behold the works of thy hands, and consider the course of thy providence, give me grace always to remember that thy thoughts are not my thoughts, nor thy ways my ways. And while it shall please thee to continue me in this world, where much is to be done and little to be known, teach me, by thy Holy Spirit, to withdraw my mind from unprofitable and dangerous inquiries, from difficulties vainly curious, and doubts impossible to be solved. Let me rejoice in the light which thou hast imparted; let me serve thee with active zeal and humble confidence, and wait with patient expectation for the time in which the soul which thou receivest shall be satisfied with knowledge. Grant this, O Lord, for Jesus Christ's sake. Amen."

And here I am enabled fully to refute a very unjust reflection, by Sir John Hawkins, both against Dr. Johnson and his faithful servant Mr. Francis Barber; as if both of them had been guilty of culpable neglect towards a person of the name of Heely, whom Sir John chooses to call a relation of Dr. Johnson's. The fact is, that Mr. Heely was not his relation: he had indeed been married to one of his cousins, but she had died without having children, and he had married another woman; so that even the slight connection which there once had been by alliance was dissolved. Dr. Johnson, who had shown very great liberality to this man while his first wife was alive, as has appeared in a former part of this work [p. 183.], was humane and charitable enough to continue his bounty to him occasionally; but surely there was no strong call of duty upon him or upon his legatee to do more. The following letter, obligingly communicated to me by Mr. Andrew Strahan, will confirm what I have stated:—

JOHNSON TO HEELY,

No. 5. in Pye-Street, Westminster.

"Ashbourne, Aug. 12. 1784.

"SIR, — As necessity obliges you to call so soon again upon me, you should at least have told the smallest sum that will supply your present want: you cannot suppose that I have much to spare. Two guineas is as much as you ought to be behind with your creditor. If you wait on Mr. Strahan, in New-Street, Fetter-Lane, or, in his absence, on Mr. Andrew Strahan, show this, by which they are entreated to advance you two guineas, and to keep this as a voucher. I am, Sir, your humble servant,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

Indeed it is very necessary to keep in mind that Sir John Hawkins has unaccountably viewed Johnson's character and conduct in almost every particular with an unhappy prejudice. I shall add one instance only to those which I have thought it incumbent on me to point out. Talking of Mr. Garrick's having signified his willingness to let Johnson have the loan of any of his books to assist him in his edition of Shakspeare, Sir John says (p. 444.), "Mr. Garrick knew not what risk he ran by this offer. Johnson had so strange a forgetfulness of obligations of this sort, that few who lent him books ever saw them again." This surely conveys a most unfavourable insinuation, and has been so understood.<sup>1</sup> Sir John mentions the single case of a curious edition of Politian, which he tells us appeared to belong to Pembroke College, which probably has been considered by Johnson as his own for upwards of fifty years. Would it not be fairer to consider this as an inadvertence, and draw no general inference? The truth is, that Johnson was so attentive, that in one of his manuscripts in my possession he has marked in two columns books borrowed and books lent.

In Sir John Hawkins's compilation there are, however, some passages concerning Johnson which have unquestionable merit. One of them I shall transcribe, in justice to a writer whom I have had too much occasion to censure, and to show my fairness as the biographer of my illustrious friend: "There was wanting in his conduct and behaviour that dignity which results from a regular and orderly course of action, and by an irresistible power commands esteem. He could not be said to be a staid man, nor so to have adjusted in his mind the balance of reason and passion, as to give occasion to say, what may be observed, of some men, that all they do is just, fit, and right." Yet a judicious friend well suggests, "It might, however, have been added, that such men are often merely just, and rigidly correct, while their hearts are cold and unfeeling: and that Johnson's virtues were of a much higher tone than those of the staid orderly man here described."

We now behold Johnson for the last time in his native city, for which he ever retained a warm affection, and which by a sudden apostrophe, under the word Lich, he introduces with reverence into his immortal work, "The English Dictionary:"—" Salve magna parens!"<sup>2</sup> While here, he felt a revival of all the tenderness of filial affection, an instance of which appeared in his ordering the grave-

<sup>1</sup> This surely is over-stated. There are many proofs that Johnson was slovenly in such matters, but no one ever thought it an imputation of so grave a nature as Boswell here represents it. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> The following circumstance, mutually to the honour of Johnson and the corporation of his native city, has been communicated to me by the Rev. Dr. Vyse from the town clerk:—

"Mr. Simpson has now before him a record of the respect and veneration which the corporation of Lichfield, in the year 1767, had for the merits and learning of Dr. Johnson. His father built the corner house in the market-place, the two fronts of which, towards Market and Broad-market Street, stood upon waste land of the corporation, under a forty years' lease, which was then expired. On the 15th of August, 1767, at a common-hall of the bailiffs and citizens, it stones and inscription over Elizabeth Blancy (see p. 5.) to be substantially and carefully renewed.

To Mr. Henry White<sup>1</sup>, a young clergyman, with whom he now formed an intimacy, so as to talk to him with great freedom, he mentioned that he could not in general accuse himself of having been an undutiful son. "Once, indeed," said he, "I was disobedient: I refused to attend my father to Uttoxeter market. Pride was the source of that refusal, and the remembrance of it was painful. A few years ago I desired to atone for this fault. I went to Uttoxeter in very bad weather, and stood for a considerable time bare-headed in the rain, on the spot where my father's stall used to stand. In contrition I stood, and I hope the penance was expiatory."<sup>2</sup>

"I told him," says Miss Seward, "in one of my latest visits to him, of a wonderful learned pig which I had seen at Nottingham; and which did all that we have observed exhibited by dogs and horses. The subject amused him. 'Then,' said he, 'the pigs are a race unjustly calumniated. Pig has, it seems, not been wanting to man, but man to pig. We do not allow time for his education; we kill him at a year old.' Mr. Henry White, who was present, observed that if this instance had happened in or before Pope's time, he would not have been justified in instancing the swine as the lowest degree of grovelling instinct. Dr. Johnson seemed pleased with the observation, while the person who made it proceeded to remark, that great torture must have been employed, ere the indocility of the animal could have been subdued. — 'Certainly,' said the Doctor; 'but,' turning to me, 'how old is your pig?' I told him, three years old. 'Then,' said he, 'the pig has no cause to complain; he would have been killed the first year if he had not been educated, and protracted existence is a good recompence for very considerable degrees of torture.'"

As Johnson had now very faint hopes of recovery, and as Mrs. Thrale was no longer devoted to him, it might have been supposed that he would naturally have chosen to remain in the comfortable house of his beloved wife's daughter, and end his life where he began it. But there was in him an animated and lofty spirit<sup>3</sup>; and however complicated diseases might depress ordinary mortals, all who saw him beheld and acknowledged the invictum animum Catonis.<sup>4</sup> Such was his intellectual ardour even at this time, that he said to one friend, "Sir, I look upon every day to be lost in which I do not make a new acquaintance;" and to another, when talking of his illness, "I will be conquered; I will not capitulate." And such was his love of London, so high a relish had he of its magnificent extent and variety of intellectual entertainment, that he languished when absent from it, his mind having become quite luxurious from the long habit of enjoying the metropolis; and, therefore, although at Lichfield, surrounded with friends who loved and revered him, and for whom he had a very sincere affection, he still found that such conversation as London affords could be found nowhere else. These feelings, joined probably to some flattering hopes of aid from the eminent physicians and surgeons in London, who kindly and generously attended him without accepting fees, made him resolve to return to the capital.

From Lichfield he came to Birmingham, where he passed a few days with his worthy old schoolfellow, Mr. Hector, who thus writes to me:

"He was very solicitous with me to recollect some of our most early transactions, and transmit them to him, for I perceived nothing gave him greater pleasure than calling to mind those days of our innocence. I complied with his request, and he only received them a few days before his death. I have transcribed for your inspection exactly the minutes I wrote to him."

This paper having been found in his repositories after his death, Sir John Hawkins has inserted it entire, and I have made occasional use of it and other communications from Mr. Hector<sup>5</sup> in the course of this work. I have was ordered (and that without any solicitation), that a lease should be granted to Samuel Johnson, Doctor of Laws, of the encroachments at his house, for the term of ninety-nine years, at the old rent, which was five shillings: of which, as town clerk, Mr. Simpson had the honour and pleasure of informing him, and that he was desired to accept it without paying any fine on the occasion; which lease was afterwards granted, and the doctor died possessed of this property." — BOSWELL. I disbelieve that Johnson's father built the house, and I am satisfied the lease was only of the encroachment, made by a shop window jutting out into the street. — CROKER.

<sup>1</sup> Sacrist and one of the vicars of Lichfield Cathedral, 1831. — MAHLAND.

<sup>2</sup> This story is told in more detail in Warner's "Tour through the Northern Counties of England," 1802. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> Mr. Burke suggested to me, as applicable to Johnson, what Cicero, in his "Cato Major," says of Appian: "Intum enim animo, tanquam arcum, habebat, nec languescens succumbebat senectuti." [His mind was strung like a bow, nor did he yield to the languor of old age]; repeating at the same time, the following noble words in the same passage: "Ita enim senectus honesta est, si seipsa defendit, si jus suum retinet, si nemini emancipata est, si usque ad extre-mum vite spiritum vindicta jus suum;" [Old age is honourable if it defends itself; if it maintains its rights; if it does not surrender itself; if to the last breath of life it vindicates its rights.] — BOSWELL.

<sup>4</sup> [The stubborn mind of Cato.] Atracem animo Catonis are Horace's words, and it may be doubted whether atrox is used by any other original writer in the same sense. Stubborn is perhaps the most correct translation of this epithet. — MALONE.

<sup>5</sup> It is a most agreeable circumstance attending the publication of this work, that Mr. Hector has survived his illustrious schoolfellow so many years; that he still retains his health and spirits; and has gratified me with the following acknowledgment: "I thank you, most sincerely thank you, for the great and long-continued entertainment your Life of Dr. Johnson has afforded me, and others of my particular friends." Mr. Hector, besides setting me right as to the verses on a Sprig of Myrtle (see ante, p. 21. n. 1.), has favoured me with two English odes, written by Dr. Johnson at an early period of his life, which will appear in my edition of his poems. — BOSWELL. This early and worthy friend of Johnson died at Birmingham, 2d of September, 1794. — MALONE.

both visited and corresponded with him since Dr. Johnson's death, and by my inquiries concerning a great variety of particulars, have obtained additional information. I followed the same mode with the Reverend Dr. Taylor, in whose presence I wrote down a good deal of what he could tell; and he, at my request, signed his name, to give it authenticity. It is very rare to find any person who is able to give a distinct account of the life even of one whom he has known intimately, without questions being put to them. My friend Dr. Kippis has told me, that on this account it is a practice with him to draw out a biographical catechism.

Johnson then proceeded to Oxford, where he was again kindly received by Dr. Adams<sup>1</sup>, who was pleased to give me the following account in one of his letters (Feb. 17th, 1785):—

“His last visit was, I believe, to my house, which he left, after a stay of four or five days. We had much serious talk together, for which I ought to be the better as long as I live. You will remember some discourse which we had in the summer upon the subject of prayer, and the difficulty of this sort of composition. He reminded me of this, and of my having wished him to try his hand, and to give us a specimen of his style and manner

<sup>1</sup> This amiable and excellent man survived Dr. Johnson about four years, having died in January, 1789, at Gloucester, aged 82. A very just character of Dr. Adams may be found in the Gent. Mag. for 1789, vol. lix. p. 214. — MALONE.

<sup>2</sup> It appears, however, that in the interval between these two visits to Oxford, and indeed within a few days of the last, Johnson had made some preparatory notes towards this purpose. In Mr. Anderson's MSS. I found the following notes:—

“PRECES.

- “— Against the incursion of evil thoughts.
- “— Repentance and pardon. — Laud.
- “— In disease.
- “— On the loss of friends — by death; by his own fault or friend's.
- “— On the unexpected notice of the death of others.

- “Prayer generally recommendatory;
- “To understand their prayers;
- “Under dread of death;
- “Prayer commonly considered as a stated and temporary duty — performed and forgotten — without any effect on the following day.
- “Prayer — a vow. — Taylor.

“SCEPTICISM CAUSED BY

- “1. Indifference about opinions.
  - “2. Supposition that things disputed are disputable.
  - “3. Demand of unsuitable evidence.
  - “4. False judgment of evidence.
  - “5. Complaint of the obscurity of Scripture.
  - “6. Contempt of fathers and of authority.
  - “7. Absurd method of learning objections first.
  - “8. Study not for truth, but vanity.
  - “9. Sensuality and a vicious life.
  - “10. False honour, false shame.
  - “11. Omission of prayer and religious exercises.
- Oct. 31. 1784.”

The first part of these notes seems to be a classification of prayers; the two latter, hints for the discourse on prayer which he intended to prefix. The chief value of this sketch is as an additional proof that the prayers published by Dr. Strahan was not the methodised system of prayers which Dr. Adams and Johnson had talked of, and for which, it seems, he had made the foregoing preparatory scheme. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> There are some errors in the foregoing statement relative to that he approved. He added that he was now in a right frame of mind; and as he could not possibly employ his time better, he would in earnest set about it. But I find upon inquiry that no papers of this sort were left behind him, except a few short ejaculatory forms suitable to his present situation.”<sup>2</sup>

Dr. Adams had not then received accurate information on this subject: for it has since appeared that various prayers had been composed by him at different periods, which, intermingled with pious resolutions and some short notes of his life, were entitled by him “Prayers and Meditations,” and have, in pursuance of his earnest requisition, in the hopes of doing good, been published, with a judicious well-written preface, by the Reverend Mr. Strahan, to whom he delivered them. This admirable collection, to which I have frequently referred in the course of this work, evinces, beyond all his compositions for the public, and all the eulogies of his friends and admirers, the sincere virtue and piety of Johnson. It proves with unquestionable authenticity, that, amidst all his constitutional infirmities, his earnestness to conform his practice to the precepts of Christianity was unceasing, and that he habitually endeavoured to refer every transaction of his life to the will of the Supreme Being.<sup>3</sup> to the Prayers and Meditations, which, — considering the effect of that publication on Dr. Johnson's character, and Boswell's zealous claims to accuracy in all such matters — are rather strange. Indeed, it seems as if Boswell had read either too hastily, or not at all, the preface to Dr. Strahan's book. In the first place, the collection was not made, as Mr. Boswell seems to suppose, by Dr. Johnson himself; nor did he give it the designation of “Prayers and Meditations,” nor do the original papers bear any appearance of being intended for the press — quite the contrary! Dr. Strahan's preface is not so clear on this point as it ought to have been; but even from it we learn that whatever Johnson's intentions may have been, as to revising and collecting for publication his own prayers, or (as the extract just quoted rather proves) composing a system of prayer; he in fact did nothing of the kind; but at first placed (inter movendum) a confused mass of papers in Dr. Strahan's hands; and from the inspection of the papers themselves it is quite evident that Dr. Strahan thought proper to weave into one work materials that were never intended to come together, and were not and never could have been intended for publication. This consideration is important, because (as has been before observed, but cannot be too often repeated) the prayers are mixed up with notices and memoranda of Dr. Johnson's conduct and thoughts (called by Dr. Strahan, “Meditations”), which — affecting and edifying as they may be when read as the secret effusions of a good man's conscience — would have a very different character if they could be supposed to be left behind him ostentatiously prepared for publication. Mr. Courtenay in his “Review of Dr. Johnson's character,” plainly expressed his disbelief of Dr. Strahan's statement, and the following letter from Dr. Adams to the Gentleman's Magazine sufficiently indicates his opinion of the publication.

“Oxford, 22d Oct. 1785.

“MR. URBAN, — In your last month's review of books, you have asserted, that the publication of Dr. Johnson's ‘Prayers and Meditations’ appears to have been at the instance of Dr. Adams, Master of Pembroke College, Oxford. This, I think, is more than you are warranted by the editor's preface to say; and is so far from being true, that Dr. Adams never saw a line of these compositions before they appeared in print, nor ever heard from Dr. Johnson, or the editor, that any such existed. Had he been consulted about the publication, he would certainly have given his voice against it; and he therefore hopes that you will clear him, in as public a manner as you can, from being any way accessory to it.

“W. M. ADAMS.” — COURTENAY.

Dr. Strahan's conduct in this whole affair seems to me to have been disingenuous and even culpable in the highest degree. — CROKER.

He arrived in London on the 16th of November, and next day sent to Dr. Burney the following note, which I insert as the last token of his remembrance of that ingenious and amiable man, and as another of the many proofs of the tenderness and benignity of his heart:—

“Mr. Johnson, who came home last night, sends his respects to dear Dr. Burney and all the dear Burneys, little and great.”

JOHNSON TO HECTOR,

In Birmingham.

“London, Nov. 17. 1784.

“DEAR SIR,—I did not reach Oxford until Friday morning, and then I sent Francis to see the balloon fly, but could not go myself. I staid at Oxford till Tuesday, and then came in the common vehicle easily to London. I am as I was, and having seen Dr. Brocklesby, am to ply the squills: but, whatever be their efficacy, this world must soon pass away. Let us think seriously on our duty. I send my kindest respects to dear Mrs. Careless: let me have the prayers of both. We have all lived long, and must soon part. God have mercy on us, for the sake of our Lord Jesus Christ. Amen. I am, &c., SAM. JOHNSON.”

His correspondence with me, after his letter on the subject of my settling in London, shall now, so far as is proper, be produced in one series. July 26. he wrote to me from Ashbourne:—

“On the 14th, I came to Lichfield, and found every body glad enough to see me. On the 20th I came hither, and found a house half-built, of very uncomfortable appearance; but my own room has not been altered. That a man worn with diseases, in his seventy-second or third year, should condemn part of his remaining life to pass among ruins and rubbish, and that no inconsiderable part, appears to me very strange. I know that your kindness makes you impatient to know the state of my health, in which I cannot boast of much improvement. I came through the journey without much inconvenience, but when I attempt self-motion I find my legs weak, and my breath very short: this day I have been much disordered. I have no company; the doctor [Taylor] is busy in his fields, and goes to bed at nine, and his whole system is so different from mine, that we seem formed for different elements; I have, therefore, all my amusement to seek within myself.”

Having written to him in bad spirits a letter filled with dejection and fretfulness<sup>1</sup>, and at the same time expressing anxious apprehensions concerning him, on account of a dream which had disturbed me; his answer was chiefly in terms of reproach, for a supposed charge of “affecting discontent, and indulging the vanity of complaint.” It, however, proceeded:—

<sup>1</sup> Dr. Johnson and others of Mr. Boswell's friends used to describe and therefore ridicule his mental inquietudes—that “Jenny Boswell” should be afflicted with melancholy, was what none of his acquaintance could imagine; and as he seemed sometimes to make a parade of these miseries, they thought he was aping Dr. Johnson, who was admitted to be

“Write to me often, and write like a man. I consider your fidelity and tenderness as a great part of the comforts which are yet left me, and sincerely wish we could be nearer to each other.”

“My dear friend, life is very short and very uncertain; let us spend it as well as we can. My worthy neighbour, Allen, is dead. Love me as well as you can. Pay my respects to dear Mrs. Boswell. Nothing ailed me at that time; let your superstition at last have an end.”

Feeling very soon that the manner in which he had written might hurt me, he, two days afterwards (July 28.), wrote to me again, giving me an account of his sufferings; after which he thus proceeds:—

“Before this letter you will have had one which I hope you will not take amiss; for it contains only truth, and that truth kindly intended. Spartam quam nactus es orna; make the most and best of your lot, and compare yourself not with the few that are above you, but with the multitudes which are below you. Go steadily forwards with lawful business or honest diversions. ‘Be,’ as Temple says of the Dutchmen, ‘well when you are not ill, and pleased when you are not angry.’ This may seem but an ill return for your tenderness; but I mean it well, for I love you with great ardour and sincerity. Pay my respects to dear Mrs. Boswell, and teach the young ones to love me.”

I unfortunately was so much indisposed during a considerable part of the year, that it was not, or at least I thought it was not, in my power to write to my illustrious friend as formerly, or without expressing such complaints as offended him. Having conjured him not to do me the injustice of charging me with affectation, I was with much regret long silent. His last letter to me then came, and affected me very tenderly:—

JOHNSON TO BOSWELL.

“Lichfield, Nov. 5. 1784.

“DEAR SIR,—I have this summer sometimes amended, and sometimes relapsed, but, upon the whole, have lost ground very much. My legs are extremely weak, and my breath very short, and the water is now increasing upon me. In this uncomfortable state your letters used to relieve; what is the reason that I have them no longer? Are you sick, or are you sullen? Whatever be the reason, if it be less than necessity, drive it away; and of the short life that we have, make the best use for yourself and for your friends. . . . I am sometimes afraid that your omission to write has some real cause, and shall be glad to know that you are not sick, and that nothing ill has befallen dear Mrs. Boswell, or any of your family. I am, &c., SAM. JOHNSON.”

really a sufferer, though he endeavoured to conceal it. But after all, there can be no doubt that Boswell was liable to great inequalities of spirits, which will account for many of the peculiarities of his character, and should induce us to pity what his contemporaries laughed at.—CROKER.

Yet it was not a little painful to me to find that in a paragraph of this letter, which I have omitted, he still persevered in arraigning me as before, which was strange in him who had so much experience of what I suffered. I, however, wrote to him two as kind letters as I could; the last of which came too late to be read by him, for his illness increased more rapidly upon him than I had apprehended; but I had the consolation of being informed that he spoke of me on his death-bed with affection, and I look forward with humble hope of renewing our friendship in a better world.

I now relieve the readers of this work from any farther personal notice of its author; who, if he should be thought to have obtruded himself too much upon their attention, requests them to consider the peculiar plan of his biographical undertaking.

Soon after Johnson's return to the metropolis, both the asthma and dropsy became more violent and distressful. He had for some time kept a journal in Latin of the state of his illness, and the remedies which he used, under the title of Ægri Ephemeris, which he began on the 6th of July, but continued it no longer than the 8th of November; finding, I suppose, that it was a mournful and unavailing register. It is in my possession; and is written with great care and accuracy.

Still his love of literature<sup>1</sup> did not fail. A very few days before his death he transmitted to his friend, Mr. John Nichols, a list of the authors of the Universal History, mentioning their several shares in that work.<sup>2</sup> It has, according to his direction, been deposited in the British Museum, and is printed in the Gentleman's Magazine for December, 1784.

As the letter accompanying this list (which fully supports the above observation) was written but a week before Dr. Johnson's death, the reader may not be displeased to find it here preserved:—

JOHNSON TO NICHOLS.

“December 6. 1784.

“The late learned Mr. Swinton, having one day remarked that one man, meaning, I suppose, no man but himself, could assign all the parts of the Ancient Universal History to their proper authors, at the request of Sir Robert Chambers, or of myself, gave the account which I now transmit to you in his own hand; being willing that of so great a work the history should be known, and that each writer should receive his due proportion of praise from posterity.

“I recommend to you to preserve this scrap of literary intelligence in Mr. Swinton's own hand, or to deposit it in the Museum, that the veracity of this account may never be doubted. I am, Sir, your most humble servant,
SAM. JOHNSON.”

Mr. [Swinton.]

The History of the Carthaginians.	The History of the Cyrenaica.
Numidians.	Marmarica.
Mauritanians.	Regio Syrtica.
Gætulians.	Turks, Tartars, and Moguls.
Garamanthes.	Indians.
Melano Gætulians.	Chinese.
Nigrita.

Dissertation on the Peopling of America.

Independency of the Arabs.
The Cosmogony, and a small part of the History immediately following; by Mr. Sale.

To the birth of Abraham; chiefly by Mr. Shelveock.

History of the Jews, Gauls, and Spaniards; by Mr. Psalmanazar.

Xenophon's Retreat; by the same.

History of the Persians and the Constantinopolitan Empire; by Dr. Campbell.

History of the Romans; by Mr. Bower.

During his sleepless nights he amused himself by translating into Latin verse, from the Greek, many of the epigrams in the “Anthologia.” These translations, with some other poems by him in Latin, he gave to his friend Mr. Langton, who, having added a few notes, sold them to the booksellers for a small sum to be given to some of Johnson's relations, which was accordingly done; and they are printed in the collection of his works.

A very erroneous notion had circulated as to Johnson's deficiency in the knowledge of the Greek language, partly owing to the modesty<sup>3</sup> with which, from knowing how much there was <sup>1</sup> It is truly wonderful to consider the extent and constancy of Johnson's literary ardour, notwithstanding the melancholy which clouded and embittered his existence. Besides the numerous and various works which he executed, he had, at different times, formed schemes of a great many more, of which the following catalogue [see Appendix] was given by him to Mr. Langton, and by that gentleman presented to his Majesty.—BOSWELL. This catalogue, as Mr. Boswell calls it, is, by Dr. Johnson himself, intitled “DESIGNS,” and is written in a few pages of a small duodecimo note-book bound in rough calf. It seems, from the hand, that it was written early in life: from the marginal dates it appears that some portions were added in 1752 and 1753. In the first page of this little volume, his late Majesty King George III. wrote with his own hand:—“Original Manuscripts of Dr. Samuel Johnson, presented by his friend, — Langton, Esq. April 16th, 1785. G. R.”—CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> History of the Romans: by Mr. Bower.—BOSWELL.—Bishop Warburton, in a letter to Jortin, in 1749, speaks with great contempt of this work as “miserable trash,” and “the infamous rhapsody called the Universal History.” Nich. Anec. vol. ii. p. 173. But Mr. Gibbon's more favourable opinion of this work will, as Mr. Markland observes, claim as much attention as the “decrees” of Warburton, who has not improperly been termed by the former “the dictator and tyrant of the world of literature.” Gibbon speaks of the “excellence of the first part of the Universal History as generally admitted.” The History of the Macedonians, he also observes, “is executed with much erudition, taste, and judgment.” This history would be invaluable were all its parts of the same merit.—Miscel. Works, v. 411, 428. Some curious facts relating to this work, and especially those parts of it committed to himself, will be found in Psalmanazar's Memoirs, p. 291.—CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> On the subject of Dr. Johnson's skill in Greek, I have great pleasure in quoting an anecdote told by my late friend, Mr. Gifford, in his Life of Ford:—

“My friend the late Lord Grosvenor had a house at Salt Hill, where I usually spent a part of the summer, and thus became acquainted with that great and good man, Jacob Bryant. Here the conversation turned one morning on a Greek criticism by Dr. Johnson in some volume lying on the table, which I ventured (for I was then young) to deem incorrect, and pointed it out to him. I could not help thinking that he was something of my opinion, but he was cautious and reserved. ‘But, Sir,’ said I, willing to overcome his to be learnt, he used to mention his own comparative acquisitions. When Mr. Cumberland<sup>1</sup> talked to him of the Greek fragments which are so well illustrated in "The Observer," and of the Greek dramatists in general, he candidly acknowledged his insufficiency in that particular branch of Greek literature. Yet it may be said, that though not a great, he was a good Greek scholar. Dr. Charles Burney, the younger, who is universally acknowledged by the best judges to be one of the few men of this age who are very eminent for their skill in that noble language, has assured me, that Johnson could give a Greek word for almost every English one; and that, although not sufficiently conversant in the niceties of the language, he, upon some occasions, discovered, even in these, a considerable degree of critical acumen. Mr. Dalzel, professor of Greek at Edinburgh, whose skill is unquestionable, mentioned to me, in very liberal terms, the impression which was made upon him by Johnson, in a conversation which they had in London concerning that language. As Johnson, therefore, was undoubtedly one of the first Latin scholars in modern times, let us not deny to his fame some additional splendour from Greek.<sup>2</sup>

I shall now fulfil my promise of exhibiting specimens of various sorts of imitation of Johnson's style.

In the "Transactions of the Royal Irish Academy, 1787," there is an "Essay on the Style of Dr. Samuel Johnson," by the Reverend Robert Burrowes, whose respect for the great object of his criticism<sup>3</sup> is thus evinced in the concluding paragraph: "I have singled him out from the whole body of English writers, because his universally-acknowledged beauties would be most apt to induce imitation: and I have treated rather on his faults, than his perfections, because an essay might comprise all the observations I could make upon his faults, while volumes would not be sufficient for a treatise on his perfections."

scruples, 'Dr. Johnson himself admitted that he was not a good Greek scholar.' 'Sir,' he replied, with a serious and impressive air, 'it is not easy for us to say what such a man as Johnson would call a good Greek scholar.' I hope that I profited by that lesson—certainly I never forgot it."—Gifford's Works of Ford, vol. i. p. lxxi. — CROKER.

<sup>1</sup> Mr. Cumberland assures me that he was always treated with great courtesy by Dr. Johnson, who, in his "Letters to Mrs. Thrale," vol. ii. p. 68., thus speaks of that learned, ingenious, and accomplished gentleman: "The want of company is an inconvenience, but Mr. Cumberland is a million." — BOSWELL.

<sup>2</sup> Johnson professed not to be deeply skilled in Greek, but was not much pleased if his profession was believed. Mrs. Piozzi tells us that when the King of Denmark was in England [in 1768], one of his noblemen was brought by Mr. Colman to see Dr. Johnson at Mr. Thrale's country-house; and having heard, he said, that he was not famous for Greek literature, attacked him on the weak side; politely adding, that he chose that conversation on purpose to favour himself. Dr. Johnson, however, displayed so copious a knowledge of authors, books, and every branch of learning in that language, that the gentleman appeared astonished. When he was gone, Johnson said, "Now for all this triumph I may thank Thrale's Xenophon here, as, I think, excepting that one, I have not looked in a Greek book these ten years; but see what haste my dear friends were all in," continued he, "to tell this poor innocent foreigner that I knew nothing of

Mr. Burrowes has analysed the composition of Johnson, and pointed out its peculiarities with much acuteness; and I would recommend a careful perusal of his Essay to those who being captivated by the union of perspicuity and splendour which the writings of Johnson contain, without having a sufficient portion of his vigour of mind, may be in danger of becoming bad copyists of his manner. I, however, cannot but observe, and I observe it to his credit, that this learned gentleman has himself caught no mean degree of the expansion and harmony which, independent of all other circumstances, characterise the sentences of Johnson. Thus, in the preface to the volume in which the Essay appears, we find, —

"If it be said, that in societies of this sort too much attention is frequently bestowed on subjects barren and speculative, it may be answered, that no one science is so little connected with the rest as not to afford many principles whose use may extend considerably beyond the science to which they primarily belong, and that no proposition is so purely theoretical as to be totally incapable of being applied to practical purposes. There is no apparent connection between duration and the cycloidal arch, the properties of which duly attended to have furnished us with our best regulated methods of measuring time: and he who had made himself master of the nature and affections of the logarithmic curve is not aware that he has advanced considerably towards ascertaining the proportionable density of the air at its various distances from the surface of the earth."

The ludicrous imitators of Johnson's style are innumerable. Their general method is to accumulate hard words, without considering, that, although he was fond of introducing them occasionally, there is not a single sentence in all his writings where they are crowded together, as in the first verse of the following imaginary Ode by him to Mrs. Thrale<sup>4</sup>, which appeared in the newspapers: —

Greek! Oh no! he knows nothing of Greek!" with a loud burst of laughter. It has been said that Dr. Johnson never exerted such steady application as he did for the last ten years of his life in the study of Greek; but frequent passages in his diary and letters contradict this statement. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> We must smile at a little inaccuracy of metaphor in the preface to the Transactions, which is written by Mr. Burrowes. The critic of the style of Johnson having, with a just zeal for literature, observed, that the whole nation are called on to exert themselves, afterwards says, "They are called on by every tye which can have laudable influence on the heart of man." — BOSWELL. — See anté, p. 69, n. 1. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> Johnson's wishing to unite himself with this rich widow was much talked of, but I believe without foundation. The report, however, gave occasion to a poem, not without characteristic merit, entitled "Ode to Mrs. Thrale, by Samuel Johnson, LL.D. on their supposed approaching Nuptials;" printed for Mr. Faulder in Bond Street. I shall quote as a specimen the first three stanzas: —

"If e'er my fingers touch'd the lyre,
In satire fierce, in pleasure gay,
Shall not my Thralia's smiles inspire?
Shall Sam refuse the sportive lay?"

"My dearest lady! view your slave,
Behold him as your very Scrub;
Eager to write as author grave,
Or govern well — the brewing-tub.

" *Cervical coctor's viduate dame,
Opins't thou this gigantic frame,
Procumb'g at thy shrine,
Shall, catenated by thy charms,
A captive in thy ambient arms,
Perennially be thine?*"

This and a thousand other such attempts are totally unlike the original, which the writers imagined they were turning into ridicule. There is not similarity enough for burlesque, or even for caricature.

Mr. Colman, in his "Prose on several Occasions," has "A Letter from Lexiphanes, containing proposals for a Glossary, or Vocabulary of the Vulgar Tongue; intended as a Supplement to a larger Dictionary." It is evidently meant as a sportive sally of ridicule on Johnson, whose style is thus imitated, without being grossly overcharged:—

"It is easy to foresee that the idle and illiterate will complain that I have increased their labours by endeavouring to diminish them; and that I have explained what is more easy by what is more difficult—ignotum per ignotius. I expect, on the other hand, the liberal acknowledgments of the learned. He who is buried in scholastic retirement, secluded from the assemblies of the gay, and remote from the circles of the polite, will at once comprehend the definitions, and be grateful for such a seasonable and necessary elucidation of his mother-tongue."

Annexed to this letter is the following short specimen of the work, thrown together in a vague and desultory manner, not even adhering to alphabetical concatenation.

"HIGGLEDY FIGGLEDY, — Conglomeration and confusion.

"HODGE-PODGE, — A culinary mixture of heterogeneous ingredients; applied metaphorically to all discordant combinations.

"TIT FOR TAT, — Adequate retaliation.

"SHILLY SHALLY, — Hesitation and irresolution.

"FEE! FA! FUM! — Gigantic intonations.

"RIGMAROLE, — Discourse, incoherent and rhapsodical.

"CRINCUM-CRANCUM, — Lines of irregularity and involution.

"DING-DONG, — Tintinnabulary chimes, used metaphorically to signify despatch and vehemence."<sup>1</sup>

The serious imitators of Johnson's style, whether intentionally or by the imperceptible effect of its strength and animation, are, as I have had already occasion to observe, so many,

"To rich felicity thus raised,
My bosom glows with amorous fire,
Porter no longer shall be praised;
'Tis I myself am Thrale's Entire." — BOSWELL.

Mrs. Carter, in one of her letters to Mrs. Montagu, says, "I once saw him (Dr. Johnson) very indigné when somebody jestted about Mrs. Thrale's marrying himself. The choice would, no doubt, have been singular, but much less exceptionable than that which she has made." — Letters, vol. iii. p. 221. Mr. Alexander Chalmers, who knew all the parties, says that the report was certainly unfounded. — CROKER.

that I might introduce quotations from a numerous body of writers in our language, since he appeared in the literary world. I shall point out the following:—

WILLIAM ROBERTSON, D.D.

"In other parts of the globe, man, in his rudest state, appears as lord of the creation, giving law to various tribes of animals which he has tamed and reduced to subjection. The Tartar follows his prey on the horse which he has reared, or tends his numerous herds which furnish him both with food and clothing; the Arab has rendered the camel docile, and avails himself of its persevering strength; the Laplander has formed the reindeer to be subservient to his will; and even the people of Kamschatka have trained their dogs to labour. This command over the inferior creatures is one of the noblest prerogatives of man, and among the greatest efforts of his wisdom and power. Without this, his dominion is incomplete. He is a monarch who has no subjects; a master without servants; and must perform every operation by the strength of his own arm." — History of America, vol. i. 4to, p. 332.

EDWARD GIBBON, ESQ.

"Of all our passions and appetites, the love of power is of the most imperious and unsocial nature, since the pride of one man requires the submission of the multitude. In the tumult of civil discord the laws of society lose their force, and their place is seldom supplied by those of humanity. The ardour of contention, the pride of victory, the despair of success, the memory of past injuries, and the fear of future dangers, all contribute to inflame the mind, and to silence the voice of pity." — Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, vol. i. chap. 4.

MISS BURNEY.

"My family, mistaking ambition for honour, and rank for dignity, have long planned a splendid connection for me, to which, though my invariable repugnance has stopped any advances, their wishes and their views immovably adhere. I am but too certain they will now listen to no other. I dread, therefore, to make a trial where I despair of success; I know not how to risk a prayer with those who may silence me by a command." — Cecilia, book vii. chap. 1.

REVEREND MR. NARES.<sup>2</sup>

"In an enlightened and improving age, much perhaps is not to be apprehended from the inroads

<sup>1</sup> On the original publication of Mr. Boswell's own work, the press teemed with parodies, or imitations of his style of reporting Dr. Johnson's conversation: but they are now all deservedly forgotten, except one by Mr. Alexander Chalmers, which is executed with so much liveliness and pleasantries, and is, in fact, so just a criticism on the lighter portions of this work, that the reader will be, I believe, much pleased to find it preserved. See Appendix, "Lesson in Biography; or, How to write the Life of one's Friend." — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> The passage which I quote is taken from that gentleman's "Elements of Orthoëpy; containing a distinct View of the whole Analogy of the English Language, so far as relates to Pronunciation, Accent, and Quantity;" London, 1784. I beg of mere caprice; at such a period it will generally be perceived that needless irregularity is the worst of all deformities, and that nothing is so truly elegant in language as the simplicity of unviolated analogy. Rules will, therefore, be observed, so far as they are known and acknowledged: but at the same time, the desire of improvement having been once excited will not remain inactive; and its efforts, unless assisted by knowledge as much as they are prompted by zeal, will not unfrequently be found pernicious; so that the very persons whose intention it is to perfect the instrument of reason will deprave and disorder it unknowingly. At such a time, then, it becomes peculiarly necessary that the analogy of language should be fully examined and understood; that its rules should be carefully laid down; and that it should be clearly known how much it contains which, being already right, should be defended from change and violation; how much it has that demands amendment; and how much that, for fear of greater inconveniences, must, perhaps, be left unaltered, though irregular."

A distinguished author in "The Mirror," a periodical paper published at Edinburgh, has imitated Johnson very closely. Thus, in No. 16.:—

"The effects of the return of spring have been frequently remarked, as well in relation to the human mind as to the animal and vegetable world. The reviving power of this season has been traced from the fields to the herds that inhabit them, and from the lower classes of beings up to man. Gladness and joy are described as prevailing through universal nature, animating the low of the cattle, the carol of the birds, and the pipe of the shepherd."

The Reverend Dr. Knox, master of Tunbridge school, appears to have the imitari avo of Johnson's style perpetually in his mind; and to his assiduous, though not servile, study of it, we may partly ascribe the extensive popularity of his writings.<sup>2</sup> leave to offer my particular acknowledgments to the author of a work of uncommon merit and great utility. I know no book which contains, in the same compass, more learning, polite literature, sound sense, accuracy of arrangement, and perspicuity of expression.—BOSWELL.

That collection was presented to Dr. Johnson, I believe, by its authors; and I heard him speak very well of it.—BOSWELL.

<sup>2</sup> It were to be wished that he had imitated that great man in every respect, and had not followed the example of Dr. Adam Smith, in ungraciously attacking his venerable Alma Mater, Oxford. It must, however, be observed, that he is much less to blame than Smith: he only objects to certain particulars; Smith, to the whole institution; though indebted for much of his learning to an exhibition which he enjoyed for many years at Balliol College. Neither of them, however, will do any hurt to the noblest university in the world. While I animalvert on what appears to me exceptional in some of the works of Dr. Knox, I cannot refuse due praise to others of his productions; particularly his sermons, and to the spirit with which he maintains, against presumptuous heretics, the consolatory doctrines peculiar to the Christian Revelation. This he has done in a manner equally strenuous and conciliating. Neither ought I to omit mentioning a remarkable instance of his candour. Notwithstanding the wide difference of our opinions upon the important subject of university education, in a letter to me concerning this work he thus expresses himself:—"I thank you for the very great enter-

In his "Essays, Moral and Literary," No. 3., we find the following passage:—

"The polish of external grace may indeed be deferred till the approach of manhood. When solidity is obtained by pursuing the modes prescribed by our forefathers, then may the file be used. The firm substance will bear attrition, and the lustre then acquired will be durable."

There is, however, one in No. 11. which is blown up into such tumidity as to be truly ludicrous. The writer means to tell us, that members of Parliament who have run in debt by extravagance will sell their votes to avoid an arrest<sup>3</sup>, which he thus expresses:—

"They who build houses and collect costly pictures and furniture with the money of an honest artisan or mechanic will be very glad of emancipation from the hands of a bailiff by a sale of their senatorial suffrage."

But I think the most perfect imitation of Johnson is a professed one, entitled "A Criticism on Gray's Elegy in a Country Churchyard," said to be written by Mr. Young, professor of Greek, at Glasgow, and of which let him have the credit, unless a better title can be shown. It has not only the particularities of Johnson's style, but that very species of literary discussion and illustration for which he was eminent. Having already quoted so much from others, I shall refer the curious to this performance, with an assurance of much entertainment.<sup>4</sup>

Yet, whatever merit there may be in any imitations of Johnson's style, every good judge must see that they are obviously different from the original; for all of them are either deficient in its force, or overloaded with its peculiarities; and the powerful sentiment to which it is suited is not to be found.

Johnson's affection for his departed relations seemed to grow warmer as he approached nearer to the time when he might hope to see tainment your Life of Johnson gives me. It is a most valuable work. Yours is a new species of biography. Happy for Johnson that he had so able a recorder of his wit and wisdom.—BOSWELL.

<sup>3</sup> Dr. Knox, in his "Moral and Literary" abstraction, may be excused for not knowing the political regulations of his country. No senator can be in the hands of a bailiff.—BOSWELL. Their houses and goods might be seized under an execution. It was said, and I believe truly, that Sheridan once (or more than once) gave a dinner under those circumstances, and that the bailiffs waited at table.—CHURCH, 1847.

<sup>4</sup> It seems to me to be one of the most insipid and unmeaning volumes ever published. I cannot make out whether it was meant for jest or earnest; but it fails either way, for it has neither pleasantly nor sense. Johnson saw this work, and thus writes of it:—"Of the imitation of my style, in a criticism on Gray's Churchyard, I forgot to make mention. The author is, I believe, utterly unknown, for Mr. Stevens cannot hunt him out. I know little of it, for though it was sent me, I never cut the leaves open. I had a letter with it, representing it to me as my own work; in such an account to the public there may be humour, but to myself it was neither serious nor comical. I suspect the writer to be wrong-headed. As to the noise which it makes, I never heard it, and am inclined to believe that low attacks either of ridicule or invective make much noise but by the help of those that they provoke."—Letters, July 5. 1753.—CHURCH.

them again. It probably appeared to him that he should upbraid himself with unkind inattention, were he to leave the world without having paid a tribute of respect to their memory.

DR. JOHNSON TO MR. GREEN,

Apothecary, at Lichfield.<sup>1</sup>

"December 2. 1784.

"DEAR SIR, — I have enclosed the epitaph for my father, mother, and brother, to be all engraven on the large size, and laid in the middle aisle in St. Michael's church, which I request the clergyman and churchwardens to permit.

"The first care must be to find the exact place of interment, that the stone may protect the bodies. Then let the stone be deep, massy, and hard; and do not let the difference of ten pounds, or more, defeat our purpose.

"I have enclosed ten pounds, and Mrs. Porter will pay you ten more, which I gave her for the same purpose. What more is wanted shall be sent; and I beg that all possible haste may be made, for I wish to have it done while I am yet alive.<sup>2</sup> Let me know, dear Sir, that you receive this. I am, &c.,

SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHNSON TO LUCY PORTER.<sup>3</sup>

"December 2. 1784.

"DEAR MADAM, — I am very ill, and desire your prayers. I have sent Mr. Green the epitaph, and a power to call on you for ten pounds.

"I laid this summer a stone over Tetty, in the chapel of Bromley in Kent. The inscription is in Latin [p. 78.], of which this is the English. (Here a translation.) That this is done, I thought it fit that you should know. What care will be taken of us, who can tell? May God pardon and bless us, for Jesus Christ's sake. I am, &c.,

"SAM. JOHNSON."

<sup>1</sup> A relation of Dr. Johnson. See antè, p. 490. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> It was not done, Dr. Harwood tells us, till after Johnson's death; and when the church was new paved in 1796, the stone was removed, and, strange and shameful to say, is nowhere to be found. The following is the inscription:—

H. S. E.

MICHAEL JOHNSON,

Vir impavidus, constans, animosus, periculorum immemor, laborum patientissimus; fiducia christiana fortis, fervidusque, patre-familias apprime strenuus; bibliopala admodum peritus; mente et libris et negotiis exulta; animo ita firmo, ut, rebus adversis diu conficatus, nec sibi nec suis defuerit: lingua sic temperata, ut ei nihil quod aures, vel pius, vel castas læsisset, aut dolor, vel voluptas unquam expresserit.

Natus Cubleæ, in agro Derbiensi, Anno 1656.

Obiit 1731.

Apposita est SARA, conjux.

Antiqua FORDORUM gente oriunda; quam domi sedulam, fors paucis notam; nulli molestam, mentis acumine et judici subtilitate præcellentem; aliis multum, sibi parum indulgentem; Æternitati semper attentam, omne fere virtutis nomen commendavit.

Nata Nortoniæ Regis, in agro Varvicensi, Anno 1669;

Obiit 1759.

Cum NATHANAËLE illorum filio, qui natus 1712, cum vires et animi, et corporis multa pollicerentur, Anno 1757, vitam brevem pia morte finivit. — CROKER, 1831-47.

CHAPTER LXXXII.

1784.

Last Illness, and Death. — His Will, Funeral, and Burial.

MY readers are now, at last, to behold SAMUEL JOHNSON preparing himself for that doom, from which the most exalted powers afford no exemption to man. Death had always been to him an object of terror: so that, though by no means happy, he still clung to life with an eagerness at which many have wondered. At any time when he was ill, he was very much pleased to be told that he looked better. An ingenious member of the Eumelian Club<sup>4</sup> informs me, that upon one occasion, when he said to him that he saw health returning to his cheek, Johnson seized him by the hand and exclaimed, "Sir, you are one of the kindest friends I ever had."

His own statement of his views of futurity will appear truly rational; and may, perhaps, impress the unthinking with seriousness.

"You know," says he to Mrs. Thrale, "I never thought confidence with respect to futurity any part of the character of a brave, a wise, or a good man. Bravery has no place where it can avail nothing; wisdom impresses strongly the consciousness of those faults, of which it is, perhaps, itself an aggravation; and goodness, always wishing to be better, and imputing every deficiency to criminal negligence, and every fault to voluntary corruption, never dares to suppose the condition of forgiveness fulfilled, nor what is wanting in the crime supplied by penitence."

"This is the state of the best; but what must be the condition of him whose heart will not suffer him to rank himself among the best, or among the good? Such must be his dread of the approaching trial, as will leave him little attention to the opinion of those whom he is leaving for ever; and the serenity that is not felt, it can be no virtue to feign."

(His great fear of death<sup>5</sup>, and the strange dark

<sup>3</sup> This lady survived Dr. Johnson just thirteen months. She died at Lichfield, in her seventy-first year, January 13. 1786, and bequeathed the principal part of her fortune to the Rev. Mr. Pearson, of Lichfield. — MALONE.

<sup>4</sup> A club in London, founded by the learned and ingenious physician, Dr. Ash, in honour of whose name it was called Eumelian, from the Greek Eumeliæ: though it was warmly contended, and even put to a vote, that it should have the more obvious appellation of Frauncian, from the Latin. — BOSWELL.

<sup>5</sup> Mrs. Carter, in one of her letters to Mrs. Montagu, says, "I see by the papers that Dr. Johnson is dead. In extent of learning, and exquisite purity of moral writing, he has left no superior, and I fear very few equals. His virtues and his piety were founded on the steadiest of Christian principles and faith. His faults, I firmly believe, arose from the irritations of a most suffering state of nervous constitution, which scarcely ever allowed him a moment's ease."

To this passage the editor of Mrs. Carter's Letters subscribes the following note:

"Mrs. Carter told the editor, that in one of the last conversations which she had with this eminent moralist, she told him that she had never known him say any thing contrary to the principles of the Christian religion. He seized her hand with great emotion, exclaiming, 'You know this, and bear witness to it when I am gone!'" — Letters, vol. iii. p. 234. — CHALMERS. "You wonder," she says in another place, "that an undoubted believer and a man of piety should be afraid of death;" but it is such characters who have ever manner in which Sir John Hawkins<sup>1</sup> imparts the uneasiness which he expressed on account of offences with which he charged himself, may give occasion to injurious suspicions, as if there had been something of more than ordinary criminality weighing upon his conscience. On that account, therefore, as well as from the regard to truth which he inculcated<sup>2</sup>, I am to mention (with all possible respect and delicacy, however), that his conduct, after he came to London, and had associated with Savage and others, was not so strictly virtuous, in one respect, as when he was a younger man. It was well known that his amorous inclinations were uncommonly strong and impetuous. He owned to many of his friends, that he used to take women of the town to taverns, and hear them relate their history. In short, it must not be concealed, that like many other good and pious men, among whom we may place the apostle Paul upon his own authority, Johnson was not free from propensities which were ever "warring against the law of his mind,"—and that in his combats with them, he was sometimes overcome.

Here let the profane and licentious pause; let them not thoughtlessly say that Johnson was an hypocrite, or that his principles were not firm, because his practice was not uniformly conformable to what he professed.

Let the question be considered independent of moral and religious associations; and no man will deny that thousands, in many instances, act against conviction. Is a prodigal, for example, an hypocrite, when he owns he is satisfied that his extravagance will bring him to ruin and misery? We are sure he believes it; but immediate inclination, strengthened by indulgence, prevails over that belief in influencing his conduct. Why then shall credit be refused to the sincerity of those who acknowledge their persuasion of moral and religious duty, yet sometimes fail of living as it requires? I heard Dr. Johnson once observe, "There is something noble in publishing truth, though it condemns one's self."<sup>3</sup> And one who said in his presence, "he had no notion of people being in earnest in their good professions, whose practice was not suitable to them," was thus reprimanded by him:—"Sir, are you so grossly ignorant of human nature as not to know that a man may be very sincere in good principles, without having good practice?" [p. 390.]

But let no man encourage or soothe himself in "presumptuous sin," from knowing that Johnson was sometimes hurried into indulgences which he thought criminal. I have exhibited this circumstance as a shade in so great a character, both from my sacred love of truth, and to show that he was not so weakly scrupulous as he has been represented by those who imagine that the sins, of which a deep sense was upon his mind, were merely such little venial trifles as pouring milk into his tea on Good-Friday. His understanding will be defended by my statement, if his consistency of conduct be in some degree impaired. But what wise man would, for momentary gratifications, deliberately subject himself to suffer such uneasiness as we find was experienced by Johnson in reviewing his conduct as compared with his notion of the ethics of the Gospel? Let the following passages be kept in remembrance:—

[1762.] "O God, giver and preserver of all life, by whose power I was created, and by whose providence I am sustained, look down upon me with tenderness and mercy; grant that I may not have been created to be finally destroyed; that I may not be preserved to add wickedness to wickedness." (Pr. and Med., p. 47.)

[1766.] "O Lord, let me not sink into total depravity; look down upon me, and rescue me at last from the captivity of sin." (p. 68.)

[1769.] "Almighty and most merciful Father, who hath continued my life from year to year, grant that by longer life I may become less desirous of sinful pleasures, and more careful of eternal happiness." (p. 84.)

[1773.] "Let not my years be multiplied to increase my guilt; but as my age advances, let me become more pure in my thoughts, more regular in my desires, and more obedient to thy laws." (p. 120.)

[No date.] "Forgive, O merciful Lord, whatever I have done contrary to thy laws. Give me such a sense of my wickedness as may produce true contrition and effectual repentance: so that when I shall be called into another state, I may be received among the sinners to whom sorrow and reformation have obtained pardon, for Jesus Christ's sake. Amen." (p. 130.)

Such was the distress of mind, such the penitence of Johnson, in his hours of privacy, and the deepest sense of their imperfections and deviations from the rule of duty, of which the very best must be conscious; and such a temper of mind as is struck with awe and humility at the prospect of the last solemn sentence appears much better suited to the wretched deficiencies of the best human performances than the thoughtless security that rushes undisturbed into eternity."—Miss Carter's Life, vol. ii. p. 166.

—CROKER.
<sup>1</sup> I must say, that I can see nothing more strange or dark in Hawkins's expressions than in some of Johnson's own; and nothing half so bad as the (I was about to say malignant) observations which Boswell proceeds to make. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> See what he said to Mr. Malone, ante, p. 671. — BOSWELL.
But surely Mr. Boswell might have been forgiven if he had not revived these stories, which, whether true or false originally, were near fifty years old. He had already said (ante, p. 50.) quite enough, and perhaps more than he was justified in saying on this topic. The reader will recollect that it has been shown (ante, p. 35, n. 5, and p. 49, n. 3) that the duration, and probably the intensity, of Dr. Johnson's intimacy with Savage have been greatly exaggerated, and so, no doubt, have been the supposed consequences of that intimacy. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides (ante, p. 335.). On the same subject, in his letter to Mrs. Thrale, dated November 29, 1783, he makes the following just observation: "Life, to be worthy of a rational being, must be always in progression; we must always purpose to do more or better than in the past. The mind is enlarged and elevated by mere purposes, though they end as they began, by airy contemplation. We compare and judge, though we do not practise." — BOSWELL.

in his devout approaches to his Maker. His sincerity, therefore, must appear to every candid mind unquestionable.<sup>1</sup>

It is of essential consequence to keep in view that there was in this excellent man's conduct no false principle of commutation, no deliberate indulgence in sin, in consideration of a counterbalance of duty. His offending and his repenting were distinct and separate<sup>2</sup>: and when we consider his almost unexampled attention to truth, his inflexible integrity, his constant piety, who will dare to "cast a stone at him?" Besides, let it never be forgotten that he cannot be charged with any offence indicating badness of heart, any thing dishonest, base, or malignant; but that, on the contrary, he was charitable in an extraordinary degree: so that even in one of his own rigid judgments of himself (Easter-eve, 1781), while he says, "I have corrected no external habits;" he is obliged to own, "I hope that since my last communion I have advanced, by pious reflections, in my submission to God, and my benevolence to man." (p. 192.)

I am conscious that this is the most difficult and dangerous part of my biographical work, and I cannot but be very anxious concerning it. I trust that I have got through it, preserving at once my regard to truth,—to my <sup>1</sup> Boswell, with a disingenuousness which I am at a loss to account for, selects all these passages (suppressing the dates) and gives them, by his introductory observations, such a peculiar colouring, as to make it appear that Johnson accused himself of sensual licentiousness; whereas I will take upon myself to assert that the entire prayers from which Boswell has garbled these extracts, as well as the general context of the whole volume, if read fairly and candidly, do not afford the slightest colour for the special charge which Boswell makes. Why has Boswell suppressed other passages of corresponding dates which explain the comparatively innocent nature of the errors with which Johnson reproached himself? In 1759, he confesses "idleness and neglect of worship;" in 1760, amidst a long and minute list of self-accusations, there is not a hint at criminal indulgence—nor in 1761—nor again in 1762: and during the whole period from which Boswell's extracts are made, it appears from Johnson's specific explanations of them, that his most serious, if not his only offences, were "misspent time," "want of diligence," "time lost in idleness or misspent in unprofitable employments," and the like; and that the only sensual indulgence is lying late in bed, and occasionally too much "addiction to meat and wine." "My chief deficiency," he says (1774), "has been, that my life is immethodical." "My reigning sin," he says, 1776, "is waste of time and sluggishness." In the Anderdon MSS. there is a note dated in 1781, recording a resolution "to endeavour to conquer scruples;" and in the Rose MSS. of a much earlier date, the following—

"PRAYER AGAINST SCRUPLES.

"O Lord, who wouldst that all men should be saved, and who knowest that without thy grace we can do nothing acceptable to thee, have mercy upon me. Enable me to break the chain of my sins, to reject sensuality in thought, and to overcome and suppress vain scruples; and to use such diligence in lawful employment as may enable me to support myself and do good to others. O Lord, forgive me the time lost in idleness; pardon the sins which I have committed, and grant that I may redeem the time misspent, and be reconciled to thee by true repentance, that I may live and die in peace, and be received to everlasting happiness. Take not from me, O Lord, thy Holy Spirit, but let me have support and comfort, for Jesus Christ's sake. Amen.

"Transc. June 26. 1768. Of this prayer there is no date, nor can I conjecture when it was composed."—Johnson.

This prayer, written long before Boswell became acquainted with Johnson, seems to me a complete answer to the inferences extorted by Boswell from the garbled extracts friend,—and to the interests of virtue and religion. Nor can I apprehend that more harm can ensue from the knowledge of the irregularities of Johnson, guarded as I have stated it, than from knowing that Addison and Parnell were intemperate in the use of wine; which he himself, in his Lives of those celebrated writers and pious men, has not forbore to record.<sup>3</sup>

It is not my intention to give a very minute detail of the particulars of Johnson's remaining days<sup>4</sup>, of whom it was now evident that the crisis was fast approaching, when he must "die like men, and fall like one of the princes." Yet it will be instructive, as well as gratifying to the curiosity of my readers, to record a few circumstances, on the authenticity of which they may perfectly rely, as I have been at the utmost pains to obtain an accurate account of his last illness, from the best authority.

Dr. Heberden, Dr. Brocklesby, Dr. Warren<sup>5</sup>, and Dr. Butler, physicians, generously attended him, without accepting any fees, as did Mr. Cruikshank, surgeon; and all that could be done from professional skill and ability was tried, to prolong a life so truly valuable. He himself, indeed, having, on account of his very bad constitution, been perpetually applying himself to medical inquiries, united his own efforts of the later prayers. Can we suppose, that while thus reproaching himself with idleness and scruples, he was habitually guilty of sensual depravity?—CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> Dr. Johnson related, with very earnest approbation, a story of a gentleman, who, in an impulse of passion, overcame the virtue of a young woman. When she said to him, "I am afraid we have done wrong!" he answered, "Yes, we have done wrong;—for I would not debauch her mind."—BOSWELL.

<sup>3</sup> This is a poor and disingenuous defence for a very grievous error. It is one thing to repeat—as Dr. Johnson did, historically, what all the world knew, and few were inclined to blame seriously—that Parnell and Addison loved a cheerful glass—

"Narratur et prisce Catonis Sæpe mero caluisse virtus."

But it is quite another thing to insinuate oneself into a man's confidence, to follow him for twenty years like his shadow, to note his words and actions like a spy, to ransack his most secret papers, and scrutinize and garble even his conscientious confessions, and then, with all the sinister authority which such a show of friendship must confer, to accuse him of low and filthy guilt, supposed to have been committed a quarter of a century before the informer and his calumniated friend had ever met, and which, consequently, Boswell could only have had from hearsay or from guess, and which all personal testimony and all the documentary evidence seem to disprove. Boswell must have been actuated by some secret motive, or labouring under a morbid delusion, when he thus regarded these wanton, and I conscientiously believe, calumnious, slanders on his illustrious friend, as conducive to "the interest of virtue and religion," and, above all, "of truth." I entreat any reader who may at all question the validity of my charges against Boswell, and my defence of Dr. Johnson on this point, to refer to the volume of Prayers and Meditations itself, which I pledge myself will effectually refute all Boswell's extraordinary imputations.—CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> The particulars which Mr. Boswell's absence, and the jealousy between him and some of Johnson's other friends, prevented his being able to give, I have supplied in the Appendix.—CROKER.

<sup>5</sup> Mr. Green (p. 490.) related that when some of Johnson's friends desired that Dr. Warren should be called in, he said they might call in whom they pleased; and when Warren was called, at his going away Johnson said, "You have come in at the eleventh hour, but you shall be paid the same with your fellow-labourers. Francis, put into Dr. Warren's coach a copy of the English Poets."—CROKER.

with those of the gentlemen who attended him; and imagining that the dropsical collection of water which oppressed him might be drawn off by making incisions in his body, he, with his usual resolute defiance of pain, cut deep, when he thought that his surgeon had done it too tenderly.<sup>1</sup>

About eight or ten days before his death, when Dr. Brocklesby paid him his morning visit, he seemed very low and desponding, and said, "I have been as a dying man all night." He then emphatically broke out in the words of Shakspeare —

"Canst thou not minister to a mind diseased;
Pluck from the memory a rooted sorrow;
Raze out the written troubles of the brain;
And with some sweet oblivious antidote,
Cleanse the stuff'd bosom of that perilous stuff,
Which weighs upon the heart?"

To which Dr. Brocklesby readily answered from the same great poet, —

"————— Therein the patient
Must minister to himself."

Johnson expressed himself much satisfied with the application.

On another day after this, when talking on the subject of prayer, Dr. Brocklesby repeated from Juvenal, —

"Orandum est, ut sit mens sana in corpore sano," and so on to the end of the tenth satire; but in running it quickly over, he happened, in the line,

"Qui spatium vitæ extremum inter munera ponat,"<sup>2</sup> to pronounce supremum for extremum; at which Johnson's critical ear instantly took offence, and discoursing vehemently on the unmetrical effect of such a lapse, he showed himself as full as ever of the spirit of the grammarian.

Having no other relations<sup>3</sup>, it had been for some time Johnson's intention to make a liberal provision for his faithful servant, Mr. Francis Barber, whom he looked upon as particularly under his protection, and whom he had all along treated truly as an humble friend.

<sup>1</sup> This bold experiment Sir John Hawkins has related in such a manner as to suggest a charge against Johnson of intentionally hastening his end; a charge so very inconsistent with his character in every respect, that it is injurious even to refute it, as Sir John has thought it necessary to do. It is evident, that what Johnson did in hopes of relief indicated an extraordinary eagerness to retard his dissolution.

— BOSWELL.
<sup>2</sup> Mr. Boswell has omitted to notice the line, for the sake of which Dr. Brocklesby probably introduced the quotation,

"Fortem posce animum et mortis terrore carentem!"

The whole passage is thus paraphrased by Dryden: —

"— [Be thy prayers] confined
To health of body and content of mind;
A soul that can securely death defy,
And count it Nature's privilege to die;
Serene and manly, hardened to sustain
The load of life, and exercised in pain!"

Juvenal, Sat. 356. — CROKER, 1817.

<sup>3</sup> The author in a former page has shown the injustice of Sir John Hawkins's charge against Johnson, with respect to a person of the name of Healy, whom he has inaccurately

Having asked Dr. Brocklesby what would be a proper annuity to a favourite servant, and being answered that it must depend on the circumstances of the master; and that in the case of a nobleman fifty pounds a year was considered as an adequate reward for many years' faithful service; — "Then," said Johnson, "shall I be nobilissimus, for I mean to leave Frank seventy pounds a year, and I desire you to tell him so." It is strange, however, to think, that Johnson was not free from that general weakness of being averse to execute a will, so that he delayed it from time to time; and had it not been for Sir John Hawkins's repeatedly urging it, I think it is probable that his kind resolution would not have been fulfilled. After making one, which, as Sir John Hawkins informs us, extended no further than the promised annuity, Johnson's final disposition of his property was established by a Will and Codicil, of which copies are subjoined.

"In the name of God. Amen. I, Samuel Johnson, being in full possession of my faculties, but fearing this night may put an end to my life, do ordain this my last will and testament. I bequeath to God a soul polluted by many sins, but I hope purified by Jesus Christ. I leave seven hundred and fifty pounds in the hands of Bennet Langton, Esq.; three hundred pounds in the hands of Mr. Barclay and Mr. Perkins, brewers; one hundred and fifty pounds in the hands of Dr. Percy, bishop of Dromore; one thousand pounds, three per cent. annuities in the public funds; and one hundred pounds now lying by me in ready money: all these before-mentioned sums and property I leave, I say, to Sir Joshua Reynolds, Sir John Hawkins, and Dr. William Scott, of Doctors' Commons, in trust, for the following uses: — That is to say, to pay to the representatives of the late William Innes, bookseller, in St. Paul's Churchyard, the sum of two hundred pounds; to Mrs. White, my female servant, one hundred pounds stock in the three per cent. annuities aforesaid. The rest of the aforesaid sums of money and property, together with my books, plate, and household furniture, I leave to the before-mentioned Sir Joshua Reynolds, Sir John Hawkins, and Dr. William Scott, also in trust, to be applied, after paying my debts, to the use of Francis Barber, represented as a relation of Johnson's. (See p. 789.) That Johnson was anxious to discover whether any of his relations were living, is evinced by the following letter, written not long before he made his will: —

"JOHNSON TO THE REV. DR. VYSE,

"In Iambeth.

"Bolt Court, Nov. 29, 1781.

"SIR,—I am desirous to know whether Charles Scrimshaw, of Woodcase (I think), in your father's neighbourhood, be now living; what is his condition, and where he may be found. If you can conveniently make any inquiry about him, and can do it without delay, it will be an act of great kindness to me, he being very nearly related to me. I beg [you] to pardon this trouble. I am, &c.,
SAM. JOHNSON."

In conformity to the wish expressed in the preceding letter, an inquiry was made; but no descendants of Charles Scrimshaw or of his sisters were discovered to be living. Dr. Vyse informs me, that Dr. Johnson told him, "he was disappointed in the inquiries he had made after his relations." There is therefore no ground whatsoever for supposing that he was unmindful of them, or neglected them. — MVLONE.

my man-servant, a negro, in such manner as they shall judge most fit and available to his benefit. And I appoint the aforesaid Sir Joshua Reynolds, Sir John Hawkins, and Dr. William Scott, sole executors of this my last will and testament, hereby revoking all former wills and testaments whatever. In witness whereof I hereunto subscribe my name, and affix my seal, this eighth day of December, 1784.

“SAM. JOHNSON, (L. S.)

“Signed, sealed, published, declared, and delivered, by the said testator, as his last will and testament, in the presence of us, the word two being first inserted in the opposite page.

“GEORGE STRAHAN.
“JOHN DESMOULINS.”

“By way of codicil to my last will and testament, I, Samuel Johnson, give, devise, and bequeath, my messuage or tenement situate at Lichfield, in the county of Stafford, with the appurtenances, in the tenure and occupation of Mrs. Bond, of Lichfield, aforesaid, or of Mr. Hinchman, her under-tenant, to my executors, in trust, to sell and dispose of the same; and the money arising from such sale I give and bequeath as follows, viz. to Thomas and Benjamin, the sons of Fisher Johnson, late of Leicester, and——Whiting, daughter of Thomas Johnson, late of Coventry, and the grand-daughter of the said Thomas Johnson, one full and equal fourth part each; but in case there shall be more grand-daughters than one of the said Thomas Johnson living at the time of my decease, I give and bequeath the part or share of that one to and equally between such grand-daughters. I give and bequeath to the Rev. Mr. Rogers, of Berkley, near Froom, in the county of Somerset, the sum of one hundred pounds, requesting him to apply the same towards the maintenance of Elizabeth Herne, a lunatic.<sup>1</sup> I also give and bequeath to my god-children, the son and daughter of Muirtilus Lowe, painter, each of them one hundred pounds of my stock in the three per cent. consolidated annuities, to be applied and disposed of by and at the discretion of my executors, in the education or settlement in the world of them my said legatees. Also I give and bequeath to Sir John Hawkins, one of my executors, the Annales Ecclesiastici of Baronius, and Holinshed's and Stow's Chronicles, and also an octavo Common Prayer-Book. To Bennet Langton, Esq., I give and bequeath my Polyglot Bible. To Sir Joshua Reynolds, my great French Dictionary, by Martiniere; and my own copy of my folio English Dictionary, of the last revision. To Dr. William Scott, one of my executors, the Dictionnaire de Commerce, and Lectius's edition of the Greek Poets. To Mr. Wadham, Poetae Graeci Heroici per Henricum Stephanum. To the Rev. Mr. Strahan, vicar of Islington, in Middlesex, Mill's Greek Testament, Beza's Greek Testament, by Stephens, all my Latin Bibles, and my Greek Bible, by Wechlius. To Dr. Heberden, Dr. Brocklesby, Dr. Butler, and Mr. Craikshank, the surgeon who attended me, Mr. Holder, my apothecary, Gerard Hamilton, Esq., Mrs. Gardiner, of Snow-hill, Mrs. Frances Reynolds, Mr. Hoole, and the Reverend Mr. Hoole, his son, each a book at their election, to keep as a token of remembrance. I also give and bequeath to Mr. John Desmoulins, two hundred pounds consolidated three per cent. annuities; and to Mr. Sastrès, the Italian master, the sum of five pounds, to be laid out in books of piety for his own use. And whereas the said Bennet Langton hath agreed, in consideration of the sum of seven hundred and fifty pounds, mentioned in my will to be in his hands, to grant and secure an annuity of seventy pounds payable during the life of me and my servant, Francis Barber, and the life of the survivor of us, to Mr. George Stubbs, in trust for us; my mind and will is, that in case of my decease before the said agreement shall be perfected, the said sum of seven hundred and fifty pounds, and the bond for securing the said sum, shall go to the said Francis Barber; and I hereby give and bequeath to him the same, in lieu of the bequest in his favour contained in my said will. And I hereby empower my executors to deduct and retain all expenses that shall or may be incurred in the execution of my said will, or of this codicil thereto, out of such estate and effects as I shall die possessed of. All the rest, residue, and remainder of my estate and effects I give and bequeath to my said executors, in trust for the said Francis Barber<sup>2</sup>, his executors and administrators. Witness my hand and seal, this ninth day of December, 1784.

“SAM. JOHNSON, (L. S.)

“Signed, sealed, published, declared, and delivered, by the said Samuel Johnson, as and for a codicil to his last will and testament, in the presence of us, who, in his presence, and at his request, and also in the presence of each other, have hereto subscribed our names as witnesses.

“JOHN COPLEY.

“WILLIAM GIBSON.

“HENRY COLE.”

Upon these testamentary deeds it is proper to make a few observations. His express declaration with his dying breath as a Christian, as it had been often practised in such solemn writings, was of real consequence from this great man, for the conviction of a mind equally acute and strong might well overbalance the doubts of others who were his contemporaries. The expression polluted may, to some, convey an impression of more than ordinary contamination; but that is not warranted by its genuine meaning, as appears from “The Rambler,” No. 42.<sup>3</sup> The same word is used in the will of Dr. Sanderson, Bishop of Lincoln, who was piety itself. His legacy of two hundred pounds to the representatives of Mr. Innys, bookseller, in St. Paul's Churchyard, proceeded from a very worthy motive. He told Sir John Hawkins that his father having

<sup>1</sup> She was his first cousin. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>2</sup> Francis Barber, Dr. Johnson's principal legatee, died in the infirmary at Stafford, after undergoing a painful operation, February 13, 1801. — MALONE. In the Gentleman's Magazine for 1793, p. 619., there are some anecdotes of Barber, in which it is said that he was then forty-eight years old. Mr. Chalmers thinks that he was about fifty-six when he died; but as he entered Johnson's service in 1752, and could scarcely have been then under ten or twelve years of age, it is probable that he was somewhat older. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> The quotations from the Scriptures in Johnson's Dictionary sufficiently justify the use of this word; but it does not occur in No. 43. of the Rambler. In the Journey to the Hebrides he uses the word familiarly, and talks of “polluting the breakfast table with slices of cheese.” Mr. Boswell may perhaps have meant the Idler, No. 82., when Johnson added to Sir Joshua Reynolds's paper the words, “and polluted his canvass with deformity.” — CROKER.

become a bankrupt, Mr. Innys had assisted him with money or credit to continue his business. "This," said he, "I consider as an obligation on me to be grateful to his descendants." The amount of his property proved to be considerably more than he had supposed it to be. Sir John Hawkins estimates the bequest of Francis Barber at a sum little short of fifteen hundred pounds, including an annuity of seventy pounds to be paid to him by Mr. Langton, in consideration of seven hundred and fifty pounds which Johnson had lent to that gentleman. Sir John seems not a little angry at this bequest, and mutters "a caveat against ostentatious bounty and favour to negroes." But surely, when a man has money entirely of his own acquisition, especially when he has no near relations, he may, without blame, dispose of it as he pleases, and with great propriety to a faithful servant. Mr. Barber, by the recommendation of his master, retired to Lichfield, where he might pass the rest of his days in comfort. It has been objected that Johnson omitted many of his best friends, when leaving books to several as tokens of his last remembrance. The names of Dr. Adams, Dr. Taylor, Dr. Burney, Mr. Hector, Mr. Murphy, the author of this work, and others who were intimate with him, are not to be found in his will. This may be accounted for by considering, that as he was very near his dissolution at the time, he probably mentioned such as happened to occur to him; and that he may have recollected that he had formerly shown others such proofs of his regard, that it was not necessary to crowd his will with their names. Mrs. Lucy Porter was much displeas'd that nothing was left to her; but besides what I have now stated, she should have considered that she had left nothing to Johnson by her will, which was made during his lifetime, as appeared at her decease. His enumerating several persons in one group, and leaving them "each a book at their election," might possibly have given occasion to a curious question as to the order of choice, had they not luckily fixed on different books. His library, though by no means handsome in its appearance, was sold by Mr. Christie for two hundred and forty-seven pounds nine shillings; many people being desirous to have a book which had belonged to Johnson.<sup>1</sup>

The consideration of numerous papers of which he was possessed seems to have struck Johnson's mind with a sudden anxiety; and as they were in great confusion, it is much to be lamented that he had not intrusted some faithful and discreet person with the care and selection of them; instead of which he, in a precipitate manner, burnt large masses of them, with little regard, as I apprehend, to discrimination. Not that I suppose we have thus been deprived of any compositions which he had ever intended for the public eye; but from what escaped the flames I judge that many curious circumstances, relating both to himself and other literary characters, have perished.

Two very valuable articles, I am sure, we have lost, which were two quarto volumes<sup>2</sup>, containing a full, fair, and most particular account of his own life, from his earliest recollection. I owned to him, that having accidentally seen them, I had read a great deal in them; and apologising for the liberty I had taken, asked him if I could help it. He placidly answered, "Why, Sir, I do not think you could have helped it." I said that I had, for once in my life, felt half an inclination to commit theft. It had come into my mind to carry off those two volumes, and never see him more. Upon my inquiring how this would have affected him, "Sir," said he, "I believe I should have gone mad."<sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> In many of them he had written little notes: sometimes tender memorials of his departed wife; as, "This was dear Tetty's book:" sometimes occasional remarks of different sorts. Mr. Lysons, of Clifford's Inn, has favoured me with the two following: "In 'Holy Rules and Helps to Devotion, by Bryan Duppa, Lord Bishop of Winton,' Preces quidam videtur diligenter tractasse; spero non inauditis." In 'The Riscrisian infallible Axiomata, by John Heydon, Gent.,' prefixed to which are some verses addressed to the author, signed Ambr. Waters, A. M. Coll. Ex. Oxon., 'These Latin verses were written to Hobbes by Bathurst, upon his Treatise on Human Nature, and have no relation to the book.—An odd fraud.'"—BOSWELL. If, as has been stated, he had about 5000 volumes, they did not produce one shilling a volume. Mr. Windham bought Markland's Status, and wrote in the first page, "Fuit e libris clarissimi Samuelis Johnson." It now, by the favour of Mr. Jesse, who bought it at Mr. Windham's sale, belongs to me.—CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> There can be little doubt that these two quarto volumes were of the same kind as, if they were not actually transcripts of, various little diaries, some of which fell into the hands of Dr. Strahan and others; the strong expression that he would have "gone mad" had they been purloined, confirms my belief that Dr. Johnson never could have intended that these diaries should have been published. I am confident that they were given to Dr. Strahan inadvertently,—if indeed they were given at all, for which we have no evidence but Dr. Strahan's very obscure, contradictory, and improbable statement; and I cannot but suspect that it was by accident only that they escaped destruction on the 1st of December. See ante, p. 792.—CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> One of these volumes, Sir John Hawkins informs us, he put into his pocket; for which the excuse he states is, that he meant to preserve it from falling into the hands of a person whom he describes so as to make it sufficiently clear who is meant [Mr. George Steevens]: "having strong reasons," said he, "to suspect that this man might find and make an ill use of the book." Why Sir John should suppose that the gentleman alluded to would act in this manner, he has not thought fit to explain. But what he did was not approved of by Johnson; who, upon being acquainted of it without delay by a friend, expressed great indignation, and warmly insisted on the book being delivered up; and, afterwards, in the supposed taken, he said, "Sir, I should have gone out of the world distrusting half mankind." Sir John next day wrote a letter to Johnson, assigning reasons for his conduct; upon which Johnson observed to Mr. Langton, "Bishop Sanderson could not have dictated a better letter. I could almost say, Melius est sic penituisse quam non crasse." The agitation into which Johnson was thrown by this incident probably made him hastily burn those precious records, which must ever be regretted.—BOSWELL. I cannot tell what Hawkins's apology to Johnson may have been, but the excuses which he alleges in his book are contemptible, and prove the animus furandi; but it is not certain that the volume which Hawkins took was one of these two quartos; and it is certain that a destruction of papers took place a day or two before that event. Johnson had really some reason for "distrusting mankind," when, of two dear friends, he found one half inclined to commit a theft, and another actually committing it. His shop Sanderson was referred to because he was an eminent

During his last illness Johnson experienced the steady and kind attachment of his numerous friends. Mr. Hoole has drawn up a narrative<sup>1</sup> of what passed in the visits which he paid him during that time, from the 10th of November to the 13th of December, the day of his death, inclusive, and has favoured me with a perusal of it, with permission to make extracts, which I have done.

Nobody was more attentive to him than Mr. Langton<sup>2</sup>, to whom he tenderly said, Te teneam moriens deficiente manu. And I think it highly to the honour of Mr. Windham, that his important occupations as an active statesman did not prevent him from paying assiduous respect to the dying sage whom he revered. Mr. Langton informs me, that "one day he found Mr. Burke and four or five more friends sitting with Johnson. Mr. Burke said to him, 'I am afraid, Sir, such a number of us may be oppressive to you.'—'No, Sir,' said Johnson, 'it is not so; and I must be in a wretched state indeed when your company would not be a delight to me.' Mr. Burke, in a tremulous voice, expressive of being very tenderly affected, replied, 'My dear Sir, you have always been too good to me.' Immediately afterwards he went away. This was the last circumstance in the acquaintance of these two eminent men."

The following particulars of his conversation within a few days of his death I give on the authority of Mr. John Nichols:—

"He said that the Parliamentary Debates were the only part of his writings which then gave him any compunction: but that at the time he wrote them he had no conception he was imposing upon the world, though they were frequently written from very slender materials, and often from none at all,—the mere coinage of his own imagination. He never wrote any part of his works with equal velocity. Three columns of the magazine in an hour was no uncommon effort, which was faster than most persons could have transcribed that quantity.

"Of his friend Cave he always spoke with great affection. 'Yet,' said he, 'Cave (who never looked out of his window but with a view to the Gentleman's Magazine) was a penurious paymaster; he would contract for lines by the hundred, and expect the long hundred; but he was a good man, and always delighted to have his friends at his table.'

"When talking of a regular edition of his own works, he said that he had power (from the booksellers) to print such an edition, if his health admitted it; but had no power to assign over any edition, unless he could add notes, and so alter them as to make them new works; which his state of health forbade him to think of. 'I may possibly live,' said he, 'or rather breathe, three days, or perhaps three weeks; but find myself daily and gradually weaker.'

"He said at another time, three or four days only before his death, speaking of the little fear he had of undergoing a surgical operation, 'I would give one of these legs for a year more of life, I mean of comfortable life, not such as that which I now suffer;—and lamented much his inability to read during his hours of restlessness. 'I used formerly,' he added, 'when sleepless in bed, to read like a Turk.'

"Whilst confined by his last illness, it was his regular practice to have the church service read to him by some attentive and friendly divine. The Rev. Mr. Hoole performed this kind office in my presence for the last time, when, by his own desire, no more than the Litany was read; in which his responses were in the deep and sonorous voice which Mr. Boswell has occasionally noticed, and with the most profound devotion that can be imagined. His hearing not being quite perfect, he more than once interrupted Mr. Hoole with, 'Louder, my dear Sir, louder, I entreat you, or you pray in vain!'—and, when the service was ended, he, with great earnestness, turned round to an excellent lady who was present, saying, 'I thank you, Madam, very heartily, for your kindness in joining me in this solemn exercise. Live well, I conjure you; and you will not feel the compunction at the last which I now feel.'<sup>3</sup> So truly humble were the thoughts which this great and good man entertained of his own approaches to religious perfection.

"He was earnestly invited to publish a volume of Devotional Exercises; but this (though he listened to the proposal with much complacency, and a large sum of money was offered for it) he declined, from motives of the sincerest modesty.

"He seriously entertained the thought of translating Thuanus. He often talked to me on the subject; and once, in particular, when I was rather wishing that he would favour the world, and gratify his sovereign, by a Life of Spenser (which he said that he would readily have done had he been able to obtain any new materials for the purpose), he added, 'I have been thinking again, Sir, of Thuanus; it would not be the laborious task which you have supposed it. I should have no trouble but that of dictation, which would be performed as speedily as an amanuensis could write.'

On the same undoubted authority I give a few articles which should have been inserted in chronological order, but which, now that casulist, and treated of cases of conscience. There can be no doubt that Barber detected and reported, as was his duty, Hawkins's attempt to perjure the volume; and hence, I suppose, arose Hawkins's malevolence against both Johnson and Barber, and his endeavour to set up Heeley as a rival to the latter. Anti-c. p. 183. n. 1., and p. 789. — CROKER.

<sup>1</sup> This Journal has been since printed at length in the European Magazine for September, 1799. As it is too long to be inserted here, I have placed it in the Appendix. It will be read with interest. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> Mr. Langton survived Johnson several years. He died at Southampton, December 18. 1801, aged sixty-five. — MALONE. Hannah More writes, March 8. 1784. "I am sure you will honour Mr. Langton when I tell you that he is come to town on purpose to stay with Dr. Johnson during his illness. He has taken a little lodging in Fleet Street, in order to be near to devote himself to him." — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>3</sup> There is a slight error in Mr. Nichols's account, as appears by the following communication to me from the Rev. Mr. Hoole himself, now (1831) rector of Poplar:—

"My mother was with us when I read prayers to Dr. Johnson, on Wednesday, December 8.; but not for the last time as it is stated by Mr. Nichols, for I attended him again on Friday, the 10th. I must here mention an incident which shows how ready Johnson was to make amends for any littleness. When I called upon him, the morning after he had pressed me rather roughly to read louder, he said, 'I was peevish yesterday; you must forgive me: when you are as old and as sick as I am, perhaps you may be peevish too.' I have heard him make many apologies of this kind." — CROKER.

they are before me, I should be sorry to omit :—

“Among the early associates of Johnson, at St. John's Gate, was Samuel Boyse, well known by his ingenious productions; and not less noted for his imprudence. It was not unusual for Boyse to be a customer to the pawnbroker. On one of these occasions, Dr. Johnson collected a sum of money to redeem his friend's clothes, which in two days after were pawned again. ‘The sum,’ said Johnson, ‘was collected by sixpences, at a time when to me sixpence was a serious consideration.’

“Speaking one day of a person<sup>1</sup> for whom he had a real friendship, but in whom vanity was somewhat too predominant, he observed, that ‘Kelly was so fond of displaying on his sideboard the plate which he possessed, that he added to it his spurs. For my part,’ said he, ‘I never was master of a pair of spurs, but once; and they are now at the bottom of the ocean. By the carelessness of Boswell's servant, they were dropped from the end of the boat, on our return from the Isle of Sky.’”

The late Reverend Mr. Samuel Budeock<sup>2</sup> having been introduced to Dr. Johnson by Mr. Nichols, some years before his death, thus expressed himself in a letter to that gentleman:—

“How much I am obliged to you for the favour you did me in introducing me to Dr. Johnson! Tantum vidi Virgilium. But to have seen him, and to have received a testimony of respect from him, was enough. I recollect all the conversation, and shall never forget one of his expressions. Speaking of Dr. Priestley (whose writings, I saw, he estimated at a low rate), he said, ‘You have proved him as deficient in probity as he is in learning.’ I called him an ‘Inlex Scholar,’ but he was not willing to allow him a claim even to that merit. He said, ‘that he borrowed from those who had been borrowers themselves, and did not know that the mistakes he adopted had been answered by others.’ I often think of our short, but precious visit, to this great man. I shall consider it as a kind of an era in my life.”

It is to the mutual credit of Johnson and divines of different communions, that although he was a steady Church of England man, there was, nevertheless, much agreeable intercourse between him and them. Let me particularly name the late Mr. La Trobe<sup>3</sup> and Mr. Hutton, of the Moravian profession. His intimacy with the English Benedictines at Paris has been mentioned; and as an additional proof of the charity in which he lived with good men of the Romish church, I am happy in this opportunity of recording his friendship with the Rev. Thomas Hussey, D.D.<sup>4</sup>, his Catholic Majesty's chaplain of embassy at the court of London, that very respectable man, eminent not only for his powerful eloquence as a preacher, but for his various abilities and acquisitions. Nay, though Johnson loved a Presbyterian the least of all, this did not prevent his having a long and uninterrupted social connection with the Rev. Dr. James Fordyce, who, since his death, hath gratefully celebrated him in a warm strain of devotional composition.

Amidst the melancholy clouds which hung over the dying Johnson, his characteristic manner showed itself on different occasions.

When Dr. Warren, in his usual style, hoped that he was better, his answer was, “No, Sir; you cannot conceive with what acceleration I advance towards death.”

A man whom he had never seen before was employed one night to sit up with him. Being asked next morning how he liked his attendant, his answer was, “Not at all, Sir; the fellow's

<sup>1</sup> Hugh Kelly, the dramatic author, who died in Gough Square in 1777, æt. 38. Kelly's first introduction to Johnson was not likely to have pleased a person of “predominant vanity.” After having sat a short time, he got up to take his leave, saying, that he feared a longer visit might be troublesome. “Not in the least, Sir,” Johnson is said to have replied: “I had forgotten that you were in the room.”—CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> Chiefly known as a Monthly Reviewer, and for a controversy with Dr. Priestley, whose friend and admirer he had previously been. His assistance to Dr. White, in a celebrated Bampton Lecture, was also the subject of a smart controversy between that divine and Dr. Parr. He had been bred a dissentor, but conformed to the established church, and was ordained in 1787. He died soon after in May, 1788, æt. 41.—CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> The son of Mr. La Trobe has published (in the Christian Observer for January, 1828), “in order,” as he says, “that the tradition may not be lost,” what he calls a corroboration of some remarks, which appeared in that work for the October and November preceding, on the last days of Dr. Johnson. Mr. La Trobe's statement tends, as far as it is entitled to credit, to confirm the opinion already, it is hoped, universally entertained, that Johnson's death was truly christian. But Mr. La Trobe had little to tell, and of that little unfortunately the prominent facts are indisputably erroneous. Mr. La Trobe states, that “Dr. Johnson had during his last illness sent every day to know when his father, who was then out of town, would come back. The moment he arrived he went to the doctor's house, but found him speechless, though sensible. Mr. La Trobe addressed to him some religious exhortation, which Johnson showed by pressing his hand, and other signs, that he understood, and was thankful for. He expired the next morning, and Mr. La Trobe always regretted not having been able to attend Dr. Johnson sooner, according to his wish.” The reader will see that the inference suggested by this statement is, that Dr. Johnson wished for the spiritual assistance of Mr. La Trobe, in addition (or it might even be inferred, in preference) to that of his near and dear friends, Mr. Hoole and Dr. Strahan, clergymen of the established church; and it may be seen that the anonymous (and why anonymous?) writer of a letter published among Hannah More's, v. i. p. 379, repeats the tale of Mr. La Trobe's conversation having had a beneficial effect on Dr. Johnson's mind. Now the facts of the case essentially contradict Mr. La Trobe's account, and any inferences which might be deducible from it. Dr. Johnson, as will be seen in the Diaries of Sir J. Hawkins and Mr. Windham, was not speechless the day before his death, nor did he die next morning (which seems mentioned as the reason why Mr. La Trobe's visit was not repeated), but in the evening. And, which is quite conclusive, it appears from Mr. Hoole's Diary, that Mr. La Trobe's visit to Dr. Johnson's residence (and his son admits there was but one) took place about eleven o'clock in the forenoon of the 13th, three days before Dr. Johnson's death; that Mr. La Trobe did not even see him; and that it was in the course of that very day that Mr. Hoole read prayers to him and a small congregation of friends. And I must add, that some further particulars stated, with the same view, in the anonymous letter,—which the editor of Hannah More's ought not to have admitted without better authentication—are certainly and manifestly false. So little can anecdotes at second hand be trusted.—CROKER, 1831-17. But see Rev. P. La Trobe's reply to this at end of the Vol.

<sup>4</sup> No doubt the gentleman who is so conspicuous in Mr. Cumberland's Memoirs. He was subsequently first master of the Roman Catholic college at Maynooth, and titular Bishop of Waterford in Ireland, in which latter capacity he published, in 1797, a pastoral charge, which excited a good deal of observation.—CROKER.

an idiot; he is as awkward as a turnspit when first put into the wheel, and as sleepy as a dormouse."

He repeated with great spirit a poem, consisting of several stanzas, in four lines, in alternate rhyme, which he said he had composed some years before, on occasion of a rich, extravagant young gentleman's<sup>1</sup> coming of age: saying he had never repeated it but once since he composed it, and had given but one copy of it. That copy was given to Mrs. Thrale, now Piozzi, who has published it in a book which she entitles "British Synonymy," but which is truly a collection of entertaining remarks and stories, no matter whether accurate or not. Being a piece of exquisite satire, conveyed in a strain of pointed vivacity and humour, and in a manner of which no other instance is to be found in Johnson's writings, I shall here insert it.

"Long-expected one-and-twenty,
Ling'ring year, at length is flown;
Pride and pleasure, pomp and plenty,
Great [Sir John], are now your own.

"Loosen'd from the minor's tether,
Free to mortgage or to sell,
Wild as wind, and light as feather,
Bid the sons of thrift farewell.

"Call the Betseys, Kates, and Jennies,
All the names that banish care;
Lavish of your grandsire's guineas,
Show the spirit of an heir.

"All that prey on vice and folly
Joy to see their quarry fly;
There the gamester, light and jolly,
There the lender, grave and sly.

"Wealth, my lad, was made to wander,
Let it wander as it will;
Call the jockey, call the pander,
Bid them come and take their fill.

"When the bonny blade carouses,
Pockets full, and spirits high—
What are acres? what are houses?
Only dirt, or wet or dry.

"Should the guardian friend or mother
Tell the woes of wilful waste:
Scorn their counsels, scorn their pother,
You can hang or drown at last."

As he opened a note which his servant brought to him, he said, "An odd thought strikes me:—we shall receive no letters in the grave."<sup>2</sup>

He requested three things of Sir Joshua Reynolds:—To forgive him thirty pounds which he had borrowed of him;—to read the Bible;—and never to use his pencil on a Sunday. Sir Joshua readily acquiesced.<sup>3</sup>

Indeed he showed the greatest anxiety for the religious improvement of his friends, to whom he discoursed of its infinite consequence. He begged of Mr. Hoole to think of what he had said, and to commit it to writing; and, upon being afterwards assured that this was done, pressed his hands, and in an earnest tone thanked him. Dr. Brocklesby having attended him with the utmost assiduity and kindness as his physician and friend, he was peculiarly desirous that this gentleman should not entertain any loose speculative notions, but be confirmed in the truths of Christianity, and insisted on his writing down in his presence, as nearly as he could collect it, the import of what passed on the subject; and Dr. Brocklesby having complied with the request, he made him sign the paper, and urged him to keep it in his own custody as long as he lived.

Johnson, with that native fortitude which, amidst all his bodily distress and mental sufferings, never forsook him, asked Dr. Brocklesby, as a man in whom he had confidence, to tell him plainly whether he could recover. "Give me," said he, "a direct answer." The doctor, having first asked him if he could bear the whole truth, which way soever it might lead, and being answered that he could, declared that, in his opinion, he could not recover without a miracle. "Then," said Johnson, "I will take no more physic, not even my opiates; for I have prayed that I may render up my soul to God unclouded." In this resolution he persevered, and, at the same time, used only the weakest kinds of sustenance. Being pressed by Mr. Windham to take somewhat more generous nourishment, lest too low a diet should have the very effect which he dreaded, by debilitating his mind, he said, "I will take any thing but inebriating sustenance."

The Reverend Mr. Strahan, who was the son of his friend, and had been always one of his great favourites, had, during his last illness, the satisfaction of contributing to soothe and comfort him. That gentleman's house at Islington, of which he is vicar, afforded Johnson, occasionally and easily, an agreeable change of place and fresh air; and he attended also upon him in town in the discharge of the sacred offices of his profession.

<sup>1</sup> Sir John Lade—the posthumous son of the fourth baronet by Mr. Thrale's sister. He entered eagerly into all the follies of the day; was a remarkable whip; and married a woman of the town.—CROKER. See Johnson's letter to Mrs. Thrale, August 8th, 1780. "You have heard in the papers how [Lade] is come to age. I have enclosed a short song of congratulation, which you must not show to any body. It is odd that it should come into any body's head. I hope you will read it with candour; it is, I believe, one of the author's first essays in that way of writing, and a beginner is always to be treated with tenderness."—MALONE.

<sup>2</sup> Madame de Maintenon somewhere said, les morts n'écrivent pas; and higher thoughts of the same class had struck Jeremy Taylor;—"What servants shall we have to wait on us in the grave? What friends to visit us? What officious people to cleanse away the moist and unwholesome cloud relected on our faces from the sides of the weeping vaults, which are the longest creepers at our funeral!"—Holy Dying, chap. v. s. 2.—CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> Hannah More says that on this last article Sir Joshua hesitated a little, but at last complied.—CROKER, 1847.

Mr. Strahan has given me the agreeable assurance, that after being in much agitation, Johnson became quite composed, and continued so till his death.

Dr. Brocklesby, who will not be suspected of fanaticism, obliged me with the following accounts:—

“For some time before his death, all his fears were calmed and absorbed by the prevalence of his faith, and his trust in the merits and propitiation of Jesus Christ.

“He talked often to me about the necessity of faith in the sacrifice of Jesus, as necessary beyond all good works whatever for the salvation of mankind.

“He pressed me to study Dr. Clarke and to read his sermons. I asked him why he pressed Dr. Clarke, an Arian.<sup>1</sup> ‘Because,’ said he, ‘he is fullest on the propitiatory sacrifice.’”

Of his last moments, my brother, Thomas David, has furnished me with the following particulars:—

“The Doctor, from the time that he was certain his death was near, appeared to be perfectly resigned, was seldom or never fretful or out of temper, and often said to his faithful servant, who gave me this account, ‘Attend, Francis, to the salvation of your soul, which is the object of greatest importance:’ he also explained to him passages in the Scripture, and seemed to have pleasure in talking upon religious subjects.

“On Monday, the 13th of December, the day on which he died, a Miss Morris<sup>2</sup>, daughter to a particular friend of his, called, and said to Francis, that she begged to be permitted to see the Doctor, that she might earnestly request him to give her his blessing. Francis went into the room, followed by the young lady, and delivered the message. The Doctor turned himself in the bed, and said, ‘God bless you, my dear!’ These were the last words he spoke. His difficulty of breathing increased till about seven o’clock in the evening, when Mr. Barber and Mrs. Desmoulins, who were sitting in the room, observing that the noise he had made in breathing had ceased, went to the bed, and found he was dead.”<sup>3</sup>

About two days after his death, the following very agreeable account was communicated to Mr. Malone, in a letter by the Honourable John Byng, to whom I am much obliged for granting me permission to introduce it in my work:—

“DEAR SIR,—Since I SAW YOU, I have had a long conversation with Cawston<sup>4</sup>, who sat up with Dr. Johnson, from nine o’clock on Sunday evening, till ten o’clock on Monday morning. And, from what I can gather from him, it should seem that Dr. Johnson was perfectly composed, steady in hope, and resigned to death. At the interval of each hour, they assisted him to sit up in his bed, and move his legs, which were in much pain; when he regularly addressed himself to fervent prayer; and though, sometimes, his voice failed him, his sense never did, during that time. The only sustenance he received was cider and water. He said his mind was prepared, and the time to his dissolution seemed long. At six in the morning, he inquired the hour, and, on being informed, said, that all went on regularly, and he felt that he had but a few hours to live.

“At ten o’clock in the morning, he parted from Cawston, saying, ‘You should not detain Mr. Windham’s servant:—I thank you; bear my remembrance to your master.’ Cawston says, that no man could appear more collected, more devout, or less terrified at the thoughts of the approaching minute.

“This account, which is so much more agreeable than, and somewhat different from, yours, has given us the satisfaction of thinking that that great man died as he lived, full of resignation, strengthened in faith, and joyful in hope.”

A few days before his death, he had asked Sir John Hawkins, as one of his executors, where he should be buried; and on being answered, “Doubtless, in Westminster Abbey,” seemed to feel a satisfaction, very natural to a poet; and indeed in my opinion very natural to every man of any imagination, who has no family sepulchre in which he can be laid with his fathers. Accordingly, upon Monday, December 20., his remains [enclosed in a leaden coffin] were deposited in that noble and renowned edifice [in the south transept, near the foot of Shakspeare’s monument, and close to the coffin of his friend Garrick]; and over his grave was placed a large blue flag-stone, with this inscription:—

“SAMUEL JOHNSON, LL. D.
Obiit XIII. die Decembris,
Anno Domini
M. DCC. LXXXIV.
Ætatis sue LXXV.”

<sup>1</sup> The change of his sentiments with regard to Dr. Clarke is thus mentioned to me in a letter from the late Dr. Adams, master of Pembroke College, Oxford.—“The Doctor’s prejudices were the strongest, and certainly in another sense the weakest, that ever possessed a sensible man. You know his extreme zeal for orthodoxy. But did you ever hear what he told me himself—that he had made it a rule not to admit Dr. Clarke’s name in his Dictionary? This, however, wore off. At some distance of time he advised with me what books he should read in defence of the Christian religion. I recommended ‘Clarke’s Evidences of Natural and Revealed Religion,’ as the best of the kind; and I find in what is called his ‘Prayers and Meditations,’ that he was frequently employed in the latter part of his time in reading Clarke’s Sermons.”—BOSWELL. But as early as 1763, he recommended Dr. Clarke, antè, p. 135.—CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> She was the sister of a lady of the same name who appeared on the stage at Covent Garden as Juliet, in 1768, and died next year. She was a relation of Mr. Corbyn Morris, commissioner of the customs.—CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> The following letter, now in my possession, written with an agitated hand, from the very chamber of death, by the amiable Mr. Langton, and obviously interrupted by his feelings, will not unaptly close the story of so long a friendship. The letter is not addressed, but Mr. Langton’s family believe it was intended for Mr. Boswell.

MY DEAR SIR,—After many conflicting hopes and fears respecting the event of this heavy return of illness which has assailed our honoured friend, Dr. Johnson, since his arrival from Lichfield, about four days ago the appearances grew more and more awful, and this afternoon at eight o’clock, when I arrived at his house to see how he should be going on, I was acquainted at the door, that about three quarters of an hour before, he breathed his last. I am now writing in the room where his venerable remains exhibit it would be in any sort to find terms to express, so to you, my dear Sir, whose own sensations will paint it so strongly, it would be of all men the most superfluous to attempt to—.—CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> Servant to the Right Hon. William Windham.—BOSWELL.

His funeral was attended by a respectable number of his friends, particularly such of the members of The Literary Club as were in town; and was also honoured with the presence of several of the Reverend Chapter of Westminster. Mr. Burke, Sir Joseph Banks, Mr. Windham, Mr. Langton, Sir Charles Bunbury, and Mr. Colman bore his pall. His schoolfellow, Dr. Taylor, performed the mournful office of reading the burial service.<sup>1</sup>

I trust I shall not be accused of affectation, when I declare, that I find myself unable to express all that I felt upon the loss of such a "guide, philosopher, and friend."<sup>2</sup> I shall, therefore, not say one word of my own, but adopt those of an eminent friend<sup>3</sup>, which he uttered with an abrupt felicity, superior to all studied compositions:—"He has made a chasm, which not only nothing can fill up, but which nothing has a tendency to fill up. Johnson is dead. Let us go to the next best: there is nobody; no man can be said to put you in mind of Johnson."

As Johnson had abundant homage paid to him during his life<sup>4</sup>, so no writer in this nation ever had such an accumulation of literary honours after his death. A sermon upon that event was preached in St. Mary's Church, Oxford, before the University, by the Rev. Mr. Agutter, of Magdalen College.<sup>5</sup> The <sup>1</sup> "It must be told, that a dissatisfaction was expressed in the public papers that he was not buried with all possible funeral rites and honours. In all processions and solemnities something will be forgotten or omitted. Here no disrespect was intended. The executors did not think themselves justified in doing more than they did; for only a little cathedral service, accompanied with lights and music, would have raised the price of interment. In this matter fees ran high; they could not be excused; and the expenses were to be paid from the property of the deceased. His funeral expenses amounted to more than two hundred pounds. Future monumental charges may be defrayed by the generosity of subscription."—Gentleman's Magazine, 1785, p. 911, probably by Mr. Tycers.

There was some hope that the fees would have been refunded, and Stevens made a suggestion to that effect in the Genl. Mag., but they were not; and it is to be added, that all Dr. Johnson's friends, but especially Malone and Stevens, were indignant at the mean and selfish spirit which the dean and chapter exhibited on this occasion; but they were especially so against Dr. Taylor, not only for not having prevailed on his colleagues to show more respect to his old friend, but for the unfeeling manner in which he himself performed the burial service.—CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> On the subject of Johnson I may adopt the words of Sir John Harrington concerning his venerable tutor and diocesan, Dr. John Still, Bishop of Bath and Wells: "who hath given me some helps, more hopes, all encouragements in my best studies: to whom I never came but I grew more religious; from whom I never went, but I parted better instructed. Of him, therefore, my acquaintance, my friend, my instructor, if I speak much, it were not to be marvelled; if I speak frankly, it is not to be blamed; and though I speak partially, it were to be pardoned."—Nuga Antiqua, vol. i. p. 136. There is one circumstance in Sir John's character of Bishop Still, which is peculiarly applicable to Johnson: "He became so famous a disputer, that the learnedest were even afraid to dispute with him; and he, finding his own strength, could not stick to warn them in their arguments to take heed to their answers, like a perfect fencer that will tell beforehand in which button he will give the venew, or like a cunning chess-player that will appoint beforehand with which pawn and in what place he will give the mate." Ibid.—BOSWELL.

<sup>3</sup> The late Right Hon. William Gerard Hamilton, who had been intimately acquainted with Dr. Johnson near thirty years. He died in London, July 16. 1796, in his sixty-eighth year.—MALONE.

Lives, the Memoirs, the Essays, both in prose and verse, which have been published concerning him, would make many volumes. The numerous attacks too upon him I consider as part of his consequence, upon the principle which he himself so well knew and asserted. Many who trembled at his presence were forward in assault, when they no longer apprehended danger. When one of his little pragmatical foes was invidiously snarling at his fame at Sir Joshua Reynolds's table, the Reverend Dr. Parr exclaimed, with his usual bold animation, "Ay, now that the old lion is dead, every ass thinks he may kick at him."

A monument for him, in Westminster Abbey, was resolved upon soon after his death, and was supported by a most respectable contribution; but the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's having come to a resolution of admitting monuments there upon a liberal and magnificent plan, that cathedral was afterwards fixed on, as a place in which a cenotaph should be erected to his memory; and in the cathedral of his native city of Lichfield a smaller one is to be erected.<sup>6</sup> To compose his epitaph, could not but excite the warmest competition of genius. If laudari è laudato viro be praise which is highly estimable, I should not forgive myself were I to omit the following sepulchral verses on the author of THE ENGLISH DICTIONARY, written by the Right Honourable Henry Flood<sup>7</sup>:—

<sup>4</sup> Beside the Dedications to him by Dr. Goldsmith, the Rev. Dr. Franklin, and the Rev. Mr. Wilson, which I have mentioned according to their dates, there was one by a lady, of a versification of "Aningait and Ajut," and one by the ingenious Mr. Walker, of his "Rhetorical Grammar." I have introduced into this work several compliments paid to him in the writings of his contemporaries; but the number of them is so great, that we may fairly say that there was almost a general tribute. Let me not be forgetful of the honour done to him by Colonel Myddleton, of Gwaynynog, near Denbigh; who, on the banks of a rivulet in his park, where Johnson delighted to stand and repeat verses, erected an urn with the inscription given antè, p. 423. n. 4.—BOSWELL. Here followed an account of the various portraits of Dr. Johnson, which will be found at the end of the chapter.—CROKER.

<sup>5</sup> It is not yet published. In a letter to me, Mr. Agutter says, "My sermon before the University was more engaged with Dr. Johnson's moral than his intellectual character. It particularly examined his fear of death, and suggested several reasons for the apprehensions of the good, and the indifference of the infidel, in their last hours; this was illustrated by contrasting the death of Dr. Johnson and Mr. Hume: the text was, Job, xxi. 22—26."—BOSWELL.

<sup>6</sup> This monument has been since erected. It consists of a medallion, with a tablet beneath, on which is this inscription:—

The friends of SAMUEL JOHNSON, LL. D.

A native of Lichfield,
Erected this Monument,
As a tribute of respect

To the Memory of a man of extensive learning,
A distinguished moral writer, and a sincere Christian.
He died Dec. 13. 1784, aged 75.—MALONE.

<sup>7</sup> To prevent any misconception on this subject, Mr. Malone, by whom these lines were obligingly communicated, requests me to add the following remark:—

"In justice to the late Mr. Flood, now himself wanting, and highly meriting an epitaph from his country, to which his transcendent talents did the highest honour, as well as the most important service, it should be observed, that these lines were by no means intended as a regular monumental inscription for Dr. Johnson. Had he undertaken to write an appropriate and discriminative epitaph for that excellent and

"No need of Latin or of Greek to grace
Our JOHNSON'S memory, or inscribe his grave;
His native language claims this mournful space,
To pay the immortality he gave." 1

The Rev. Dr. Parr, on being requested to undertake Johnson's epitaph, thus expressed himself in a letter to William Seward, Esq.:

"I leave this mighty task to some hardier and some abler writer. The variety and splendour of Johnson's attainments, the peculiarities of his character, his private virtues, and his literary publications, fill me with confusion and dismay, when I reflect upon the confined and difficult species of composition, in which alone they can be expressed with propriety, upon this monument."

But I understand that this great scholar, and warm admirer of Johnson, has yielded to repeated solicitations, and executed the very difficult undertaking.

extraordinary man, those who knew Mr. Flood's vigour of mind will have no doubt that he would have produced one worthy of his illustrious subject. But the fact was merely this: in December, 1789, after a large subscription had been made for Dr. Johnson's monument, to which Mr. Flood liberally contributed, Mr. Malone happened to call on him at his house in Berners Street, and the conversation turning on the proposed monument, Mr. Malone maintained that the epitaph, by whomsoever it should be written, ought to be in Latin. Mr. Flood thought differently. The next morning, in a postscript to a note on another subject, he mentioned that he continued of the same opinion as on the preceding day, and subjoined the lines above given." — BOSWELL.

1 Dr. Johnson's monument, consisting of a colossal figure leaning against a column (but not very strongly resembling him), has since the death of Mr. Boswell been placed in St. Paul's Cathedral, having been first opened to public view, February 23. 1796. The epitaph was written by the Rev. Dr. Parr, and is as follows:—

A  $\text{X}$   $\text{\Omega}$

SAMVELI JOHNSON
GRAMMATICO ET CRITICO
SCRIPTORVM ANGLICORVM LITTERATE
PERITO
POETAE LVMINIBVS SENTENTIARVM
ET PONDERIBVS VERBORVM ADMIRABILI
MAGISTRO VIRTVTIS GRAVISSIMO
HOMINI OPTIMO ET SINGVLARIS EXEMPLI

QVI VIXIT ANN LXXV MENS 11 DIEB XIII
DECESSIT IDIB DECEMBER ANN CHRIST
CLD LCC LXXXIII SEPVL IN AED SANCT
PETR WESTMONASTERIENS XII KAL
IANVAR ANN CHRIST CLD LCC LXXXV
AMICI ET SODALES LITTERARI
PECVNIA CONLATA
H M FACIEND CVRAVER

On a scroll in his hand are the following words:—
ENMAKAPESΣIΠONΩNANTAΞIΘEΣIHAMOIBH.

On one side of the monument:—
FACIEBAT JOHANNES BACON, SCYPTOR ANN. CHRIST.
M.D.C.C.LXXXV.

The subscription for this monument, which cost eleven hundred guineas, was begun by the Literary Club, and completed by the aid of Johnson's other friends and admirers.—MALONE.

It is to be regretted that the committee for erecting this monument did not adhere to the principles of the Round Robin, on the subject of Goldsmith's epitaph, (ante, p. 521.), and insist on having the epitaph to Johnson written in the language to which he had been so great and so very peculiar a benefactor. The committee of subscribers, called curators, were Lord Stowell, Mr. Burke, Mr. Windham, Sir Joseph Banks, Mr. Metcalf, Mr. Boswell, and Mr. Malone; of whom, Mr. Metcalf, Mr. Burke, and Sir Joseph had signed the Round Robin; but it may be presumed that Dr. Johnson's pre-

CONCLUSION.

THE character of SAMUEL JOHNSON has, I trust, been so developed in the course of this work, that they who have honoured it with a perusal may be considered as well acquainted with him. As, however, it may be expected that I should collect into one view the capital and distinguishing features of this extraordinary man, I shall endeavour to acquit myself of that part of my biographical undertaking, however difficult it may be to do that which many of my readers will do better for themselves.

His figure was large and well formed, and his countenance of the cast of an ancient statue; yet his appearance was rendered strange and somewhat uncouth, by convulsive cramps, by the scars of that distemper which it was once ference of a Latin epitaph, so positively pronounced on that occasion, operated on their minds as an expression of what his wishes would have been as to his own. It seems, however, to me, the height of bad taste and absurdity to exhibit Dr. Johnson in St. Paul's cathedral in the masquerade of a half-naked Roman, with such pedantic, and, to the passing public, unintelligible inscriptions as the above: of which the following is a close translation:—

Alpha  $\text{X}$  Omega.

TO SAMUEL JOHNSON,

A grammarian and critic
Of great skill in English literature;
A poet admirable for the light of his sentences
And the weight of his words;
A most effective teacher of virtue;
An excellent man, and of singular example,
Who lived 75 years, 2 months, 14 days.

He died in the ides of December, in the year of Christ,
MDCCLXXXV.

Was buried in the church of St. Peter's, Westminster,
The 13th of the kalends of January, in the year of Christ
MDCCLXXXV.

His literary friends and companions,
By a collection of money,
Caused this monument to be made.

The reader will not of course attribute to the original all the awkwardness of this nearly literal version; but he will not fail to observe the tedious and confused mode of marking the numerals, the unnecessary repetition of them, and the introduction of nones and ides, all of which are, even on the principles of the Lapidarian scholars themselves, clumsy, and on the principles of common sense, contemptible. Thirty-four letters and numerals (nearly a tenth part of the whole inscription) are, for instance, expended in letting posterity know that Dr. Johnson was buried in about a week after his death.

The Greek words, so pedantically jumbled together on the scroll, are an alteration by Dr. Parr of the concluding line of Dionysius, the zoographer, with which Johnson had closed the Rambler. See ante, p. 71. It seems, that in deference to some apprehensions of the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's might think the ΑΡΙΣΤΟΝ ΕΙΣΙΝ ΑΝΤΙΣΤΟΙΧΟΝ ἢ ἀμειβῆ,—from the blessed [gods] may he receive his merited reward—somewhat heathenish, Dr. Parr was persuaded to convert the line into Ἐν μακαρίσιν τοῖς ἀνταχθῶς ἢ ἀμειβῶ—may he receive amongst the blessed the merited reward of his labours. The reader who is curious about the pompous inanities of literature will find at the end of the fourth volume of Dr. Parr's works, ed. 1828, a long correspondence between Parr, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Malone, and other friends of Dr. Johnson, on the subject of this epitaph. He will be amused at the burlesque importance which Parr attaches to epitaph-writing, the tenacity with which he endeavoured to describe Dr. Johnson, with reverence to his poetical character, as poeta probabilis, and his candid avowal, that in the composition he was thinking more of his own character than Dr. Johnson's.—CROKER.

2 As I do not see any reason to give a different character of my illustrious friend now from what I formerly gave, the greatest part of the sketch of him in my "Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides" is here adopted.—BOSWELL.

imagined the royal touch could cure, and by a slovenly mode of dress. He had the use only of one eye; yet so much does mind govern, and even supply the deficiency of organs, that his visual perceptions, as far as they extended, were uncommonly quick and accurate. So morbid was his temperament, that he never knew the natural joy of a free and vigorous use of his limbs: when he walked, it was like the struggling gait of one in fetters; when he rode, he had no command or direction of his horse, but was carried as if in a balloon. That with his constitution and habits of life he should have lived seventy-five years, is a proof that an inherent vidida vis is a powerful preservative of the human frame.

Man is, in general, made up of contradictory qualities; and these will ever show themselves in strange succession, where a consistency in appearance at least, if not reality, has not been attained by long habits of philosophical discipline. In proportion to the native vigour of the mind, the contradictory qualities will be the more prominent, and more difficult to be adjusted; and, therefore, we are not to wonder that Johnson exhibited an eminent example of this remark which I have made upon human nature. At different times he seemed a different man in some respects; not, however, in any great or essential article, upon which he had fully employed his mind, and settled certain principles of duty, but only in his manners, and in the display of argument and fancy in his talk. He was prone to superstition, but not to credulity. Though his imagination might incline him to a belief of the marvellous and the mysterious, his vigorous reason examined the evidence with jealousy. He was a sincere and zealous Christian, of high Church of England and monarchical principles, which he would not tamely suffer to be questioned; and had, perhaps, at an early period, narrowed his mind somewhat too much, both as to religion and politics. His being impressed with the danger of extreme latitude in either, though he was of a very independent spirit, occasioned his appearing somewhat unfavourable to the prevalence of that noble freedom of sentiment which is the best possession of man. Nor can it be denied that he had many prejudices; which, however, frequently suggested many of his pointed sayings, that rather show a playfulness of fancy than any settled malignity. He was steady and inflexible in maintaining the obligations of religion and morality, both from a regard for the order of society and from a veneration for the Great Source of all order; correct, nay stern, in his taste; hard to please, and easily offended; impetuous and irritable in his temper, but of a most humane and benevolent heart<sup>1</sup>, which showed itself not only in a most liberal charity, as far as his circumstances would allow, but in a thousand instances of active benevolence. He was afflicted with a bodily disease, which made him often restless and fretful, and with a constitutional melancholy, the clouds of which darkened the brightness of his fancy, and gave a gloomy cast to his whole course of thinking; we, therefore, ought not to wonder at his sallies of impatience and passion at any time, especially when provoked by obtrusive ignorance or presuming petulance; and allowance must be made for his uttering hasty and satirical sallies even against his best friends. And, surely, when it is considered, that "amidst sickness and sorrow" he exerted his faculties in so many works for the benefit of mankind, and particularly that he achieved the great and admirable Dictionary of our language, we must be astonished at his resolution. The solemn text, "Of him to whom much is given much will be required," seems to have been ever present to his mind, in a rigorous sense, and to have made him dissatisfied with his labours and acts of goodness, however comparatively great; so that the unavoidable consciousness of his superiority was, in that respect, a cause of disquiet. He suffered so much from this, and from the gloom which perpetually haunted him, and made solitude frightful, that it may be said of him, "If in this life only he had hope, he was of all men most miserable." He loved praise when it was brought to him; but was too proud to seek for it. He was somewhat susceptible of flattery. As he was general and unconfined in his studies, he cannot be considered as master of any one particular science; but he had accumulated a vast and various collection of learning and knowledge, which was so arranged in his mind as to be ever in readiness to be brought forth. But his superiority over other learned men consisted chiefly in what may be called the art of thinking, the art of using his mind; a certain continual power of seizing the useful substance of all that he knew, and exhibiting it in a clear and forcible manner; so that knowledge, which we often see to be no better than lumber in men of dull understanding, was in him true, evident, and actual wisdom. His moral precepts are practical, for they are drawn from an intimate acquaintance with human nature. His maxims carry conviction; for they are founded on the basis of common sense, and a very attentive and minute survey of real life. His mind was so full of imagery that he might have been perpetually a poet; yet it is remarkable, that however rich his prose is in this respect, his poetical pieces in general have not much of that splendour, but are rather distinguished by strong sentiment and acute obser-

<sup>1</sup> In the "Olla Podrida," a collection of essays published at Oxford, there is an admirable paper upon the character of Johnson, written by the Rev. Dr. Horne, the late excellent Bishop of Norwich. The following passage is eminently happy:—"To reject wisdom, because the person of him who communicates it is uncouth, and his manners are inelegant; what is it, but to throw away a pine-apple, and assign for a reason the roughness of its coat?"—BOSWELL.

vation, conveyed in harmonious and energetic verse, particularly in heroic couplets. Though usually grave, and even awful in his deportment, he possessed uncommon and peculiar powers of wit and humour; he frequently indulged himself in colloquial pleasantry; and the heartiest merriment was often enjoyed in his company; with this great advantage, that, as it was entirely free from any poisonous tincture of vice or impiety, it was salutary to those who shared in it. He had accustomed himself to such accuracy in his common conversation<sup>1</sup>, that he at all times expressed his thoughts with great force, and an elegant choice of language, the effect of which was aided by his having a loud voice, and a slow deliberate utterance. In him were united a most logical head with a most fertile imagination, which gave him an extraordinary advantage in arguing: for he could reason close or wide, as he saw best for the moment. Exulting in his intellectual strength and dexterity, he could, when he pleased, be the greatest sophist that ever contended in the list of declamation; and, from a spirit of contradiction, and a delight in showing his powers, he would often maintain the wrong side with equal warmth and ingenuity; so that, when there was an audience, his real opinions could seldom be gathered from his talk; though when he was in company with a single friend, he would discuss a subject with genuine fairness; but he was too conscientious to make error permanent and pernicious, by deliberately writing it; and, in all his numerous works, he earnestly inculcated what appeared to him to be the truth; his piety being constant, and the ruling principle of all his conduct.

Such was SAMUEL JOHNSON<sup>2</sup>; a man whose talents, acquisitions, and virtues, were so extraordinary, that the more his character is considered, the more he will be regarded by the present age, and by posterity, with admiration and reverence.

<sup>1</sup> Though a perfect resemblance of Johnson is not to be found in any age, parts of his character are admirably expressed by Clarendon, in drawing that of Lord Falkland, whom the noble and masterly historian describes at his seat near Oxford: "Such an immensity of wit, such a solidity of judgment, so infinite a fancy, bound in by a most logical ratiocination. His acquaintance was cultivated by the most polite and accurate men; so that his house was an university in less volume, whether they came, not so much for repose as study, and to examine and refine those grosser propositions which laziness and consent made current in conversation." Bayle's account of Menage may also be quoted as exceedingly applicable to the great subject of this work:—

"His illustrious friends erected a very glorious monument to him in the collection entitled 'Menagiana.' Those who judge of things right will confess that this collection is very proper to show the extent of genius and learning which was the character of Menage. And I may be bold to say, that the excellent works he published will not distinguish him from other learned men so advantageously as this. To publish books of great learning, to make Greek and Latin verses exceedingly well turned, is not a common talent; I own; neither is it extremely rare. It is incomparably more difficult to find men who can furnish discourse about an infinite number of things, and who can diversify them a hundred ways. How many authors are there who are admired for their works, on account of the vast learning that is displayed in them, who are not able to sustain a conversation. Those who know Menage only by his books might think he resembled those learned men; but if you show the 'Menagiana,' you distinguish him from them, and make him known by a talent which is given to very few learned men. There it appears that he was a man who spoke off-hand a thousand good things. His memory extended to what was ancient and modern; to the court and to the city; to the dead and to the living languages; to things serious and things jocose; in a word, to a thousand sorts of subjects. That which appeared a trifle to some readers of the 'Menagiana,' who did not consider circumstances, caused admiration in other readers, who minded the difference between what a man speaks without preparation and that which he prepares for the press. And, therefore, we cannot sufficiently commend the care which his illustrious friends took to erect a monument so capable of giving him immortal glory. They were not obliged to rectify what they had heard him say; for, in so doing, they had not been faithful historians of his conversation." — BOSWELL.

<sup>2</sup> As no inconsiderable circumstance of his fame, we must reckon the extraordinary zeal of the artists to extend and perpetuate his image. I can enumerate a bust by Mr. Nollekens, and the many casts which were made from it; (p. 568, n. 2.), several pictures by Sir Joshua Reynolds, from one of which, in the possession of the Duke of Dorset, Mr. Humphrey executed a beautiful miniature in enamel; one by Mrs. Frances Reynolds, Sir Joshua's sister; one by Mr. Zoffany; and one by Mr. Opie; and the following engravings of his portrait:—1. By Cooke, from Sir Joshua, for the proprietors' edition of his folio Dictionary. — 2. One from ditto, by ditto, for their quarto edition. — 3. One from Opie, by Heath, for Harrison's edition of his Dictionary. — 4. One from Nollekens' bust of him, by Bartolozzi, for Fielding's quarto edition of his Dictionary. — 5. One small, from Sir Joshua, by Trotter, for his "Beauties." — 6. One small, from Sir Joshua, by Trotter, for his "Lives of the Poets." — 7. One small from Sir Joshua, by Hall, for "The Rambler." — 8. One small from an original drawing, in the possession of Mr. John Simeon, etched by Trotter, for another edition of his "Lives of the Poets." — 9. One small, no painter's name, etched by Taylor, for his "Johnsoniana." — 10. One folio, whole length, with his oak stick, as described in Boswell's "Tour," drawn and etched by Trotter. — 11. One large Mezzotinto, from Sir Joshua, by Doughty. — 12. One large Roman head, from Sir Joshua, by Marchi. — 13. One octavo, holding a book to his eye, from Sir Joshua, by Hall, for his works. — 14. One small, from a drawing from the life, and engraved by Trotter, for his life published by Kearsley. — 15. One large, from Opie, by Mr. Townley (brother of Mr. Townley of the Commons), an ingenious artist, who resided some time at Berlin, and has the honour of being engraver to His Majesty the King of Prussia. This is one of the finest mezzotintos that ever was executed; and what renders it of extraordinary value, the plate was destroyed after four or five impressions only were taken off. One of them is in the possession of Sir William Scott. Mr. Townley has lately been prevailed with to execute and publish another of the same, that it may be more generally circulated amongst the admirers of Dr. Johnson. — 16. One large, from Sir Joshua's first picture of him, by Heath, for this work, in quarto. — 17. One octavo, by Baker, for the octavo edition. — 18. And one for "Lavoisier's Essays on Phlogistony," in which Johnson's countenance is analysed upon the principles of that fanciful writer. There are also several seals with his head cut on them, particularly a very fine one by that eminent artist, Edward Burch, Esq., R.A., in the possession of the younger Dr. Charles Bury.

Let me add, as a proof of the popularity of his character, that there are copper pieces struck at Birmingham, with his head impressed on them, which pass current as half-pence there, and in the neighbouring parts of the country. — BOSWELL.

I had in my first edition, with the assistance of Mr. John Murray, enlarged Mr. Boswell's catalogue of pictures and engravings, but the latter have become too many for enumeration. I am, therefore, obliged to abide by Mr. Boswell's list, which comprises the best and most remarkable; adding only, that Dr. Harwood allowed me to engrave for my first edition a miniature (painter unknown), which had belonged to Mrs. Johnson, and was no doubt very like when he was about 30. — CROKER, 1817.

APPENDIX.

NO. I.

AN ACCOUNT OF THE EARLY LIFE OF DR. JOHNSON,

WRITTEN BY HIMSELF.

[See p. 4.]

From a little volume published in 1805, and now become scarce, entitled "An Account of the Life of Dr. Samuel Johnson, from his Birth to his Eleventh Year, written by himself; to which are added, Original Letters to Dr. Johnson, by Miss Hill Boothby; from the MSS. preserved by the Doctor, and now in possession of Richard Wright, Surgeon, of Lichfield."—"This volume (says this gentleman) was among that mass of papers which were ordered to be committed to the flames a few days before Dr. Johnson's death, thirty-two pages of which were torn out by himself, and destroyed. Francis Barber, his black servant, unwilling that all the MSS. of his illustrious master should be utterly lost, preserved these relics from the flames. By purchase they came into the possession of the Editor."—It seems strange that Mr. Boswell, who seems to have had access to all Barber's information, should not have heard of this.—CROKER.

A N N A L S.

I. 1709-10.

SEPT. 7.<sup>1</sup> 1709, I was born at Lichfield. My mother had a very difficult and dangerous labour, and was assisted by George Hector, a man-midwife of great reputation.<sup>2</sup> I was born almost dead<sup>3</sup>, and could not cry for some time. When he had me in his arms, he said, "Here is a brave boy."

In a few weeks an inflammation was discovered on my buttock, which was at first, I think, taken for a burn; but soon appeared to be a natural disorder. It swelled, broke, and healed.

My father being that year sheriff of Lichfield, and to ride the circuit of the county<sup>4</sup> next day, which was a ceremony then performed with great pomp; he was asked by my mother, "Whom he would invite to the Riding?" and answered, "All the town now." He feasted the citizens with uncommon magnificence, and was the last but one that maintained the splendour of the Riding.

I was, by my father's persuasion, put to one Marclew, commonly called "Bellison's," the servant, or wife of a servant of my father, to be nursed in George Lane, where I used to call when I was a bigger boy, and eat fruit in the garden, which was full of trees. Here it was discovered that my eyes were bad; and an issue was cut in my left arm<sup>6</sup>, of which I took no great notice, as I think my mother has told me, having my little hand in a custard.

It is observable, that, having been told of this operation, I always imagined that I remembered it, but I laid the scene in the wrong house. Such confusions of memory I suspect to be common.

My mother visited me every day, and used to go different ways, that her assiduity might not expose her to ridicule; and often left her fan or glove behind her, that she might have a pretence to come back unexpected; but she never discovered any taken of neglect. Dr. Swinfen told me, that the scrofulous sores which afflicted me proceeded from the bad humours of the nurse, whose son had the same distemper, and was likewise short-sighted, but both in a less degree. My mother thought my diseases derived from her family.<sup>7</sup>

In ten weeks I was taken home, a poor, diseased infant, almost blind.

I remember my aunt Nath. Ford told me, when I was about . . . years old, that she would not have picked such a poor creature up in the street.

In 1707, when I was at Lichfield, I went to look for my nurse's house; and, inquiring somewhat obscurely, was told "this is the house in which you were nursed." I saw my nurse's son, to whose milk I succeeded, reading a large Bible, which my nurse had bought, as I was then told, some time before her death.

Dr. Swinfen used to say, that he never knew any child reared with so much difficulty.

II. 1710-11.

In the second year I knew not what happened to me. I believe it was then that my mother carried me to Frysul<sup>8</sup>, to consult Dr. Atwood, an oculist of Worcester. My father and Mrs. Harriots, I think, never had much kindness for each other. She was my mother's relation; and he had none so high to whom he could send any of his family. He saw her seldom himself, and willingly disgusted her, by sending his horses from home on Sunday; which she considered, and with reason, as a breach of duty. My father had much vanity, which his adversity hindered from being fully exerted. I remember, that, mentioning her legacy in the humility of distress, he called her our good Cousin Harriots. My mother had no value for his relations; those indeed whom we knew of were much lower than hers. This contempt began, I know not on which side, very early; but as my father was little at home, it had not much effect.

My father and mother had not much happiness from each other. They seldom conversed; for my father could not bear to talk of his affairs; and my mother, being unacquainted with books, cared not to talk of any thing else. Had my mother been more literate, they had been better companions. She might have sometimes introduced her unwelcome topic with more success, if she could have diversified her conversation. Of business she had no distinct conception; and therefore her discourse was composed only of complaint, fear, and suspicion. Neither of them ever tried to calculate the profits of trade, or the expenses of living. My mother concluded that we were poor, because we lost by some of our trades; but the truth was, that my father, having in the early part of his life contracted debts, never had trade sufficient to enable him to pay them, and maintain his family; he got something, but not enough.

It was not till about 1708, that I thought to calculate the returns of my father's trade, and by that estimate his probable profits. This, I believe, my parents never did.

III. 1711-12.

This year, in Lent—12. I was taken to London, to be touched for the evil by Queen Anne. My mother was at Nicholson's, the famous bookseller, in Little Britain.<sup>9</sup> I always retained some memory of this journey, though I was then but thirty months old. I remembered a little dark room behind the kitchen, where the jack-weight fell through a hole in the floor, into which I once slipped my leg.<sup>10</sup>

I remember a boy crying at the palace when I went to be touched. Being asked, "on which side of the shop was the counter?" I answered, "on the left from the entrance," many years after, and spoke, not by guess, but by memory. We went in the stage-coach, and returned in the waggon, as my mother said, because my cough was violent. The hope of saving a few shillings was no slight motive; for she, not having been accustomed to money, was afraid of such expenses as now seem very small. She sewed two guineas in her petticoat, lest she should be robbed.

<sup>7</sup> Ante, p. 4. n. 1. His mother and Dr. Swinfen were both perhaps wrong in their conjecture as to the origin of the disease; he more probably inherited it from his father, with the morbid melancholy which is so commonly an attendant on scrofulous habits.—CROKER.

<sup>8</sup> Near Wolverhampton.—R. WRIGHT.

<sup>9</sup> My mother, then with child, concealed her pregnancy, that she might not be hindered from the journey.—Orig.

<sup>10</sup> I seem to remember, that I played with a string and a bell, which my cousin Isaac Johnson gave me; and that there was a cat with a white collar, and a dog called Chops, that leaped over a stick; but I know not whether I remember the thing, or the talk of it.—Orig.

<sup>1</sup> 18. of the present style.—Orig.

<sup>2</sup> Father, no doubt, of Johnson's friend of the same name.—CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> To have been born almost dead has been related of many eminent men; amongst others of Addison, Lord Lyttelton, and Voltaire.—CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> Of the city.—CROKER.

<sup>5</sup> The name of Marclew, alias Bellison, is yet common in Lichfield, and is usually so distinguished.—R. WRIGHT.

<sup>6</sup> How long this issue was continued I do not remember. I believe it was suffered to dry when I was about six years old.—Orig.

We were troublesome to the passengers; but to suffer such inconveniences in the stage-coach was common in those days to persons in much higher rank.<sup>1</sup> She bought me a small silver cup and spoon, marked SAM. L. lest, if they had been marked S. L., which was her name, they should, upon her death, have been taken from me. She bought me a speckled linen frock, which I knew afterwards by the name of my London frock. The cup was one of the last pieces of plate which dear Betty<sup>2</sup> sold in our distress. I have now the spoon. She bought at the same time two tea-spoons, and till my manhood she had no more.

My father considered tea as very expensive, and discouraged my mother from keeping company with the neighbours, and from paying visits or receiving them. She lived to say, many years after, that if the time were to pass again, she would not comply with such unsocial injunctions.<sup>3</sup>

I suppose that in this year I was first informed of a future state. I remember, that being in bed with my mother one morning, I was told by her of the two places to which the inhabitants of this world were received after death: one a fine place filled with happiness, called Heaven; the other, a sad place, called Hell. That this account much affected my imagination, I do not remember. When I was risen, my mother bade me repeat what she had told me to Thomas Jackson. When I told this afterwards to my mother, she seemed to wonder that she should begin such talk so late as that the first time could be remembered.

[Here there is a chasm of thirty-eight pages in the manuscript.]

— examination. We always considered it as a day of ease; for we made no preparation, and indeed were asked commonly such questions as we had been asked often before, and could regularly answer. But I believe it was of use at first.

On Thursday night a small portion of Æsop was learned by heart, and on Friday morning the lessons in Æsop were repeated; I believe, not those in Æliævius. On Friday afternoon we learned Quæ Genus; I suppose that other boys might say their repetition, but of this I have now no distinct remembrance. To learn Quæ Genus was to me always pleasing; and As in Præsentis was, I know not why, always disgusting.

When we learned our Accidence we had no parts, but, I think, two lessons. The boys that came to school untaught read the Accidence twice through before they learned it by heart.

When we learned Propria quæ Maribus, our parts were in the Accidence; when we learned As in Præsentis, our parts were in the Accidence and Propria quæ Maribus; when we learned Syntaxis, to the former three. Propria quæ Maribus I could repeat without any effort of recollection. I used to repeat it to my mother and Tom Johnson; and remember, that I once went as far as the middle of the paragraph, "Mascula dicuntur monosyllaba," in a dream.

On Saturday, as on Thursday, we were examined. We were sometimes, on one of those days, asked our Catechism<sup>4</sup>, but with no regularity or constancy.

The progress of examination was this. When we learned Propria quæ Maribus, we were examined in the Accidence; particularly we formed Verbs, that is, went through the same person in all the Moods and Tenses. This was very difficult to me; and I was once very anxious about the next day, when this exercise was to be performed, in which I had failed till I was discouraged. My mother encouraged me, and I proceeded better. When I told her of my good escape, "We often," said she, dear mother! "come off best, when we are most afraid." She told me, that, once when she asked me about forming verbs, I said, "I did not form them in an ugly shape." "You could not," said she, "speak plain; and I was proud that I had a boy who was forming verbs." These little memorials soothe my mind. Of the parts of Cordeus or Æsop, which we learned to repeat, I have not the least recollection, except of a passage in one of the Morals, where it is said of some man, that when he hated another, he made him rich; this I repeated emphatically in my mother's hearing, who could never conceive that riches could bring any evil. She remarked it, as I expected.

I had the curiosity, two or three years ago, to look over Garretson's Exercises, Willynot's Particles, and Walker's Exercises; and found very few sentences that I should have recollected if I had found them in any other books. That which is read without pleasure is not often recollected nor infixed by conversation, and therefore in a great measure drops from the memory. Thus it happens that those who are taken early from school, commonly lose all that they have learned.

When we learned As in Præsentis, we parsed Propria quæ Maribus by Boole's Terminations; and when we learned Syntaxis, we parsed As in Præsentis; and afterwards Quæ Genus by the same book; sometimes, as I remember, proceeding in order of the rules, and sometimes, particularly in As in Præsentis, taking words as they occurred in the Index.

The whole week before we broke up, and the part of the week in which we broke up, were spent wholly, I know not why, in examination; and were therefore easy to both us and the master. The two nights before the vacation were free from exercise.

This was the course of the school, which I remember with pleasure; for I was indulged and caressed by my master, and, I think, really excelled the rest.

I was with Hawkins but two years, and perhaps four months. The time, till I had computed it, appeared much longer by the multitude of novelties which it supplied, and of incidents, than in my thoughts important, it produced. Perhaps it is not possible that any other period can make the same impression on the memory.

X. 1719

In the Spring of 1719, our class, consisting of eleven, the number was always fixed in my memory, but one of the names I have forgotten, was removed to the upper school, and put under Holbrook's, a peevish and ill-tempered man. We were removed sooner than had been the custom; for the head-master, intent upon his boarders, left the town-boys long in the lower school. Our removal was caused by a reproof from the Town-clerk<sup>5</sup>; and Hawkins complained that he had lost half his profit. At this removal I cried. The rest were indifferent. My exercise in Garretson was somewhere about the Gerundis. Our places in Æsop and Æliævius I have totally forgotten.

At Whitsuntide Mrs. Longworth brought me a "Hermes Garretson," of which I do not remember that I ever could make much use. It was afterwards lost, or stolen at school. My exercise was then in the end of the Syntax. Hermes furnished me with the word miticulus, which I did not understand, but used it. This task was very troublesome to me; I made all the twenty-five exercises, others made but sixteen. I never showed all mine; five lay long after in a drawer in the shop. I made an exercise in a little time, and showed it my mother; but the task being long upon me, she said, "Though you could make an exercise in so short a time, I thought you would find it difficult to make them all as soon as you should."

This Whitsuntide, I and my brother were sent to pass some time at Birmingham; I believe, a fortnight. Why such boys were sent to trouble other houses, I cannot tell. My mother had some opinion that much improvement was to be had by changing the mode of life. My uncle Harrison was a widower; and his house was kept by Sally Ford, a young woman of such sweetness of temper, that I used to say she had no fault. We lived most at uncle Ford's, being much caressed by my aunt, a good-natured, coarse woman, easy of converse, but willing to find something to censure in the absent. My uncle Harrison did not much like us, nor did we like him. He was a very mean and vulgar man, drunk every night, but drunk with little drink, very peevish, very proud, very ostentatious, but, luckily, not rich. At my aunt Ford's I ate so much of a boiled leg of mutton<sup>6</sup>, that she used to talk of it. My mother, who had lived in a narrow sphere, and was then affected by little things, told me seriously that it would hardly ever be forgotten. Her mind, I think, was afterwards much enlarged, or greater evils wore out the care of less.

I stayed after the vacation was over some days; and remember, when I wrote home, that I desired the horses to come on Thursday of the first school week; and then, and not till then, they should be welcome to go. I was much pleased with a rattle to my whip, and wrote of it to my mother.

When my father came to fetch us home, he told the ostler, that he had twelve miles home, and two boys under his care.

<sup>1</sup> I was sick: one woman fondled me, the other was disgusted.—Orig.

<sup>2</sup> His wife, whom he called by this familiar contraction of Elizabeth.—CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> When Dr. Johnson, at an advanced age, (for the Account must have been written subsequent to 1768) recorded all these minute circumstances, he contemplated, we are told, writing the history of his own life, and probably intended to develop, from his own infant recollections, the growth and powers of the faculty of memory, which he possessed in so remarkable a degree. From the little details of his domestic history he perhaps meant also to trace the progressive change in the habits of the middle classes of society.—CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> G. Hector, [junior], never had been taught his Catechism.—Orig.

<sup>5</sup> Anti, p. 8, n. 1.—Harwood,—C.

<sup>6</sup> Dr. Harwood informed me that the Town-clerk was Mr. Richard Wakefield, one of Dr. Johnson's godfathers, who left him five pounds by his will. He died in 1733.—CROKER.

<sup>7</sup> All these trifles—since Dr. Johnson thought them worth recording—appear worth quoting. His voracious love of a leg of mutton adhered to him through life; and the prophecy of his mother, that it never would be forgotten, is realised in a way the good woman could not have anticipated.—CROKER.

This offended me. He had then a watch<sup>1</sup>, which he returned when he was to pay for it.

In making, I think, the first exercise under Holbrook, I perceived the power of continuity of attention, of application not suffered to wander or to pause. I was writing at the kitchen windows, as I thought, alone, and turning my head saw Sally dancing. I went on without notice, and had finished almost without perceiving that any time had elapsed. This close attention I have seldom in my whole life obtained.

In the upper-school, I first began to point my exercise, which we made noon's business. Of the method I have not so distinct a remembrance as of the foregoing system. On Thursday morning we had a lesson, as on other mornings. On Thursday afternoon, and on Saturday morning, we commonly made examples to the Syntax.

We were soon raised from Esop to Phædrus, and then said our repetition on Friday afternoon to Hunter. I remember the fable of the wolf and lamb, to my draught—that I may drink. At what time we began Phædrus, I know not. It was the only book which we learned to the end. In the latter part thirty lines were expected for a lesson. What reconciles masters to long lessons is the pleasure of tasking.

Helvicus was very difficult; the dialogue Vestitus, Hawkins directed us to omit, as being one of the hardest in the book. As I remember, there was another upon food, and another upon fruits, which we began, and were ordered not to pursue. In the dialogue of Fruits, we perceived that Holbrook did not know the meaning of Una Crispæ. That lesson gave us great trouble. I observed that we learned Helvicus a long time with very little progress. We learned it in the afternoon on Monday and Wednesday.

Gladioli Scriptorius—A little lapse, we quitted it. I got an English Erasmus.

In Phærus we tried to use the interpretation, but never attempted the notes. Nor do I remember that the interpretation helped us.

In Phærus we were sent up twice to the upper master to be punished. The second time we complained that we could not get the passage. Being told that we should ask, we informed him that we had asked, and that the assistant would not tell us.

No. II.

OMISSIONS FROM MR. BOSWELL'S TEXT AND NOTES, AND HIS APPENDIX.

§ 1. LAW CASES.

1. Argument in behalf of Hustie, the Schoolmaster, prosecuted for undue Severity.

[See p. 241.]

THE charge is, that he has used immoderate and cruel correction. Correction in itself is not cruel; children, being not reasonable, can be governed only by fear. To impress this fear is, therefore, one of the first duties of those who have the care of children. It is the duty of a parent; and has never been thought inconsistent with parental tenderness. It is the duty of a master, who is in his highest exaltation when he is lucro parantis. Yet, as good things become evil by excess, correction, by being immoderate, may become cruel. But when is correction immoderate? When it is more frequent or more severe than is required ad monendum et docendum, for reformation and instruction. No severity is cruel which obstinacy makes necessary; for the greatest cruelty would be, to desist, and leave the scholar too careless for instruction, and too much hardened for reproof. Locke, in his treatise of education, mentions a mother, with applause, who whipped an infant eight times before she subdued it; for had she stopped at the seventh act of correction, her daughter, says he, would have been ruined. The degrees of obstinacy in young minds are very different: as different must be the degrees of persevering severity. A stubborn scholar must be corrected till he is subdued. The discipline of a school is military. There must be either unbanded licence or absolute authority. The master, who punishes, not only commits the future happiness of him who is the immediate subject of correction, but he propagates obedience through the whole school, and establishes regularity by exemplary justice. The victorious obstinacy of a single boy would make his future endeavours of reformation or instruction totally ineffectual. Obstinance, therefore, must never be victorious. Yet it is well known, that there sometimes occurs a sullen and hardy resolution, that laughs at all common punishment, and bids defiance to all common degrees of pain. Correction must be proportionate to occasions. The flexible will be reformed by gentle discipline, and the refractory must be subdued by harsher methods. The degrees of scholastic as well as of military punishment, no stated rules can ascertain. It must be enforced till it overpowers temptation; till stubbornness becomes flexible, and perverseness regular. Custom and reason have, indeed, set some bounds to scholastic penalties. The schoolmaster inflicts no capital punishments; nor enforces his edicts by either death or mutilation. The civil law has wisely determined, that a master who strikes at a scholar's eye shall be considered as criminal. But punishments, however severe, that produce no lasting evil, may be just and reasonable, because they may be necessary. Such have been the punishments used by the respondent. No scholar has gone from him either blind or lame, or with any of his limbs or powers injured or impaired. They were irregular, and he punished them; they were obstinate, and he entered his punishment. But however provoked, he never exceeded the limits of moderation, for he inflicted nothing beyond present pain; and how much of that was required, no man is so little able to determine as those who have determined against him—the parents of the offenders. It has been said, that he used unprecedented and improper instruments of correction. Of this accusation the meaning is not very easy to be found. No instrument of correction is more proper than another, but as it is better adapted to produce present pain without lasting mischief. Whatever were his instruments, no lasting mischief has ensued; and therefore, however unusual, in hands so cautious they were proper. It has been objected, that the respondent admits the charge of cruelty by producing no evidence to confute it. Let it be considered, that his scholars are either dispersed at large in the world, or continue to inhabit the place in which they were bred. Those who are dispersed cannot be found; those who remain are the sons of his prosecutors, and are not likely to support a man to whom their fathers are enemies. If it be supposed that the enmity of their fathers proves the justness of the charge, it must be considered how often experience shows us, that men who are angry on one ground will accuse on another; with how little kindness, in a town of low trade, a man who lives by learning is regarded; and how implicitly, where the inhabitants are not very rich, a rich man is hearkened to and followed. In a place like Campbell-town, it is easy for one of the principal inhabitants to make a party. It is easy for that party to heat themselves with imaginary grievances. It is easy for them to oppress a man poorer than themselves, and natural to assert the dignity of riches, by persisting in oppression. The argument which attempts to prove the impropriety of restoring him to the school, by alleging that he has lost the confidence of the people, is not the subject of juridical consideration; for he is to suffer, if he must suffer, not for their judgment, but for his own actions. It may be convenient for them to have another master; but it is a convenience of their own making. It would be likewise convenient for him to find another school; but this convenience he cannot obtain. The question is not what is now convenient, but what is generally right. If the people of Campbell-town be distressed by the restoration of the respondent, they are distressed only by their own fault; by turbulent passions and unreasonable desires; by tyranny, which law has defeated, and by malice, which virtue has surmounted.

2. Argument in favour of the Scottish Law Doctrine of "Vicious Intrusion."

[See p. 244.]

THIS, we are told, is a law which has its force only from the long practice of the court; and may, therefore, be suspended or modified as the court shall think proper.

Concerning the power of the court to make or to suspend a law, we have no intention to inquire. It is sufficient for our purpose that every just law is dictated by reason, and that the practice of every legal court is regulated by equity. It is the quality of reason to be invariable and constant; and of equity, to give to one man what, in the same case, is given to another. The advantage which humanity derives from law is this; that the law gives every man a rule of action, and prescribes a mode of conduct which shall entitle him to the support and protection of society. That the law may be a rule of action, it is necessary that it be known; it is necessary that it be permanent and stable. The law is the measure of civil right; but if the measure be changeable, the extent of the thing measured never can be settled.

<sup>1</sup> The convenience of a watch, now so general, Dr. Johnson himself, as Sir J. Hawkins reports, (ans. p. 192. n. 6.), did not possess till 1768. — CROKER.

To permit a law to be modified at discretion, is to leave the community without law. It is to withdraw the direction of that public wisdom, by which the deficiencies of private understanding are to be supplied. It is to suffer the rash and ignorant to act at discretion, and then to depend for the legality of that action on the sentence of the judge. He that is thus governed lives not by law, but by opinion: not by a certain rule, to which he can apply his intention before he acts, but by an uncertain and variable opinion, which he can never know but after he has committed the act on which that opinion shall be passed. He lives by a law (if a law it be), which he can never know before he has offended it. To this case may be justly applied that important principle, misera est servitus ubi jus est incognitum aut vagum. If intromission be not criminal till it exceeds a certain point, and that point be unsettled, and consequently different in different minds, the right of intromission, and the right of the creditor arising from it, are all jura vaga, and, by consequence, are jura incognita; and the result can be no other than a misera servitus, an uncertainty concerning the event of action, a servile dependence on private opinion.

It may be urged, and with great plausibility, that there may be intromission without fraud; which, however true, will by no means justify an occasional and arbitrary relaxation of the law. The end of law is protection as well as vengeance. Indeed, vengeance is never used but to strengthen protection. That society is well governed, where life is freed from danger, not only from suspicion, where possession is so sheltered by legal prohibitions, that violation is prevented more frequently than punished. Such a prohibition was this, while it operated with its original force. The creditor of the deceased was not only without loss, but without fear. He was not to seek a remedy for an injury suffered; for injury was warded off.

As the law has been sometimes administered, it lays us open to wounds, because it is imagined to have the power of healing. To punish fraud when it is detected is the proper art of vindictive justice; but to prevent frauds, and make punishment unnecessary, is the great employment of legislative wisdom. To permit intromission, and to punish fraud, is to make law no better than a pitfall. To tread upon the brink is safe; but to come a step further is destruction. But, surely it is better to enclose the gulf, and hinder all access, than, by encouraging us to advance a little, to entice us afterwards a little further, and let us perceive our folly only by our destruction.

As law supplies the weak with adventitious strength, it likewise enlightens the ignorant with fantastic understanding. Law teaches us to know when we commit injury and when we suffer it. It fixes certain marks upon actions, by which we are admonished to do or to forbear them. Qui sibi bene temperat in licitis, says one of the fathers, nunquam cadet in illicita. He who never intromits at all, will never intromit with fraudulent intentions.

The relaxation of the law against vicious intromission has been very favourably represented by a great master of jurisprudence<sup>1</sup>, whose words have been exhibited with unnecessary pomp, and seem to be considered as irresistibly decisive. The great moment of his authority makes it necessary to examine his position. "Some ages ago," says he, "before the ferocity of the inhabitants of this part of the island was subdued, the utmost severity of the civil law was necessary, to restrain individuals from plundering each other. Thus, the man who intermeddled irregularly with the movables of a person deceased was subjected to all the debts of the deceased without limitation. This makes a branch of the law of Scotland, known by the name of vicious intromission; and so rigidly was this regulation applied in our courts of law, that the most trifling moveable abstracted malâ fide, subjected the intermeddler to the foregoing consequences, which proved in many instances a most rigorous punishment. But this severity was necessary, in order to subdue the undisciplined nature of our people. It is extremely remarkable that in proportion to our improvement in manners, this regulation has been gradually softened and applied by our sovereign court with a sparing hand."

I find myself under a necessity of observing, that this learned and judicious writer has not accurately distinguished the deficiencies and demands of the different conditions of human life, which, from a degree of savageness and independence, in which all laws are vain, passes or may pass, by innumerable gradations, to a state of reciprocal benignity in which laws shall be no longer necessary. Men are first wild and uncivil, living each man to himself, taking from the weak and losing to the strong. In their first coalitions of society, much of this original savageness is retained. Of general happiness, the product of general confidence, there is yet no thought. Men continue to prosecute their own advantages by the nearest way; and the utmost severity of the civil law is necessary to restrain individuals from plundering each other. The restraints then necessary are restraints from plunder, from acts of public violence, and undisguised oppression. The ferocity of our ancestors, as of all other nations, produced not fraud but rapine. They had not yet learned to cheat, and attempted only to rob. As manners grow more polished, with the knowledge of good, men attain likewise dexterity in evil. Open rapine becomes less frequent, and violence gives way to cunning. Those who before invaded pastures and stormed houses, now begin to enrich themselves by unequal contracts and fraudulent intromissions. It is not against the violence of ferocity, but the circumventions of deceit, that this law was framed; and I am afraid the increase of commerce, and the incessant struggle for riches which commerce excites, give us no prospect of an end speedily to be expected of artifice and fraud. It therefore seems to be no very conclusive reasoning, which connects those two propositions:—"the nation is become less ferocious, and therefore the laws against fraud and coram shall be relaxed."

Whatever reason may have influenced the judges to a relaxation of the law, it was not that the nation was grown less ferocious; and, I am afraid, it cannot be affirmed, that it is grown less fraudulent.

Since this law has been represented as rigorously and unreasonably penal, it seems not improper to consider what are the conditions and qualities that make the justice or propriety of a penal law.

To make a penal law reasonable and just, two conditions are necessary, and two proper. It is necessary that the law should be adequate to its end; that, if it be observed, it shall prevent the evil against which it is directed. It is, secondly, necessary that the end of the law be of such importance as to deserve that the security of the penal sanction. The other conditions of a penal law, which, though not absolutely necessary, are to a very high degree fit, are, that to the moral violation of the law there are many temptations, and that of the physical observance there is great facility.

All these conditions apparently concur to justify the law which we are now considering. Its end is the security of property, and property very often of great value. The method by which it effects the security is efficacious, because it admits, in its original rigour, no gradations of injury; but keeps guilt and innocence apart, by a distinct and definite limitation. He that intromits is criminal; he that intromits not is innocent. Of the two secondary considerations, it cannot be denied that both are in our favour. The temptation to intromit is frequent and strong; so strong and so frequent, as to require the utmost activity of justice, and vigilance of caution, to withstand its prevalence; and the method by which a man may entitle himself to legal intromission is so open and so facile, that to neglect it is a proof of fraudulent intention; for why should a man omit to do (but for reasons which he will not confess) that which he can do so easily, and that which he knows to be required by the law? If temptation were rare, a penal law might be deemed unnecessary. If the duty enjoined by the law were of difficult performance, omission, though it could not be justified, might be pitied. But in the present case neither equity nor compassion operate against it. A useful, a necessary law is broken, not only without a reasonable motive, but with all the inducements to obedience that can be derived from safety and facility.

I therefore return to my original position, that a law, to have its effects, must be permanent and stable. It may be said, in the language of the schools, Lex non recipit majus et minus, — we may have a law, or we may have no law, but we cannot have half a law. We must either have a rule of action, or be permitted to act by discretion and by chance. Deviations from the law must be uniformly punished, or no man can be certain when he shall be safe.

That from the rigour of the original institution this court has sometimes departed, cannot be denied. But, as it is evident that such deviations, as they make law uncertain, make life unsafe, I hope, that of departing from it there will now be an end; that the wisdom of our ancestors will be treated with due reverence; and that consistent and steady decisions will firm the people with a rule of a tion, and leave fraud and fraudulent intromissions no future hope of impunity or escape.

3. Argument in defence of Lay Patronage.

[See p. 260.]

AGAINST the right of patronage is commonly opposed, by the inferior judicatures, the plea of conscience. Their conscience tells them that the people ought to choose their pastor; their conscience tells them that they ought not to impose upon a congregation a minister ungrateful and unacceptable to his auditors. Conscience is nothing more than a conviction felt by ourselves of something to be done, or something to be avoided; and in questions of simple unperplexed morality, conscience is very often a guide that may be trusted. But before conscience can determine, the state of the question is supposed to be completely known. In questions of law, or of fact, conscience is very often confounded with opinion. No man's conscience can tell him the rights of another man; they must be known by rational investigation or historical inquiry. Opinion, which he that holds it may call his conscience, may teach some men that religion would be promoted, and quiet preserved, by granting to the people universally the choice of their ministers. But it is a conscience very ill informed that violates the rights of one man for the convenience of another. Religion cannot be promoted by injustice; and it was never yet found that a popular election was very quietly transacted.

<sup>1</sup> Lord Kames, in his Historical Law Tracts. — BOSWELL.

That justice would be violated by transferring to the people the right of patronage, is apparent to all who know whence that right had its original. The right of patronage was not at first a privilege torn by power from unresisting poverty.

It is not an authority at first usurped in times of ignorance, and established only by succession and by pre-emptive. It is not a grant capriciously made from a higher tyrant to a lower. It is a right dearly purchased by the first possessors, and justly inherited by those that succeeded them. When Christianity was established in this island, a regular mode of public worship was prescribed. Public worship requires a public place; and the proprietors of lands, as they were converted, built churches for their families and their vassals. For the maintenance of ministers, they settled a certain portion of their lands, and a district, through which each minister was required to extend his care, was, by that circumscription, constituted a parish. This is a position so generally received in England, that the extent of a manor and of a parish are regularly received for each other. The churches which the proprietors of lands had thus built and thus endowed, they justly thought themselves entitled to provide with ministers; and when the episcopal government prevails, the bishop has no power to reject a man nominated by the patron, but for some crime that might exclude him from the priesthood. For the endowment of the church being the gift of the landlord, he was consequently at liberty to give it, according to his choice, to any man capable of performing the holy offices. The people did not choose him, because the people did not pay him.

We hear it sometimes urged, that this original right is passed out of memory, and is obliterated and obscured by many translations of property and changes of government: that scarce any church is now in the hands of the heirs of the builders; and that the present persons have entered subsequently upon the pretended rights by a thousand accidental and unknown causes. Much of this, perhaps, is true. But how is the right of patronage extinguished? If the right followed the lands, it is possessed by the same equity by which the lands are possessed. It is, in effect, part of the manor, and protected by the same laws with every other privilege. Let us suppose an estate forfeited by treason, and granted by the crown to a new family. With the lands were forfeited all the rights appendant to those lands; by the same power that grants the lands, the rights also are granted.

The right lost to the patron falls not to the people, but is either retained by the crown, or what to the people is the same thing, is by the crown given away. Let it change hands ever so often, it is possessed by him that receives it with the same right as it was conveyed. It may, indeed, like all our possessions, be forcibly seized or fraudulently obtained. But no injury is still done to the people; for what they never had, they have never lost. Caius may usurp the right of Titius, but neither Caius nor Titius injure the people; and no man's conscience, however tender or however active, can prompt him to restore what may be proved to have been never taken away. Supposing, what I think cannot be proved, that a popular election of ministers were to be desired, our desires are not the measure of equity. It were to be desired that power should be only in the hands of the merciful, and riches in the possession of the generous; but the law must leave both riches and power where it finds them; and must often leave riches with the covetous, and power with the cruel. Convenience may be a rule in little things, where no other rule has been established. But as the great end of government is to give every man his own, no inconvenience is greater than that of making right uncertain. Nor is any man more an enemy to public peace, than he who kills weak heads with imaginary claims, and breaks the series of civil subordination, by inciting the lower classes of mankind to encroach upon the higher.

Having thus shown that the right of patronage, being originally purchased, may be legally transferred, and that it is now in the hands of lawful possessors, at least as certainly as any other right, we have left to the advocates of the people no other plea but that of convenience. Let us, therefore, now consider what the people would really gain by a general abolition of the right of patronage. What is most to be desired by such a change is, that the country should be supplied with better ministers. But why should we suppose that the parish will make a wiser choice than the patron? If we suppose mankind actuated by interest, the patron is more likely to choose with caution, because he will suffer more by choosing wrong. By the deficiencies of his minister, or by his vices, he is equally offended with the rest of the congregation; but he will have this reason more to lament them, that they will be imputed to his absurdity or corruption. The qualifications of a minister are well known to be learning and piety. Of his learning the patron is probably the only judge in the parish; and of his piety not less a judge than others; and is more likely to inquire minutely and diligently before he gives a presentation, than one of the parochial rabble, who can give nothing but a vote. It may be urged, that though the parish might not choose better ministers, they would at least choose ministers whom they like better, and who would therefore officiate with greater efficacy. That ignorance and perverseness should always obtain what they like was never considered as the end of government; of which it is the great and standing benefit, that the wise see for the simple, and the regular act for the capricious. But that this argument supposes the people capable of judging, and resolute to act according to their best judgments, though this be sufficiently absurd, it is not all its absurdity. It supposes not only wisdom, but unanimity, in those, who upon no other occasions are unanimous or wise. If by some strange concurrence all the voices of a parish should unite in the choice of any single man, though I could not charge the patron with injustice for presenting a minister, I should censure him as unkind and injudicious. But it is evident, that as in all other popular elections there will be a contrariety of judgment and acrimony of passion, a parish upon every vacancy would break into factions, and the contest for the choice of a minister would set neighbours at variance, and bring discord into families. The minister would be taught all the arts of a candidate, would flatter some, and bribe others; and the electors, as in all other cases, would call for holiness and break the heads of each other during the jollity of the canvass. The time must, however, come at last, when one of the factions must prevail, and one of the ministers get possession of the church. On what terms does he enter upon his ministry but those of enmity with half his parish? By what prudence or what diligence can he hope to conciliate the affections of that party by whose defeat he has obtained his living? Every man who voted against him will enter the church with hanging head and downcast eyes, afraid to encounter that neighbour, by whose vote and influence he has been overpowered. He will hate his neighbour for opposing him, and his minister for having prospered by his opposition; and as he will never see him but with pain, he will never see him but with hatred. Of a minister presented by the patron, the parish has seldom any thing worse to say than that they do not know him. Of a minister chosen by a popular contest, all those who do not favour him have nursed up in their bosoms principles of hatred and reasons of rejection. Anger is excited principally by pride. The pride of a common man is very little exasperated by the supposed usurpation of an acknowledged superior. He bears only his little share of a general evil, and suffers in common with the whole parish; but when the contest is between equals, the defeat has many aggravations; and he that is defeated by his next neighbour is seldom satisfied without some revenge; and it is hard to say what bitterness of malignity would prevail in a parish where these elections should happen to be frequent, and the enmity of opposition should be rekindled before it had cooled.

4. Argument in favour of Mr. James Thompson, Minister of Dunfermline.

[See p. 513.]

"Of the censure pronounced from the pulpit, our determination must be formed, as in other cases, by a consideration of the act itself, and the particular circumstances with which it is invested.

"The right of censure and rebuke seems necessarily appendant to the pastoral office. He to whom the care of a congregation is intrusted, is considered as the shepherd of a flock, as the teacher of a school, as the father of a family. As a shepherd tending not his own sheep but those of his master, he is answerable for those that stray, and that lose themselves by straying. But no man can be answerable for losses which he has not power to prevent, or for vagrancy which he has not authority to restrain.

"As a teacher giving instruction for wages, and liable to reproach, if those whom he undertakes to inform make no proficiency, he must have the power of enforcing attendance, of awakening negligence, and repressing contradiction.

"As a father, he possesses the paternal authority of admonition, rebuke, and punishment. He cannot, without reducing his office to an empty name, be hindered from the exercise of any practice necessary to stimulate the idle, to reform the vicious, to check the petulant, and correct the stubborn.

"If we inquire into the practice of the primitive church, we shall, I believe, find the ministers of the word exercising the whole authority of this complicated character. We shall find them not only encouraging the good by exhortation, but terrifying the wicked by reproof and denunciation. In the earliest ages of the church, while religion was yet pure from secular advantages, the punishment of sinners was public censure and open penance; penalties inflicted merely by ecclesiastical authority, at a time while the church had yet no help from the civil power, while the hand of the magistrate lifted only the rod of persecution, and when governors were ready to afford a refuge to all those who fled from clerical authority.

"That the church, therefore, had once a power of public censure, is evident, because that power was frequently exercised. That it borrowed not its power from the civil auto-erty, is likewise certain, because civil authority was at that time its enemy.

"The hour came, at length, when, after three hundred years of struggle and distress, Truth took possession of imperial power, and the civil laws lent their aid to the ecclesiastical constitutions. The magistrate from that time cooperated with the priest, and clerical sentences were made efficacious by secular force. But the state, when it came to the assistance of the church, had no intention to diminish its authority. Those rebukes and those censures which were lawful before, were lawful still. But they had hitherto operated only upon voluntary submission. The refractory and contemptuous were at first in no danger of temporal severities, except what they might suffer from the reproaches of conscience, or the detestation of their fellow Christians. When religion obtained the support of law, if admonitions and censures had no effect, they were seconded by the magistrates with coercion and punishment.

"It therefore appears, from ecclesiastical history, that the right of inflicting shame by public censure has been always considered as inherent in the church; and that this right was not conferred by the civil power; for it was exercised when the civil power operated against it. By the civil power it was never taken away; for the Christian magistrate interposed his office, not to rescue sinners from censure, but to supply more powerful means of reformation; to add pain where shame was insufficient; and, when men were proclaimed unworthy of the society of the faithful, to restrain them by imprisonment from spreading abroad the contagion of wickedness.

"It is not improbable, that from this acknowledged power of public censure grew, in time, the practice of auricular confession. Those who dreaded the blast of public reprehension were willing to submit themselves to the priest by a private accusation of themselves, and to obtain a reconciliation with the church by a kind of clandestine absolution and invisible penance; conditions with which the priest would, in times of ignorance and corruption, easily comply, as they increased his influence, by adding the knowledge of secret sins to that of notorious offences, and enlarged his authority, by making him the sole arbiter of the terms of reconciliation.

"From this bondage the Reformation set us free. The minister has no longer power to press into the retirements of conscience, to torture us by interrogatories, or put himself in possession of our secrets and our lives. But though we have thus controlled his usurpations, his just and original power remains unimpaired. He may still see, though he may not pry; he may yet hear, though he may not question. And that knowledge which his eyes and ears force upon him it is still his duty to use, for the benefit of his flock. A father who lives near a wicked neighbour may forbid a son to frequent his company. A minister who has in his congregation a man of open and scandalous wickedness may warn his parishioners to shun his conversation. To warn them is not only lawful, but not to warn them would be criminal. He may warn them one by one in friendly converse, or by a parochial visitation. But if he may warn each man singly, what shall forbid him to warn them all together? Of that which is to be made known to all, how is there any difference whether it be communicated to each singly, or to all together? What is known to all must necessarily be public. Whether it shall be public at once, or public by degrees, is the only question. And of a sudden and solemn publication the impression is deeper, and the warning more effectual.

"It may easily be urged, if a minister be thus left at liberty to relate sinners from the pulpit, and to publish at will the crimes of a parishioner, he may often blast the innocent, and distress the timorous. He may be suspicious, and condemn without evidence; he may be rash, and judge without examination; he may be severe, and treat slight offences with too much harshness; he may be malignant and partial, and gratify his private interest or resentment under the shelter of his pastoral character.

"Of all this there is possibility, and of all this there is danger. But if possibility of evil be to exclude good, no good ever can be done. If nothing is to be attempted in which there is danger, we must all sink into hopeless inactivity. The evils that may be feared from this practice arise, not from any defect in the institution, but from the inbred vices of human nature. Power, in whatever hands it is placed, will be sometimes improperly exerted; yet courts of law must judge, though they will sometimes judge amiss. A father must instruct his children, though he himself may often want instruction. A minister must censure sinners, though his censure may be sometimes erroneous by want of judgment, and sometimes unjust by want of honesty.

"If we examine the circumstances of the present case, we shall find the sentence neither erroneous nor unjust; we shall find no breach of private confidence, no intrusion into secret transactions. The fact was notorious and indubitable; so easy to be proved, that no proof was desired. The act was base and treacherous, the perpetration insolent and open, and the example naturally mischievous. The minister, however, being retired and recluse, had not yet heard what was publicly known throughout the parish; and, on occasion of a public election, warned his people, according to his duty, against the crimes which public elections frequently produce. His warning was felt by one of his parishioners as pointed particularly at himself. But instead of producing, as might be wished, private compunction and immediate reformation, it kindled only rage and resentment. He charged his minister, in a public paper, with scandal, defamation, and falsehood. The minister, thus reproached, had his own character to vindicate, upon which his pastoral authority must necessarily depend. To be charged with a defamatory lie is an injury which no man patiently endures in common life. To be charged with polluting the pastoral office with scandal and falsehood, was a violation of character still more atrocious, as it affected not only his personal, but his clerical veracity. His indignation naturally rose in proportion to his honesty, and, with all the fortitude of injured honesty, he dared this calumniator in the church, and at once exonerated himself from censure, and rescued his flock from deception and from danger. The man whom he accuses pretends not to be innocent; or, at least, only pretends, for he declines a trial. The crime of which he is accused has frequent opportunities and strong temptations. It has already spread far, with much deprivation of private morals, and much injury to public happiness. To warn the people, therefore, against it was not wanton and officious, but necessary and pastoral.

"What, then, is the fault with which this worthy minister is charged? He has usurped no dominion over conscience. He has exerted no authority in support of doubtful and controverted opinions. He has not dragged into light a base and corrigible sinner. His censure was directed against a breach of morality, against an act which no man justifies. The man who appropriated this censure to himself is evidently and notoriously guilty. His consciousness of his own wickedness incited him to attack his faithful reprover with open insolence and printed accusations. Such an attack made defence necessary; and we hope it will be at last decided that the means of defence were just and lawful."

5. Lord Thurlow's Opinion on the same Case.

[See p. 513.]

CASE. "There is herewith laid before you,

"1. Petition for the Reverend Mr. James Thomson, minister of Dumfermline.

"2. Answers thereto.

"3. Copy of the judgment of the Court of Session upon both.

"4. Notes of the opinions of the judges, being the reasons upon which their decree is grounded.

"These papers you will please to peruse, and give your opinion,

"Whether there is a probability of the above decree of the Court of Session being reversed, if Mr. Thomson should appeal from the same?"

"I don't think the appeal advisable; not only because the value of the judgment is in no degree adequate to the expense; but because there are many chances, that upon the general complexion of the case, the impression will be taken to the disadvantage of the appellant.

"It is impossible to approve the style of that sermon. But the complaint was not less ungracious from that man, who had behaved so ill by his original libel, and at the time when he received the reproach he complains of. In the last article all the plaintiff's are equally concerned. It struck me also with some wonder, that the judges should think so much fervour apposite to the occasion of reproving the defendant for a little excess.

"Upon the matter, however, I agree with them in condemning the behaviour of the minister, and in thinking it a subject fit for ecclesiastical censure; and even for an action, if any individual could qualify it wrong, and a damage arising from it. But this I doubt. The circumstance of publishing the reproach in a pulpit, though extremely indecent, and culpable in another view, does not constitute a different sort of wrong, or any other rule of law than would have obtained, if the same words had been pronounced elsewhere. I don't know whether there be any difference in the law of Scotland, in the definition of slander, before the commissaries, or the Court of Session. The common law of England does not give way to actions for every reproachful word. An action cannot be brought for general damages upon any words which import less than an offence cognisable by law; consequently no action could have been brought here for the words in question. Both laws admit the truth to be a justification in action for words; and the law of England does the same in actions for libels. The judgment, therefore, seems to me to have been wrong, in that the court repelled that defence. E. Thurlow."

explanation. To qualify a wrong, is to point out and establish it. — BOSWELL.

6. Argument against a Prosecution, by the Procurators of Edinburgh, of an alleged Libel.

[See p. 696.]

"All injury is either of the person, the fortune, or the fame. Now it is a certain thing, it is proverbially known, that a jest breaks no bones. They never have gained half-a-crown less in the whole profession since this mischievous paragraph has appeared; and, as to their reputation, what is their reputation but an instrument of getting money? If, therefore, they have lost no money, the question upon reputation may be answered by a very old position,—De minimis non curat prætor.

"Whether there was, or was not, an animus injuriandi is not worth inquiring, if no injuria can be proved. But the truth is, there was no animus injuriandi. It was only an animus irritandi<sup>1</sup>, which, happening to be exercised upon a genus irritabile, produced unexpected violence of resentment. Their irritability arose only from an opinion of their own importance, and their delight in their new exaltation. What might have been borne by a procurator, could not be borne by a solicitor. Your lordships well know, that honores mutant mores. Titles and dignities play strongly on the fancy. As a madman is apt to think himself grown suddenly great, so he that grows suddenly great is apt to borrow a little from the madman. To co-operate with their resentment would be to promote their frenzy; nor is it possible to guess to what they might proceed, if to the new title of Solicitor should be added the elation of victory and triumph.

"We consider your lordships as the protectors of our rights, and the guardians of our virtues; but believe it not included in your high office, that you should flatter our vices, or solace our vanity; and, as vanity only dictates this prosecution, it is humbly hoped your lordships will dismiss it.

"If every attempt, however light or ludicrous, to lessen another's reputation, is to be punished by a judicial sentence, what punishment can be sufficiently severe for him who attempts to diminish the reputation of the supreme court of justice, by reclaiming upon a cause already determined, without any change in the state of the question? Does it not imply hopes that the judges will change their opinion? Is not uncertainty and inconsistency in the highest degree disreputable to a court? Does it not suppose, that the former judgment was temerarious or negligent? Does it not lessen the confidence of the public? Will it not be said, that jus est aut incognitum aut vagum? and will not the consequence be drawn, misera est servitus? Will not the rules of action be obscure? Will not he who knows himself wronged to-day, hope that the courts of justice will think him right to-morrow? Surely, my lords, these are attempts of dangerous tendency, which the solicitors, as men versed in the law, should have foreseen and avoided. It was natural for an ignorant printer to appeal from the lord ordinary; but from lawyers, the descendants of lawyers, who have practised for three hundred years, and have now raised themselves to a higher denomination, it might be expected, that they should know the reverence due to a judicial determination; and, having been once dismissed, should sit down in silence."

§ 2. NOTES.

1. Supplement to Note on Cibber's "Lives of the Poets."

[See p. 504. n. 2.]

In the Monthly Review for May, 1792, there is such a correction of the above passage as I should think myself very culpable not to subjoin. "This account is very inaccurate. The following statement of facts we know to be true, in every material circumstance:—Shiels was the principal collector and digester of the materials for the work; but, as he was very raw in authorship, an indifferent writer in prose, and his language full of Scotticisms, [Theoph.] Cibber, who was a clever, lively fellow, and then soliciting employment among the booksellers, was engaged to correct the style and diction of the whole work, then intended to make only four volumes, with power to alter, expunge, or add, as he liked. He was also to supply notes occasionally, especially concerning those dramatic poets with whom he had been chiefly conversant. He also engaged to write several of the Lives; which (as we are told) he accordingly performed. He was further useful in striking out the Jacobitical and Tory sentiments which Shiels had industriously interspersed wherever he could bring them in; and as the success of the work appeared, after all, very doubtful, he was content with twenty-one pounds for his labour, besides a few sets of the books to disperse among his friends. Shiels had nearly seventy pounds, beside the advantage of many of the best Lives in the work being communicated by friends to the undertaking; and for which <sup>1</sup> Mr. Robertson altered this word to jocandi, he having found in Blackstone that to irritate is actionable. — BOSWELL.

Mr. Shiels had the same consideration as for the rest, being paid by the sheet for the whole. He was, however, so angry with his wigghish supervisor (The., like his father, being a violent stickler for the political principles which prevailed in the reign of George the Second) for so unmercifully mutilating his copy, and scouting his politics, that he wrote Cibber a challenge; but was prevented from sending it by the publisher, who fairly laughed him out of his fury. The proprietors, too, were disconcerted in the end, on account of Mr. Cibber's unexpected industry; for his corrections and alterations in the proof-sheets were so numerous and considerable, that the printer made for them a grievous addition to his bill; and, in fine, all parties were dissatisfied. On the whole, the work was productive of no profit to the undertakers, who had agreed, in case of success, to make Cibber a present of some addition to the twenty guineas which he had received, and for which his receipt is now in the booksellers' hands. We are farther assured, that he actually obtained an additional sum; when he, soon after (in the year 1798), unfortunately embarked for Dublin, on an engagement for one of the theatres there; but the ship was cast away, and every person on board perished. There were about sixty passengers, among whom was the Earl of Drogheda, with many other persons of consequence and property.

"As to the alleged design of making the complement pass for the work of old Mr. Cibber, the charges seem to have been founded on a somewhat uncharitable construction. We are assured that the thought was not harboured by some of the proprietors, who are still living; and we hope that it did not occur to the first designer of the work, who was also the printer of it, and who bore a respectable character.

"We have been induced to enter circumstantially into the foregoing detail of facts relating to the Lives of the Poets, compiled by Messrs. Cibber and Shiels, from a sincere regard to that sacred principle of truth, to which Dr. Johnson so rigidly adhered, according to the best of his knowledge; and which, we believe, no consideration would have prevailed on him to violate. In regard to the matter, which we now dismiss, he had, no doubt, been misled by partial and wrong information; Shiels was the doctor's amanuensis; he had quarrelled with Cibber; it is natural to suppose that he told his story in his own way; and it is certain that he was not 'a very sturdy moralist.'

This explanation appears to me satisfactory. It is, however, to be observed, that the story told by Johnson does not rest solely upon my record of his conversation; for he himself has published it in his Life of Hammond, where he says, "the manuscript of Shiels is now in my possession." Very probably he had trusted to Shiels's word, and never looked at it so as to compare it with "The Lives of the Poets," as published under Mr. Cibber's name. What became of that manuscript I know not. I should have liked much to examine it. I suppose it was thrown into the fire in that impetuous combustion of papers, which Johnson, I think rashly, executed when moribundus. — BOSWELL.

In addition to all this, I must observe, that, notwithstanding the weight which must be given to Dr. Johnson's repeated assertions on a subject concerning which he alleged that he had evidence in his own possession, yet there are some indisputable circumstances which seem at variance with his statements. It is true that the title-page of the first volume says, "compiled by Mr. Cibber;" but all the other volumes have, "compiled by Mr. Cibber and other hands;" so that Johnson was certainly mistaken in representing that Cibber was held out as the sole author. In the third vol., p. 156., the life of Betterton, the actor, is announced as "written by R. S.," no doubt Robert Shiels, and to it is appended the following note: "As Mr. Theophilus Cibber is publishing (in another work) the 'Lives and Character of eminent Actors,' he leaves to other gentlemen concerned in this work the account of some players, who could not be omitted herein as poets." A similar notice accompanies the life of Booth, vol. iv. p. 178.; and again, in a note on the "Life of Thomson," vol. v. p. 211., Theophilus Cibber, in his own name, states, that he had read the tragedy of Agamemnon to the theatrical synd with so much applause, that he was selected to play the part of Melisander. These circumstances prove that "a Cibber" had some share in the work;—that there was no intention to conceal that it was Theophilus; and that Robert Shiels and others were avowed assistants. Mr. Boswell, in a former passage, (see antè, p. 57. n. 3.) intimated, that "some choice passages of these lives were written by Johnson himself." That opinion I once thought that Johnson's own assertion sufficiently negated; but I must admit, on reconsideration, that there is some colour for Mr. Boswell's suspicion; for it appears that Johnson was at one time employed to contribute to that work the lives of, at least, Shakespeare and Dryden (see antè, p. 171. n. 2. and 516. n. 2.); and though he certainly did not write these lives, yet several passages throughout the work are much in his style. That, however, might arise from the imitation of Shiels; but what is most important is, that the plan in which these lives are written is substantially the same as that which Johnson long after adopted for his own beautiful work. — CROKER, 1831. The question is now decided by Mr. Griffiths's letter (antè, p. 564. n. 2.), in opposition to Dr. Johnson's assertion, for whose error I cannot account.

2. Supplement to Note on Wilkes's Interpretation of Horace's "Difficile est propriè dicere," &c.

[See p. 517.]

It is necessary, to a fair consideration of the question, that the whole passage in which the words occur should be kept in view :—

"Si quid inexpertum scenam committis, et andes Personam formare novam; servetur ad imum Quilis ab incepto processerit, et sibi constat. Difficile est propriè communia dicere: tuque Rectius Iliacum carmen deducis in actus, Quàm si proferes ignota indictaque primus. Publica materies privati juris erit, si Non circa vilem patulumque moraberis orbem, Nec verbum verbo curabis reddere fidus Interpres; nec desilies imitator in arctum Unde pedem proferre pudor vetat aut operis lex."

The "Commentary" thus illustrates it:—"But the formation of quite new characters is a work of great difficulty and hazard. For here there is no generally received and fixed archetype to work after, but every one judges of common right according to the extent and comprehension of his own idea; therefore he advises to labour and retit old characters and subjects, particularly those made known and authorised by the practice of Homer and the epic writers." The note is, "Difficile est propriè communia dicere." Lambin's commentary has, "Communia hoc loco appellat Horatius argumenta fabularum à nullo adhuc tractata: et ita, quæ culvis exposita sunt et in medio quodammodo posita, quasi vacua et a nemine occupata." And that this is the true meaning of communis is evidently fixed by the words ignota indictaque, which are explanatory of it; so that the sense given in the "Commentary" is unquestionably the right one. Yet, notwithstanding the clearness of the case, a late critic has this strange passage: "Difficile quidem esse propriè communia dicere, hoc est, materiem vulgarem, notam et à medio petitam, ita immutare atque exornare, ut nova et scriptori propria videatur, ulro concedimus; et maximi procul dubio proposita ista est observatio. Sed omnibus utrinque collatis, et tum difficultis tum venusti, tam judicii quam ingenii ratione habita, major videatur esse gloria fabulam formare penitus novam, quàm veterem, utqueque mutatum de novo exhibere."—Poet. Præf. v. li. p. 164. Where, having first put a wrong construction on the word communis, he employs it to introduce an impertinent criticism. For where does the poet prefer the glory of retitling old subjects to that of inventing new ones? The contrary is implied in what he urges about the superior difficulty of the latter, from which he dissuades his countrymen, only in respect of their abilities and inexperience in these matters; and in order to cultivate in them, which is the main view of the epistle, a spirit of correctness, by sending them to the old subjects, treated by the Greek writers. For my own part (with all deference for Dr. Hurd, who thinks the case clear), I consider the passage, "Difficile est propriè communia dicere," to be a crux for the critics on Horace. The explication which my Lord of Worcester treats with so much contempt is, nevertheless, countenanced by authority which I find quoted by the learned Baxter, in his edition of Horace, "Difficile est propriè communia dicere, h. e. res vulgares disertis verbis enarrare, vel humile thema cum dignitate tractare. Difficile est communis res propriè explicare verbis. Vët. Schol." I was much disappointed to find that the great critic, Dr. Bentley, has no note upon this very difficult passage, as from his vigorous and illuminated mind I should have expected to receive more satisfaction than I have yet had. Sanadon thus treats it of: "Propriè communia dicere; c'est à dire, qu'il n'est pas aisé de former à ces personnages d'imagination des caractères particuliers et cependant vraisemblables. Comme l'on a été le maître de les former tels qu'on a voulu, les fautes que l'on fait en cela sont moins pardonnables. C'est pourquoi Horace conseille de prendre toujours des sujets connus, tels que sont, par exemple, ceux que l'on peut tirer des poèmes d'Homère." And Dacier observes upon it, "Après avoir marqué les deux qualités qu'il faut donner aux personnages qu'on invente, il conseille aux poètes tragiques, de n'user pas trop facilement de cette liberté qu'ils ont d'en inventer, car il est très difficile de réussir dans ces nouveaux caractères. Il est mal aisé, dit Horace, de traiter proprement, c'est à dire, convenablement, des sujets communs; c'est à dire, des sujets inventés, et qui n'ont aucun fondement ni dans l'histoire ni dans la fable; et il les appelle communs, parcequ'ils sont en disposition à tout le monde, et que tout le monde a le droit de les inventer, et qu'ils sont, comme on dit, au premier occupant." See his observations at large on this expression and the following. After all, I cannot help entertaining some doubt whether the words "Difficile est propriè communia dicere" may not have been thrown in by Horace to form a separate article in a "choice of difficulties" which a poet has to encounter who chooses a new subject, in which case it must be uncertain which of the various explanations is the true one, and every reader has a right to decide as it may strike his own fancy. And even should the words be understood, as they generally are, to be connected both with what goes before and what comes after, the exact sense cannot be absolutely ascertained; for instance, whether propriè is meant to signify in an appropriated manner, as Dr. Johnson here understands it, or, as it is often used by Cicero, with propriety or elegance. In short, it is a rare instance of a defect in perspicuity in an admirable writer, who, with almost every species of excellence, is peculiarly remarkable for that quality. The length of this note, perhaps, requires an apology. Many of my readers, I doubt not, will admit that a critical discussion of a passage in a favourite classic is very engaging.—BOSWELL.

This passage was the subject of an ingenious discussion between the young Marquis de Sevigné and M. Dacier, which will be found together with Sanadon's and Dumarsais's opinions, in a recent edition of Madame de Sevigné's letters.—CROKER.

3. Note on the Words "Balance of Misery."

[See p. 764.]

The Reverend Mr. Ralph Churton, Fellow of Brazen-Nose College, Oxford, has favoured me with the following remarks on my work, which, he is pleased to say, "I have hitherto extolled, and cordially approve:"—

"The chief part of what I have to observe is contained in the following transcript from a letter to a friend, which, with his concurrence, I copied for this purpose; and, whatever may be the merit or justness of the remarks, you may be sure that being written to a most intimate friend, without any intention that they ever should go further, they are the genuine and undisguised sentiments of the writer:—

"Jan. 6. 1792.

"Last week I was reading the second volume of 'Boswell's Johnson,' with increasing esteem for the worthy author, and increasing veneration of the wonderful and excellent man who is the subject of it. The writer throws in, now and then, very properly, some serious religious reflections; but there is one remark, in my mind an obvious and just one, which I think he has not made, that Johnson's 'morbid melancholy,' and constitutional infirmities, were intended by Providence, like St. Paul's thorn in the flesh, to check intellectual conceit and arrogance; which the consciousness of his extraordinary talents, awake as he was to the voice of praise, might otherwise have generated in a very culpable degree. Another observation strikes me, that in consequence of the same natural indisposition, and habitual sickness (for he says he scarcely passed one day without pain after his twentieth year), he considered and represented human life as a scene of much greater misery than is generally experienced. There may be persons bowed down with affliction all their days; and there are those, no doubt, whose iniquities rob them of rest; but neither calamities nor crimes, I hope and believe, do so much and so generally abound, as to justify the dark picture of life which Johnson's imagination designed, and his strong pencil delineated. This I am sure, the colouring is far too gloomy for what I have experienced, though, as far as I can remember, I have had more sickness (I do not say more severe, but only more in quantity) than falls to the lot of most people. But then daily debility and occasional sickness were far overbalanced by intervenient days, and, perhaps, weeks void of pain, and overflowing with comfort. So that, in short, to return to the subject, human life, as far as I can perceive from experience or observation, is not that state of constant wretchedness which Johnson always insisted it was; which misrepresentation, for such it surely is, his biographer has not corrected. I suppose, because, unhappily, he has himself a large portion of melancholy in his constitution, and fancied the portrait a faithful copy of life."

"The learned writer then proceeds thus in his letter to me:—

"I have conversed with some sensible men on this subject, who all seem to entertain the same sentiments respecting life with those which are expressed or implied in the foregoing paragraph. It might be added, that as the representation here spoken of appears not consistent with fact and experience, so neither does it seem to be countenanced by Scripture. There is, perhaps, no part of the sacred volume which at first sight promises so much to lend its sanction to these dark and desponding notions as the book of Ecclesiastes, which so often, and so emphatically, proclaims the vanity of things sublunary. But the design of this whole book (as it has been justly observed) is not to put us out of countenance with life, but to cure our vain expectations of a complete and perfect happiness in this world; to convince us, that there is no such thing to be found in mere external enjoyments;—and to teach us to seek for happiness in the practice of virtue, in the knowledge and love of God, and in the hopes of a better life. For this is the application of all: Let us hear, &c. xii. 13. Not only his duty, but his happiness too: For God, &c. v. 14.—See Sherlock on Providence."

"The New Testament tells us, indeed, and most truly, that 'wisely forbid us to increase our burden by forebodings of sorrows: but I think it nowhere says, that even our ordinary afflictions are not consistent with a very considerable degree of positive comfort and satisfaction. And, accordingly, one whose sufferings as well as merits were conspicuous assures us, that in proportion 'as the sufferings of Christ abounded in them, so their consolation also abounded by Christ.' 2 Cor. i. 5. It is needless to cite, as indeed it would be endless even to refer to, the multitude of passages in both Testaments holding out, in the strongest language, promises of blessings, even in this world, to the faithful servants of God. I will only refer to St. Luke, xviii. 29, 30, and 1 Tim. iv. 8.

Upon the whole, setting aside instances of great and lasting bodily pain, of minds peculiarly oppressed by melancholy, and of severe temporal calamities, from which extraordinary cases we surely should not form our estimate of the general tenor and complexion of life; excluding these from the account, I am convinced that as well the gracious constitution of things which Providence has ordained, as the declarations of Scripture and the actual experience of individuals, authorise the sincere Christian to hope that his humble and constant endeavours to perform his duty, chequered as the best life is with many failings, will be crowned with a greater degree of present peace, serenity, and comfort, than he could reasonably permit himself to expect, if he measured his views and judged of life from the opinion of Dr. Johnson, often and energetically expressed in the memoirs of him, without any animadversion or censure by his ingenious biographer. If he himself, upon reviewing the subject, shall see the matter in this light, he will in an octavo edition, which is eagerly expected, make such additional remarks or corrections as he shall judge fit; lest the impressions which these discouraging passages may leave on the reader's mind should in a degree hinder what otherwise the whole spirit and energy of the work tends, and, I hope, successfully, to promote, — pure morality and true religion."

Though I have, in some degree, obviated any reflections against my illustrious friend's dark views of life, when considering, in the course of this work, his "Rambler" and his "Rasselas," I am obliged to Mr. Churton for complying with my request of his permission to insert his remarks, being conscious of the weight of what he judiciously suggests as to the melancholy in my own constitution. His more pleasing views of life, I hope, are just. Valent quantum valere possunt. Mr. Churton concludes his letter to me in these words: —

"Once, and only once, I had the satisfaction of seeing your illustrious friend; and as I feel a particular regard for all whom he distinguishes with his esteem and friendship, so I derive much pleasure from reflecting that I once beheld, though but transiently, near our college gate, one whose works will for ever delight and improve the world, who was a sincere and zealous son of the church of England, an honour to his country, and an ornament to human nature."

His letter was accompanied with a present from himself of his "Sermons at the Banquet Lecture," and from his friend, Dr. Townson, the venerable rector of Malpas, in Cheshire, of his "Discourses on the Gospels," together with the following extract of a letter from that excellent person, who is now gone to receive the reward of his labours: "Mr. Boswell is not only very entertaining in his works, but they are so replete with moral and religious sentiments, without an instance, as far as I know, of a contrary tendency, that I cannot help having a great esteem for him; and if you think such a trifle as a copy of the Discourses, ex dono auctoris, would be acceptable to him, I should be happy to give him this small testimony of my regard." Such spontaneous testimonies of approbation from such men, without any personal acquaintance with me, are truly valuable and encouraging.—
BOSWELL.

4. Catalogue or List of Designs.

[Supplement to note, p. 794. n. 1.]

DIVINITY.

A SMALL BOOK of precepts and directions for piety; the hint taken from the directions in Morton's Exercise.

PHILOSOPHY, HISTORY, AND LITERATURE IN GENERAL.

History of Criticism, as it relates to judging of authors, from Aristotle to the present age. An account of the rise and improvements of that art: of the different opinions of authors, ancient and modern.

Translation of the History of Herodian.

New edition of Fairfax's Translation of Tasso, with notes, glossary, &c.

Chaucer, a new edition of him, from manuscripts and old editions, with various readings, conjectures, remarks on his language, and the changes it had undergone from the earliest times to his age, and from his to the present; with notes explanatory of customs, &c. and references to Boccaccio, and other authors, from whom he has borrowed, with an account of the liberties he has taken in telling the stories; his life, and an exact etymological glossary.

Aristotle's Rhetoric, a translation of it into English.

A Collection of Letters, translated from the modern writers, with some account of the several authors.

Oldham's Poems, with notes, historical and critical.

Roscommon's Poems, with notes.

Lives of the Philosophers, written with a polite air, in such a manner as may divert as well as instruct.

History of the Heathen Mythology, with an explication of the fables, both allegorical and historical; with references to the poets.

History of the State of Venice, in a compendious manner.

Aristotle's Ethics, an English translation of them, with notes.

Geographical Dictionary from the French. [Utrecht.] MS.

Hierocles upon Pythagoras, translated into English, perhaps with notes. This is done by Norris. [Nov. 9th, 1752.] MS.

A book of Letters, upon all kinds of subjects.

Claudian, a new edition of his works, cum notis variorum, in the manner of Burman.

Tully's Tusculan questions, a translation of them.

Tully's De Naturâ Deorum, a translation of those books.

Benzo's New History of the New World, to be translated.

Machiavel's History of Florence, to be translated.

History of the Revival of Learning in Europe, containing an account of whatever contributed to the restoration of literature: such as controversies, printing, the destruction of the Greek empire, the encouragement of great men, with the lives of the most eminent patrons, and most eminent early professors of all kinds of learning in different countries.

A Body of Chronology, in verse, with historical notes. [Nov. 9th, 1752.] MS.

A Table of the Spectators, Tatlers, and Guardians, distinguished by figures into six degrees of value, with notes giving the reasons of preference or degradation.

A Collection of Letters from English authors, with a preface, giving some account of the writers; with reasons for selection, and criticism upon styles; remarks on each letter, if needful.

A Collection of Proverbs from various languages. Jan. 6th, —53.

A Dictionary to the Common Prayer, in imitation of Calmet's Dictionary of the Bible. March, [17]52.

A Collection of Stories and Examples, like those of Valerius Maximus. Jan. 10th, [17]53.

From Ælian, a volume of select Stories, perhaps from others. Jan. 28th, [17]53.

Collection of Travels, Voyages, Adventures, and Descriptions of Countries.

Dictionary of Ancient History and Mythology.

Treatise on the Study of Polite Literature, containing the history of learning, directions for editions, commentaries, &c.

Maxims, Characters, and Sentiments, after the manner of Bruyère, collected out of ancient authors, particularly the Greek, with Apophthegms.

Classical Miscellanies, Select Translations from ancient Greek and Latin authors.

Lives of Illustrious Persons, as well of the active as the learned, in imitation of Plutarch.

Judgment of the learned upon English Authors.

Poetical Dictionary of the English Tongue.

Considerations upon the present State of London.

Collection of Epigrams, with notes and observations.

Observations on the English Language, relating to words, phrases, and modes of speech.

Minutiæ Literariæ, Miscellaneous Reflections, Criticisms, Emendations, Notes.

History of the Constitution.

Comparison of Philosophical and Christian Morality, by sentences collected from the moralists and fathers.

Plutarch's Lives, in English, with notes.

POETRY AND WORKS OF IMAGINATION.

Hymn to Ignorance.

The Palace of Sloth: — a vision.

Coluthus, to be translated.

Prejudice, — a poetical essay.

The Palace of Nonsense, — a vision.

Johnson's extraordinary facility of composition, when he shook off his constitutional indolence, and resolutely sat down to write, is admirably described by Mr. Courtenay, in his "Poetical Review," which I have several times quoted:—

"While through life's maze he sent a piercing view,
His mind expansive to the object grew.
With various stores of erudition fraught,
The lively image, the deep searching thought,
Slept in repose; — but when the moment press'd,
The bright ideas stood at once confess'd;
Instant his genius sped its vigorous rays,
And o'er the letter'd world diffused a blaze.
As womb'd with fire the cloud electric flies,
And calmly o'er the horizon seems to rise:
Touch'd by the pointed steel, the lightning flows,
And all th' expanse with rich effluence glows."

We shall in vain endeavour to know with exact precision every production of Johnson's pen. He owned to me that he had written about forty sermons; but as I understood that he had given or sold them to different persons, who were to preach them as their own, he did not consider himself at liberty to acknowledge them. Would those who were thus aided by him, who are still alive, and the friends of those who are dead, fairly inform the world, it would be obligingly gratifying a reasonable curiosity, to which there should, I think, now be no objection. Two volumes of them, published since his death, are sufficiently ascertained. See p. 555. I have before me in his handwriting a fragment of twenty quarto leaves, of a translation into English of Sallust, De Bello Catihnario. When it was done I have no notion; but it seems to have no very superior merit to mark it as his. Besides the publications heretofore mentioned, I am satisfied, from internal evidence, to admit also as genuine the following, which, notwithstanding all my chronological care, escaped me in the course of this work:—

"Considerations on the Case of Dr. Trapp's Sermons,"† published in 1739, in the "Gentleman's Magazine." It is a very ingenious defence of the right of abridging an author's work, without being held as infringing his property. This is one of the nicest questions in the Law of Literature; and I cannot help thinking, that the indulgence of abridging is often exceedingly injurious to authors and booksellers, and should in very few cases be permitted. At any rate, to prevent difficult and uncertain discussion, and give an absolute security to authors in the property of their labours, no abridgment whatever should be permitted till after the expiration of such a number of years as the legislature may be pleased to fix.

But, though it has been confidently ascribed to him, I cannot allow that he wrote a dedication to both houses of parliament of a book entitled "The Evangelical History Harmonised." He was no croaker, no declaimer against the times. He would not have written "That we are fallen upon an age in which corruption is not barely universal, is universally confessed." Nor, "Rape preys on the public without opposition, and perjury betrays it without inquiry." Nor would he, to excite a speedy reformation, have conjured up such phantoms of terror as these:—"A few years longer, and perhaps all endeavours will be in vain. We may be swallowed by an earthquake; we may be delivered to our enemies." This is not Johnsonian.

There are, indeed, in this dedication several sentences constructed upon the model of those of Johnson. But the imitation of the form, without the spirit of his style, has been so general, that this of itself is not sufficient evidence. Even our newspaper writers aspire to it. In an account of the funeral of Edwin, the comedian, in "The Diary" of Nov. 9. 1790, that son of drollery is thus described:—"A man who had so often cheered the sullenness of vacancy, and suspended the approaches of sorrow." And in "The Dublin Evening Post," August 16. 1791, there is the following paragraph:—"It is a singular circumstance, that in a city like this, containing 200,000 people, there are three months in the year during which no place of public amusement is open. Long vacation is here a vacation from pleasure, as well as business; nor is there any mode of passing the listless evenings of declining summer, but in the riots of a tavern, or the stupidity of a coffee-house."

I have not thought it necessary to specify every copy of verses written by Johnson, it being my intention to publish an authentic edition of all his poetry, with notes.

BOSWELL.

5. A Chronological Catalogue of the Prose Works of Samuel Johnson, LL.D.<sup>1</sup>

N. B.—To those which he himself acknowledged is added acknowled. To those which may be fully believed to be his from internal evidence is added intern. evid.

1735. ABRIDGMENT and translation of Lobo's Voyage to Abyssinia, acknowled.

1738. Part of a translation of Father Paul Sarpi's History of the Council of Trent, acknowled.

N. B.—As this work, after some sheets were printed, suddenly stopped, I know not whether any part of it is now to be found.

FOR THE GENTLEMAN'S MAGAZINE.

Preface, intern. evid.Life of Father Paul, acknowled.

1739. A complete vindication of the Licenser of the Stage from the malicious and scandalous aspersions of Mr. Brooke, author of Gustavus Vasa, acknowled. Marston Norfolkensis: or an Essay on an ancient prophetic inscription in monkish rhyme, lately discovered near Lynne in Norfolk, by Phouts BERTANICUS, acknowled.

FOR THE GENTLEMAN'S MAGAZINE.

Life of Boerhaave, acknowled.Address to the Reader, intern. evid.Appeal to the Public in behalf of the Editor, intern. evid.

Considerations on the case of Dr. Trapp's Sermons; a plausible attempt to prove that an author's work may be abridged without injuring his property, acknowled.

1<sup>2</sup> * Address to the Reader in May.

1740. FOR THE GENTLEMAN'S MAGAZINE.

Preface, intern. evid.Life of Admiral Drake, acknowled.Life of Admiral Blake, acknowled.Life of Philip Barreter, acknowled.Essay on Epitaphs, acknowled.

1741. FOR THE GENTLEMAN'S MAGAZINE.

Preface, intern. evid.

A free translation of the Jests of Hierocles, with an introduction, intern. evid.
 Debate on the Humble Petition and Advice of the Rump Parliament to Cromwell, in 1657, to assume the title of King; abridged, methodised, and digested, intern. evid.

Translation of Abbé Guyon's Dissertation on the Amazons, intern. evid.

Translation of Fontenelle's Panegyric on Dr. Morin, intern. evid.

1742. FOR THE GENTLEMAN'S MAGAZINE.

Preface, intern. evid.

Essay on the Account of the Conduct of the Duchess of Marlborough, acknowled.

An Account of the Life of Peter Burman, acknowled.

The Life of Sydenham, afterwards prefixed to Dr.

Swan's edition of his works, acknowled.

Proposals for printing Bibliotheca Harleiana, or a Catalogue of the Library of the Earl of Oxford, afterwards prefixed to the first volume of that catalogue, in which the Latin accounts of the books were written by him, acknowled.

Abridgment, entitled Foreign History, intern. evid.

Essay on the Description of China, from the French of Du Halde, intern. evid.

1743. Dedication to Dr. Mead of Dr. James's Medicinal Dictionary, intern. evid.

FOR THE GENTLEMAN'S MAGAZINE.

Preface, intern. evid.

Parliamentary Debates under the name of Debates in the Senate of Lilliput, from Nov. 19. 1740, to Feb. 23. 1742-3, inclusive, acknowled.

Considerations on the Dispute between Crousaz and Warburton on Pope's Essay on Man, intern. evid.

A Letter, announcing that the Life of Mr. Savage was speedily to be published by a person who was favoured with his confidence, intern. evid.

Advertisement for Osborne concerning the Harleian Catalogue, intern. evid.

1744. Life of Richard Savage, acknowled.Preface to the Harleian Miscellany, acknowled.

FOR THE GENTLEMAN'S MAGAZINE.

Preface, intern. evid.

1745. Miscellaneous Observations on the tragedy of Macbeth, with remarks on Sir T. H.'s (Sir Thomas Hamner's) Edition of Shakspeare, and proposals for a new Edition of that Poet, acknowled.

1747. Plan for a Dictionary of the ENGLISH LANGUAGE, addressed to Philip Dormer, Earl of Chestertield, acknowled.

<sup>1</sup> I do not here include his poetical works; for, excepting his Latin translation of Pope's Messiah, his London, and his Vanity of Human Wishes, imitated from Juvenal, his Prologue on the opening of Drury-Lane Theatre by Mr. Garrick, and his Irene, a Tragedy, they are very numerous and in general short; and I have promised a complete edition of them, in which I shall, with the utmost care, ascertain their authenticity, and illustrate them with notes and various readings.—BOSWELL. The meaning of this sentence, and particularly of the word excepting, is not very clear. Perhaps Mr. Boswell wrote, "they are not very numerous," which would be less obscure.—CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> These and several other articles, which are marked with an asterisk, were suggested to Mr. Malone by Mr. Chalmers as probably written by Dr. Johnson; they have been therefore added to this general list.—CROKER.

FOR THE GENTLEMAN'S MAGAZINE.

- * Lauder's Proposals for printing the Adamus Exul of Grovius.
[Abridgement of Foreign History, Gent. Mag. 1794, p. 1001.]

FOR THE GENTLEMAN'S MAGAZINE.

1748. Life of Roscommon, acknowl.
Foreign History, November, intern. evid.

FOR MR. DODSLEY'S PRECEPTOR.

- Preface, acknowl.*
Vision of Theodore the Hermit, acknowl.

FOR THE GENTLEMAN'S MAGAZINE.

1749. * Letter on Fire Works.
1750. THE RAMBLER, the first paper of which was published 20th of March this year, and the last 17th of March, 1752, the day on which Mrs. Johnson died<sup>1</sup>, acknowl.
Letter in the General Advertiser to excite the attention of the public to the performance of Comus, which was next day to be acted at Drury Lane play-house, for the benefit of Milton's grand-daughter, acknowl.
Preface and Postscript to Lauder's Pamphlet, entitled "An Essay on Milton's Use and Imitation of the Moderns in his "Paradise Lost," acknowl.

FOR THE GENTLEMAN'S MAGAZINE.

- Address to the Public concerning Miss Williams's Miscellanies.*
1751. Life of Cheynel, in the Miscellany called "The Student," acknowl.
Letter for Lauder, addressed to the Rev. Dr. John Douglas, acknowledging his fraud concerning Milton in terms of suitable contrition, acknowl.
Dedication to the Earl of Middlesex of Mrs. Charlotte Lennox's "Female Quixote," intern. evid.

FOR THE GENTLEMAN'S MAGAZINE.

- * Preface.
* Criticism on Moore's Gil Blas.
1753. Dedication to John, Earl of Orrery, of Shakspeare illustrated, by Mrs. Charlotte Lennox, acknowl.
During this and the following year he wrote and gave to his much loved friend, Dr. Bathurst, the papers in the Adventurer, signed T., acknowl.

FOR THE GENTLEMAN'S MAGAZINE.

- * Preface.
* Notice of Mr. Edward Cave's death, inserted in the last page of the index.
1754. Life of Edward Cave, in the Gentleman's Magazine, acknowl.

FOR THE GENTLEMAN'S MAGAZINE.

- * Preface.
1755. A DICTIONARY, with a Grammar and History, of the ENGLISH LANGUAGE, acknowl.
An Account of an Attempt to ascertain the Longitude at Sea, by an exact Theory of the Variations of the Magnetical Needle, with a Table of the Variations at the most remarkable cities in Europe, from the year 1660 to 1780, acknowl. This he wrote for Mr. Zachariah Williams, an ingenious ancient Welsh gentleman, father of Mrs. Anna Williams, whom he for many years kindly lodged in his house. It was published with a translation into Italian by Signor Baretti. In a copy of it, which he presented to the Bodleian Library at Oxford, is pasted a character of the late Mr. Zachariah Williams, plainly written by Johnson, intern. evid.
1756. An Abridgment of his Dictionary, acknowl.
Several Essays in the Universal Visitor, which there is some difficulty in ascertaining. All that are marked with two asterisks have been ascribed to him, although I am confident, from internal evidence, that we should except from these "The Life of Chaucer," "Reflections on the State of Portugal," and "An Essay on Architecture." And from the same evidence I am confident that he wrote "Further Thoughts on Agriculture" and "A Dissertation on the State of Literature and Authors." The Dissertation on the Epitaphs of Pope, he afterwards acknowledged, and added to his "Idler."

Life of Sir Thomas Browne, prefixed to a new edition of his Christian Morals, acknowl.

In the LITERARY MAGAZINE, or UNIVERSAL REVIEW, which began in January, 1756,

HIS ORIGINAL ESSAYS are,

- The Preliminary Address, intern. evid.*
An Introduction to the Political State of Great Britain, intern. evid.
Remarks on the Militia Bill, intern. evid.
Observations on his Britannic Majesty's Treaties with the Empress of Russia and the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, intern. evid.
Observations on the Present State of Affairs, intern. evid.
Memoirs of Frederick III., King of Prussia, intern. evid.
In the same MAGAZINE his REVIEWS are of the following books:—"Birch's History of the Royal Society;" "Browne's Christian Morals;" "Warton's Essay on the Writings and Genius of Pope" vol. i.; "Hampton's Translation of Polybius;" "Sir Isaac Newton's Arguments in proof of a Deity;" "Borlase's History of the Isles of Scilly;" "Home's Experiments on Bleaching;" "Browne's History of Jamaica;" "Hales on Distilling Sea-Waters, Ventilators in Ships, and curing an ill taste in Milk;" "Lucas's Essay on Waters;" "Keith's Catalogue of the Scottish Bishops;" "Philosophical Transactions," vol. xlix.; "Miscellanies by Elizabeth Harrison;" "Evans's Map and Account of the Middle Colonies in America;" "The Cadet, a Military Treatise;" "The Conduct of the Ministry relating to the present War, impartially examined," intern. evid.
"Mrs. Lennox's Translation of Sully's Memoirs;" "Letter on the Case of Admiral Byng;" "Appeal to the People concerning Admiral Byng;" "Hanway's Eight Days' Journey" and "Essay on Tea;" "Some further particulars in Relation to the Case of Admiral Byng, by a Gentleman of Oxford," acknowl.
Mr. Jonas Hanway having written an angry Answer to the Review of his Essay on Tea, Johnson, in the same collection, made a reply to it, acknowl. This is the only instance, it is believed, when he condescended to take notice of any thing that had been written against him; and here his chief intention seems to have been to make sport.
Dedication to the Earl of Rochford, of, and Preface to, Mr. Payne's introduction to the Game of Draughts, acknowl.
Introduction to the London Chronicle, an Evening Paper, which still subsists with deserved credit, acknowl.
** Observations on the Foregoing Letter," i. e. A Letter on the American Colonies.
1757. Speech on the subject of an Address to the Throne after the Expedition to Rochefort; delivered by one of his friends in some public meeting: it is printed in the Gentleman's Magazine for October, 1785, intern. evid.
The first two paragraphs of the Preface to Sir William Chambers's Designs of Chinese Buildings, &c., acknowl.
1758. THE IDLER, which began April 5, in this year, and was continued till April 5, 1760, acknowl.
An Essay on the Bravery of the English Common Soldiers was added to it, when published in volumes, acknowl.
1759. Rasselas, Prince of Abyssinia, a Tale, acknowl.
Advertisement for the Proprietors of the Idler against certain persons who pirated those papers as they came out singly in a newspaper called the Universal Chronicle, or Weekly Gazette, intern. evid.
For Mrs. Charlotte Lennox's English Version of Brumoy, "A Dissertation on the Greek Comedy," and the General Conclusion of the Book, intern. evid.
Introduction to the World Displayed, a Collection of Voyages and Travels, acknowl.
Three Letters in the Gazetteer, concerning the best plan for Blackfriars Bridge, acknowl.
1760. Address of the Painters to George III. on his Accession to the Throne, intern. evid.
Dedication of Baretti's Italian and English Dictionary to the Marquis of Abreu, then Envoy Extraordinary from Spain at the Court of Great Britain, intern. evid.
Review in the Gentleman's Magazine of Mr. Tytler's acute and able Vindication of Mary Queen of Scots, acknowl.
Introduction to the Proceedings of the Committee for Clothing the French Prisoners, acknowl.
1761. Preface to Rolt's Dictionary of Trade and Commerce, acknowl.

<sup>1</sup> This is a mistake. The last number of the Rambler appeared on the 14th of March, three days before Mrs. Johnson died. — MALONE.

- Corrections and Improvements for Mr. Gwyn the Architect's pamphlet, entitled "Thoughts on the Coronation of George III.," acknowl.
1762. Dedication to the King of the Rev. Dr. Kennedy's Complete System of Astronomical Chronology unfolding the Scriptures, 4to edition, acknowl. Preface to the Catalogue of the Artists' Exhibition, intern. evid.
1763. Character of Collins in the Poetical Calendar, published by Fawkes and Woty, acknowl. Dedication to the Earl of Shaftesbury of the edition of Roger Ascham's English Works, published by the Reverend Mr. Bennett, acknowl. The Life of Ascham, also prefixed to that edition, acknowl. Review of Telemachus, a Masque, by the Reverend George Graham, of Eton College, in the Critical Review, acknowl. Dedication to the Queen of Mr. Hoole's Translation of Tasso, acknowl. Account of the Detection of the Imposture of the Cock Lane Ghost, published in the Newspapers and Gentleman's Magazine, acknowl.
1764. Part of a Review of Granger's "Sugar Cane," a Poem, in the London Chronicle, acknowl. Review of Goldsmith's "Traveller," a Poem, in the Critical Review, acknowl.
1765. The Plays of William Shakspeare, in eight volumes, 8vo, with Notes, acknowl.
1766. The Fountains, a Fairy Tale, in Mrs. Williams's Miscellanies, acknowl.
1767. Dedication to the King of Mr. Adams's Treatise on the Globes, acknowl.
1769. Character of the Reverend Mr. Zachariah Mudge, in the London Chronicle, acknowl.
1770. The False Alarm, acknowl.
1771. Thoughts on the late Transactions respecting Falkland's Islands, acknowl.
1772. Defence of a Schoolmaster; dictated to me for the House of Lords, acknowl. Argument in support of the Law of Vicious Intromission; dictated to me for the Court of Session in Scotland, acknowl.
1773. Preface to Macbean's "Dictionary of Ancient Geography," acknowl. Argument in favour of the Rights of Lay Patrons; dictated to me for the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, acknowl.
1774. The Patriot, acknowl.
1775. A Journey to the Western Islands of Scotland, acknowl. Proposals for publishing the Works of Mrs. Charlotte Lennox, in 3 volumes, 4to, acknowl. Preface to Baret's Easy Lessons in Italian and English, intern. evid. Taxation no Tyranny: an Answer to the Resolutions and Address of the American Congress, acknowl. Argument on the case of Dr. Memis; dictated to me for the Court of Sessions in Scotland, acknowl. Argument to prove that the Corporation of Stirling was corrupt; dictated to me for the House of Lords, acknowl.
1776. Argument in support of the Right of immediate and personal Reprehension from the Pulpit; dictated to me, acknowl. Proposals for publishing an Analysis for the Scotch Celtic Language, by the Rev. William Shaw, acknowl.
1777. Dedication to the King of the Posthumous Works of Dr. Pearce, Bishop of Rochester, acknowl. Additions to the Life and Character of that Prelate, prefixed to those works, acknowl. Various Papers and Letters in favour of the Reverend Dr. Dodd, acknowl.
1780. Advertisement for his Friend, Mr. Thrale, to the Worthy Electors of the Borough of Southwark, acknowl. First Paragraph of Mr. Thomas Davies's Life of Garrick, acknowl.
1781. Prefaces, biographical and critical to the Works of the most eminent English poets; afterwards published with the title of the Lives of the English Poets, acknowl. Argument on the Importance of the Registration of Deeds; dictated to me for an Election Committee of the House of Commons, acknowl. On the distinction between Tory and Whig; dictated to me, acknowl.

On Vicarious Punishments, and the great Propitiation for the Sins of the World by Jesus Christ; dictated to me, acknowl.

Argument in favour of Joseph Knight, an African Negro, who claimed his Liberty in the Court of Session in Scotland, and obtained it; dictated to me, acknowl.

Defence of Mr. Robertson, Printer of the Caledonian Mercury, against the Society of Procurators in Edinburgh, for having inserted in his paper a ludicrous paragraph against them; demonstrating that it was not an injurious Libel; dictated to me, acknowl.

1782. The greatest [part], if not the whole, of a Reply, by the Reverend Mr. Shaw, to a person at Edinburgh, of the name of Clarke, refuting his arguments for the authenticity of the Poems published by Mr. James Macpherson as Translations from Ossian, intern. evid.

1784. List of the Authors of the Universal History, deposited in the British Museum, and printed in the Gentleman's Magazine for December, this year, acknowl.

VARIOUS YEARS.

Letters to Mrs. Thrale, acknowl.

Prayers and Meditations which he delivered to the Rev. Mr. Strahan, enjoining him to publish them, acknowl.

Sermons, left for publication by John Taylor, I. L. D., Prebendary of Westminster, and given to the World by the Reverend Samuel Hayes, A. M., intern. evid.

Such was the number and variety of the prose works of this extraordinary man, which I have been able to discover, and am at liberty to mention<sup>2</sup>; but we ought to keep in mind, that there must undoubtedly have been many more which are yet concealed; and we may add to the account, the numerous letters which he wrote, of which a considerable part are yet unpublished. It is hoped that those persons, in whose possession they are, will favour the world with them.

BOSWELL.

6. The following Letters and Prayer were accidentally omitted from their proper Places.

JOHNSON TO MR. TOMKESON.

"1st Oct. 1783.

"Sir, — I have known Mr. Lowe very familiarly a great while. I consider him as a man of very clear and vigorous understanding, and conceive his principles to be such that whatever you transact with him you have nothing to expect from him unbecoming a gentleman. I am, Sir, your humble servant,

SAM. JOHNSON."

JOHNSON TO MR. NICHOLS.

"April 12. 1784.

"Sir, — I have sent you inclosed a very curious proposal from Mr. Hawkins, the son of Sir John Hawkins, who, I believe, will take care that whatever his son promises shall be performed. If you are inclined to publish this compilation, the editor will agree for an edition on the following terms, which I think liberal enough. That you shall print the book at your own charge. That the sale shall be wholly for your benefit till your expenses are repaid; except that at the time of publication you shall put into the hands of the editor, without price, . . . copies for his friends. That, when you have been repaid, the profits arising from the sale of the remaining copies shall be divided equally between you and the editor. That the edition shall not comprise fewer than five hundred.

SAM. JOHNSON."

UNPUBLISHED PRAYER.

From the Pearson MSS.

"Easter day, 15th April, 1759.

"ALMIGHTY and most merciful Father, look down with pity upon my sins. I am a sinner, good Lord; but let not my sins burthen me for ever. Give me thy grace to break the chain of evil custom. Enable me to shake off idleness and sloth; to will and to do what thou hast commanded, grant me chaste in thoughts, words and actions; to love and <sup>1</sup> See anté, p. 792., my reasons for disbelieving that there were any such injunctions. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> This is a strange phrase. What work could it have been that Mr. Boswell was not at liberty to mention? That there was some peculiar meaning here can hardly be doubted. It perhaps may allude to some publications of a Jacobite tendency, written in Johnson's earlier days, and which may have been acknowledged in confidence to Boswell; but this is a mere conjecture. Mr. Markland thinks that Boswell's letter, p. 214., explains this, — but I do not see it. Many of the articles inserted in the foregoing list on internal evidence (particularly those from the Magazines) are of very little importance, and of very doubtful authenticity. — CROKER.

frequent thy worship, to study and understand thy word; to be diligent in my calling, that I may support myself and relieve others.

"Forgive me, O Lord, whatever my mother has suffered by my fault, whatever I have done amiss, and whatever duty I have neglected. Let me not sink into useless dejection; but so sanctify my affliction, O Lord, that I may be converted and healed; and that, by the help of thy holy spirit, I may obtain everlasting life through Jesus Christ our Lord.
"And, O Lord, so far as it may be lawful, I commend unto thy fatherly goodness my father, brother, wife, and mother, beseeching thee to make them happy for Jesus Christ's sake. Amen.
SAM. JOHNSON."

§ 3. MR. BOSWELL'S APPENDIX.

1. Dr. Blacklock's Explanatory Letter.

In justice to the ingenious Dr. Blacklock, I publish the following Letter from him, relative to a passage in p. 278.

"TO JAMES BOSWELL, ESQ.

"Edinburgh, Nov. 12. 1785.

"DEAR SIR,—Having lately had the pleasure of reading your account of the journey which you took with Dr. Samuel Johnson to the Western Isles, I take the liberty of transmitting my ideas of the conversation which happened between the Doctor and myself concerning lexicography and poetry, which, as it is a little different from the delineation exhibited in the former edition of your Journal, cannot, I hope, be unacceptable; particularly since I have been informed, that a second edition of that work is now in contemplation, if not in execution; and I am still more strongly tempted to encourage that hope, from considering that, if every one concerned in the conversations related were to send you what they can recollect of these colloquial entertainments, many curious and interesting particulars might be recovered, which the most assiduous attention could not observe, nor the most tenacious memory retain. A little reflection, Sir, will convince you, that there is not an axiom in Euclid more intuitive nor more evident than the Doctor's assertion that poetry was of much easier execution than lexicography. Any mind, therefore, endowed with common sense, must have been extremely absent from itself, if it discovered the least astonishment from hearing that a poem might be written with much more facility than the same quantity of a dictionary.

"The real cause of my surprise was what appeared to me much more paradoxical, that he could write a sheet of dictionary with as much pleasure as a sheet of poetry. He acknowledged, indeed, that the latter was much easier than the former. For in the one case books and a desk were requisite; in the other, you might compose when lying in bed, or walking in the fields, &c. He did not, however, descend to explain, nor to this moment can I comprehend, how the labours of a mere philologist, in the most refined sense of that term, could give equal pleasure with the exercise of a mind replete with elevated conceptions and pathetic ideas, while taste, fancy, and intellect were deeply enamoured of nature, and in full exertion. You may likewise, perhaps, remember, that when I complained of the ground which scepticism in religion and morals was continually gaining, it did not appear to be on my own account, as my private opinions upon these important subjects had long been inflexibly determined. What I then deplored, and still deplore, was the unhappy influence which that gloomy hesitation had, not only upon particular characters, but even upon life in general; as being equally the bane of action in our present state, and of such consolations as we might derive from the hopes of a future.

"I have the pleasure of remaining, with sincere esteem and respect, dear Sir, your most obedient humble servant,
"THOMAS BLACKLOCK."

I am very happy to find that Dr. Blacklock's apparent uneasiness on the subject of scepticism was not on his own account (as I supposed), but from a benevolent concern for the happiness of mankind. With respect, however, to the question concerning poetry, and composing a dictionary, I am confident that my state of Dr. Johnson's position is accurate. One may misconceive the motive by which a person is induced to discuss a particular topic (as in the case of Dr. Blacklock's speaking of scepticism); but an assertion, like that made by Dr. Johnson, cannot be easily mistaken. And, indeed, it seems not very probable, that he who so pathetically laments the drudgery to which the unhappy lexicographer is doomed, and is known to have written his splendid imitation of Juvenal with astonishing rapidity, should have had "as much pleasure in writing a sheet of a dictionary as a sheet of poetry." Nor can I concur with the ingenious writer of the foregoing letter, in thinking it an axiom as evident as any in Euclid, that "poetry is of easier execution than lexicography." I have no doubt that Bailey, and the "mighty blunderbuss of law," Jacob, wrote ten pages of their respective dictionaries with more ease than they could have written five pages of poetry.

If this book should again be reprinted, I shall, with the utmost readiness, correct any errors I may have committed, in stating conversation, provided it can be clearly shown to me that I have been inaccurate. But I am slow to believe (as I have elsewhere observed) that any man's memory, at the distance of several years, can preserve facts or sayings with such fidelity as may be done by writing them down when they are recent: and I beg it may be remembered, that it is not upon memory, but upon what was written at the time, that the authenticity of my Journal rests.—BOSWELL.

2. Sir A. Macdonald's Latin Verses.

[See Page 312.]

The following verses, written by Sir Alexander (now Lord) Macdonald, and addressed and presented to Dr. Johnson, at Armidale, in the Isle of Skye, should have appeared in their proper place (ante, p. 312.) if the author of this Journal had been possessed of them: but this edition was almost printed off when he was accidentally furnished with a copy by a friend.—BOSWELL.

I have not removed these verses to the text, because Mr. Boswell did not think proper to do so in his subsequent editions, and because I really do not profess to understand more than the first stanza. It seems hard to guess what Sir Alexander could have meant by presenting Dr. Johnson with such lines; which are really not much better than the nonsense verses of a school-boy.—CROKER.

Viator, o qui nostra per æquora
Visurus agris Skiatios venis,
En te salutantes tribotim
Undique conglomeraunt oris

Donaldiani, — quotquot in insulis
Compescit artis limitibus mare;
Alitque jamdudum, ac alendus
Piscibus indigenas fovetib.

Ciere fluctus siste, Procelliger,
Nec tu laborans perge, precor, ratis
Ne conjugem plangat marita,
Ne dolcat soboles parentem.

Nec te vicissim pœniteat virum
Luxisse; — vestro scimus ut æstant
In corde luctantes dolores,
Cum feriant inopina corpus.

Quidni! preperntum clade tuentibus
Plus semper illo qui moritur pati
Datur, doloris dum profundus
Pervia mens aperit recessus.

Valete luctus; — hinc lærymabiles
Aere visus: — ibimus, ibimus
Superbienti qua theatro
Fingalæ memoraunt aulæ.

Illustris hospes! mox spatlabere
Qua mens ruinæ ducta meatibus
Gaudet explore æretus,
Bœccina qua cœchit triumphos.

Audin? resurgens spirat anhelitu
Dux usitato, suscitæ efficac
Poeta manes, ingruique
Vi solitâ redivivus horror.

Ahena quassans tela gravi manu
Sic ibat atrox Ossiani pater:
Quiescat urnâ, stet fidelis
Phersonius vigil ad favillam.

3. Inscription on the Monument of Sir James Macdonald, Bart., in the Church of Slate; and Two Letters from that young Gentleman to his Mother.

[Referred to in p. 313. n. 2.]

To the memory
OF SIR JAMES MACDONALD, Bart.
Who, in the flower of youth,
Had attained to so eminent a degree of knowledge
In mathematics, philosophy, languages,
And in every other branch of useful and polite learning,
As few have acquired in a long life
Wholly devoted to study;
Yet to this erudition he joined,
What can rarely be found with it,
Great talents for business,
Great propriety of behaviour,
Great politeness of manners!
His eloquence was sweet, correct, and flowing;
His memory vast and exact;
His judgment strong and acute;
All which endowments, united
With the most amiable temper
And every private virtue,

Procured him, not only in his own country,
But also from foreign nations,
The highest marks of esteem.
In the year of our Lord 1766,

The 25th of his life,
After a long and extremely painful illness,
Which he supported with admirable patience and fortitude,
He died at Rome.

Where, notwithstanding the difference of religion,
Such extraordinary honours were paid to his memory,
As had never graced that of any other British subject,
Since the death of Sir Philip Sydney.

The fame he left behind him is the best consolation
To his afflicted family,

And to his countrymen in this isle,
For whose benefit he had planned

Many useful improvements,
Which his fruitful genius suggested,
And his active spirit promoted,

Under the sober direction
Of a clear and enlightened understanding.
Reader, bewail our loss,
And that of all Britain.

In testimony of his love,
And as the best return she can make
To her departed son,

For the constant tenderness and affection
Which, even to his last moments,

He showed for her,
His much afflicted mother,
The LADY MARGARET MACDONALD,
Daughter to the Earl of Eglington,
Erected this monument,
A. D. 1768.

This extraordinary young man, whom I had the pleasure of knowing intimately, having been deeply regretted by his country, the most minute particulars concerning him must be interesting to many. I shall therefore insert his two last letters to his mother, Lady Margaret Macdonald, which her ladyship has been pleased to communicate to me.

SIR JAMES MACDONALD TO LADY MARGARET.

"Rome, 9th July, 1766.

"MY DEAR MOTHER, — Yesterday's post brought me your answer to the first letter, in which I acquainted you of my illness. Your tenderness and concern upon that account are the same I have always experienced, and to which I have often owed my life. Indeed it never was in so great danger as it has been lately; and though it would have been a very great comfort to me to have had you near me, yet perhaps I ought to rejoice, on your account, that you had not the pain of such a spectacle. I have been now a week in Rome, and wish I could continue to give you the same good accounts of my recovery as I did in my last; but I must own that, for three days past, I have been in a very weak and miserable state, which however seems to give no uneasiness to my physician. My stomach has been greatly out of order, without any visible cause; and the palpitation does not decrease. I am told that my stomach will soon recover its tone, and that the palpitation must cease in time. So I am willing to believe; and with this hope support the little remains of spirits which I can be supposed to have, on the forty-seventh day of such an illness. Do not imagine I have relapsed; I only recover slower than I expected. If my letter is shorter than usual, the cause of it is a dose of physic, which has weakened me so much to-day, that I am not able to write a long letter. I will make up for it next post, and remain always your most sincerely affectionate son,
"J. MACDONALD."

He grew, however, gradually worse; and on the night before his death he wrote as follows from Frescati:

"MY DEAR MOTHER, — Though I did not mean to deceive you in my last letter from Rome, yet certainly you would have very little reason to conclude of the very great and constant danger I have gone through ever since that time. My life, which is still almost entirely desperate, did not at that time appear to me so, otherwise I should have represented, in its true colours, a fact which acquires very little horror by that means, and comes with redoubled force by deception. There is no circumstance of danger and pain of which I have not had the experience, for a continued series of above a fortnight; during which time I have settled my affairs, after my death, with as much distinctness as the hurry and the nature of the thing could admit of. In case of the worst, the Abbé Grant will be my executor in this part of the world, and Mr. Mackenzie in Scotland, where my object has been to make you and my younger brother as independent of the eldest as possible." — BOSWELL.

4. Errata and Observations on the Tour to the Hebrides.

[See p. 427. n. 2.]

Transmitted to Dr. Johnson by Mr. Boswell immediately after the publication of that work; as these corrections were not made in the subsequent editions, it seems worth while to preserve them here. The MS. belongs to the Anderson collection.

Page 210. Maria Reg.<sup>1</sup> My journal has He.
Ibid. The whole Island. Would it not be better to say the whole island of Britain? On first reading, it strikes one as if Inch-Keith had once belonged to two kings.

211. St. Andrew's. Excellent.
217. Trees in that county. Colonel Nairne, when he said that there were but two trees in the county of Fife, must have been jocular or very ignorant. At several seats there are old trees. I am assured that there are some very fine ones at Lesly, the seat of the family of Rothies; Langton's lady or Councillor Pepsy's sister-in-law [p. 222.] will inform you.

Ibid. It may be doubted. Your doubt goes too far — as you travelled along the coast you saw no trees between Edinburgh and England, but several were set before the Union, which are now very stately. I allow that few were set. At Inverary and Auchleck you saw some large old trees which were set. But indeed they were not between Edinburgh and England. I am glad the west of Scotland has not been so severely handled by you; though I will fairly give you an anecdote, which I had the other day from Mr. Hay Campbell, an advocate here. About the beginning of this century his grandfather planted some trees within four miles of Glasgow. He was then blind with a putta serena, and the people in the neighbourhood said his blindness had affected his judgment, so as to make him imagine that trees would grow there. Your observations on the nakedness of Scotland are just, and if they had not been so precisely pointed, no man could have controverted them.

219. Acerbrothick. Excellent.
220. Early in the afternoon. Do you call it the afternoon before dinner? Lord Monboddo is treated perhaps more genteelly than he deserves from you upon the whole. However, he was very agreeable to you that day. But in strict order of time it was his magnetism that drew you, for you did not like him much from what you had formerly seen of him.

222. By the same magistrates. Old and New Aberdeen are not governed by the same magistrates. The new town is a royal burgh; the old is only a borough of barony. Mr. Boyd, Lord Errol's brother, was provost of it.

225. The course of education. Should it not be "the course of education in Scotland?" for, as the passage now stands, it seems to refer only to Aberdeen, though you mean our education in general. I am the more anxious as to this, because you mention the advocates, and you must know that the attorneys of Aberdeen set up a claim to that title, because James VI. by mistake addressed a letter to one of them as "Advocate in Aberdeen."

226. Sufficient not to desire it. Aberdeen — excellent. Your observation on degrees should satisfy everybody.

227. Unexpected calamity. I do not think we travelled over the buried estate. If I recollect right, we were told of it at Mr. Fraser's. A calamity of the same kind happened to an estate in the county of Moray.

229. Buller of Buchan. The Buller of Buchan — great painting.

230. Went backward. Is going backward to a depth right? Does not depth mean something downwards?

... Ladies. Should it not be ladies and gentlemen? Ladies do not come alone to the Buller.

230. Strichion. Read Strichen.

231. Claimed my attention. Earl Fife has a magnificent house near Hamf. Might you not have shown that you did not disregard it, by mentioning that you did not come to Scotland to look at fine places? Perhaps there is no occasion for this. Earl Fife has been my client, and I have had many of his guineas, which probably gave rise to the remark.

235. In the old city. Elgin — excellent. But I shall henceforth not trouble you with repetitions of my applauses.

... Lochabars. Lochabars is between Cullen and Elgin.

236. The governor. Sir Eyre Coote is not Governor of Fort George. He commanded because his regiment then lay there.

237. English race. Is not "peopled the place with an English race," not so well? (my wife's remark.)

239. Cottages of Hottonets. Your observation is in general striking and just, but is not the illustration by Eskineux and Hottonets too strong? There was much sumptuousness in some of our great families before the Union.

240. Every thing but himself. Is not "leave behind him every thing but himself" liable to an Irish construction?

<sup>1</sup> Mr. Boswell's references are made to the pages of the first edition; the present references are adapted to the pages of the Journey in Murphy's edition of Dr. Johnson's Works. — CROKER.

240. Twenty-eighth. For the 13th, read 30th.<sup>1</sup>

241. The peak. Should it not be Peak of Derby, to make it more intelligible, especially on the continent?

245. Fall of Fiers. Lockness and Fall of Fiers — excellent.

247. St. George's. Dele St. The fort was named after King George II.

247. Great convenience. There is not a communication by water all the way to Inverness, but as there is for the greatest part, the passage is perhaps quite right as it stands.

248. Glenmollison. Read Glenmorison.

256. Glenheals. Read Gleneshal: also dele s at the end of Aucknasheals. I believe its inhabitants should be written Macraas.

. . . Your thoughts on the islands are masterly indeed.

264. Aucknasheals and the Macraas. Read Aucknasheal and Macraas.

265. Gordon. Read Murchison. [Anté, p. 42.]

266. The twentieth. For 20th, read 2d.

. . . Reside at Edinburgh. Sir Alexander should be very thankful for your tenderness.

271. Coriatachan. Read Corichatachan.

272. We're united. In the appendix to Gordon's Itinerary Septentrional an account is given of cairns, and of piling<sup>2</sup> and cremation being united among the northern nations.

274. Give no account. Did you not see the women at their meals as well as the men? I take their diet to be the same — "strong liquor" — excellent!

275. Cheshire cheese. I do not think it is Cheshire cheese; they make cheese enough of their own.

278. Water was calm. You are mistaken in saying the water was calm; the sea was pretty rough, and you may recollect that your spurs were lost.

285. Chiefs. Dele s.

. . . Migration. Is yet a good word here? Should it not be still, or some other expression? "Content and faithful, yet unaffected." No wonder they are unaffected if content and faithful. This may occur to a heedless reader from one sense of the word yet (a remark by my wife). Would as yet be clearer?

289. Phœacia. Raasay — very fine! but is there not some inconsistency between saying "that it affords not much ground, notwithstanding its extent for pasture," and "of black cattle I suppose the number is very great." Perhaps the first passage might be altered to "in proportion to." My wife was delighted with the conclusion of Raasay; but it has occurred to me that "if I could have found an Ulysses" may be construed as not altogether delicate to the laird.

289. And narrow. I do not think Port Ke is narrow.

. . . Of the Island. Does this agree with having said "one Inn at Scensor?" It should be Scensor. Might not some sharp rogues lay hold of this in a traveller so rigidly exact as you are? I believe the largest inn of Skye is at Dunvegan; that and the two you have mentioned are the only inns properly so called. There are many huts where whiskey is sold.

298. Macloed. Are you sure it was Macloed who sold the cattle? Was he one of the conspirators?

299. Long genealogy. This is a little anachronism. It was not Ulmist's boatmen, but those who rowed us from Scensor on Saturday, 25th September, who asked about your genealogy. This however is immaterial.

302. Coriatachan — Corichatachan. Your allusion to the gothic romances is admirable.

303. Is minister. Mr. Macpherson is minister of State and taxman of Ostig.

308. Is this description of kelp accurate? Is not kelp the sea-weed after it is calcined? Are not its ashes only ingredients in the composition of glass, as in the composition of soap, and, I believe, some other substances? Upon recollection, I find that kelp is in common language used for the word itself in its original state — they talk of cutting kelp.

312. On a Crate. I do not find the word crate in your dictionary.

312. A turtle feast. Does not "a citizen at a turtle feast" seem to represent him as an image of longevity, as like an eagle. If a citizen should eat turtle as constantly as a cottager eats oaten cakes, would he live as long?

330. Now a wilderness. All this is capital. I am persuaded the king must have his knowledge enlarged and his feelings roused.

339. Bring her husband? In the first edition there was no note of interrogation here, and Boswell asks whether there should not be. There is none in the new Oxford edition.

340. Prevail at last. Your observations on religion should do good.

341. King's palace. You have touched the political tenets of the islanders with a very soft address.

343. Second sight. I am struck to see how your great powers of mind can expand and illustrate a subject. The second sight will henceforth be treated at least with attention by thinking and unprejudiced men.

345. Not to believe it. I believe all the ministers in Skye are natives. Mr. Macpherson, who told you that he was resolved not to believe, was born at Ostig, so that he did not come resolved. I am wrong; he was born in the island of Barra.

352. Almost suppressed. See p. 375.

357. Can be found. Your reflections on Highland learning, on bards, and on Ossian, amount to demonstration only how "if any can be found" might be omitted; for I take it to be certain that some wandering ballads are inserted in Ossian.

Recite six lines. You are mistaken here; some of them do actually recite many more.

358. Taking in kelp. A trifling inaccuracy here. We did not leave Skye in a boat that was taking in kelp. It was a boat from Ilay, in which a gentleman had come in search of an emigrant who owed him money; but before he came the emigrant had sailed. You treat, too, the storm too lightly; both Col and all the islanders thought that we were really in danger.

363. Buacag. Read Buacahach.

368. Popish Islands. This page will, I believe, make me yet go to the Popish Islands, but I must have instructions from you in writing.

375. Dronash-Fingala. Read Dovash-Finvola.

. . . Attend the procession. Is this perfectly consistent with the passage at p. 353? Should not one or the other be modified?

380. Mull. Very instructive. Acti labores sunt juveni, while I read your account.

381. Tabor Morar. Tobermore; — Mori or Mory, the Erse for Mary.

387. Another little inaccuracy. The master was not on board that night; he was sitting socially with Macquharrie. The sailors were our kind deliverers.

388. Refinements of courtesy. As beautiful as any thing in fiction, yet all exactly true, except the inconsiderable circumstance that "we were met by Sir Allan when we landed." We found him in the house, or but; this, however, is nothing. I figure to myself how many amiable readers will envy us at Inch Kenneth.

389. Plentiful and delicate. This phrase has been used already, as to the tacksmen in Skye, page 369. Would it be better to vary one of them? If you think so, I insist that Sir Allan shall retain it.

392. Inch Kenneth. At the death of Col, my wife wept much. I was deeply affected, though I shed no tear. As Tacitus says, Fornis lugere honestum est — visis meminisse.

395. Gradually obscures. The evening sail — very fine!

396. Iona. I cannot express the grandeur of soul that this passage inspires. I should think numbers would visit Iona, to feel it fully.

397. Black stones. Read stone.

Without the blackest. Might not a better word be found for the infamy of violating an oath on the black stone?

401. Mr. Macleod. Read Mr. Macleod. [Anté, p. 42.]

402. Hebrides. Your observations on the castles in the Hebrides, excellent!

417. Higher than the true. I am not conscious of the truth of this observation. I do not recollect instances.

408. Night came on. I am glad to find the grand night-piece preserved. I remembered it imperfectly: my journal stops at Loch-buys, I know not how; but I am continuing it, and you shall read it when we meet.

411. His college. Your account of education in Scotland is just. I repeated it to Lord Monboddó. "He is right," said he.

412. Several places. What places remarkable, and already described, did you find between Glasgow and Auchinleck? I expected to have found something said of the royal castle of Dundonald, where you made me laugh so much with your jokes on king Bob.

. . . Mr. Boswell's sister. Read sister-in-law. Mr. Campbell and I are married to two sisters.

. . . Stony field. Auchinleck has no particular claim to the denomination of a stony field, by which is meant a field much covered with loose pebbles; but Auchinleck is a stony field, and Auchinleck signifies a field of flag stones; now the red rocks there are generally composed of thin strata, or flags.

413. His tenants. You have done Auchinleck much honour, and have, I hope, overcome my father, who has never forgiven your warmth for monarchy and episcopacy. I am anxious to see how your pages will operate upon him.

. . . A pedant's. Why call yourself a pedant?

414. Braidwood. Braidwood deserves attention, and you have ensured him celebrity.

416. Is not your concluding paragraph rather too modest? The more I read your journey, the more satisfaction I receive. That the canvas should glow with your rich store of colour was to be expected; but it is wonderful to consider the number and variety of minute objects that you have accurately delineated. There is, in general, much entertainment; but I can hardly conceive how, in so short a time, you acquired the knowledge of so many particulars.

BOSWELL.

<sup>1</sup> It would seem as if Dr. Johnson had made an imperfect correction here. Murphy's edition has the 28th. In the Oxford works it still stands 13th. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> He means, piling stones on stones till a cairn is raised. — CROKER.

No. III.

SOME ACCOUNT OF FRANCIS STUART.

[Referred to in pp. 57. 611. 613. 718. 750.]

Is that amusing scrap-book called "Grose's Olio," there is an imputation against Dr. Johnson of having obtained an advance of money from the publishers of the Dictionary, by the trick of substituting old sheets instead of new copy, which he had neglected to prepare. The following extract from the Gentleman's Magazine contradicts this imputation; but for that sole purpose I should not have thought it necessary to quote it, but am induced to do so because it also affords some curious particulars as to the practical compilation of the Dictionary, and gives some account of Francis Stuart, whose connexion with Johnson seems to have been more important than Mr. Boswell supposed. Indeed Mr. Boswell's account of a little negotiation in which Dr. Johnson employed him with Stuart's sister is very confused. In December, 1779, he states that he had, as desired by Johnson, "discovered the sister of Stuart, and given her a guinea for an old pocket-book of her brother's which Dr. Johnson had retained; that the woman wondered at his scrupulous and liberal honesty, and received the guinea as if sent by Providence:" ante, p. 641. But this must have been a total mistake on the part of Boswell; for it appears that the sister had the pocket-book or letter-case in her own possession, and that it was for obtaining it that Johnson offered the guinea. This matter was probably explained in some letters not given; for in April, 1780 (p. 643.), Johnson expresses "satisfaction at the success of Boswell's transaction with Mrs. Stuart," by which it may be inferred that Boswell had obtained the letter-case from her; but the negotiation was not terminated; for four years after, in 1784 (p. 748.), Johnson writes to Boswell, "I desire you to see Mrs. Stuart once again, and say that in the letter-case was a letter relating to me for which I will give her, if she is willing to give it to me, another guinea: the letter is of consequence only to me." (p. 750.) The reader now sees that the retention by Johnson of Stewart's old pocket-book, and the scrupulous honesty of paying a guinea in lieu of it, was a total misapprehension on the part of Boswell; and that Johnson really wanted to obtain the pocket-book, which he seems to have gotten, for the sake of a letter it contained which he seems not to have gotten. But what letter could this be of consequence to Dr. Johnson, when on the verge of the grave, yet so long neglected by him; for Stewart had been dead many years? Boswell's original error and his subsequent silence on the subject are very strange. I am satisfied either that Boswell did not obtain the letter, or that it related to some circumstance of Johnson's life which he did not choose to divulge; and what could it have been that he would not have told? It might, no doubt, have related to the trick or mistake about the copy of the Dictionary; but this, as we shall see by the following explanation, could have hardly interested Johnson at the end of thirty years; while the contradictions and mystery of the case as we have it, and the strange and utter ignorance of what Johnson was about in the years 1745-6—together with many smaller circumstances, incline me to suspect that Johnson may have taken some personal share in the disaffected movements of that period, and that the letter he was so anxious about, may have had some reference to those transactions in which Stuart was likely enough to have been engaged. From the following account it might be inferred that Stuart was not acquainted with Johnson till he lived in Gough square, 1748—that was no doubt the date at which Johnson employed him on the Dictionary, but as it seems that Stuart left Scotland soon after the celebrated Porteous riot in 1736, in which he had some share, he may have known Johnson long before 1745.

"This was Francis Stuart. He was the son of a shop-keeper in Edinburgh, and was brought up to the law. For several years he was employed as a writer in some of the principal offices of Edinburgh; and being a man of good natural parts, and given to literature, he frequently assisted in digesting and arranging MSS. for the press; and, among other employments of this sort, he used to boast of assisting or copying some of the juvenile productions of the afterwards celebrated Lord Kaimes when he was very young and a correspondent with the Edinburgh Magazine. When he came to London, he stuck more closely to the press; and in this walk of copying or arranging for the press, he got recommended to Dr. Johnson, who then lived in Gough-square. Frank was a great admirer of the doctor, and upon all occasions consulted him; and the doctor had also a very respectable opinion of his amanuensis Frank Stuart, as he always familiarly called him. But it was not only in collecting authorities that Frank was employed: he was the man who did every thing in the writing way for him, and managed all his affairs between the doctor, his bookseller, and his creditors, who were then often very troublesome, and every species of business the doctor had to do out of doors; and for this he was much better qualified than the doctor himself, as he had been more accustomed to common business, and more conversant in the ways of men.

"That he was 'a porter-drinking man,' as Captain Grose says, may be admitted: for he usually spent his evenings at the Bible, in Shire lane, a house of call for bookbinders and printers, where Frank was in good esteem among some creditable neighbours that frequented the back room; for, except his fudding, he was a very worthy character. But his drinking and conviviality, he used to say, he left behind him at Edinburgh, where he had connected himself with some jovial wits and great card-players, which made his journey to London very prudent and necessary, as nothing but such a measure could break off the connexion, or bring them to good hours and moderation. In one of those night rambles, Stuart and his companions met with the mob-procession when they were conducting Captain Porteous to be hanged; and Stuart and his companions were next day examined about it before the town-council, when (as Stuart used to say) 'we were found to be too drunk to have had any hand in the business.' But he gave a most accurate and particular account of that memorable transaction in the Edinburgh Magazine of that time, which he was rather fond of relating.

"In another walk, besides collecting authorities, he was remarkably useful to Dr. Johnson; that was, in the explanation of low cant phrases, which the doctor used to get Frank to give his explanation of first; and all words relating to gambling and card-playing, such as All Fours, Catch honours, Cribbage, &c. were, among the typos, said to be Frank Stuart's, corrected by the doctor, for which he received a second payment. At the time this happened, the Dictionary was going on printing very briskly in three departments, letters D, G, and L, being at work upon at the same time; and as the doctor was, in the printing-house phrase, out of town—that is, had received more money than he had produced MS. for—the proprietors restricted him in his payments, and would answer no more demands from him than at the rate of a guinea for every sheet of MS. copy he delivered; and this was paid him by Mr. Strahan on delivery; and the doctor readily agreed to this. The copy was written upon 4to, post, and in two columns each page. The doctor wrote, in his own hand, the words and their explanation, and generally two or three words in each column, leaving a space between each for the authorities, which were pasted on as they were collected by the different clerks or amanuenses employed; and in this mode the MS. was so regular, that the sheets of MS. which made a sheet of print could be very exactly ascertained. Every guinea parcel came after this agreement regularly tied up, and was put upon a shelf in the corrector's room till wanted. The MS. being then in great forwardness, the doctor supplied copy faster than the printers called for it; and in one of the heaps of copy it happened that, upon giving it out to the compositors, some sheets of the old MS. that had been printed off were found among the new MS. paid for. It is more probable that this happened by the doctor's keeping the old copy, which was always returned him with the proof, in a disorderly manner. But another mode of accounting for this was at that time very current in the printing-house. The doctor, besides his kind and constant assistant, Stuart, had several others, some of them not of the best characters; and one of this class had been lately discharged, whom the doctor had been very kind to, notwithstanding all his loose and idle tricks; and it was generally supposed that he had fallen upon this expedient of picking up the old MS. to raise a few guineas, finding the money so readily paid on the MS. as he delivered it. But every body was inclined to acquit the doctor, as he had been well known to have rather too little thoughts about money matters. And what served to complete the doctor's acquittal was, Stuart immediately on the discovery supplying the quantum of right copy (for it was ready); which set every thing to rights, and that in the course of an hour or two, as the writer of this note can truly assert, as he was employed in the business.

"How such an erroneous and injurious account of an accident so fairly and justly to be accounted for, and the doctor's character cleared from all imputation of art or guilt, came to Captain Grose's ears, is hard to be accounted for; but it appears to have been picked up among the common gossip of the press-room, or other remote parts of the printing-house, where the right state of the fact could not be minutely related nor accurately known."—Gent. Mag. v. 69. p. 1171.

No. IV.

EXTRACTS FROM BOSWELL'S LETTERS TO MR. MALONE.

[Mr. Boswell's letters to Mr. Malone, written while the first edition of his Life of Johnson was passing through the press, afford so curious a view of his situation and state of mind at that period, that the Editor has gladly availed himself of Mr. Upcott's permission to make some extracts from the MSS. in that gentleman's collection.] — WRIGHT.

"London, Dec. 4. 1790. Let me begin with myself. On the day after your departure, that most friendly fellow Courtenay (begging the pardon of an M. P. for so free an epithet) called on me, and took my word and honour that, till the 1st of March, my allowance of wine per diem should not exceed four good glasses at dinner, and a pint after it; and this I have kept, though I have dined with Jack Wilkes; at the London Tavern, after the launch of an Indian; and with dear Edwards; Dilly; at home with Courtenay; Dr. Barrow; at the mess of the Coldstream; at the Club; at Warren Hastings's; at Hawkins the Cornish member's; and at home with a colonel of the guards, &c. This regulation I assure you is of essential advantage in many respects. The Magnum Opus advances. I have revised p. 216. The additions which I have received are a Spanish quotation from Mr. Cambridge (p. 722.); an account of Johnson at Warley Camp from Mr. Langton (p. 618.); and Johnson's letters to Mr. Hastings — three in all — one of them long and admirable (p. 676.); but what sets the diamonds in pure gold of Ophir is a letter from Mr. Hastings to me (p. 675.), illustrating them and their writer. I had this day the honour of a long visit from the late governor-general of India. There is to be no more impeachment. But you will see his character nobly vindicated. Depend upon this.

"And now for my friend. The appearance of Malone's Shakespeare on the 29th November was not attended with any external noise; but I suppose no publication seized more speedily and surely on the attention of those for whose critical taste it was chiefly intended. At the Club on Tuesday, where I met Sir Joshua, Dr. Warren, Lord Ossory, Lord Palmerston, Windham, and Burke in the chair, — Burke was so full of his anti-French revolution rage, and poured it out so copiously, that we had almost nothing else. He, however, found time to praise the clearness and accuracy of your dramatic history; and Windham found fault with you for not taking the profits of so laborious a work. Sir Joshua is pleased, though he would gladly have seen more disquisition — you understand me! Mr. Daines Barrington is exceedingly gratified. He regrets that there should be a dryness between you and Steevens, as you have treated him with great respect. I understand that, in a short time, there will not be one of your books to be had for love or money.

"Dec. 7. I dined last Saturday at Sir Joshua's with Mr. Burke, his lady, son, and niece, Lord Palmerston, Windham, Dr. Lawrence, Dr. Blagden, Dr. Burney, Sir Abraham Hume, Sir William Scott. I sat next to young Burke at dinner, who said to me, that you had paid his father a very fine compliment. I mentioned Johnson, to sound if there was any objection. He made none. In the evening Burke told me he had read your Henry VI. with all its accompaniment, and it was 'exceedingly well done.' He left us for some time; I suppose on some of his cursed politics; but he returned — I sat him again, and heard from his lips what, believe me, I delighted to hear, and took care to write down soon after. 'I have read his History of the Stage, which is a very capital piece of criticism and anti-agrarianism. I shall now read all Shakespeare through, in a very different manner from what I have yet done, when I have got such a commentator.' Will not this do for you, my friend? Burke was admirable company all that day. He never once, I think, mentioned the French revolution, and was easy with me, as in days of old.

"Dec. 16. I was sadly mortified at the Club on Tuesday, where I was in the chair, and on opening the box found three balls against General Burgoyne. Present, besides me, Lord Ossory, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Sir Joseph Banks, Dr. Fordyce, Dr. Burney, young Burke, Courtenay, Steevens. One of the balls, I do believe, was put into the side by Fordyce by mistake. You may guess who put in the other two. The Bishop of Carlisle and Dr. Blagden are put up. I doubt if the latter will be admitted, till Burgoyne gets in first. My work has met with a delay for a little while — not a whole day, however — by an unaccountable neglect in having paper enough in readiness. I have now before me p. 256. My utmost wish is to come forth on Shrove Tuesday (8th March). 'Wits are game cocks,' &c. Langton is in town, and dines with me to-morrow quietly, and revises his Collectanea." (p. 654.)

"Jan. 18. 1791. I have been so disturbed by sad money-matters, that my mind has been quite fretful; 500*l.* which I borrowed and lent to a first cousin, an unlucky captain of an Indian, were due on the 15th to a merchant in the city. I could not possibly raise that sum, and was apprehensive of being hardly used. He, however, indulged me with an allowance to make partial payments; 150*l.* in two months, 150*l.* in eight months, and the remainder, with the interests, in eighteen months. How I am to manage I am at a loss, and I know you cannot help me. So this, upon my honour, is no hint. I am really tempted to accept of the 1000*l.* for my Life of Johnson. Yet it would go to my heart to sell it at a price which I think much too low. Let me struggle and hope. I cannot be out on Shrove Tuesday, as I flattered myself. P. 376. of Vol. II. is ordered for press, and I expect another proof to-night. But I have yet near 200 pages of copy besides letters, and the death, which is not yet written. My second volume will, I see, be forty or fifty pages more than my first. Your absence is a woful want in all respects. You will, I dare say, perceive a difference in the part which is revised only by myself, and in which many insertions will appear. My spirits are at present bad; but I will mention all I can recollect."

"Jan. 29. You will find this a most desponding and disagreeable letter, for which I ask your pardon. But your vigour of mind and warmth of heart make your friendship of such consequence, that it is drawn upon like a bank. I have, for some weeks, had the most woful return of melancholy, inasmuch that I have not only had no relish of any thing, but a continual uneasiness, and all the prospect before me for the rest of life has seemed gloomy and hopeless. The state of my affairs is exceedingly embarrassed. I mentioned to you that the 500*l.* which I borrowed several years ago, and lent to a first cousin, an unfortunate India captain, must now be paid; 150*l.* on the 18th of March, 150*l.* on the 18th of October, and 257*l.* 15*s.* 6*d.* on the 18th of July, 1792. This debt presses upon my mind, and it is uncertain if I shall ever get a shilling of it again. The clear money on which I can reckon out of my estate is scarcely 900*l.* a year. What can I do? My grave brother urges me to quit London, and live at my seat in the country; where he thinks that I might be able to save so as gradually to relieve myself. But, alas! I should be absolutely miserable. In the mean time, such are my projects and sanguine expectations, that you know I purchased an estate which was given long ago to a younger son of our family, and came to be sold last autumn, and paid for it 2500*l.* — 1500*l.* of which I borrow upon itself by a mortgage. But the remaining 1000*l.* I cannot conceive a possibility of raising, but by the mode of annuity; which is, I believe, a very heavy disadvantage. I own it was imprudent in me to make a clear purchase at a time when I was sadly straitened; but if I had missed the opportunity, it never again would have occurred, and I should have been vexed to see an ancient appanage, a piece of, as it were, the flesh and blood of the family, in the hands of a stranger. And now that I have made the purchase, I should feel myself quite despicable should I give it up.

"In this situation, then, my dear Sir, would it not be wise in me to accept of 1000 guineas for my Life of Johnson, supposing the person who made the offer should now stand to it, which I fear may not be the case; for two volumes may be considered as a disadvantageous circumstance? Could I indeed raise 1000*l.* upon the credit of the work, I should incline to game, as Sir Joshua says; because it may produce double the money, though Steevens kindly tells me that I have over-printed, and that the curiosity about Johnson is now only in our own circle. Pray decide for me; and if, as I suppose, you are for my taking the offer, inform me with whom I am to treat. In my present state of spirits, I am all timidity. Your absence has been a severe stroke to me. I am at present quiet at a loss what to do. Last week they gave me six sheets. I have now before me in proof p. 456. — yet I have above 100 pages of my copy remaining, besides his death, which is yet to be written, and many insertions, were there room, as also seven-and-thirty letters, exclusive of twenty to Dr. Brocklesby, most of which will furnish only extracts. I am advised to extract several of those to others, and leave out some; for my first volume makes only 516 pages, and to have 600 in the second will seem awkward, besides increasing the expense considerably. The counsellor indeed has devised an ingenious way to thicken the first volume, by prefixing the index. I have now desired to have but one compositor. Indeed, I go sluggishly and comfortably about my work. As I pass your door I cast many a longing look.

humble circumstances. There is an interesting biographical notice of him by Sir J. Mackintosh, prefixed to his "Poetical Review of Dr. Johnson's Character," in my former editions, but there is not room here for either. — CHOKER, 1847.

<sup>1</sup> John Courtenay, born in Ireland in 1738. He was, through the influence of Lords Townshend and Thanet, M. P. for Tamworth and Appleby, from 1780 to 1807. In 1806 he was a lord of the treasury. He died in March, 1815, in very

"I am to cancel a leaf of the first volume, having found that though Sir Joshua certainly assured me he had no objection to my mentioning that Johnson wrote a dedication for him, he now thinks otherwise. In that leaf occurs the mention of Johnson having written to Dr. Leland, thanking the University of Dublin for their diploma. What shall I say to it? I have also room to state shortly the anecdote of the college cook, which I beg you may get for me. I shall be very anxious till I hear from you.

"Having harassed you with so much about myself, I have left no room for any thing else. We had a numerous club on Tuesday; Fox in the chair, quoting Homer and Fielding, &c. to the astonishment of Jo. Warton; who, with Langton and Seward, ate a plain bit with me, in my new house, last Saturday. Sir Joshua has put up Dr. Lawrence, who will be black-balled as sure as he exists.<sup>1</sup>

"We dined on Wednesday at Sir Joshua's; thirteen without Miss P. Himsel, Bladen, Batt, [Lawrence,] Erskine, Langton, Dr. Warton, Metcalf, Dr. Lawrence, his brother, a clergyman, Sir Charles Bunbury, myself."

"Feb. 10. Yours of the 5th reached me yesterday. I instantly went to the Don, who purchased for you at the office of Hazard and Co. a ball, stamped by government and warranted undrawn, of No. 43,152, in the English State Lottery. I have marked on the back of it, 'Edmond, Henrietta, and Catherine Malone,' and if Fortune will not favour those three united, I shall blame her. This half shall lie in my bureau with my one whole one, till you desire it to be placed elsewhere. The cost, with registration, is 82, 12s. 6d. A half is always proportionally dearer than a whole. I bought my ticket at the number, but paid 16l. 8s. for it. I did not look at the number, but seated it up. In the evening a hand-bill was circulated by Nicholson, that a ticket the day before sold at his office for 16l. 8s. was drawn a prize of 5000l. The number was mentioned in the hand-bill. I had resolved not to know what mine was till after the drawing of the lottery was finished, that I might not receive a sudden shock of blank; but this unexpected circumstance, which elated me by calculating that mine must certainly be one of 100, or at most 200 sold by Nicholson the day before, made me look at the two last figures of it; which, alas! were 48, whereas those of the fortunate one were 33. I have remanded my ticket to its secrecy. O! could I but get a few thousands, what a difference would it make upon my state of mind, which is harassed by thinking of my debts. I am anxious to hear your determination as to my Magnam Opus. I am very very unwilling to part with the property of it, and certainly would not, if I could but get credit for 1000l. for three or four years. Could you not assist me in one half of my rents, 700l., which, upon my honour, are always due, and would be forthcoming in case of my decease? I will not sell, till I have your answer as to this.

"On Tuesday we had a Club of eleven—Lords Lucan (in the chair), Osory, Macartney, Eliot, Bishop of Clonfert, young Burke, myself, Courtenay, Windham, Sir Joshua, and Charles Fox, who takes to us exceedingly, and asked to have dinner a little later; so it was to be at half-past five. Burke had made great interest for his drum major, and would you believe it? had not Courtenay and I been there, he would have been chosen. I am strangely ill, and doubt if even you could dispel the demonic influence. I have now before me p. 488, in print; and 923 pages of the copy only is exhausted, and there remains 80, besides the death; as to which I shall be concise, though solemn. Pray how shall I wind up? Shall I give the character from my Tour, somewhat enlarged?<sup>2</sup>

"Feb. 25. I have not seen Sir Joshua I think for a fortnight. I have been worse than you can possibly imagine, or I hope ever shall be able to imagine; which no man can do without experiencing the malady. It has been for some time painful to me to be in company. I, however, am a little better, and to meet Sir Joshua to-day at dinner at Mr. Dancer's, and shall tell him that he is to have good Irish claret.

"I am in a distressing perplexity how to decide as to the property of my book. You must know, that I am certainly informed that a certain person who delights in mischief has been depreciating it, so that I fear the sale of it may be very dubious. Two quarts and two guineas sound in an alarming manner. I believe, in my present frame, I should accept even of 500l.; for I suspect that were I now to talk to Robinson, I should find him not disposed to give 1000l. Did he absolutely offer it, or did he only express himself so as that you concluded he would give it? The pressing circumstance is, that I must lay down 1000l. by the 1st of May, on account of the purchase of land, which my old family circumstanced me to make. You, I doubt not, have full enthusiasm urged me to make. May I then ask you if you could confidence in my honesty. May I then ask you if you could venture to join with me in a bond for that sum, as then I would take my chance, and, as Sir Joshua says, game with my book? Upon my honour, your telling me that you cannot comply with what I propose will not in the least surprise me, or make any manner of difference as to my opinion of your friendship. I mean to ask Sir Joshua if he will join; for indeed I should be vexed to sell my Magnam Opus for a great deal less than its intrinsic value. I meant to publish on Shrove Tuesday; but if I can get out within the month of March I shall be satisfied. I have now, I think, four or five sheets to print, which will make my second volume about 575 pages. But I shall have more caucels. That nervous mortal W. G. H.<sup>3</sup> is not satisfied with my report of some particulars which I wrote down from his own mouth, and is so much agitated, that Courtenay has persuaded me to allow a new edition of them by H. himself to be made at H.'s expense. Besides, it has occurred to me, that when I mention 'a literary fraud,' by Holt the historian, in going to Dublin, and publi-hing Aken-side's Pleasures of the Imagination, with his own name (p. 121.). I may not be able to authenticate it, as Johnson is dead, and he may have relations who may take it up as an offence, perhaps a libel. Courtenay suggests, that you may perhaps get intelligence whether it was true. The Bishop of Down can probably tell, as he knows a great deal about Holt. In case of doubt, should I not cancel the leaf, and either omit the curious anecdote or give it as a story which Johnson laughingly told as having circulated?"

"March 8. I have before me your volunteer letter of February 24th, and one of 5th current, which, if you have dated it right, has come with wonderful expedition. You may be perfectly sure that I have not the smallest fault to find with your disinclination to come again under any pecuniary engagements for others, after having suffered so much. Dilly proposes that he and Baldwin should each advance 2000l. on the credit of my book; and if they do so, I shall manage well enough, for I now find that I can have 600l. in Scotland on the credit of my rents; and thus I shall get the 1000l. paid in May.

"You would observe some stupid lines on Mr. Burke in the 'Oracle' by Mr. Boswell. I instantly wrote to Mr. Burke, expressing my indignation at such impertinence, and had next morning a most obliging answer. Sir William Scott told me I could have no legal redress. So I went civilly to Bell, and he promised to mention handsomely that James Boswell, Esq. was not the author of the lines. The note however, on the subject was a second impertinence. But I can do nothing. I wish Fox, in his bill upon labels, would make a heavy penalty the consequence of forging any person's name to any composition, which, in reality, such a trick amounts to.

"In the night between the last of February and first of this month, I had a sudden relief from the inexplicable disorder, which occasionally clouds my mind and makes me miserable, and it is amazing how well I have been since. Your friendly admonition as to excess in wine has been often too applicable; but upon this late occasion I erred on the other side. However, as I am now free from my restriction to Courtenay, I shall be much upon my guard, as, to tell the truth, I did go too deep the day before yesterday, having dined with Michael Angelo Taylor, and then supped at the London Tavern with the stewards of the Humane Society, and continued till I know not what hour in the morning. John Nichols was joyous to a pitch of bacchanalian vivacity. I am to dine with him next Monday; an excellent city party, Alderman Curtis, Deputy Birch, &c. &c. I rated him gently on his saying so little of your Shakespeare.<sup>3</sup> He is ready to receive more ample notice. You may depend on your having whatever reviews that mention you sent directly. Have I told you that Murphy has written 'An Essay on the Life and Writings of Dr. Johnson,' to be prefixed to the new edition of his works? He wrote it in a month, and has received 2000l. for it. I am quite resolved now to keep the property of my Magnam Opus; and I flatter myself I shall not repent it.

"My title, as we settled it, is 'The Life of Samuel Johnson, LL.D., comprehending an account of his studies and various works, in chronological order, his conversation with many eminent persons, a series of his letters to be celebrated, and several original pieces of his own composition; the whole exhibiting a view of literature and literary men in Great Britain, for near half a century, during which he flourished.' It will be very kind if you will suggest what yet occurs. I hoped to have published to-day; but it will be about a month yet before I launch."

"March 12. Being the depository of your chance in the lottery I am under the disagreeable necessity of communicating the bad news that it has been drawn a blank. I am very sorry, both on your account and that of your sisters, and my own; for had your share of good fortune been 3166l. 13s. 4d. I should have hoped for a loan to accommodate me. As it is, I shall, as I wrote to you, be enabled to weather my difficulties for some time; but I am still in great

<sup>1</sup> Dr. Lawrence was black-balled, and did not become a member of the Club till December 1802. — WRIGHT.

<sup>2</sup> See ante, p. 168, n. 6, and 169, n. 1. Mr. Hamilton's nervousness increases our regret at not being able to penetrate the secret of his political transactions with Johnson. It was clearly something that he did not like to reveal. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> Viz, in the Gentleman's Magazine. — CROKER.

anxiety about the sale of my book. I find so many people shake their heads at the two quartos and two guineas. Courtenay is clear that I should sound Robinson, and accept of a thousand guineas, if he will give that sum. Meantime, the title-page must be made as good as may be. It appears to me that mentioning his studies, works, conversations, and letters is not sufficient; and I would suggest comprehending an account, in chronological order, of his studies, works, friendships, acquaintance, and other particulars; his conversations with eminent men; a series of his letters to various persons; also several original pieces of his composition never before published. The whole, &c. You will, probably, be able to assist me in expressing my idea, and arranging the parts. In the advertisement I intend to mention the letter to Lord Chesterfield, and perhaps the interview with the King, and the names of the correspondents in alphabetical order. How should chronological order stand in the order of the members of my title? I had at first 'celebrated correspondents,' which I don't like. How would it do to say 'his conversations and epistolary correspondence with eminent (or celebrated) persons?' Shall it be 'different works,' and 'various particulars?' In short, it is difficult to decide.

"Courtenay was with me this morning. What a mystery is his going on at all! Yet he looks well, talks well, dresses well, keeps his mare—in short, is in all respects like a parliament man. Do you know that my bad spirits are returned upon me to a certain degree; and such is the sickly fondness for change of place, and imagination of relief, that I sometimes think you are happier by being in Dublin, than one is in this great metropolis, where hardly any man cares for another. I am persuaded I should relish your Irish dinners very much. I have at last got chambers in the Temple, in the very staircase where Johnson lived; and when my Magnum Opus is fairly launched, there shall I make a trial."

No. V.

ORIGINAL ANECDOTES OF DR. JOHNSON,

COMMUNICATED TO MR. CROKER.

§ 1. MISS REYNOLDS'S RECOLLECTIONS.

[Communicated, in 1829, to me by Mr. Palmer, grand-nephew of Sir Joshua Reynolds. — CROKER.]

"Clarissa Harlowe." The first time I was in company with Dr. Johnson, which was at Miss Cotterel's, (p. 79.) I well remember the flattering notice he took of a lady present, on her saying that she was inclined to estimate the morality of every person according as they liked or disliked "Clarissa Harlowe." He was a great admirer of Richardson's works in general, but of "Clarissa" he always spoke with the highest enthusiastic praise. He used to say, that it was the first book in the world for the knowledge it displays of the human heart.

Richardson. Yet of the author I never heard him speak with any degree of cordiality, but rather as if impressed with some cause of resentment against him; and this has been imputed to something of jealousy, not to say envy, on account of Richardson's having engrossed the attentions and affectionate assiduities of several very ingenious literary ladies, whom he used to call his adopted daughters, and for whom Dr. Johnson had conceived a paternal affection (particularly for two of them, Miss Carter and Miss Mulso, now Mrs. Chapone), previous to their acquaintance with Richardson; and it was said, that he thought himself neglected by them on his account.

Female Friendship. Dr. Johnson set a higher value upon female friendship than, perhaps, most men; which may reasonably be supposed was not a little enhanced by his acquaintance with those ladies, if it was not originally derived from them. To their society, doubtless, Richardson owed that delicacy of sentiment, that feminine excellence, as I may say, that so peculiarly distinguishes his writings from those of his own sex in general, how high soever they may soar above the other in the more dignified paths of literature, in scientific investigations, and abstruse inquiries.

What is Love? Dr. Johnson used to repeat, with very apparent delight, some lines of a poem written by Miss Mulso:—

"Say, Stella, what is Love, whose cruel power
Robs virtue of content, and youth of joy?
What nymph or goddess, in what fatal hour,
Produced to light the mischief-making boy?"

"Some say, by Idleness and Pleasure bred,
The smiling babe on beds of roses lay;
There with soft honey'd dews by Fancy fed,
His infant beauties open'd on the day."<sup>1</sup>

An Inn. Dr. Johnson had an uncommonly retentive memory for every thing that appeared to him worthy of observation. Whatever he met with in reading, particularly poetry, I believe he seldom required a revival to be able to repeat verbatim. If not literally so, his deviations were generally improvements. This was the case, in some respects, in Shenstone's poem of "The Inn," which I learned from hearing Dr. Johnson repeat it; and I was surprised, on seeing it lately among the author's works for the first time, to find it so different. One stanza he seems to have extemporised himself:—

"And once again I shape my way
Through rain, through shine, through thick and thin,
Secure to meet, at close of day,
A kind reception at an inn." (p. 485.)

Quick Reading. — He always read amazingly quick, glancing his eye from the top to the bottom of the page in an instant. If he made any pause, it was a compliment to the work; and, after seasawing over it a few minutes, generally repeated the passage, especially if it was poetry.

Pope's "Essay on Man". — One day, on taking up Pope's "Essay on Man," a particular passage seemed more than ordinarily to engage his attention; so much so, indeed, that, contrary to his usual custom, after he had left the book and the seat in which he was sitting, he returned to revise it, turning over the pages with anxiety to find it, and then repeated—

"Passions, though selfish, if their means be fair,
List under Reason, and deserve her care:
Those that, imparted, court a nobler aim,
Exalt their kind, and take some virtue's name."

His task, probably, was the whole paragraph, but these lines only were audible.

Favourite Verses. — He seemed much to delight in reciting verses, particularly from Pope. Among the many I have had the pleasure of hearing him recite, the conclusion of the "Dunciad," and his "Epistle to Jervas," seemed to claim his highest admiration: two lines of it—

"Led by some rule that guides, but not constrains, And finish'd more through happiness than pains,"

he used to remark, was a union that constituted the ultimate degree of excellence in the fine arts.

Two lines from Pope's "Universal Prayer" I have heard him quote, in very serious conversation, as his theological creed:—

"And binding Nature fast in fate, Left free the human will."

Some lines also he used to repeat in his best manner, written in memory of Bishop Boulter (p. 107.), which I believe are not much known:—

"Some write their wrongs in marble: he, more just,
Stoop'd down serene and wrote them in the dust;
Trod under foot, the sport of every wind,
Swept from the earth, and blotted from his mind.
There, secret in the grave, he bade them lie,
And griev'd they could not 'scape the Almighty's eye."

A lady [Miss Reynolds], who had learnt them from Dr. Johnson, thought she had made a mistake, or had forgot some words, as she could not make out a reference to "there," and mentioned it to him. "No," said he, "she had not," and, after sec-sawing a few minutes, said something that indicated surprise that he should not have made the same remark before.

<sup>1</sup> Johnson paid the first of those stanzas the great and undeserved compliment of quoting it in his Dictionary, under the word "QUATRRAIN." — CROKER.

Some time after he told the lady that these lines were inserted in the last edition of his Dictionary, under the word "spout."<sup>1</sup>

Goldsmith.—Of Goldsmith's "Traveller" he used to speak in terms of the highest commendation. A lady [Miss Reynolds herself], I remember, who had the pleasure of hearing Dr. Johnson read it from the beginning to the end on its first coming out, to testify her admiration of it, exclaimed, "I never more shall think Dr. Goldsmith ugly."

In having thought so, however, she was by no means singular: an instance of which I am rather inclined to mention, because it involves a remarkable one of Dr. Johnson's ready wit: for this lady, one evening being in a large party, was called upon after supper for her toast, and seeming embarrassed, she was desired to give the ugliest man she knew; and she immediately named Dr. Goldsmith, on which a lady (Mrs. Cholmondeley) on the other side of the table rose up and reached across to shake hands with her, expressing some desire of being better acquainted with her, it being the first time they had met; on which Dr. Johnson said, "Thus the ancients, on the commencement of their friendships, used to sacrifice a beast between them."

Sir Joshua, I have often thought, never gave a more striking proof of his excellence in portrait-painting, than in giving dignity to Dr. Goldsmith's countenance, and yet preserving a strong likeness. But he drew after his mind, or rather his genius, if I may be allowed to make that distinction; assimilating the one with his conversation, the other with his works.

Dr. Goldsmith's cast of countenance, and indeed his whole figure from head to foot, impressed every one at first sight with an idea of his being a low mechanic; particularly, I believe, a journeyman tailor. A little concurring instance of this I well remember. One day at Sir Joshua Reynolds's, in company with some gentlemen and ladies, he was relating with great indignation an insult he had just received from some gentleman he had accidentally met (I think at a coffee-house). "The fellow," he said, "took me for a tailor!" on which all the party either laughed aloud or showed they suppressed a laugh.

Dr. Johnson seemed to have much more kindness for Goldsmith, than Goldsmith had for him. He always appeared to be overawed by Johnson, particularly when in company with people of any consequence, always as if impressed with some fear of disgrace; and, indeed, well he might. I have been witness to many mortifications he has suffered in Dr. Johnson's company: one day in particular, at Sir Joshua's table, a gentleman to whom he was talking his best stopped him, in the midst of his discourse, with "Hush! hush! Dr. Johnson is going to say something."

At another time, a gentleman who was sitting between Dr. Johnson and Dr. Goldsmith, and with whom he had been disputing, remarked to another, loud enough for Goldsmith to hear him, "That he had a fine time of it, between Ursa major and Ursa minor!"<sup>2</sup>

Talking one's best.—Mr. Baretti used to remark, with a smile, that Dr. Johnson always talked his best to the ladies. But, indeed, that was his general practice to all who would furnish him with a subject worthy of his discussion; for, what was very singular in him, he would rarely, if ever, begin any subject himself, but would sit silent (p. 27.) till something was particularly addressed to him, and of that which happened to lead to any scientific or moral inquiry, his benevolence, I believe, more immediately incited him to expatiate on it for the edification of the ignorant than for any other motive whatever.

Original Sin.—One day, on a lady's telling him that she had read Parnell's "Hermit" with dissatisfaction, for she could not help thinking that thieves and murderers, who were such immediate ministers from Heaven of good to man, did not deserve such punishments as our laws inflict. Dr. Johnson spoke such an eloquent oration, so deeply philosophical, as indeed afforded a most striking instance of the truth of Baretti's observation, but of which, to my great regret, I can give no corroborating proof, my memory furnishing me with nothing more than barely the general tendency of his arguments, which was to prove, that though it might be said that wicked men, as well as the good, were ministers of God, because in the moral sphere the good we enjoy and the evil we suffer are administered to us by man, yet, as Infinite Goodness could not inspire or influence man to act wickedly, but, on the contrary, it was his divine property to produce good out of evil, and as man was endowed with free will to act, or to refrain from acting wickedly, with knowledge of good and evil, with conscience to admonish and to direct him to choose the one and to reject the other, he was, therefore, as criminal in the sight of God and of man, and as deserving punishment for his evil deeds, as if no good had resulted from them.

And yet, though, to the best of my remembrance, this was the substance of Dr. Johnson's discourse in answer to the lady's observation, I am rather apprehensive that, in some respects, it may be thought inconsistent with his general assertions; that man was by nature much more inclined to evil than to good. But it would ill become me to expatiate on such a subject.

Yet, what can be said to reconcile his opinion of the natural tendency of the human heart to evil with his own zealous virtuous propensities? Nothing, perhaps, at least by me, but that this opinion, I believe, was founded upon religious principles relating to original sin; and I well remember that, when disputing with a person on this subject, who thought that nature, reason, and virtue were the constituent principles of humanity, he would say, "Nay, nay, if man is by nature prompted to act virtuously, all the divine precepts of the Gospel, all its denunciations, all the laws enacted by man to restrain man from evil, had been needless."

Sympathy.—It is certain that he would scarcely allow any one to feel much for the distresses of others; or, whatever he thought they might feel, he was very apt to impute to causes that did no honour to human nature. Indeed, I thought him rather too fond of Rochefoucault maxims.

Evil Propensities.—The very strict watch he apparently kept over his mind seems to correspond with his thorough conviction of nature's evil propensities; and it might be as likely in consequence of his dread of those peculiar ones, whatever they were, which attended, or rather constituted, his mental malady, which, I have observed, might probably have incited him so often to pray; and I impute it to the same cause, that he so frequently, with great earnestness, desired his intimate acquaintance to pray for him, apparently on very slight occasions of corporeal disorder.

Dr. Dodd.—That Dr. Johnson should have desired one prayer from Dr. Dodd, who was himself such an atrocious offender, has been very much condemned; but we ought to consider that Dr. Johnson might, perhaps, have had sufficient reason to believe Dodd to be a sincere penitent, which, indeed, was the case; and, besides, his mind was so softened with pity and compassion for him, so impressed with the awful idea of his situation, the last evening of his life, that he probably did not think of his former transgressions, or thoughts, perhaps, that he ought not to remember them, when the offender was so soon to appear before the Supreme Judge of heaven and earth.

Dr. Johnson told me that Dodd, on reading his letter, (anté, p. 544.) gave it into the hands of his wife, with a strong injunction never to part with it; that he had slept during the night, and when he awoke in the morning, he did not immediately recollect that he was to suffer, and when he did, he expressed the utmost horror and agony of mind—outrageously vehement in his speech and in his looks—till he went into the chapel, and on his coming out of it his face expressed the most angelic peace and composure.

He also told me that Dodd probably entertained some hopes of life even to the last moment, having been flattered by some of his medical friends that there was a chance of suspending its total extinction till he was cut down, by placing the knot of the rope in a particular manner behind his ear. That then he was to be carried to a convenient place, where they would use their utmost endeavours to recover him. All this was done. The hangman observed their injunctions in fixing the rope, and as the cart drew off, said in Dodd's ear, you must not move an inch! But he struggled.—Being carried to the place appointed, his friends endeavoured to restore him by bathing his breast with warm water, which Dr. Johnson said was not so likely to have that effect as cold water; and on this occasion he repeated (with a slight variation) the story already told [anté, p. 550.], that a man wandered round the prison some days before his execution, with bank notes in his pocket to the amount of a thousand pounds, to bribe the jailer to let him escape.

Morbil Melancholy.—It was a gloomy axiom of his, that the pains and miseries of human life outweighed its happiness and good; but on a lady's asking him, whether he would not permit the ease and quiet of common life to be put into the scale of happiness and good, he seemed embarrassed (very unusual with him), and answering in the affirmative, rose from his seat, as if to avoid the inference and reply, which his answer authorized the lady to make.

But much may be said in Dr. Johnson's justification, supposing this notion should not meet with universal approbation.

<sup>1</sup> We see in this case, as in that of Miss Mulso, that Johnson's personal partialities induced him to quote in his Dictionary authors who had no business there; unless, indeed, these lines, which seem above Madden's usual rate, be Johnson's own. See anté, p. 107., the motive of his gratitude to Madden.—CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> This is a striking instance of the easy fabrication of what are called anecdotes, and of how little even the best authorities can be relied on in such matters. The real anecdote was of Doctor Major and Doctor Minor (see anté, p. 291.) by no means so happy as the fabrication; and the title of Doctor Major was applied to Johnson by old Lord Auchinleck (anté, p. 398.). From these two facts the pleasant talley quoted by Miss Reynolds was no doubt compounded.—CROKER.

tion, he having, it is probable, imbibed it in the early part of his life when under the pressure of adverse fortune, and in every period of it under the still heavier pressure and more adverse influence of Nature herself; for I have often heard him lament that he inherited from his father a morbid disposition both of body and of mind—an oppressive melancholy, which robbed him of the common enjoyments of life.<sup>1</sup>

Indeed, he seemed to struggle almost incessantly with some mental evil, and often, by the expression of his countenance and the motion of his lips, appeared to be offering up some ejaculation to Heaven to remove it. But in Lent, or near the approach of any great festival, he would generally retire from the company to a corner of the room, but most commonly behind a window-curtain, to pray, and with such energy, and in so loud a whisper, that every word was heard distinctly, particularly the Lord's Prayer and the Apostles' Creed, with which he constantly concluded his devotions. Sometimes some words would emphatically escape him in his usual tone of voice.

At these holy seasons he secluded himself more from society than at other times,—at least from general and mixed society; and on a gentleman's sending him an invitation to dinner on Easter eve, he was highly offended, and expressed himself so in his answer.

Probably his studious attention to the secret workings of his peculiar mental infirmity, together with his experience of divine assistance co-operating with his reasoning faculties to repel its force, may have proved in the highest degree conducive to the exaltation of his piety, and the pre-eminence of his wisdom. And I think it equally probable, that all his natural defects were conducive to that end; for being so peculiarly debarred from the enjoyment of those amusements which the eye and the ear afford, doubtless he sought more assiduously for those gratifications which scientific pursuits or philosophic meditation bestow.

Painting and Music.—These defects sufficiently account for his insensibility of the charms of music and of painting, being utterly incapable of receiving any delight from the one or the other, particularly from painting, his sight being more deficient than his hearing.

Of the superfluities of the fine arts, or visible objects of taste, he could have had but an imperfect idea; but as to the invisible principles of a natural good taste, doubtless he was possessed of these in the most eminent degree, and I should have thought it a strange inconsistency indeed in his character, had he really wanted a taste for music; but as a proof that he did not, I think I had need only mention, that he was remarkably fond of Dr. Burney's "History of Music,"<sup>2</sup> and that he said it showed that the author understood the philosophy of music better than any man that ever wrote on that subject.

It is certain, that when in the company of connoisseurs, whose conversation has turned chiefly upon the merits of the attractive charms of painting, perhaps of pictures that were immediately under their inspection, Dr. Johnson, I have thought, used to appear as if conscious of his unbecoming situation, or rather, I might say, suspicious that it was an unbecoming situation.

But it was observable, that he rather avoided the discovery of it, for when asked his opinion of the likeness of any portrait of a friend, he has generally evaded the question, and if obliged to examine it, he has held the picture most ridiculously, quite close to his eye, just as he held his book. But he was so unwilling to expose that defect, that he was much displeas'd with Sir Joshua, I remember, for drawing him with his book held in that manner, which, I believe, was the cause of that picture being left unfinished.<sup>3</sup>

Religion and Morality.—Good-breeding.—On every occasion that had the least tendency to depreciate religion or morality, he totally disregarded all forms or rules of good-breeding, as utterly unworthy of the slightest consideration. But it must be confessed, that he sometimes suffered this noble principle to transgress its due bounds, and to extend even to those who were anywise connected with the person who had offended him.

Wilkes.—Johnson's dislike of Mr. Wilkes was so great that it extended even to his connections. He happened to dine one day at Sir Joshua Reynolds's with a large and distinguished company, amongst which were Mr. Wilkes's brother, Israel, and his lady. In the course of conversation, Mr. Israel Wilkes was about to make some remark, when Johnson suddenly stopped him with, "I hope, sir, what you are going to say may be better worth hearing than what you have already said." This rudeness shocked and spread a gloom over the whole party, particularly as Mr. Israel Wilkes was a gentleman of a very amiable character and of refined taste, and, what Dr. Johnson little suspected, a very loyal subject. Johnson afterwards owned to Miss Reynolds that he was very sorry that he had "snebbed Wilkes, as his wife was present." Miss Reynolds replied that he should be sorry for many reasons. "No," said Johnson, who was very reluctant to apologize for offences of this nature: "no, I only regret it because his wife was by." Miss Reynolds believed that he had no kind of motive for this incivility to Mr. I. Wilkes but disgust at his brother's political principles.

Republicans.—His treatment of Israel Wilkes was mild in comparison of what a gentleman (Mr. Elliott) met with from him one day at Sir Joshua Reynolds's, a barrister at law and a man of fashion, who, on discoursing with Dr. (then Mr.) Johnson on the laws and government of different nations (I remember particularly those of Venice), and happening to speak of them in terms of high approbation: "Yes, Sir," says Johnson, "all republican rascals think as you do." How the conversation ended I have forgot, it was so many years ago; but that he made no apology to the gentleman I am very sure, nor to any person present, for such an outrage against society.

Influence of Age.—Of later years he grew much more companionable, and I have heard him say, that he knew himself to be so. "In my younger days," he would say, "it is true I was much inclined to treat mankind with asperity and contempt; but I found it answered no good end. I thought it wiser and better to take the world as it goes. Besides, as I have advanced in life I have had more reason to be satisfied with it. Mankind have treated me with more kindness, and of course I have more kindness for them."

Poverty.—In the latter part of his life, indeed, his circumstances were very different from what they were in the beginning. Before he had the pension, he literally dressed like a beggar; and from what I have been told, he as literally lived as such; at least as to common conveniences in his apartments, wanting even a chair to sit on, particularly in his study, where a gentleman who frequently visited him whilst writing his "Idlers" constantly found him at his desk, sitting on one with three legs; and on rising from it, he remarked that Dr. Johnson never forgot its defect, but would either hold it in his hand or place it with great composure against some support, taking no notice of its imperfection to his visitor. Whether the visitor sat on a chair, or on a pile of folios, or how he sat, I never remember to have been told.

Pride or Politeness.—It was remarkable in Dr. Johnson, that no external circumstances ever prompted him to make any apology, or to seem even sensible of their existence. Whether this was the effect of philosophic pride, or of some partial notion of his respecting high breeding, is doubtful. Strange as it may appear, he scrupled not to boast, that "no man knew the rules of true politeness better than himself;" and, stranger still, "that no man more attentively practised them."

Ceremony to Ladies.—He particularly piqued himself upon his nice observance of ceremonious punctilios towards ladies. A remarkable instance of this was his never suffering any lady to walk from his house to her carriage, through Bolt Court, unattended by himself to hand her in or to (at least I have reason to suppose it to be his general custom, from his constant performance of it to those with whom he was the most intimately acquainted), p. 468.; and if any obstacle prevented it from driving off, there he would stand by the door of it, and gather a mob around him; indeed, they would begin to gather the moment he appeared handing the lady down the steps into Fleet-street. But to describe his appearance—his important air—that indeed cannot be described; and his morning habiliments would excite the utmost astonishment in my reader, that a man in his senses could think of stepping outside his door in them, or even to be seen at home. Sometimes he exhibited himself at the distance of eight or ten doors from Bolt Court, to get at the carriage, to the no small diversion of the populace. And I am certain that to those who love laughing, a description of his dress from head to foot would be highly acceptable, and in general I believe he thought the most curious part of my book; but I forbear, out of respect to his memory, to give more than this slight intimation of it; for, having written a minute description of his figure, from his wig to his slippers, a thought occurred that it might probably excite some person to delineate it, and I might have the mortification to see it hung up at a printshop as the greatest curiosity ever exhibited.

Johnson's Dress.—His best dress was, in his early times, so very mean, that one afternoon as he was following some ladies up stairs, on a visit to a lady of fashion [Miss Cotterel, p. 79.] the servant, not knowing him, suddenly seized him by the shoulder, and exclaimed, "Where are you going?" striving at the same time to drag him back; but Sir Joshua <sup>1</sup> This last paragraph was originally written, "terrifying melancholy, which he was sometimes apprehensive bordered on insanity." This Miss Reynolds softened into the remark as it stands above; but he himself did not scruple to call it something like madness. (anté, p. 336.)—CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> Miss Reynolds will hardly convince any one that Dr. Johnson was fond of music by proving that he was fond of his friend Dr. Burney's "History of Music." The truth is, he held both painting and music in great contempt, because probably his organs afforded him no adequate perception of either.—CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> This, however, or a similar picture, was finished and engraved as the frontispiece of Murphy's edition of Dr. Johnson's works.—CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> Miss Hawkins, in her memoirs, tells us that his appearance was much improved after the pension.—CROKER.

(then Mr.) Reynolds, who was a few steps behind, prevented her from doing or saying more, and Mr. Johnson growled all the way up stairs, as well he might. He seemed much chagrined and discomposed. Unluckily, whilst in this humour, a lady of high rank<sup>1</sup> happening to call upon Miss Cotterel, he was most violently offended with her for not introducing him to her ladyship, and still more so for her seeming to show more attention to her than to him. After sitting some time silent, meditating how to dawn Miss Cotterel, he addressed himself to Mr. Reynolds, who sat next him; and, after a few introductory words, with a loud voice said, "I wonder which of us two could get most money at his trade in one week, were we to work hard at it from morning till night." "I don't remember the answer; but I know that the lady, rising soon after, went away without knowing what trade they were of. She might probably suspect Mr. Johnson to be a poor author by his dress; and because the trade of neither a blacksmith, a porter, or a chairman, which she probably would have taken him for in the street, was not quite so suitable to the place she saw him in. This incident he used to mention with great glee—how he had dawned Miss Cotterel, though at the same time he professed a great friendship and esteem for that lady.

Dr. Barnard.—"Forty-five."—It is certain, for such kind of mortifications, he never expressed any concern; but on other occasions he has shown an amiable sorrow<sup>2</sup> for the offence he has given, particularly if it seemed to involve the slightest disrespect to the church or to its ministers.

I shall never forget with what regret he spoke of the rude reply he made to Dr. Barnard, on his saying that men never improved after the age of forty-five. "That's not true, Sir," said Johnson. "You, who perhaps are forty-eight, may still improve if you will try; I wish you would set about it; and I am afraid," he added, "there is great room for it;" and this was said in rather a large party of ladies and gentlemen at dinner. Soon after the ladies withdrew from the table, Dr. Johnson followed them, and sitting down by the lady of the house, he said, "I am very sorry for having spoken so rudely to the dean." "You very well may, Sir," "Yes," he said, "it was highly improper to speak in that style to a minister of the Gospel, and I am the more hurt on reflecting with what mild dignity he received it." When the Dean came up into the drawing-room, Dr. Johnson immediately rose from his seat, and made him sit on the sofa by him, and with such a beseeching look for pardon and with such fond gestures—literally smoothing down his arms and his knees—tokens of penitence, which were so graciously received by the Dean as to make Dr. Johnson very happy, and not a little added to the esteem and respect he had previously entertained for his character.

The next morning the Dean called on Sir Joshua Reynolds with the following verses:—

"I lately thought no man alive
Could e'er improve past forty-five,
And ventured to assert it.
The observation was not new,
But seem'd to me so just and true
That none could controvert it.

"No, Sir," says Johnson, "'tis not so;
'Tis your mistake, and I can show
An instance if you doubt it.
You, who perhaps are forty-eight,
May still improve,—"tis not too late:—
I wish you'd set about it."

"Encouraged thus to mend my faults,
I turn'd his counsel in my thoughts
Which way I could apply it;
Genius I knew was past my reach,
For who can learn what none can teach?
And wit—I could not buy it.

"Then come, my friends, and try your skill;
You may improve me if you will,
(My books are at a distance);
With you I'll live and learn, and then
Instead of books I shall read men;
So lend me your assistance.

"Dear knight of Plympton<sup>3</sup>, teach me how
To suffer, with unclouded brow,
And smile serene as thine,
The jest uncount and truth severe;
Like thee to turn my dearest ear,
And calmly drink my wine.

<sup>1</sup> Lady Fitzroy.—MISS REYNOLDS.—See anté, p. 79, where this story is told of the Duchess of Argyll and another lady of high rank; that other lady was no doubt the person erroneously designated by Miss Reynolds as Lady Fitzroy. She probably was Elizabeth Crosby, wife of Lord Augustus Fitzroy, and grandmother of the present Duke of Grafton.—CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> He repented just as certainly, however, if he had been led to praise any person or thing by accident more than he

"Thou say'st not only skill is gain'd,
But genius, too, may be attain'd,
By studious invitation;
Thy temper mild, thy genius fine,
I'd study till I make them mine,
By constant meditation.

"Thy art of pleasing teach me, Garrick,
Thou who reverest odes Pindaric;
A second time read o'er;
Oh! how could I read thee backwards too,
Past thirty years thou should'st review,
And charm us thirty more.

"If I have thoughts and can't express 'em,
Gibbon shall teach me how to dress 'em
In terms select and terse;
Jones teach me modesty and Greek;
Smith, how to think; Burke, how to speak;
And Beauclerk to converse.

"Let Johnson teach me how to place
In fairest light each borrow'd grace;
From him I'll learn to write:
Copy his free and easy style,
And from the roughness of his file
Grow, like himself, polite."

It is with much regret that I reflect on my stupid negligence to write down some of his discourses, his observations, precepts, &c. The following few short sentences only did I ever take any account of in writing; and these, (which I lately found in an old memorandum pocket-book, of ancient date,) were made soon after the commencement of my acquaintance with him. A few others, indeed, relating to the character of the French (anté, p. 467, &c.), were taken in a voice, the day after his arrival from France, November 11, 1775, intending them for the subject of a letter to a friend in the country.

Laughter.—A gentleman said, "I think when a person laughs alone, he supposes himself for the moment with company." JOHNSON. "Yes, if it be true that laughter is a comparison of self-superiority, you must suppose some person with you."

Scepticism.—Talking on the subject of scepticism, he said, "The eyes of the mind are like the eyes of the body; they can see only at such a distance; but because we cannot see beyond this point, is there nothing beyond it?"

Want of Memory.—Talking of the want of memory, he said, "No, Sir, it is not true; in general every person has an equal capacity for remembrance, and for one thing as well as another, otherwise it would be like a person complaining that he could hold silver in his hand, but could not hold copper."

Genius.—"No, Sir," he once said, "people are not born with a particular genius for particular employments or studies, for it would be like saying that a man could see a great way east, but could not west. It is good sense applied with diligence to what was at first a mere accident, and which, by great application, grew to be called, by the generality of mankind, a particular genius."

Imagination.—Some persons advanced, that a lively imagination disqualified the mind from fixing steadily upon objects which required serious and minute investigation. JOHNSON. "It is true, Sir, a vivacious quick imagination does sometimes give a confused idea of things, and which do not fix deep, though, at the same time, he has a capacity to fix them in his memory, if he would endeavour at it. It being like a man that, when he is running does not make observations on what he meets with, and consequently is not impressed by them; but he has, nevertheless, the power of stopping and informing himself."

Conscience and Shame.—A gentleman was mentioning it as a remark of an acquaintance of his, "that he never knew but one person that was completely wicked." JOHNSON. "Sir, I don't know what you mean by a person completely wicked." GENTLEMAN. "Why, any one that has entirely got rid of all shame." JOHNSON. "How is he, then, completely wicked? He must get rid, too, of all conscience." GENTLEMAN. "I think conscience and shame the same thing." JOHNSON. "I am surpris'd to hear you say so; they spring from two different sources, and are distinct perceptions; one respects this world, the other the next." A LADY. "I think, however, that a person who has got rid of shame is in a fair way to get rid of conscience." JOHNSON. "Yes, 'tis a part of the way, I grant; but there are degrees at which men stop, some thought it deserved; and was on such occasions comically earnest to destroy the praise or pleasure he had unintentionally given."—Piozzi.—CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> Sir Joshua Reynolds was born at Plympton in Devon.—CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> A humorous attempt of Garrick's to read one of Cumberland's odes backwards.—DR. BARNARD.

<sup>5</sup> See anté, p. 680, about dining out in Passion Week.—CROKER.

for the fear of men, some for the fear of God: shame arises from the fear of men, conscience from the fear of God."

Characters.—Dr. Johnson seemed to delight in drawing characters; and, when he did so con amore, delighted every one that heard him. Indeed, I cannot say I ever heard him draw any con odio, though he professed himself to be, or at least to love, a good hater (anté, p. 78.). But I have remarked that his dislike of any seldom prompted him to say much more than that the fellow is a blockhead, a poor creature, or some such epithet.

Bennet Langton.—I shall never forget the exalted character he drew of his friend Mr. Langton, nor with what energy, what fond delight, he expatiated in his praise, giving him every excellence that nature could bestow, and every perfection that humanity could acquire. A literary lady was present, Miss Hannah More, who perhaps inspired him with an unusual ardour to shine, which indeed he did with redoubled lustre, deserving himself the praises he bestowed: not but I have often heard him speak in terms equally high of Mr. Langton, though more concisely expressed.

Mrs. Thrale.—On the praises of Mrs. Thrale he used to dwell with a peculiar delight, a paternal fondness, expressive of conscious exultation in being so intimately acquainted with her. One day, in speaking of her to Mr. Harris, author of "Hermes," and expatiating on her various perfections,—the solidity of her virtues, the brilliancy of her wit, and the strength of her understanding, &c.—he quoted some lines (a stanza, I believe, but from what author I know not), with which he concluded his most eloquent eulogium, and of these I retained but the two last lines<sup>1</sup>:—

"Virtues—of such a generous kind,
Good in the last recesses of the mind."

Mrs. Montagu.—This brings to my remembrance the unparalleled eulogium which the late Lord Bath made on Mrs. Montagu, (a lady he was intimately acquainted with,) in speaking of her to Sir Joshua Reynolds. His lordship said, that "he did not believe that there ever was a more perfect human being created, or ever would be created, than Mrs. Montagu." I gave the very words I heard from Sir Joshua's mouth; from whom also I heard that he repeated them to Mr. Burke, observing that Lord Bath could not have said more, and "I do not think that he said too much," was Mr. Burke's reply. I have also heard Dr. Johnson speak of this lady in terms of high admiration. "Sir," he would say, "that lady exerts more mind in conversation than any person I ever met with: Sir, she displays such powers of ratiocination—such radiations of intellectual excellence as are amazing!" (p. 509.)

Johnson's Benevolence.—It will doubtless appear highly paradoxical to the generality of the world to say, that few men, in his ordinary disposition or common frame of mind, could be more inoffensive than Dr. Johnson; yet surely those who knew his uniform benevolence, and its actuating principles—steady virtue, and true holiness—will readily agree with me, that peace and good-will towards man were the natural emanations of his heart.

I shall never forget the impression I felt in Dr. Johnson's favour, the first time I was in his company, on his saying, that as he returned to his lodgings, at one or two o'clock in the morning, he often saw poor children asleep on thresholds and stalls, and that he used to put pennies into their hands to buy them a breakfast.<sup>2</sup>

His Tenderness.—When travelling with a lady in Devonshire, in a post-chaise, near the churchyard of Wear, near Torrington, in which she saw the verdant monument of maternal affection described in the "Melancholy Tale," and heard the particular circumstances relating to the subject of it, and as she was relating them to Dr. Johnson, she heard him heave heavy sighs and sobs, and turning round she saw his dear face bathed in tears. A circumstance he had probably forgotten when he wrote at the end of the manuscript poem with his correcting pen in red ink, "I know not when I have been so much affected."<sup>3</sup>

Serious and Scripture.—He always carried a religious treatise in his pocket on a Sunday, and he used to encourage me to relate to him the particular parts of Scripture I did not understand, and to write them down as they occurred to me in reading the Bible.

Johnson's Recitation.—When repeating to me one day Grainger's "Ode on Solitude," (anté, p. 561.) I shall never forget the concordance of the sound of his voice with the grandeur of those images; nor, indeed, the gothic dignity of his aspect, his look and manner, when repeating sublime passages. But what was very remarkable, though his cadence in reading poetry was so judiciously emphatical as to give <sup>1</sup> Being so particularly engaged as not to be able to attend to them sufficiently.—MISS REYNOLDS.

<sup>2</sup> And this at a time when he himself was living on pennies.—CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> Miss Reynolds herself; and the Melancholy Tale, was probably a poem which she had written on this event, whatever it was. See anté, p. 649.—CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> See anté, p. 485, Boswell's version of this story. It does additional force to the words uttered, yet in reading prose, particularly on common or familiar subjects, narrations, essays, letters, &c., nothing could be more injudicious than his manner, beginning every period with a pompous accent, and reading it with a whine, or with a kind of spasmodic struggle for utterance; and this, not from any natural infirmity, but from a strange singularity, in reading on, in one breath, as if he had made a resolution not to respire till he had closed the sentence.

Grainger's Sugar-cane.—"Johnson's reply to Dr. Grainger, who was reading his MS. poem of the Sugar-cane to him, will probably be thought more excusable than his rudeness to Dr. Percy. When he came to the line 'Say, shall I sing of rats?' 'No!' cried Dr. Johnson, with great vehemency. This he related to me himself; laughing heartily at the conceit of Dr. Grainger's refractory muse. Where it happened I do not know; but I am certain, very certain, that it was not, as Mr. Boswell asserts, at Sir Joshua's; for they (Sir Joshua and Dr. Grainger) were not, I believe, personally known to each other."<sup>4</sup>

Gesticulations.—I believe no one has described his extraordinary gestures or antics<sup>5</sup> with his hands and feet, particularly when passing over the threshold of a door, or rather before he would venture to pass through any doorway. On entering Sir Joshua's house with poor Mrs. Williams, a blind lady who lived with him, he would quit her hand, or else whirl her about on the steps as he whirled and twisted about to perform his gesticulations; and as soon as he had finished, he would give a sudden spring, and make such an extraordinary stride over the threshold, as if he was trying for a wager how far he could stride. Mrs. Williams standing groping about outside the door, unless the servant took hold of her hand to conduct her in, leaving Dr. Johnson to perform at the parlour door much the same exercise over again.

But it was not only at the entrance of a door that he exhibited such strange manoeuvres, but across a room or in the street with company he has stopped on a sudden, as if he had recollected his task, and began to perform it there, gathering a mob round him; and when he had finished would hasten to his companion (who probably had walked on before) with an air of great satisfaction that he had done his duty. (Anté, pp. 166, 439.)

Activity.—Dr. Johnson was very ambitious of excelling in common acquirements, as well as the uncommon, and particularly in feats of activity. One day, as he was walking in Gunbury Park (or Paddock) with some gentlemen and ladies, who were admiring the extraordinary size of some of the trees, one of the gentlemen remarked that, when he was a boy, he made nothing of climbing (stearming, I think, was the phrase) the largest there. "Why, I can stearn it now," replied Dr. Johnson, which excited a hearty laugh—(he was then between fifty and sixty); on which he ran to the tree, clung round the trunk, and ascended to the branches, and, I believe, would have gone in amongst them, had he not been very earnestly entreated to descend; and down he came with a triumphant air, seeming to make nothing of it.

At another time, at a gentleman's seat in Devonshire, as he and some company were sitting in a saloon, before which was a spacious lawn, it was remarked as a very proper place for running a race. A young lady present boasted that she could outrun any person; on which Dr. Johnson rose up and said, "Madam, you cannot outrun me;" and, going out on the lawn, they started. The lady at first had the advantage; but Dr. Johnson happening to have slippers on much too small for his feet, kicked them off up into the air, and ran a great length without them, leaving the lady far behind him, and, having won the victory, he returned, leading her by the hand, with looks of high exultation and delight.<sup>6</sup>

One Sunday morning, as I was walking with him in Twickenham meadows, he began his antics both with his feet and hands; with the latter as if he was holding the reins of a horse like a jockey on full speed. But to describe the strange positions of his feet is a difficult task; sometimes he would make the back part of his heels to touch, sometimes his toes, as if he was aiming at making the form of a triangle, at least the two sides of one. Though indeed, whether these were his gestures on this particular occasion in Twickenham meadows I do not recollect, it is so long since; but I will remember that they were so extraordinary that men, women, and children gathered round him, laughing. At last we sat down on some logs of wood by the river side, and they nearly dispersed; when he pulled out of his pocket, Grotius's "De Veritate Religione," over which he seasawed at such a violent rate as to excite the curiosity of some people at a distance to come and see what was the matter with him.

Hawkins and Hawkesworth.—As we were returning from not appear what the rudeness was which made Dr. "Percy angry," (anté, p. 486. n. 1.), but it seems to have been something on the same subject.—CROKER, 1831. 47.

<sup>5</sup> See anté, pp. 42, 166, 269, 439.—C.

<sup>6</sup> This exhibition occurred during his visit to Devonshire in 1762, at the house of the lady to whom he made the avowal mentioned anté, p. 128.—CROKER.

the meadows that day, I remember we met Sir John Hawkins, whom Dr. Johnson seemed much rejoiced to see; and no wonder, for I have often heard him speak of Sir John in terms expressive of great esteem and much cordiality of friendship. On his asking Dr. Johnson when he had seen Dr. Hawkesworth, he roared out with great vehemence, "Hawkesworth is grown a coxcomb, and I have done with him."

Nice Observation.—We drank tea that afternoon at Sir John Hawkins's, and on our return I was surprised to hear Dr. Johnson's minute criticism on Lady Hawkins's dress, with almost every part of which he found fault. It was amazing, so short-sighted as he was, how very observant he was of appearances in dress and behaviour, nay, even of the department of servants while waiting at table. One day, as his man Frank was attending at Sir Joshua Reynolds's table, he observed, with some emotion, that he had placed the salver under his arm. Nor would the conduct of the company, — blind as he was to his own many and strange peculiarities, — escape his animadversion on some occasions. He thought the use of water-glasses a strange perversion of the idea of refinement, and had a great dislike to the use of a pocket-handkerchief at meals, when, if he happened to have occasion for one, he would rise from his chair and go to some distance, with his back to the company, and perform the operation as silently as possible.

Carriage.—Johnson at Table.—Few people, I have heard him say, understood the art of carving better than himself; but that it would be highly indecorous in him to attempt it in company, being so near-sighted, that it required a suspension of his breath during the operation.

It must be owned, indeed, that it was to be regretted that he did not practise a little of that delicacy in eating, for he appeared to want breath more at that time than usual. It is certain that he did not appear to the best advantage at the hour of repast; but of this he was perfectly unconscious, — owing probably to his being totally ignorant of the characteristic expressions of the human countenance, and therefore he could have no conception that his own expressed, when most pleased, any thing displeasing to others; for though, when particularly directing his attention towards any object to spy out defects or perfections, he generally succeeded better than most men; partly perhaps, from a desire to excite admiration of his perspicacity, of which he was not a little ambitious — yet I have heard him say, and I have often perceived, that he could not distinguish any man's face half a yard distant from him, not even his most intimate acquaintance.

Manners.—Defect of Sight and Hearing.—That Dr. Johnson possessed the essential principles of politeness and of good taste (which I suppose are the same, at least concomitant), none who knew his virtues and his genius will, I imagine, be disposed to dispute. But why they remained with him, like gold in the ore, unfashioned and unsewn, except in his literary capacity, no one that I know of has made any inquiry, though in general it has been spoken of as an unaccountable inconsistency in his character. Much, too, may be said in excuse for an apparent asperity of manners which was, at times at least, the natural effect of those inherent mental infirmities to which he was subject. His corporeal defects also contributed largely to the singularity of his manners; and a little reflection on the disqualifying influence of blindness and deafness would suggest many apologies for Dr. Johnson's want of politeness.

The particular instance I have just mentioned, of his inability to discriminate the features of any one's face, deserves perhaps more than any other to be taken into consideration, wanting, as he did, the aid of those intelligent signs, or insinuations, which the countenance displays in social converse; and which, in their slightest degree, influence and regulate the manners of the polite, or even the common observer. And to his defective hearing, perhaps, his unaccommodating manners may be equally ascribed, which not only precluded him from the perception of the expressive tones of the voice of others, but from hearing the boisterous sound of his own: and nothing, I believe, more conduced to fix upon his character the general stigma of ill-breeding, than his loud impetuous tone of voice, which apparently heightened the slightest dissent to a tone of harsh reproof; and, with his corresponding aspect, had an intimidating influence on those who were not much acquainted with him, and excited a degree of resentment which his words in ordinary circumstances would not have provoked. I have often heard him on such occasions express great surprise, that what he had said could have given any offence.

Blunders.—Under such disadvantages, it was not much to be wondered at that Dr. Johnson should have committed many blunders and absurdities, and excited surprise and resentment in company; one in particular I remember. Being in company with Mr. Garrick and some others, who were unknown to Dr. Johnson, he was saying something tending to the disparagement of the character or of the works of a gentleman present — I have forgot who; on which Mr. Garrick touched his foot under the table; but he still went on, and Garrick, much alarmed, touched him a second time, and, I believe, the third; at last Johnson exclaimed, "David, David, is it you? What makes you tread on my toes so?" This little anecdote, perhaps, indicates as much the want of prudence in Dr. Johnson as the want of sight. But had he at first seen Garrick's expressive countenance, and (probably) the embarrassment of the rest of the company on the occasion, it doubtless would not have happened.

It were also much to be wished, in justice to Dr. Johnson's character for good manners, that many joocular and ironical speeches which have been reported had been put as such, for the information of those who were unacquainted with him.

General Character.—Though it cannot be said that he was "in manners gentle," yet it justly can that he was "in affections mild," benevolent, and compassionate; and to this combination of character may, I believe, be ascribed, in a great measure, his extraordinary celebrity; his being beheld as a phenomenon or wonder of the age.

And yet Dr. Johnson's character, singular as it certainly was from the contrast of his mental endowments with the roughness of his manners, was, I believe, perfectly natural and consistent throughout; and to those who were intimately acquainted with him must, I imagine, have appeared so. For being totally devoid of all deceit, free from every tinge of affectation or ostentation and unwearied by any vice, his singularities, those strong lights and shades that so peculiarly distinguish his character, may the more easily be traced to their primary and natural causes.

The more luminous parts of his character, — his soft affections, and I should suppose his strong intellectual powers, at least the digilized charm or radiance of them, — must be allowed to owe their origin to his strict, his rigid, principles of religion and virtue; and the shadowy parts of his character, his rough, unaccommodating manners, were in general to be ascribed to those corporeal defects that I have already observed naturally tended to darken his perceptions of what may be called "propriety" and "impropriety" in general conversation; and of course in the ceremonious or artificial sphere of society gave his deportment so contrasting an aspect to the apparent softness and general uniformity of cultivated manners.

And perhaps the joint influence of these two primeval causes, his intellectual excellence and his corporeal defects, mutually contributed to give his manners a greater degree of harshness than they would have had if only under the influence of one of them — the imperfect perceptions of the one not unfrequently producing misconceptions in the other.

Besides these, many other equally natural causes concurred to constitute the singularity of Dr. Johnson's character. Doubtless, the progress of his education had a double tendency to brighten and to obscure it. But I must observe, that this obscurity (implying only his awkward uncouth appearance, his ignorance of the rules of politeness, &c.) would have gradually disappeared at a more advanced period, at least could have had no manner of influence to the prejudice of Dr. Johnson's character, had it not been associated with those corporeal defects above mentioned. But, unhappily, his untaught, uncivilised manner seemed to render every little indecorum or impropriety that he committed doubly indecorous and improper.

§ 2. BY MR. WICKINS'S

Deception.—Walking one day with him in my garden at Lichfield, we entered a small meandering shrubbery, whose "vista lengthened to the sight," gave promise of a larger extent. I observed, that he might perhaps conceive that he was entering an extensive labyrinth, but that it would prove a deception, though I hoped not an unpardonable one. "Sir," said he, "don't tell me of deception; a lie, Sir, is a lie, whether it be a lie to the eye or a lie to the ear."

Urns.—Passing on we came to an urn which I had erected to the memory of a deceased friend. I asked him how he liked that urn — it was of the true Tuscan order. "Sir," said he, "I hate urns; they are nothing, they mean nothing, convey no ideas but ideas of horror — would they were beaten to pieces to pave our streets!"

Cold Baths.—We then came to a cold bath. I expatiated upon its salubrity. "Sir," said he, "how do you do?" "Very well, I thank you, Doctor." "Then, Sir, let well alone, and be content. I hate immersion." Truly, as Fal-

<sup>1</sup> This notorious blindness and equally notorious "perspicacity," is an enigma very difficult to solve — particularly as Johnson never helped his defective vision with glasses. — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>2</sup> Dr. Harwood informs me that Mr. Wickins was a respectable draper in Lichfield. It is very true that Dr. Johnson was accustomed to call on him during his visits to his native town. The garden attached to his house was ornamented in the manner he describes, and his anecdotes, though of little interest, are no doubt authentic. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> See a similar sentiment on the occasion of Mr. Myddleton's urn to himself, ante, p. 423. — CROKER.

staff says, the Doctor "would have a sort of alacrity at sinking."<sup>1</sup>

The Venus de' Medicis.—Upon the margin stood [a cast of] the Venus de' Medicis—

"So stands the statue that enchants the world."

"Throw her," said he, "into the pond to hide her nakedness, and to cool her lasciviousness."

Sylvan Ideas.—He then, with some difficulty, squeezed himself into a root-house, when his eye caught the following lines from Parnell:—

"Go search among your idle dreams,
Your busy, or your vain extremes,
And find a life of equal bliss,
Or own the next began in this."

The Doctor, however, not possessing any sylvan ideas, seemed not to admit that heaven could be an Arcadia.

Some Good every Day.—I then observed him with Herculean strength tugging at a nail which he was endeavouring to extract from the bark of a plum tree; and having accomplished it, he exclaimed, "There, Sir, I have done some good to-day; the tree might have festered. I make a rule, Sir, to do some good every day of my life."

Sterne's Sermons.—Returning through the house, he stepped into a small study or book room. The first book he laid his hands upon was Harwood's<sup>2</sup> "Liberal Translation of the New Testament." The passage which first caught his eye was from that sublime apostrophe in St. John, upon the raising of Lazarus, "and Jesus, the Saviour of the world, burst into a flood of tears." He contemptuously threw the book aside, exclaiming, "Puppy!" I then showed him Sterne's Sermons. "Sir," said he, "do you ever read any others?" "Yes, Doctor; I read Sherlock, Tillotson, Beveridge, and others." "Ay, Sir, there you drink the cup of salvation to the bottom; here you have merely the froth from the surface."

Shakspeare's Mulberry Vase. Garrick.—Within this room stood the Shakspearean mulberry vase, on a pedestal, given by me to Mr Garrick, and which was recently sold, with Mr Garrick's gems, at Mrs. Garrick's sale at Hampton. The Doctor read the inscription:—

"SACRED TO SHAKSPEARE,
And in honour of
DAVID GARRICK, ESQ.
The Ornament—the Reformer
Of the British Stage."<sup>3</sup>

"Ay, Sir; Davy, Davy loves flattery; but here, indeed, you have flattered him as he deserves, paying a just tribute to his merit."

§ 3. BY MR. GREEN, OF LICHFIELD.

Dr. Kippis. Royal Society.—Dr. Brooklesby, a few days before the death of Dr. Johnson, found on the table Dr. Kippis's account of the Disputes of the Royal Society. Dr. Johnson inquired of his physician if he had read it, who answered in the negative. "You have sustained no loss, Sir. It is poor stuff, indeed, a sad unscholar-like performance. I could not have believed that that man would have written so ill."

Dr. Warren.—When some of Johnson's friends desired to call in Dr. Warren, he said, they might call in any body they pleased; and Warren was called. At his going away, "You have come in," said Dr. Johnson, "at the eleventh hour; but you shall be paid the same with your fellow-labourers. Francis, put into Dr. Warren's coach a copy of the 'English Poets.'" (anté, p. 800.)—C.

Fear of Death.—Some years before, some person in a company at Salisbury, of which Dr. Johnson was one, vouched for the company, that there was nobody in it afraid of death.—"Speak for yourself, Sir," said Johnson, "for indeed I am." "I did not say of dying," replied the other; "but of death, meaning its consequences." "And so I mean," rejoined the Doctor; "I am very seriously afraid of the consequences."

§ 4. BY THE REV. MR. PARKER.<sup>5</sup>

Stow Hill.—Dr. Johnson's friendship for Mrs. Elizabeth Aston commenced at the palace in Lichfield, the residence

<sup>1</sup> A mistake—he was a good swimmer. See anté, p. 524.
<sup>2</sup> CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> The reader must bear in mind that this Doctor Edward Harwood, anté, p. 506., is not to be confounded with Dr. Thomas Harwood, the historian of Lichfield.—CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> This vase was in the collection of Thomas Hill, Esq., of the Adelphi.—WRIGHT.

<sup>5</sup> See anté, p. 490.—C.

of Mr. Walmesley; with Mrs. Gastrel he became acquainted in London, at the house of her brother-in-law, Mr. Hervey. During the Doctor's annual visits to his daughter-in-law, Lucy Porter, he spent much of his time at Stow Hill, where Mrs. Gastrel and Mrs. Elizabeth Aston resided. They were the daughters of Sir Thomas Aston, of Aston Hall in Cheshire, of whom it is said, that being applied to for some account of his family, to illustrate the history of Cheshire, he replied, that "the title and estate had descended from father to son for thirty generations, and that he believed they were neither much richer nor much poorer than they were at first."

Dr. Hunter. Miss Seward.—He used to say of Dr. Hunter, [p. 7.] master of the free grammar school, Lichfield, that he never taught a boy in his life—he whipped and they learned. Hunter was a pompous man, and never entered the school without his gown and cassock, and his wig full dressed. He had a remarkably stern look, and Dr. Johnson said, he could tremble at the sight of Miss Seward, she was so like her grandfather.

Lives of the Poets.—Mrs. Gastrel was on a visit at Mr. Hervey's, in London, at the time that Johnson was writing the Rambler; the printer's boy would often come after him to their house, and wait while he wrote off a paper for the press in a room full of company. A great portion of the Lives of the Poets was written at Stow Hill: he had a table by one of the windows, which was frequently surrounded by five or six ladies engaged in work or conversation. Mrs. Gastrel had a very valuable edition of Bailey's Dictionary, to which he often referred. She told him that Miss Seward said that he had made poetry of no value by his criticism. "Why, my dear lady," replied he, "if silver is dirty, it is not the less valuable for a good scouring."

Climbing.—A large party had one day been invited to meet the Doctor at Stow Hill: the dinner waited far beyond the usual hour, and the company were about to sit down, when Johnson appeared at the great gate; he stood for some time in deep contemplation, and at length began to climb it, and, having succeeded in clearing it, advanced with hasty strides towards the house. On his arrival Mrs. Gastrel asked him, "if he had forgotten that there was a small gate for foot passengers by the side of the carriage entrance." "No, my dear lady, by no means," replied the Doctor; "but I had a mind to try whether I could climb a gate now as I used to do when I was a lad."

Cato's Soliloquy.—One day Mrs. Gastrel set a little girl to repeat to him Cato's soliloquy, which she went through very correctly. The Doctor, after a pause, asked the child, "What was to bring Cato to an end?" She said, it was a knife. "No, my dear, it was not so." "My aunt Polly said it was a dagger, my dear." He then asked her the meaning of "bane and antidote," which she was unable to give. Mrs. Gastrel said, "You cannot expect so young a child to know the meaning of such words." He then said, "My dear, how many pence are there in sixpence?" "I cannot tell, Sir," was the half-terrified reply. On this, addressing himself to Mrs. Gastrel, he said, "Now, my dear lady, can any thing be more ridiculous than to teach a child Cato's soliloquy, who does not know how many pence there are in sixpence?"

Charity.—The ladies at Stow Hill would occasionally rebuke Dr. Johnson for the indiscriminate exercise of his charity to all who applied for it. "There was that woman," said one of them, "to whom you yesterday gave half-a-crown, why she was at church to-day in long sleeves and ribbands." "Well, my dear," replied Johnson, "and if it gave the woman pleasure, why should she not wear them?"

Gilbert Walmesley.—He had long promised to write Mr. Walmesley's epitaph, and Mrs. W. waited for it, in order to erect a monument to her husband's memory: procrastination, however, one of the Doctor's few failings, prevented its being finished; he was engaged upon it in his last illness, and when the physicians, at his own request, informed him of his danger, he pushed the papers from before him, saying, "It was too late to write the epitaph of another, when he should so soon want one himself."<sup>6</sup>

§ 5. BY MRS. ROSE.<sup>7</sup>

The Dockers.—Dr. Mudge used to relate, as a proof of Dr. Johnson's quick discernment into character:—When he was on a visit to Dr. Mudge at Plymouth, the inhabitants of the Dock (now Devonport) were very desirous of their town being supplied with water, to effect which it was necessary to obtain the consent of the Corporation of Plymouth;

<sup>5</sup> The following anecdotes are told by Mr. Parker, from the relation of Mrs. Aston and her sister.—CROKER.

<sup>6</sup> There must be some mistake here.—Walmesley died in 1751. Surely they were not 33 years waiting for an epitaph.—CROKER, 1847.

<sup>7</sup> Mrs. Rose, who has obligingly communicated these anecdotes, is the daughter of Dr. Farr, of Plymouth, and the daughter-in-law of Dr. Johnson's old friend, Dr. Rose, of Chiswick.—CROKER.

this was obstinately refused, the Dock being considered as an upstart. And a rival, Alderman Polcher, who took a very strong part, called one morning, and immediately opened on the subject to Dr. Johnson, who appeared to give great attention, and, when the alderman had ceased speaking, replied, "You are perfectly right, Sir; I would let the rogues die of thirst, for I hate a Docker from my heart." The old man went away quite delighted, and told all his acquaintances how completely "the great Dr. Johnson was on his side of the question."<sup>1</sup>

Calumny. Ridicule.—It was after the publication of the Lives of the Poets that Dr. Farr, being engaged to dine with Sir Joshua Reynolds, mentioned, on coming in, that, in his way, he had seen a caricature, which he thought clever, of the nine muses lodging Dr. Johnson round Parmassus. The admirers of Gray and others, who thought their favourites hardly treated in the Lives, were laughing at Dr. Farr's account of the print, when Dr. Johnson was himself announced. Dr. Farr being the only stranger, Sir Joshua introduced him, and to Dr. Farr's infinite embarrassment, repeated what he had just been telling them. Johnson was not at all surly on the occasion, but said, turning to Dr. Farr, "Sir, I am very glad to hear this. I hope the day will never arrive when I shall neither be the object of calumny or ridicule, for then I shall be neglected and forgotten."

Fidèle-de-dece.—It was near the close of his life that two young ladies, who were warm admirers of his works, but had never seen himself, went to Bolt Court, and, asking if he was at home, were shown up stairs where he was writing. He laid down his pen on their entrance, and, as they stood before him, one of the females repeated a speech of some length, previously prepared for the occasion. It was an enthusiastic effusion, which, when the speaker had finished, she panted for her idol's reply. What was her mortification when all he said was, "Fidèle-de-dece, my dear."

Hayley.—Much pains were taken by Mr. Hayley's friends to prevail on Dr. Johnson to read "The Triumphs of Temper," when it was in its zenith; at last he consented, but never got beyond the two first pages, of which he uttered a few words of contempt that I have now forgotten. They were, however, carried to the author, who revenged himself by portraying Johnson as Ramble in his comedy of "The Masquerade," and subsequently he published, without his name, a "Dialogue in the Shades between Lord Chesterfield and Dr. Johnson," more distinguished for malignity than wit. Being anonymous, and possessing very little merit, it fell still-born from the press. See ante, p. 773.

Mrs. Montagu. Lord Lyttelton.—Dr. Johnson sent his "Life of Lord Lyttelton" in MS. to Mrs. Montagu, who was much dissatisfied with it, and thought her friend every way underrated; but the Doctor made no alteration. When he subsequently made one of a party at Mrs. Montagu's, he addressed his hostess two or three times after dinner, with a view to engage her in conversation: receiving only cold and brief answers, he said, in a low voice, to General Paoli, who sat next him, and who told me the story, "You see, Sir, I am no longer the man for Mrs. Montagu."<sup>2</sup>

Favourite Couplet.—Mrs. Piozzi related to me, that when Dr. Johnson one day observed, that poets in general preferred some one couplet they had written to any other, she replied, that she did not suppose he had a favourite; he told her she was mistaken—he thought his best lines were:—

"The encumber'd or scarce leaves the hostile coast, Through purple billows and a floating host."

§ 6. BY MR. BARCLAY.

"Mr. Barclay<sup>3</sup>, from his connection with Mr. Thrale, had several opportunities of meeting and conversing with Dr. Johnson. On his becoming a partner in the brewery, Johnson advised him not to allow his commercial pursuits to divert his attention from his studies. 'A mere literary man,' said the Doctor, 'is a dull man; a man, who is solely a man of business, is a selfish man; but when literature and commerce are united, they make a respectable man.'

"Mr. Barclay saw Johnson ten days before he died, when the latter observed, 'That they should never meet more. Have you any objection to receive an old man's blessing?' Mr. Barclay knelt down, and Johnson gave him his blessing with great fervour.

"Mr. Barclay had never observed any rudeness or violence on the part of Johnson.

<sup>1</sup> This story is told by Mr. Boswell, and commented upon by Mr. Biakeway (ante, p. 128), as if Dr. Johnson had scripsit entered into the spirit of the contest; whereas Dr. Mudge, more naturally, represents him as fluctuating, with an ironical vehemence, the prejudices of the worthy alderman, who is known, from other circumstances, to have been of a very zealous disposition.—CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> This was his usual declaration on all such occasions. If Johnson had been an amateur author, abuse and even criticism would no doubt have given him pain, but, to an author by profession and one who, for so many years, had lived by his pen, the greatest misfortune would be neglect; for his daily

"He has seen Boswell lay down his knife and fork, and take out his tablets, in order to register a good anecdote."

"When John on proceeded to the dining-room, one of Mr. Thrale's servants handed him a wig of a smarter description than the one he wore in the morning, the exchange took place in the hall, or passage. Johnson, like many other men, was always in much better humour after dinner than before."

§ 7. BY THE RIGHT HON. W. WINDHAM.

Understanding that a Journal kept by the late Mr. Windham contained some particulars relating to Dr. Johnson, I applied to my friend Admiral Windham, that gentleman's nephew and heir, for permission to see the Journal, which the Admiral most readily granted; but a gentleman (Mr. Thomas Amyot), to whose care the papers had been previously consigned, with a view to his writing the life of Mr. Windham, declined to favour me with the desired information. From another quarter, however, I have been enabled to present the reader with the following extracts made from the original Journal, before (as I suppose) it was confided to Mr. Amyot. Mr. Amyot afterwards communicated some extracts from the Journal to Mr. Wright, but they do not appear to be so full as those with which I was favoured.—CROKER, 1831-47.

*From 21st to 20th August, 1781.—This interval was passed by Mr. Windham in a circuitous journey to Ashbourne, when he paid a visit of a few days to his friend Dr. Johnson, [see ante, pp. 751-756], and has preserved the following minutes of their conversations, under the title of "Johnsoniana."*

Amusement.—"The principle of all amusement is to beguile time and to fill the interval between active thoughts and perfect vacancy."

Homer.—"The source of every thing, either in or out of nature, that can excite the purposes of poetry, is to be found in Homer;—every species of distress, every modification of heroic character, battles, storms, ghosts, incantations, &c."

Translation from the Greek.—"Much credit is due to the first translators of Greek authors. Grævus and Bœndictus give the palm to Sir Thomas More, among all the translators of Lucian."

Odyssey.—"Dr. Johnson said, he had never read through the Odyssey completely in the original."

Johnson's first Declamation.—"Anecdote of his first declamation at College, that having neglected to write it till the morning of his being to repeat it, and having only one copy, he got part of it by heart, while he was walking into the Hall, and the rest he repeated as well as he could extempore."

The Ramet.—"Anecdote of his tutor, who told them that the Ramet, the followers of Ramus, were so called from Ramus, a bow."<sup>4</sup>

Johnson's Idleness.—"Description of himself as very idle and neglectful of his studies."

Latin.—"His opinion, that I could not name above five of my college acquaintance who read Latin with ease sufficient to make it pleasurable. The difficulties of the language overpowered the desire of reading the author."

"That he read Latin with as much ease when he went to college as at present."

"That a year or two elapsed between" his quitting school and going to college.

Thomas Hearne.—"His opinion of that fact of Thomas Hearne, that he had never been in London."

Ovid's Fasti. Wotton. Wood.—"Recommended the reading the Fasti of Ovid,—also Wotton, and Wood on Homer."

Ovid and Virgil.—"Commended Ovid's description of the death of Hercules,—doubted whether Virgil would not have loaded the description with too many fine words, that Virgil would sometimes dare verba."

Styles.—"Opinion that there were three ways in which writing might be unnatural; by being bombastic and above nature—affected and beside it, imagining events with ornaments which nature did not afford—or a cold, and by low nature. That neither of the first would please long. That the third might indeed please a good while, or at least many; because sublimity, and consequently a love of imbecility, might be found in many."

A Good Work.—"Baretti had told him of some Italian author, who said that a good work must be that with which the vulgar were pleased, and of which the learned could tell spread depended on the sensation his works might create. This observation would be found applicable to many other cases.—CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> Robert Barclay, Esq. of Bury Hill, near Dorking, from whom Mr. Markland derived these memoranda in 1831, died in 1847, at an advanced age.—CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> Sic in the MS. before me, as well as in that to which Mr. Wright had access; no doubt an error of Mr. Windham's own pen for long; but the blunder of the tutor corroborates what is said ante (p. 13.) of Mr. Jorden's scanty literature.—CROKER.

why it pleased — that it must be able to employ the learned, and detain the idle. Chey Chase pleased the vulgar, but did not satisfy the learned; it did not fit a mind capable of thinking strongly. The merit of Shakspeare was such as the ignorant could take in, and the learned add nothing to.”

“Stat magni nominis,” &c. — “Stat magni nominis umbra he would construe as, umbra quæ est magni nominis, hoc est, celebrata.”

College Tutor. — “Τελέμαχος νῆπται, καὶ πλείονα εἰδώς, (the offer of the Syren to Ulysses) any man who can promise that to another will preserve his respect.” — Applied to a college tutor.

Rowe's Lucan. — “Opinion of Rowe's translation of Lucan, that it would have been improved, if Rowe had had a couple of years to render it less paraphrastic.”

Tenses. — “Suspicion that the old grammarians have given us from analogy more modification of tenses than were ever used. Remembers but one instance of the second future, viz. εὐγὴ, in Josephus, and three of the optative, if I recollect, of the proterite middle — one of them in Hesiod.”

Virgil. — “The first female warrior is the Camilla of Virgil.” “Vast change of the Latin language from the time of Lucretius to Virgil; — greater than known in any other, even the French. The story of Dido is in Ovid's Fasti, also of Mezentius. Virgil's invention, therefore, is less than supposed. Take from his what is in Homer, what do you leave him?” [anté, p. 559.]

University. — “Great advantage of a university, that a person lives in a place where his reputation depends on his learning.”

Nervous Feel. — “Argument about that feel which persons on great heights suppose themselves to have of a wish to throw themselves down.”

Delicescence. — “The idea of delicescence is one of those that please the mind in a hilly country.”

Taypescence. — “Much of the faculties of the mind lost in it.”

Warton. — “Qui stupet, in Statius, applied to Joseph Warton's admiration of fine passages. His taste is amazement.”

Latin. — “The pretensions of the English to the reputation of writing Latin is founded not so much on the specimens in that way which they have produced, as on the quantity of talent diffused through the country.”

Erasmus. — “Erasmus appears to be totally ignorant of science and natural knowledge. But one Italian writer is mentioned in Erasmus; whence Johnson conjectured that he did not understand Italian.”

Turnpike Roads. — “Opinion about the effect of turnpike roads. Every place communicating with each other. Before, there were cheap places and dear places. Now all refuges are destroyed for elegant or genteel poverty. Want of such a last hope to support men in their struggle through life, however seldom it might be resorted to. Disunion of families by furnishing a market to each man's abilities, and destroying the dependence of one man on another.”

September 1st. — “Left Ashbourne at half-past one, having gone with Dr. Johnson, in the morning, to prayers. Regretted, upon reflection, that I had not staid another day; which I should have done if I had not waited to be asked, or had not contrived that my intention was not known.”

§ 8. MISCELLANEOUS.

Donne v. Pope. — The late Mr. Crauford, of Hyde Park Corner, being engaged to dinner, where Dr. Johnson was to be, resolved to pay his court to him; and, having heard that he preferred Donne's Satires to Pope's version of them, said, “Do you know, Dr. Johnson, that I like Dr. Donne's original Satires better than Pope's.” Johnson said, “Well, Sir, I can't help that.”

Music. King David. — Miss Johnson, one of Sir Joshua's nieces (afterwards Mrs. Deane), was dining one day at her uncle's with Dr. Johnson and a large party: the conversation happening to turn on music, Johnson spoke very contemptuously of that art, and added, “that no man of talent, or whose mind was capable of better things, ever would or could devote his time and attention to so idle and frivolous a pursuit.” The young lady, who was very fond of music, whispered her next neighbour, “I wonder what Dr. Johnson thinks of King David.” Johnson overheard her, and, with great good humour and complacency, said, “Madam, I thank you; I stand rebuked before you, and promise that, on one subject at least, you shall never hear me talk nonsense again.”

Pleasure of Hunting. — The honours of the University of Cambridge were once performed to Dr. Johnson, by Dr. Watson, afterwards Bishop of Llandaff, and then Professor of Chemistry, &c.<sup>2</sup> After having spent the morning in seeing all that was worthy of notice, the sage dined at his conductor's table, which was surrounded by various persons, all anxious to see so remarkable a character, but the moment was not favourable; he had been wearied by his previous exertions, and would not talk. After the party had dispersed, he said, “I was tired, and would not take the trouble, or I could have set them right upon several subjects, Sir; for instance, the gentleman who said he could not imagine how any pleasure could be derived from hunting, — the reason is, because man feels his own vacuity less in action than when at rest.”

Johnson in a Stage Coach. — Mr. Williams, the rector of Wellesbourne, in Warwickshire, mentioned having once, when a young man, performed a stage-coach journey with Dr. Johnson, who took his place in the vehicle, provided with a little book, which his companion soon discovered to be Lucian: he occasionally threw it aside, if struck by any remark made by his fellow-travellers, and poured forth his knowledge and eloquence in a full stream, to the delight and astonishment of his auditors. Accidentally, the first subject which attracted him was the digestive faculties of dogs, from whence he branched off as to the powers of digestion in various species of animals, discovering such stores of information, that this particular point might have been supposed to have formed his especial study, and so it was with every other subject started. The strength of his memory was not less astonishing than his eloquence; he quoted from various authors, either in the support of his own argument or to confute those of his companions, as readily, and apparently as accurately, as if the works had been in his hands. The coach halted, as usual, for dinner, which seemed to be a deeply interesting business to Johnson, who vehemently attacked a dish of stewed carp, using his fingers only in feeding himself.<sup>3</sup>

“Pilgrim's Progress.” — Bishop Percy was at one time on a very intimate footing with Dr. Johnson, and the Doctor one day took Percy's little daughter<sup>4</sup> upon his knee, and asked her what she thought of “Pilgrim's Progress?” The child answered that she had not read it. “No!” replied the Doctor; “then I would not give one farthing for you;” and he set her down and took no further notice of her.

No. VI.

ACCOUNTS OF DR. JOHNSON'S LAST DAYS.

§ 1. BY MR. WINDHAM.

The following interesting Account of Mr. Windham's Conversations with Dr. Johnson a few Days before his Death, is extracted from the Journal before mentioned. — CROKER.

Tuesday, December 7, 1781. — Ten minutes past 2, P. M. — After waiting some short time in the adjoining room, I was admitted to Dr. Johnson in his bed-chamber, where, after placing me in the chair next him (the sitting in his usual place, on the east side of the room, and I on his right hand), he put into my hands two small volumes (an edition of the New Testament), saying, “Extremum hoc munus morientis habeto.”

He then proceeded to observe that I was entering upon a life which would lead me deeply into all the business of the world: that he did not condemn civil employment, but that it was a state of great danger, and that he had therefore one piece of advice earnestly to impress upon me, that I would set apart every seventh day for the care of my soul. That one day, the seventh, should be employed in repenting what was amiss in the six preceding, and fortifying my virtue for the six to come. That such a portion of time was surely little enough for the meditation of eternity.

<sup>1</sup> This word is not in his Dictionary. It means here no doubt seclusion — hiding one's self. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> Dr. Watson was a fellow of Trinity. See anté, p. 167.. a very different account of one evening at Trinity; but both may be true of different evenings. The visit to Cambridge occurred in Feb. 1765. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> Mr. Boswell, anté, p. 758., mentions another instance, in which Dr. Johnson surprised his accidental companions in a stage-coach with the force of his conversation and the goodness of his appetite. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> Afterwards Mrs. Isted, of Ecton, Northamptonshire. — CROKER.

He then told me that he had a request to make to me; namely, that I would allow his servant Frank to look up to me as his friend, adviser, and protector, in all difficulties which his own weakness and imprudence, or the force or fraud of others, might bring him into. He said that he had left him what he considered an ample provision, viz. seventy pounds per annum; but that even that sum might not place him above the want of a protector, and to me, therefore, he recommended him as to one who had will, and power, and activity to protect him. Having obtained my assent to this, he proposed that Frank should be called in; and desiring me to take him by the hand in token of the promise, repeated before him the recommendation he had just made of him, and the promise I had given to attend to it.

I then took occasion to say how much I felt — what I had long foreseen that I should feel — regret at having spent so little of my life in his company. I stated this as an instance where resolutions are deterred till the occasions are past. For some time past I had determined that such an occasion of self-reproach should not subsist, and had built upon the hope of passing in his society the chief part of my time, at the moment when it was to be apprehended we were about to lose him for ever.

I had no difficulty in speaking to him thus of my apprehensions. I could not help, on the other hand, entertaining hopes, but with these I did not like to trouble him, lest he should conceive that I thought it necessary to flatter him: he answered hastily, that he was sure I would not; and proceeded to make a compliment to the manliness of my mind, which, whether deserved or not, ought to be remembered, — that it may be deserved.

I then stated, that among other neglects was the omission of introducing of all topics the most important, the consequence of which particularly filled my mind at that moment, and in which I had often been desirous to know his opinions; the subjects I meant were, I said, natural and revealed religion. The wish thus generally stated, was in part gratified on the instant. For revealed religion, he said, was such historical evidence, as, upon any subject, not religions, would have left no doubt. Had the facts recorded in the New Testament been mere civil occurrences, no one would have called in question the testimony by which they are established; but the importance annexed to them, amounting to nothing less than the salvation of mankind, raised a cloud in our minds, and created doubts unknown upon any other subject. Of proofs to be derived from history, one of the most cogent, he seemed to think, was the opinion so well authenticated, and so long entertained, of a deliverer that was to appear about that time. Among the typical representations, the sacrifice of the Paschal Lamb, in which no bone was to be broken, had early struck his mind. For the immediate life and miracles of Christ, such attestation as that of the apostles, who all, except St. John, confirmed their testimony with their blood — such belief as these witnesses procured from a people best furnished with the means of judging, and least disposed to judge favourably — such an extension afterwards of that belief over all the nations of the earth, though originating from a nation of all others, not despised, would leave no doubt that the things witnessed were true, and were of a nature more than human. With respect to evidence, Dr. Johnson observed, that we had not such evidence that Cæsar died in the Capitol, as that Christ died in the manner related.

December 11. — Went with Sir Joshua, whom I took up by the way, to see Dr. Johnson. Strahan and Laughton there. No hopes; though a great discharge had taken place from the legs.

December 12. — At about half past seven P. M. went to Dr. Johnson's, where I stayed, chiefly in the outer room, till past eleven. Strahan there during the whole time; during past Mr. Hoole; and latterly Mr. Cruikshanks and the apothecary. I only went in twice, for a few minutes each time: the first time I hinted only what they had before been urging; namely, that he would be prevailed upon to take some sustenance, and desisted upon his exclaiming, " 'Tis all very childish; let us hear no more of it." The second time I came in, in consequence of a consultation with Mr. Cruikshanks and the apothecary, and addressed him formally, after premising that I considered what I was going to say as matter of duty; I said that I hoped he would not suspect me of the weakness of importuning him to take nourishment for the purpose of prolonging his life for a few hours or days. I then stated what the reason was. It was to secure that which I was persuaded he was most anxious about; namely, that he might preserve his faculties entire to the last moment. Before I had quite stated my meaning, he interrupted me by saying, that he had refused no sustenance but liberating sustenance; and proceeded to give instances where, in compliance with the wishes of his physician, he had taken even a small quantity of wine. I readily assented to any objections he might have to nourishment of that kind, and observing that milk was the only nourishment I intended, flattered myself that I had succeeded in my endeavours, when he recurred to his general refusal, and begged that there might be an end of it." I then said, that I hoped he would forgive my earnestness, or something to that effect, when he replied eagerly, that from me nothing could be necessary, by way of apology; adding, with great fervour, in words which I shall, I hope, never forget, "God bless you, my dear Windham, through Jesus Christ;" and concluding with a wish — "that we might [share] in some humble portion of that happiness which God might finally vouchsafe to repentant sinners." These were the last words I ever heard him speak. I hurried out of the room with tears in my eyes, and more affected than I had been on any former occasion.

December 13. — In the morning went to have met Mr. Cruikshanks in Bolt Court; but while I was deliberating about going, was sent for by Mr. Burke. Went to Bolt Court about half-past three, found that Dr. Johnson had been almost constantly asleep since nine in the morning, and heard from Mr. Desmoulins what passed in the night. He had compelled Frank to give him a lancet, and had besides concealed in the bed a pair of scissors, and with one or the other of them had scarified himself in three places, two of them in the leg. On Mr. Desmoulins making a difficulty in giving him the lancet, he said, "Don't, if you have any scruple; but I will compel Frank;" and on Mr. Desmoulins attempting afterwards to prevent Frank from giving it to him, and at last to restrain his hand, he grew very outrageous, so as to call Frank scoundrel, and to threaten Mr. Desmoulins that he would stab him; he then made the three incisions above mentioned, two of which were not unskilfully made; but one of those in the leg was a deep and ugly wound, from which they suppose him to have lost at least eight ounces of blood.

Upon Dr. Heberden expressing his fears about the scarification, Dr. Johnson told him he was timid-um timidissimus. A few days before his death, talking with Dr. Brocklesby, he said, "Now will you ascribe my death to my having taken eight grains of squills, when you recommended only three? Dr. Heberden, to my having opened my left foot, when nature was pointing out the discharge in the right?" The conversation was introduced by his quoting some lines to the same purpose, from Swift's verses on his own death.

It was within the same period, if I understood Dr. Brocklesby right, that he enjoined him, as an honest man and a physician, to inform him how long he thought he had to live. Dr. Brocklesby inquired, in return, whether he had firmness to bear the answer. Upon his replying that he had, and Dr. Brocklesby limiting the time to a few weeks, he said, "that he then would trouble himself no more with medicine or medical advice;" and to this resolution he pretty much adhered.

In a conversation about what was practicable in medicine or surgery, he quoted, to the surprise of his physicians, the opinion of Marchetti for an operation of extracting (I think) part of the kidney. He recommended for an account of China, Sir John Mandeville's Travels. Holyday's Notes on Javana he thought so highly of as to have employed himself for some time in translating them into Latin.

He insisted on the doctrine of an expiatory sacrifice as the condition without which there was no Christianity (anté, p. 292.); and urged in support the belief entertained in all ages, and by all nations, barbarous as well as polite. He recommended to Dr. Brocklesby, also, Clarke's Sermons (anté, p. 807.), and repeated to him the passage which he had spoken of to me.

While airing one day with Dr. Brocklesby, in passing and returning by St. Pancras church, he fell into prayer, and mentioned, upon Dr. Brocklesby's inquiring why the Catho-cowardly, as he thought them, apprehensions of his attendants. It might be wished that in such circumstances he had spoken and acted with less impatience; but let us not forget the excuses which may be drawn from the natural infirmity of his temper, exasperated by the peevishness of a long and painful disease. — CROKER.

"The doctors, in case of their fame,
Wisely on one lay all the blame;
'We must confess his case was nice,
But he would never take advice;
Had he been ruled, for aught appears,
He might have lived these twenty years;
For when we opened him we found
That all his vital parts were sound."

CROKER.

<sup>1</sup> It appears in this journal that Mr. Windham laboured occasionally under a nervous and indeed morbid hesitation to do even the commonest things, and used to lose hours and days in deliberating whether he should do this or that trifling thing. This was hypochondriasis; and he used to call it the feet which, he said, came over him on these occasions. (See anté, p. 617.) — CROKER, 1847.

<sup>2</sup> See anté, p. 166. That more importance may not be given to this transaction than it deserves, it must be recollected, that Johnson fancied that his attendants were treating him with a timid leniency, merely to spare him pain, — a notion which irritated, at once, his love of life, his animal courage, and his high moral principle. We have already seen (anté, p. 494.) that when in health he had said, "Whoever is afraid of any thing is a scoundrel;" and now, in the same feeling, and the same words, he censures the lies chose that for their burying place, that some Catholics, in Queen Elizabeth's time, had been burnt there.<sup>1</sup> Upon Dr. Brocklesby's asking him whether he did not feel the warmth of the sun, he quoted from Juvenal —

"Prætere minimus gelido jam in corpore sanguis Febre calet solâ."<sup>2</sup> —

December 13. — Forty-five minutes past ten P. M. — While writing the preceding articles — I received the fatal account, so long dreaded, that Dr. Johnson was no more!

May those prayers which he incessantly poured from a heart fraught with the deepest devotion, and their acceptance with Him to whom they were addressed — which piety, so humble and so fervent, may seem to promise!

December 18. — For some days to work of any sort has been done. I cannot, indeed, say that all the time has been mis-spent; much of it has been employed in performing the last duties of respect and affection to the great man who is gone.

December 20. — A memorable day; the day which saw deposited in Westminster Abbey the remains of Johnson.

§ 2 BY SIR JOHN HAWKINS.

(Extracted from his Life of Johnson, pp. 564-6.)

A few days after the remnant of the Ivy-lane Club had dined with him [Feb. 1784], Dr. Johnson sent for me, and informed me that he had discovered in himself the symptoms of a dropsy; and, indeed, his very much increased bulk, and the swollen appearance of his legs, seemed to indicate no less. He told me, that he was desirous of making a will, and requested me to be one of his executors: upon my consenting, he gave me to understand that he meant to make a provision for his servant, Frank, of about 70*l.* a year for his life, and concerted with me a plan for investing a sum sufficient for the purpose: at the same time he opened to me the state of his circumstances, and the amount of what he had to dispose of.

In a visit which I made him in a few days, in consequence of a very pressing request to see me, I found him labouring under great dejection of mind. He bade me draw near him, and said he wanted to enter into a serious conversation with me; and, upon my expressing a willingness to join in it, he, with a look that cut me to the heart, told me that he had the prospect of death before him, and that he dreaded to meet his Saviour.<sup>3</sup> I could not but be astonished at such a declaration, and advised him, as I had done once before, to reflect on the course of his life, and the services he had rendered to the cause of religion and virtue, as well by his example as his writings; to which he answered, that he had written as a philosopher, but had not lived like one. In the estimation of his offences, he reasoned thus: "Every man knows his own sins, and also what grace he has resisted. But, to those of others, and the circumstances under which they were committed, he is a stranger: he is, therefore, to look on himself as the greatest sinner that he knows of."<sup>4</sup> At the conclusion of this argument, which he strongly enforced, he uttered this passionate exclamation, — "Shall I, who have been a teacher of others, myself be a castaway?"

Much to the same purpose passed between us in this and other conversations that I had with him; in all which I could not but wonder, as much at the freedom with which he opened his mind, and the compunction he seemed to feel for the errors of his past life, as I did at his making choice of me for his confessor, knowing full well how meanly qualified I was for such an office.

It was on a Thursday (19th February) that I had this conversation with him; and here, let not the supercilious lip of scorn protrude itself, while I relate that, he declared his intention to devote the whole of the next day to fasting, humiliation, and such other devotional exercises as became a man in his situation. — On the Saturday following I made him a visit, and, upon entering his room, observed in his countenance such a serenity, as indicated that some remarkable crisis of his disorder had produced a change in his feelings. He told me that, pursuant to the resolution he had mentioned, he had spent the preceding day in an abstraction from all worldly concerns; that, to prevent interruption, he had, in the morning, ordered Frank not to admit any one to him; and, the better to enforce the charge, had added these awful words, "For your master is preparing himself to die." He then mentioned to me, that, in the course of this exercise, he found himself relieved from that disorder which had been growing on him, and was become very oppressing, the dropsy, by a gradual evacuation of water to the amount of twenty pints, a like instance whereof he had never before experienced; and asked me what I thought of it.

I was well aware of the lengths that superstition and enthusiasm will lead men, and how ready some are to attribute favourable events to supernatural causes, and said, that it might savour of presumption to say that, in this instance, God had wrought a miracle; yet, as divines recognise certain dispensations of his providence, recorded in the Scripture by the denomination of returns of prayer, and his omnipotence is now the same as ever, I thought it would be little less than criminal to ascribe his late relief to causes merely natural, and that the safer opinion was, that he had not in vain humbled himself before his Maker. He seemed to acquiesce in all that I said on this important subject; and, several times, while I was discoursing with him, cried out, "It is wonderful, very wonderful!"

His zeal for religion, as manifested in his writings and conversation, and the accounts extant that attest his piety, have induced the enemies to his memory to tax him with superstition. To that charge I oppose his behaviour on this occasion, and leave it to the judgment of sober and rational persons, whether such an unexpected event as that above mentioned would not have prompted a really superstitious man to some more passionate exclamation than that it was "wonderful."

[This relief, extraordinary as it was, Johnson himself said, "was only a reprieve," — the disease returned, and Hawkins renewed the subject of the will. pp. 580, 593.]

His complaint still increasing, I continued pressing him to make a will; but he still procrastinated that business. On the 27th of November, in the morning, I went to his house, with a purpose still farther to urge him not to give occasion, by dying intestate, for litigation among his relations; but finding that he was gone to pass the day with the Rev. Mr. Strahan, at Islington, I followed him thither, and found there our old friend Mr. Ryland, and Mr. Hoole. Upon my sitting down, he said, that the prospect of the change he was about to undergo, and the thought of meeting his Saviour, troubled him, but that he had hope that he would not reject him.

I then began to discourse with him about his will, and the provision for Frank, till he grew angry. He told me, that he had signed and sealed the paper I left him; but that, said I, had blanks in it, which, as it seems, you have not filled up with the names of the executors. "You should have filled them up yourself," answered he. I replied, that such an act would have looked as if I meant to prevent his choice of a fitter person. "Sir," said he, "these minor virtues are not to be exercised in matters of such importance as this." At length he said that on his return home he would send for a clerk, and dictate a will to him. "You will then," said I, "be homo ensulii; rather do it now. With Mr. Strahan's permission, I will be his guest at dinner; and, if Mr. Hoole will please to hold the pen, I will, in a few words, make such a disposition of your estate as you shall direct. To this he assented; but such a prooxym of the asthma seized him, as prevented our going on. As the fire burned up, he found himself relieved, and grew cheerful. "The fit," said he, "was very sharp; but I am now easy."

After I had dictated a few lines, I told him, that the ancient form of wills contained a profession of the faith of the testator; and that he being a man of eminence for learning and parts, it would afford an illustrious example, and well become him, to make such an explicit declaration of his belief, as might obviate all suspicions that he was any other than a Christian. He thanked me for the hint, and, calling for paper, wrote on a slip, that I had in my hand and gave him, the following words: — "I humbly commit to the infinite and eternal goodness of Almighty God, my soul polluted with many sins; but, as I hope, purified by repentance, and redeemed, as I trust, by the death of Jesus Christ;<sup>5</sup> and, returning it to me, said, "This I commit to your custody."

Upon my calling on him for directions to proceed, he told

<sup>1</sup> It has been said that this preference arises from a belief that special services are performed for persons buried at St. Pancras, in a church of the same name in the South of France; but I learn, from unquestionable authority, that it rests upon no foundation, and that mere prejudice exists amongst the Roman Catholics in favour of this church, as is the case with respect to other places of burial in various parts of the kingdom. — MARKLAND.

<sup>2</sup> "Add that a fever only warms his veins,

And thaws the little blood that yet remains."

— GIFFORD.

<sup>3</sup> This, and other expressions of the like kind, which he uttered to me, should put to silence the idle reports that he dreaded annihilation. — HAWKINS.

<sup>4</sup> I find the above sentiment in "Law's Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life," a book which Johnson was very conversant with, and often commended. — HAWKINS, ante, p. 15.

<sup>5</sup> The will of the other great luminary of that age, Mr. Burke, is throughout strikingly characteristic, and was no doubt chiefly drawn up by himself. Those who revere his memory will read with satisfaction the opening declaration, "First, according to the ancient, good, and laudable custom, of which my heart and understanding recognise the propriety, I bequeath my soul to God, hoping for his mercy through the only merits of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ." — MARKLAND.

methat his father, in the course of his trade of a bookseller, had become bankrupt, and that Mr. William Innes had assisted him with money or credit to continue his business. "This," said he, "I consider as an obligation on me to be grateful to his descendants, and I therefore mean to give 200*l.* to his representative." He then meditated a devise of his house at Lichfield to the corporation of that city for a charitable use; but, it being freehold, he said, "I cannot live a twelvemonth, and the last statute of mortmain stands in the way." His next, therefore, think of some other disposition of it." His next consideration was, a provision for Frank, concerning the amount whereof I found he had been consulting Dr. Brocklesby, to whom he had put this question, "What would be a proper annuity to bequeath to a favourite servant?" The doctor answered, that the circumstances of the master were the truest measure; and that, in the case of a nobleman, 50*l.* a year was deemed an adequate reward for many years' faithful service. "Then shall I," said Johnson, "be nobilis-simus; for I mean to leave Frank 70*l.* a year, and I desire you to tell him so." And now, at the making of the will, a devise, equivalent to such a provision, was therein inserted. The residue of his estate and effects, which took in, though he intended it not, the house at Lichfield, he bequeathed to his executors, in trust for a religious association; which it is needless to describe.

Having executed the will with the necessary formalities, he would have come home; but being pressed by Mr. and Mrs. Strahan to stay, he consented, and we all dined together. Towards the evening he grew cheerful; and I having promised to take him in my coach, Mr. Strahan and Mr. Ryland would accompany him home. In the way thither he appeared much at ease, and told stories. At eight I set him down, and Mr. Strahan and Mr. Ryland betook themselves to their respective homes.

Sunday, Nov. 28th. I saw him about noon: he was dozing; but waking, he found himself in a circle of his friends. Upon opening his eyes, he said, that the prospect of his dissolution was very terrible to him, and addressed himself to us all, in nearly these words: "You see the state in which I am; conflicting with bodily pain and mental distraction; while you are in health and strength, labour to do good, and avoid evil, if ever you hope to escape the distress that now oppresses me."

A little while after,—"I had, very early in my life, the seeds of goodness in me: I had a love of virtue, and a reverence for religion; and these, I trust, have brought forth in me fruits meet for repentance; and, if I have repented as I ought, I am forgiven. I have, at times, entertained a loathing of sin and of myself, particularly at the beginning of this year, when I had the prospect of death before me; and this has not abated when my fears of death have been less; and at these times, I have had such rays of hope shot into my soul, as have almost persuaded me that I am in a state of reconciliation with God."

29th. Mr. Langton, who had spent the evening with him, reported, that his hopes were increased, and that he was much cheered upon being reminded of the general tendency of his writings, and of his example.

30th. I saw him in the evening, and found him cheerful. Was informed that he had, for his dinner, eaten heartily of a French duck pie and a pheasant.

Dec. 1. I was busied in destroying papers. Gave to Mr. Langton and another person [young Mr. Desmoulin], to fair-copy, some translations of the Greek epigrams, which he had made in the preceding nights, and transcribed the next morning, and they began to work on them.

3d. Finding his legs continue to swell, he signified to his physicians a strong desire to have them scalded; but they, unwilling to put him to pain, and fearing a mortification, declined advising it. He afterwards consulted his surgeon, and has performed the operation on one leg.

4th. I visited him: the scarification made yesterday in his leg appeared to have had little effect. He said to me, that he was easier in his mind, and as fit to die at that instant as he could be a year hence. He requested me to receive the sacrament with him on Sunday, the next day. Complained of great weakness, and of phantoms that haunted his imagination.

5th. Being Sunday, I communicated with him and Mr.

Langton, and other of his friends, as many as nearly filled the room. Mr. Strahan, who was constant in his attendance on him throughout his illness, performed the office. Previous to reading the exhortation, Johnson knelt, and, with a degree of fervour that I had never been witness to before, uttered the following most eloquent and energetic prayer:—

"O Almighty and most merciful Father, I am now, as to human eyes, it seems, about to commemorate, for the last time, the death of thy son Jesus Christ, our Saviour and Redeemer. Grant, O Lord, that my whole hope and confidence may be in his merits and in thy mercy; forgive and accept my late conversion; enforce and accept my imperfect repentance; make this commemoration of him available to the confirmation of my faith, the establishment of my hope, and the enlargement of my charity; and make the death of thy son Jesus effectual to my redemption. Have mercy upon me, and pardon the multitude of my offences. O my friends: have mercy upon all men. Support me by the grace of thy Holy Spirit in the days of weakness, and at the hour of death, and receive me, at my death, to everlasting happiness, for the sake of Jesus Christ.—Amen."

Upon rising from his knees, after the office was concluded, he said, that he dreaded to meet God in a state of abeyance, or with opinion in his head; and, that having now communicated with the effects of a dose upon him, he doubted if his exertions were the genuine operations of his mind. I repeated from Bishop Taylor, this sentiment, "That letter, that has been omitted in health can be done to any purpose in sickness."

While he was dressing and preparing for this solemnity, an accident happened which went very near to disarrange his mind. He had mislaid, and was very anxious to find a paper that contained private instructions to his executors; and myself, Mr. Strahan, Mr. Langton, Mr. Hoole, Frank, and I believe some others that were about him, went into his bed-chamber to seek it. In our search, I laid my hands on a parchment-covered book, into which I imagined it might have been slipped. Upon opening the book, I found it to be meditations and reflections, in Johnson's own handwriting; and having been told a day or two before by Frank, that a person formerly intimately connected with his master, a joint proprietor of a newspaper, well known among the booksellers, and of whom Mrs. Williams once told me she had often cautioned him to beware; I say, having been told that this person had lately been very importunate to get access to him, indeed to such a degree, that when he was told that the doctor was not to be seen, he would push his way up stairs; and having stronger reasons than I need here mention, to suspect that this man might find and make an ill use of the book, I put it, and a less of the same kind, into my pocket; at the same time telling those around me, and particularly Mr. Langton and Mr. Strahan, that I had got both, and withy reasons for thus securing them. After the ceremony was over, Johnson took me aside, and told me that I had a book of his in my pocket; I answered that I had two, and that to prevent their falling into the hands of a person who had attempted to force his way into the house, I had done as I conceived a friendly act, but not without telling his friends of it, and also my reasons. He then asked me what ground I had for my suspicion of the man I mentioned: I told him his great importunity to get admittance; and farther, that immediately after a visit which he made me, in the year 1775, I missed a paper of public nature, and of great importance; and that a day or two after, and before it could be put to its intended use, I saw it in the newspapers.<sup>1</sup>

At the mention of this circumstance, Johnson paused; but recovering himself, said, "You should not have laid hands on the book; for had I missed it, and not known you had it, I should have roared for my book, as Ortelio did for his handkerchief, and probably have run mad."

I gave him time, till the next day, to compose himself, and then wrote him a letter, apologizing, and assuring at large the reasons for my conduct; and received a verbal answer by Mr. Langton, which were I to repeat it, would render me suspected of inexpressible vanity [p. 803]. It concluded with these words, "If I was not satisfied with this I must be a savage."

7th. I again visited him. Before my departure Dr. Brocklesby came in, and, taking him by the wrist, Johnson acted me at the time.—HAWKINS.—Miss Hawkins's Memoirs, vol. i. p. 261, tells this story in the same way, supplies Stevens's name, and insists on the same justification, which would be quite inconclusive, even if the fact on which the suspicion against Stevens was grounded were true: for the parcelled paper was only a copy of an address from the Middlesex magistrates to the king (which was, from its very nature, destined for publication). And after all, there was no other proof that Stevens had taken that paper, than that it appeared in the St. James's Chronicle the day after Stevens had made a visit at Sir John's. Hawkins's act was unjustifiable, and the defence frivolous. It is observable, that there was no allusion to these circumstances in the first edition of Hawkins's work, but Boswell's notice of the fact forced Johnson to make what defence he could, and a wretched one it is. See ante, p. 803.—CROKER.

<sup>1</sup> He very much admired, and often in the course of his illness recited, from the conclusion of old Isaac Walton's Life of Bishop Sanderson, the following pathetic request:—"Thus this pattern of meekness and primitive innocence changed this for a better life:—'tis now too late to wish that mine may be like his; for I am in the eighty-fifth year of my age, and God knows it hath not; but, I most humbly beseech Almighty God, that my death may; and I do as earnestly beg, that, if any reader shall receive any satisfaction from this very plain, and as true, relation, he will be so charitable as to say, Amen."—HAWKINS.

<sup>2</sup> Mr. George Stevens.—CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> As I take no pleasure in the disgrace of others, I regret the necessity I am under of mentioning these particulars; my reason for it is, that the transaction which so disturbed him may possibly be better known than the motives that gave him a look of great contempt, and ridiculed the judging of his disorder by the pulse. He complained, that the sarcocole had again made its appearance, and asked if a puncture would not relieve him, as it had done the year before? The doctor answered, that it might, but that his surgeon was the best judge of the effect of such an operation. Johnson, upon this, said, "How many men in a year die through the timidity of those whom they consult for health! I want length of life, and you fear giving me pain, which I care not for."

8th. I visited him with Mr. Langton, and found him dictating to Mr. Strahan another will<sup>1</sup>, the former being, as he had said at the time of making it, a temporary one. On our entering the room, he said, "God bless you both." I arrived just time enough to direct the execution, and also the attestation of it. After he had published it, he desired Mr. Strahan to say the Lord's Prayer, which he did, all of us joining. Johnson, after it, uttered, extempore, a few pious ejaculations.

9th. I saw him in the evening, and found him dictating to Mr. Strahan a codicil to the will he had made the evening before. I assisted them in it, and received from the testator a direction, to insert a devise to his executors of the house at Lichfield, to be sold for the benefit of certain of his relations, a bequest of sundry pecuniary and specific legacies, a provision for the annuity of 70*l.* for Francis, and, after all, a devise of all the rest, residue, and remainder of his estate and effects, to his executors, in trust for the said Francis Barber, his executors and administrators; and having dictated accordingly, Johnson executed and published it as a codicil to his will.

He was now so weak as to be unable to kneel, and lamented that he must pray sitting; but, with an effort, he placed himself on his knees, while Mr. Strahan repeated the Lord's Prayer. During the whole of the evening he was much composed and resigned. Being become very weak and helpless, it was thought necessary that a man should watch with him all night; and one was found in the neighbourhood, who, for half a crown a night, undertook to sit up with and assist him. When the man had left the room, he, in the presence and hearing of Mr. Strahan and Mr. Langton, asked me where I meant to bury him. I answered, doubtless, in Westminster Abbey: "If," said he, "my executors think it proper to mark the spot of my interment by a stone, let it be so placed as to protect my body from injury." I assured him it should be done. Before my departure, he desired Mr. Langton to put into my hands money to the amount of upwards of 100*l.* with a direction to keep it till called for.

10th. This day at noon I saw him again. He said to me, that the male nurse to whose care I had committed him was unfit for the office. "He is," said he, "an idiot, as awkward as a turnspit just put into the wheel, and as sleepy as a dormouse." Mr. Cruikshank came into the room, and looking on his scarified leg saw no sign of a mortification.

11th. At noon, I found him dozing, and would not disturb him.

12th. Saw him again; found him very weak, and, as he said, unable to pray.

13th. At noon I called at the house, but went not into his room, being told that he was dozing. I was further informed by the servants that his appetite was totally gone, and that he could take no sustenance. At eight in the evening of the same day, word was brought me by Mr. Sastres, to whom, in his last moments, he uttered these words, "Jam mortuus," that at a quarter past seven, he had, without a groan, or the least sign of pain or uneasiness, yielded his last breath.

At eleven, the same evening, Mr. Langton came to me, and, in an agony of mind, gave me to understand that our friend had wounded himself in several parts of the body. I was shocked at the news; but, upon being told that he had not touched any vital part, was easily able to account for an action, which would else have given us the deepest concern. The fact was, that, conceiving himself to be full of water, he had done that, which he had so often solicited his medical assistants to do, — made two or three incisions in his lower limbs, vainly hoping for some relief from the flux that might follow.

Early the next morning, Frank came to me; and, being desirous of knowing all the particulars of this transaction, I interrogated him very strictly concerning it, and received from him answers to the following effect: —

<sup>1</sup> There seems something strange in this affair of the will. Why did Johnson, after employing Sir J. Hawkins, a professional and in every other respect a proper person to draw up his will, throw it aside, and dictate another to a young clergyman? Had Sir J. Hawkins attempted to thwart the testator's intentions, which he tells us he disapproved of? or was this change the result of the scene of the 5th about the secreted books? In any case, it may have tended to produce that unfavourable temper towards Dr. Johnson which tinges the whole, and certainly discolours some passages of Sir J. Hawkins's book. — CROKER.

<sup>2</sup> The clumsy solemnity with which Hawkins thinks it necessary to defend Dr. Johnson from the suspicion of endeavouring to shorten his life by an act manifestly, avowedly,

That, at eight in the morning of the preceding day, upon going into the bedchamber, his master, being in bed, ordered him to open a cabinet, and give him a drawer in it; that he did so, and that out of it his master took a case of lancets, and choosing one of them, would have conveyed it into the bed, which Frank and a young man that sat up with him seeing, they seized his hand, and entreated him not to do a rash action: he said he would not; but drawing his hand under the bed-clothes, they saw his arm move. Upon this they turned down the clothes, and saw a great effusion of blood, which soon stopped; that soon after, he got at a pair of scissors that lay in a drawer by him, and plunged them deep in the calf of each leg; that immediately they sent for Mr. Cruikshank and the apothecary, and they, or one of them, dressed the wounds; that he then fell into that dozing which carried him off; that it was conjectured he lost eight or ten ounces of blood; and that this effusion brought on the dozing, though his pulse continued firm till three o'clock.

That this act was not done to hasten his end, but to discharge the water that he conceived to be in him, I have not the least doubt. A dropsy was his disease: he looked upon himself as a bloated carcass; and, to attain the power of easy respiration, would have undergone any degree of temporary pain. He dreaded neither punctures nor incisions, and, indeed, defied the trochar and the lancet; he had often reproached his physicians and surgeon with cowardice; and when Mr. Cruikshank scarified his leg, he cried out, "Deeper, deeper; I will abide the consequence; you are afraid of your reputation, but that is nothing to me." To those about him he said, "You all pretend to love me, but you do not love me so well as I myself do."

I have been thus minute in regarding the particulars of his last moments, because I wished to attract attention to the conduct of this great man, under the most trying circumstances human nature is subject to. Many persons have appeared possessed of more serenity of mind in this awful scene; some have remained unmoved at the dissolution of the vital union; and it may be deemed a discouragement from the severe practice of religion, that Dr. Johnson, whose whole life was a preparation for his death, and a conflict with natural infirmity, was disturbed with terror at the prospect of the grave.<sup>3</sup> Let not this relax the circumspection of any one. It is true, that natural firmness of spirit, or the confidence of hope, may buoy up the mind to the last; but, however heroic an undaunted death may appear, it is not what we should pray for. As Johnson lived the life of the righteous, his end was that of a Christian; he strictly fulfilled the injunction of the apostle, to work out his salvation with fear and trembling; and though his doubts and scruples were certainly very distressing to himself, they give his friends a pious hope, that he who added to almost all the virtues of Christianity that religious humility which its great teacher inculcated, will, in the fulness of time, receive the reward promised to a patient continuance in well-doing.

§ 3. BY J. HOOLE, ESQ.

(Extracted from the European Magazine for September, 1799.)

Saturday, Nov. 20, 1784. — This evening, about eight o'clock, I paid a visit to my dear friend Dr. Johnson, whom I found very ill and in great dejection of spirits. We had a most affecting conversation on the subject of religion, in which he exhorted me, with the greatest warmth of kindness, to attend closely to every religious duty, and particularly enforced the obligation of private prayer and receiving the sacrament. He desired me to stay that night and join in prayer with him; adding, that he always went to prayer every night with his man Francis. He conjured me to read and meditate upon the Bible, and not to throw it aside for a play or a novel. He said he had himself lived in great negligence of religion and worship for forty years; that he had neglected to read his Bible, and had often reflected what he could hereafter say when he should be and even passionately meant to prolong it, was certainly supererogative; but does not, I think, justify Mr. Boswell's suspicion (ante, p. 801. n. 1.), that there was some malevolence at the bottom of the defence. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> Hawkins seems to confound two different periods. At the first appearance of danger, Dr. Johnson exhibited great, and perhaps gloomy anxiety, which, however, under the gradual effect of religious contemplations and devotional exercises, gave way to more comfortable and devout feelings, a lively faith in the propitiatory merits of his Redeemer. In this tranquil disposition the last days of his life seem to have been passed, and in this Christian confidence it is believed that he died. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> See ante, p. 804. — C.

asked why he had not read it. He begged me repeatedly to let his present situation have due effect upon me; and advised me, when I got home, to note down in writing what had passed between us, adding, that what a man writes in that manner dwells upon his mind. He said many things that I cannot now recollect, but all delivered with the utmost fervour of religious zeal and personal affection. Between nine and ten o'clock his servant Francis came up stairs; he then said we would all go to prayers, and, desiring me to kneel down by his bed-side, he repeated several prayers with great devotion. I then took my leave. He then pressed me to think of all he had said, and to commit it to writing. I assured him I would. He seized my hand with much warmth, and repeated, "Promise me you will do it!" on which we parted, and I engaged to see him the next day.

Sunday, Nov. 21. — About noon I again visited him; found him rather better and easier, his spirits more raised, and his conversation more disposed to general subjects. When I came in, he asked if I had done what he desired (meaning the noting down what passed the night before); and upon my saying that I had, he pressed my hand and said earnestly, "Thank you." Our discourse then grew more cheerful. He told me, with apparent pleasure, that he heard the Empress of Russia had ordered "The Rambler" to be translated into the Russian language, and that a copy would be sent him. [p. 755.] Before we parted, he put into my hands a little book, by Fleetwood, on the Sacrament, which he told me he had been the means of introducing to the University of Oxford by recommending it to a young student there.

Monday, Nov. 22. — Visited the Doctor; found him seemingly better of his complaints, but extremely low and dejected. I sat by him till he fell asleep, and soon after left him, as he seemed little disposed to talk; and, on my going away, he said, emphatically, "I am very poorly indeed!"

Tuesday, Nov. 23. — Called about eleven; the Doctor not up: Mrs. Gardiner in the dining-room; the Doctor soon came to us, and seemed more cheerful than the day before. He spoke of his design to invite a Mrs. Hall [Wesley's sister] to be with him, and to offer her Mrs. Williams's room. Called again about three; found him quite oppressed with company that morning, therefore left him directly.

Wednesday, Nov. 24. — Called about seven in the evening; found him very ill and very low indeed. He said a thought had struck him that his rapid decline of health and strength might be partly owing to the town air, and spoke of getting a lodging at Islington. I sat with him till past nine, and then took my leave.

Thursday, Nov. 25. — About three in the afternoon was told that he had desired that day to see no company. In the evening, about eight, called with Mr. Nicol<sup>1</sup>, and, to our great surprise, we found him then setting out for Islington, to the Rev. Mr. Strahan's. He could scarce speak. We went with him down the court to the coach. He was accompanied by his servant Frank and Mr. Lowe the painter. I offered myself to go with him, but he declined it.

Friday, Nov. 26. — Called at his house about eleven; heard he was much better, and had a better night than he had known a great while, and was expected home that day. Called again in the afternoon — not so well as he was, nor expected home that night.

Saturday, Nov. 27. — Called again about noon; heard he was much worse; went immediately to Islington, where I found him extremely bad, and scarce able to speak, with the asthma. Sir John Hawkins, the Rev. Mr. Strahan, and Mrs. Strahan, were with him. Observing that we said little, he desired that we would not constrain ourselves, though he was not able to talk with us. Soon after he said he had something to say to Sir John Hawkins, on which we immediately went down into the parlour. Sir John soon followed us, and said he had been speaking about his will. Sir John started the idea of proposing to him to make it on the spot; that Sir John should dictate it, and that I should write it. He went up to propose it, and soon came down with the Doctor's acceptance. The will was then begun; but before we proceeded far, it being necessary, on account of some alteration, to begin again, Sir John asked the Doctor whether he would choose to make any introductory declaration respecting his faith. The Doctor said he would. Sir John further asked if he would make any declaration of his being of the church of England: to which the Doctor said "No!" but, taking a pen, he wrote on a paper the following words, which he delivered to Sir John, desiring him to keep it: —

"I commit to the infinite mercies of Almighty God my soul, polluted with many sins; but purified, I trust, with repentance and the death of Jesus Christ." While he was at Mr. Strahan's, Dr. Brocklesby came in, and Dr. Johnson put the question to him, whether he thought he could live six weeks? to which Dr. Brocklesby returned a very doubtful answer, and soon left us. After dinner the will was finished, and about six we came to town in Sir John Hawkins's carriage: Sir John, Dr. Johnson, Mr. Ryland (who came in after dinner), and myself. The Doctor appeared much better in the way home, and talked pretty cheerfully.

Sunday, Nov. 28. — Went to Dr. Johnson's about two o'clock; met Mrs. Hoole coming from thence, as he was asleep; took her back with me, found Sir John Hawkins with him. The Doctor's conversation tolerably cheerful. Sir John reminded him that he had expressed a desire to leave some small memorials to his friends, particularly a Polyglot Bible to Mr. Langton; and asked if they should add the codicil then. The Doctor replied, "he had forty things to add, but could not do it at that time." Sir John then took his leave. Mr. Sastres came next into the dining-room, where I was with Mrs. Hoole. Dr. Johnson hearing that Mrs. Hoole was in the next room, desired to see her. He received her with great affection, took her by the hand, and said nearly these words: — "I feel great tenderness for you: think of the situation in which you see me, profit by it, and God Almighty keep you for Jesus Christ's sake. Amen." He then asked if we would both stay and dine with him. Mrs. Hoole said she could not; but I agreed to stay. Upon my saying to the Doctor that Dr. Heberden would sit with him that afternoon, his answer was, "God has called me, and Dr. Heberden comes to late." Soon after this Dr. Heberden came. While he was there, we heard, from the other room, in earnest discourse, and found that they were talking over the affairs of the King and Queen. — Dr. Hoole heard Dr. Heberden say, "All you did was extremely proper." After Dr. Heberden was gone, Mr. Sastres and I returned into the chamber. Dr. Johnson complained that sleep this day had powerful dominion over him, that he waked with great difficulty, and that probably he should go off in one of these paroxysms. Afterwards he said that he hoped his sleep was the effect of opium, taken some days before, which might not be worked off. We dined together — the Doctor, Mr. Sastres, Mrs. Davis, and myself. He ate a pretty good dinner with seeming appetite, but appearing rather impatient; and being asked unnecessary and tedious questions, he said he often thought of Maebeth, — "Question engages him." He retired immediately after dinner, and we soon went to bed. He said little, but dozed at times. At six he ordered tea for us, and we went out to drink it with Mrs. Davis; but the Doctor drank none. The Rev. Dr. Taylor, of Ashbourne, came soon after, and Dr. Johnson desired our attendance at prayers, which were read by Dr. Taylor. Mr. Ryland came and sat some time with him; he thought him much better. Mr. Sastres and I continued with him the remainder of the evening, when he exhorted Mr. Sastres in nearly these words: — "There is no one who has shown me more attention than you have done, and it is now right you should claim some attention from me. You are a young man, and are to struggle through life; you are in a profession that I dare say you will exercise with great fidelity and innocence; but let me exhort you always to think of my situation, which must one day be yours; always remember that life is short, and that eternity never ends! I say nothing of your religion; for if you conscientiously keep to it, I have little doubt but you may be saved; if you read the controversy, I think we have the right on our side; but if you do not read it, he not persuaded, from any worldly consideration, to alter the religion in which you were educated: change not, but from a conviction of reason." He then most strongly entered the motives of virtue and piety from the consideration of a future state of reward and punishment, and concluded with "Remember all this, and God bless you! Write down what I have said — I think you are the third person I have bid do this."<sup>2</sup> At ten o'clock he dismissed us, thanking us for a visit which he said could not have been very pleasant to us.

Monday, Nov. 29. — Called with my son [the Clergyman] about eleven; saw the Doctor, who said, "You must not now stay;" but, as we were going away, he said, "I will get Mr. Hoole to come next Wednesday and read the Litany to me, and do you and Mrs. Hoole come with him." He appeared very ill. Returning from the city I called again to inquire, and heard that Dr. Butler was with him. In the evening, about eight, called again, and just saw him; but did not stay, as Mr. Langton was with him on business. I met Sir Joshua Reynolds going away.

Tuesday, Nov. 30. — Called twice this morning, but did not see him; he was much the same. In the evening, between six and seven, went to his house; found there Mr. Langton, Mr. Sastres, and Mr. Ryland; the Doctor being asleep in the chamber, we went all to tea and coffee; when the Doctor came in to us rather cheerful, and entering said, "Dear gentlemen, how do you do?" He drank coffee, and, in the course of the conversation, said that he recollected a poem of his, made some years ago on a young gentleman coming of age. [p. 806.] He repeated the whole with great spirit:

1 Mr. George Nicol, of Pall Mall. — J. HOOLE.

2 This alludes to an application made for an increase to his pension, to enable him to go to Italy. — J. HOOLE.

3 Sic; probably an error of the press for C — r, meaning the Lord Chancellor: see ante, p. 788. — CROKER.

4 Mr. Sastres was a Roman Catholic. Johnson, we have seen, left him in his will £5 to buy books of piety. — CROKER, 1847.

5 The other two were Dr. Brocklesby and myself. — J. HOOLE.

it consisted of about fifteen or sixteen stanzas of four lines, in alternate rhyme. He said he had only repeated it once since he composed it, and that he never gave but one copy. He said several excellent things that evening, and among the rest, that "scruples made many men miserable, but few men good." He spoke of the affliction that men had to accuse themselves of petty faults or weaknesses, in order to exalt themselves into notice for any extraordinary talents which they might possess; and instanced Waller, which he said he would record if he lived to revise his life. Waller was accustomed to say that his memory was so bad he would sometimes forget to repeat his grace at table, or the Lord's Prayer, perhaps that people might wonder at what he did else of great moment; for the Doctor observed, that no man takes upon himself small blemishes without supposing that great abilities are attributed to him; and that, in short, this affectation of candour or modesty was but another kind of indirect self-praise, and had its foundation in vanity. Frank bringing him a note, as he opened it he said an odd thought struck him, that "one should receive no letters in the grave."<sup>1</sup>

His talk was in general very serious and devout, though occasionally cheerful: he said, "You are all serious men, and I will tell you something. About two years since I feared that I had neglected God, and that then I had not a minut to give him; on which I set about to read Thomas à Kempis in Low Dutch, which I accomplished, and thence I judged that my mind was not impaired, Low Dutch having no affinity with any of the languages which I knew." With respect to his recovery, he seemed to think it hopeless. There was to be a consultation of physicians next day: he wished to have his legs scarified to let out the water; but this his medical friends opposed, and he submitted to their opinion, though he said he was not satisfied. At half past eight he dismissed us all but Mr. Langton. I first asked him if my son should attend him next day, to read the Litany, as he had desired; but he declined it on account of the expected consultation. We went away, leaving Mr. Langton and Mr. Desmoulin, a young man who was employed in copying his Latin epigrams.

Wednesday, Dec. 1.—At his house in the evening: drank tea and coffee; with Mr. Sastres, Mr. Desmoulin, and Mr. Hall<sup>2</sup>: went into the Doctor's chamber after tea, when he gave me an epitaph to copy, written by him for his father, mother, and brother. He continued much the same.

Thursday, Dec. 2.—Called in the morning, and left the epigram; with him in the evening about seven; found Mr. Langton and Mr. Desmoulin; did not see the Doctor; he was in his chamber, and afterwards engaged with Dr. Scott.

Friday, Dec. 3.—Called; but he wished not to see any body. Consultations of physicians to be held that day: called again in the evening; found Mr. Langton with him; Mr. Sastres and I went together into his chamber; he was extremely low. "I am very bad indeed, dear gentlemen," he said; "very bad, very low, very cold, and I think I find my life to fall." In about a quarter of an hour he dismissed Mr. Sastres and me; but called me back again, and said that next Sunday, if he lived, he designed to take the sacrament, and wished me, my wife, and son to be there. We left Mr. Langton with him.

Saturday, Dec. 4.—Called on him about three: he was much the same; did not see him, he had much company that day. Called in the evening with Mr. Sastres about eight; found he was not disposed for company; Mr. Langton with him; did not see him.

Sunday, Dec. 5.—Went to Bolt Court with Mrs. Hoole after eleven; found there Sir John Hawkins, Rev. Mr. Strahan, Mrs. Gardiner, and Mr. Desmoulin, in the dining-room. After some time the Doctor came to us from the chamber, and saluted us all, thanking us for this visit to him. He said he found himself very bad, but hoped he should go well through the duty which he was about to do. The sacrament was then administered to all present, Frank being of the number. The Doctor repeatedly desired Mr. Strahan to speak louder; seeming very anxious not to lose any part of the service, in which he joined in very great fervour of devotion. The service over, he again thanked us all for attending him on the occasion; he said he had taken some opium to enable him to support the fatigue; he seemed quite spent, and lay in his chair some time in a kind of doze; he then got up and retired into his chamber. Mr. Ryland then called on him. I was with him: he said to Mr. Ryland, "I have taken my victimum: I hope I shall arrive safe at the end of my journey, and be accepted at last." He spoke very despondingly several times: Mr. Ryland comforted him, observing that "we had great hopes given us." "Yes," he replied, "we have hopes given us; but they are conditional, and I know not how far I have fulfilled those conditions." He afterwards said, "However, I think that I have now corrected all bad and vicious habits." Sir Joshua Reynolds called on him: we left them together. Sir Joshua being gone, he called Mr. Ryland and me again to him: he continued talking very seriously, and repeated a prayer or collect with great fervour, when Mr. Ryland took his leave. My son came to us from his church; we were at dinner.—Dr. Johnson, Mrs. Gardiner, myself, Mrs. Hoole, my son, and Mr. Desmoulin. He ate a tolerable dinner, but retired directly after dinner. He had looked out a sermon of Dr. Clarke's, "On the Shortness of Life," for me to read to him after dinner, but he was too ill to hear it. After six o'clock he called us all into his room, when he dismissed us for that night with a prayer, delivered as he sat in his great chair in the most fervent and affecting manner, his mind appearing wholly employed with the thoughts of another life. He told Mr. Ryland that he wished not to come to God with opium, but that he hoped he had been properly attentive. He said before us all, that when he recovered the last spring, he had only called it a reprieve, but that he did think it was for a longer time; however he hoped the time that had been prolonged to him might be the means of bringing forth fruit meet for repentance.

Monday, Dec. 6.—Sent in the morning to make inquiry after him; he was much the same; called in the evening; found Mr. Cruikshanks the surgeon with him; he said he had been that day quarrelling with all his physicians; he appeared in tolerable spirits.

Tuesday, Dec. 7.—Called at dinner time; saw him eat a very good dinner: he seemed rather better, and in spirits.

Wednesday, Dec. 8.—Went with Mrs. Hoole and my son, by appointment; found him very poorly and low, after a very bad night. Mr. Nichols the printer was there. My son read the Litany, the Doctor several times urging him to speak louder. After prayers Mr. Langton came in; much serious discourse: he warned us all to profit by his situation; and, applying to me, who stood next him, exhorted me to lead a better life than he had done. "A better life than you, my dear Sir!" I repeated. He replied warmly, "Don't complain now." He told Mr. Langton that he had the night before enforced on ———<sup>3</sup> a powerful argument to a powerful objection against Christianity.

He had often thought it might seem strange that the Jews, who refused belief to the doctrine supported by the miracles of our Saviour, should after his death raise a numerous church; Mr. Cruikshanks the surgeon had a temporal prince, and with this idea the multitude was actuated when they strewed his way with palm-branches on his entry into Jerusalem; but finding their expectations afterwards disappointed, rejected him, till in process of time, comparing all the circumstances and prophecies of the Old Testament, confirmed in the New, many were converted; that the Apostles themselves once believed him to be a temporal prince. He said that he had always been struck with the resemblance of the Jewish passover and the Christian doctrine of redemption. He thanked us all for our attendance, and we left him with Mr. Langton.

Thursday, Dec. 9.—Called in the evening; did not see him, as he was engaged.

Friday, Dec. 10.—Called about eleven in the morning; saw Mr. La Trobe there<sup>4</sup>: neither of us saw the Doctor, as we understood he wished not to be visited that day. In the evening I sent him a letter, recommending Dr. Dalloway (an irregular physician) as an extraordinary person for curing the dropsy. He returned me a verbal answer that he was obliged to me, but that it was too late. My son read prayers with him this day.

Saturday, Dec. 11.—Went to Bolt Court about twelve; met there Dr. Burney, Dr. Taylor, Sir John Hawkins, Mr. Sastres, Mr. Paradise, Count Zenobia, and Mr. Langton. Mrs. Hoole called for me there; we both went to him; he received us very kindly; told me he had my letter, but "it was too late for doctors, regular or irregular." His physicians had been with him that day, but prescribed nothing. Mr. Cruikshanks came; the Doctor was rather cheerful with him; he said, "Come, give me your hand," and shook him by the hand, adding, "You shall make no other use of it now;" meaning he should not examine his legs. Mr. Cruikshanks wished to do it, but the Doctor would not let him. Mr. Cruikshanks said he would call in the evening.

Sunday, Dec. 12.—Was not at Bolt Court in the forenoon; at St. Sepulchre's school in the evening with Mrs. Hoole, where we saw Mrs. Gardiner and Lady Roties; heard that Dr. Johnson was very bad, and had been something delirious. Went to Bolt Court about nine, and found there Mr. Windham and the Rev. Mr. Strahan. The Doctor was then very bad in bed, which I think he had only taken to that day; he had now refused to take any more medicine or food. Mr. Cruikshanks came about eleven; he endeavoured to persuade him to take some nourishment, but in vain. Mr. Windham then went again to him, and by the advice of Mr. Cruikshanks, put it upon this footing,—that by persisting to refuse all sustenance he might probably <sup>1</sup> This note was from Mr. Davies the bookseller, and mentioned a present of some pork; upon which the Doctor said, in a manner that seemed as if he thought it ill-timed, "Too much of this," or some such expression. — J. HOOLE.

<sup>2</sup> Probably an error of the press for Mrs. Hall. — CROKER.

<sup>3</sup> No doubt Mr. Windham; see ante, his Journal, 7th Dec. p. 838. — CROKER.

<sup>4</sup> See ante, p. 805, n. 3.

defeat his own purpose to preserve his mind clear, as his weakness might bring on paralytic complaints that might affect his mental powers. The Doctor, Mr. Windham said, heard him patiently; but when he had heard all, he desired to be troubled no more. He then took a most affectionate leave of Mr. Windham, who reported to us the issue of the conversation, for only Mr. Desmoulin's was with them in the chamber. I did not see the Doctor that day, being fearful of disturbing him, and never conversed with him again. I came away about half past eleven with Mr. Windham.

Monday, Dec. 13. — Went to Bolt Court at eleven o'clock in the morning; met a young lady coming down stairs from the Doctor, whom, upon inquiry, I found to be Miss Morris (a sister to Miss Morris, formerly on the stage). Mrs. Desmoulin told me that she had seen the Doctor; that by her desire he had been told she came to ask his blessing, and that he said, "God bless you!" I then went up into his chamber, and found him lying very composed in a kind of doze; he spoke to nobody. Sir John Hawkins, Mr. Langton, Mrs. Gardiner, Rev. Mr. Strahan and Mrs. Strahan, Doctors Brocklesby and Butler, Mr. Stevens, and Mr. Nichols the orator, came; but no one chose to disturb him by speaking to him, and he seemed to take no notice of any person. While Mrs. Gardiner and I were there, before the rest came, he took a little warm milk in a cup, when he said something upon its not being properly given into his hand; he breathed very regular, though short, and appeared to be mostly in a calm sleep or dozing. I left him in this state, and never more saw him alive. In the evening I supped with Mrs. Hoole and my son at Mr. Brathwaite's, and at night my servant brought me word that my dearest friend died that evening about seven o'clock; and next morning I went to the house, where I met Mr. Seward; we went together into the chamber, and there saw the most awful sight of Dr. Johnson laid out in his bed, without life!

JOHN HOOLE.

No. VII.

LESSON IN BIOGRAPHY; OR, HOW TO WRITE THE LIFE OF ONE'S FRIEND.

An Extract from the Life of Dr. Pozz, in ten volumes folio, written by James Bozz, Esq., who flourished with him near fifty years.

BY ALEXANDER CHALMERS, ESQ.

Among the numerous parodies and jeux d'esprit which Mr. Boswell's work produced, this pleasantry from the pen of my old friend Mr. Alexander Chalmers, which appeared in the periodical publications of the day, is worth preserving; for it is not merely a good pleasantry, but a fair criticism of some of the lighter parts of the work. — CHUCKEN.

We dined at the chop-house. Dr. Pozz was this day very instructive. We talked of books. I mentioned the History of Tommy Trip. I said it was a great work. Pozz. "Yes, Sir, it is a great work; but, Sir, it is a great work relatively; it was a great work to you when you was a little boy; but now, Sir, you are a great man, and Tommy Trip is a little boy." I felt somewhat hurt at this comparison, and I believe he perceived it; for, as he was squeezing a lemon, he said, "Never be affronted at a comparison. I have been compared to many things, but I never was affronted. No, Sir, if they would call me a dog, and you a canister tied to my tail, I would not be affronted."

Chcered by this kind mention of me, though in such a situation, I asked him what he thought of a friend of ours, who was always making comparisons. Pozz. "Sir, that fellow has a simile for every thing but himself. I knew him when he kept a shop; he then made money, Sir, and now he makes comparisons. Sir, he would say that you and I were two figs stuck together; two figs in adhesion, Sir; and then he would laugh." Bozz. "But have not some great writers determined that comparisons are now and then odious?" Pozz. "No, Sir, not odious in themselves, not odious as comparisons; the fellows who make them are odious. The Whigs make comparisons."

We supped that evening at his house. I showed him some lines I had made upon a pair of breeches. Pozz. "Sir, the lines are good; but where could you find such a subject in your country?" Bozz. "Therefore it is a proof of invention, which is a characteristic of poetry." Pozz. "Yes, Sir, but an invention which few of your countrymen can enjoy." I reflected afterwards on the depth of this remark; it affords a proof of that acuteness which he displayed in every branch of literature. I asked him if he approved of green spectacles? Pozz. "As to green spectacles, Sir, the question seems to be this: if I wore green spectacles, it would be because they assisted vision, or because I liked them. Now, Sir, if a man tells me he does not like green spectacles, and that they hurt his eyes, I would not compel him to wear them. No, Sir, I would dissuade him." A few months after, I consulted him again on this subject, and he honoured me with a letter, in which he gives the same opinion. It will be found in its proper place, Vol. VI. p. 279. I have thought much on this subject, and must confess that in such matters a man ought to be a free moral agent.

Next day I left town, and was absent for six weeks, three days, and seven hours, as I find by a memorandum in my journal. In this time I had only one letter from him, which is as follows:—

"TO JAMES BOZZ, ESQ.

"DEAR SIR,—My bowels have been very bad. Pray buy me some Turkey rhubarb, and bring with you a copy of your 'Tour'."

"Write to me soon, and write to me often. I am, dear Sir, yours, affectionately,

It would have been unpardonable to have omitted a letter like this, in which we see so much of his great and illuminated mind. On my return to town, we met again at the chop-house. We had much conversation to-day: his wit flashed like lightning; indeed, there is not one hour of my present life in which I do not profit by some of his valuable communications.

We talked of wind. I said I knew many persons much distressed with that complaint. Pozz. "Yes Sir, when confined, when pent up." I said I did not know that, but I questioned if the Romans ever knew it. Pozz. "Yes, Sir, the Romans knew it." Bozz. "Livy does not mention it." Pozz. "No, Sir. Livy wrote History. Livy was not writing the Life of a Friend."

On medical subjects his knowledge was immense. He told me of a friend of ours who had just been attacked by a most dreadful complaint; he had entirely lost the use of his limbs, so that he could neither stand nor walk, unless supported; his speech was quite gone; his eyes were much swollen, and every vein distended, yet his face was rather pale, and his extremities cold; his pulse beat 160 in a minute. I said, with tenderness, that I would go and see him; and, said I, "Sir, I will take Dr. Bolus with me." Pozz. "No, Sir, don't go." I was startled, for I knew his compassionate heart, and earnestly asked why? Pozz. "Sir, you don't know his disorder." Bozz. "Pray what is it?" Pozz. "Sir, the man is—dead drunk!" This explanation threw me into a violent fit of laughter, in which he joined me, rolling about as he used to do when he enjoyed a joke; but he afterwards checked me. Pozz. "Sir, you ought not to laugh at what I said. Sir, he who laughs at what another man says, will soon learn to laugh at that other man. Sir, you should laugh only at your own jokes; you should laugh seldom."

We talked of a friend of ours who was a very violent politician. I said I did not like his company. Pozz. "No, Sir, he is not healthy; he is sore, Sir; his mind is ulcerated; he has a political whitlow; Sir, you cannot touch him without giving him pain. Sir, I would not talk politics with that man; I would talk of cabbage and peas; Sir, I would ask him how he got his corn in, and whether his wife was with child; but I would not talk politics." Bozz. "But perhaps, Sir, he would talk of nothing else." Pozz. "Then, Sir, it is plain what he would do." On my very earnestly inquiring what that was, Dr. Pozz answered, "Sir, he would let it alone."

I mentioned a tradesman who had lately set up his crutch. Pozz. "He is right, Sir; a man who would go on swimmingly cannot get too soon off his legs. That man keeps his coach. Now, Sir, a coach is better than a chaise, Sir—it is better than a chariot." Bozz. "Why, Sir?" Pozz. "Sir, it will hold more." I begged he would repeat this, that I might remember it, and he complied with great good humour. "Dr. Pozz," said I, "you ought to keep a coach." Pozz. "Yes, Sir, I ought." Bozz. "But you do not, and that has often surprised me." Pozz. "Surprised you! There, Sir, is another prejudice of absurdity. Sir, you ought to be surprised at nothing. A man that has lived half your days ought to be above all surprise. Sir, it is a rule with me never to be surprised. It is mere ignorance; you cannot guess why I do not keep a coach, and you are surprised. Now, Sir, if you did know you would not be surprised." I said, tenderly, "I hope, my dear Sir, you will let me know before I leave town." Pozz. "Yes, Sir, you shall know now. You shall not go to Mr. Wilkins, and to Mr. Jenkins, and to Mr. Stubbs, and say, why does not Pozz keep a coach? I will tell you myself—Sir, I can't afford it."

We talked of drinking. I asked him whether, in the course of his long and valuable life, he had not known some men who drank more than they could bear? Pozz. "Yes, Sir; and then, Sir, nobody could bear them. A man who is drunk, Sir, is a very foolish fellow." Bozz. "But, Sir, as the poet says, 'he is devoid of all care.'" Pozz. "Yes, Sir, he cares for nobody; he has none of the cares of life: he cannot be a merchant, Sir, for he cannot write his name; he cannot be a politician, Sir, for he cannot talk; he cannot be an artist, Sir, for he cannot see; and yet, Sir, there is science in drinking." Bozz. "I suppose you mean that a man ought to know what he drinks." Pozz. "No, Sir, to know what one drinks is nothing; but the science consists of three parts. Now, Sir, were I to drink wine, I should wish to know them all; I should wish to know when I had too little, when I had enough, and when I had too much. There is our friend ***** (mentioning a gentleman of our acquaintance); he knows when he has too little, and when he has too much, but he knows not when he has enough. Now, Sir, that is the science of drinking, to know when one has enough."

We talked this day on a variety of topics, but I find very few memorandums in my journal. On small beer, he said it was flatulent liquor. He disapproved of those who deny the utility of absolute power, and seemed to be offended with a friend of ours who would always have his eggs poached. Sign-posts, he observed, had degenerated within his memory; and he particularly found fault with the moral of the "Beggar's Opera." I endeavoured to defend a work which had afforded me so much pleasure, but could not master that strength of mind with which he argued; and it was with great satisfaction that he communicated to me afterwards a method of curing corns by applying a piece of oiled silk. In the early history of the world he preferred Sir Isaac Newton's Chronology; but as they gave employment to useful artisans, he did not dislike the large buckles then coming into use.

Next day we dined at the Mitre. I mentioned spirits. Pozz. "Sir, there is as much evidence for the existence of spirits as against it." You may not believe it, but you cannot deny it. I told him that my great grandmother once saw a spirit. He asked me to relate it, which I did very minutely, while he listened with profound attention. When I mentioned that the spirit once appeared in the shape of a shoulder of mutton, and another time in that of a tea-pot, he interrupted me:—Pozz. "There, Sir, is the point; the evidence is good, but the scheme is defective in consistency. We cannot deny that the spirit appeared in these shapes; but then we cannot reconcile them. What has a tea-pot to do with a shoulder of mutton? Neither is it a terrific object. There is nothing contemporaneous. Sir, these are objects which are not seen at the same time nor in the same place." Bozz. "I think, Sir, that old women in general are used to see ghosts." Pozz. "Yes, Sir, and their conversation is full of the subject: I would have an old woman to record such conversations; their loquacity tends to minuteness."

We talked of a person who had a very bad character. Pozz. "Sir, he is a scoundrel." Bozz. "I hate a scoundrel." Pozz. "There you are wrong; don't hate scoundrels. Scoundrels, Sir, are useful. There are many things we cannot do without scoundrels. I would not choose to keep company with scoundrels, but something may be got from them." Bozz. "Are not scoundrels generally fools?" Pozz. "No, Sir, they are not. A scoundrel must be a clever fellow; he must know many things of which a fool is ignorant. Any man may be a fool. I think a good book might be made out of scoundrels. I would have a Biographia Flagitiosa, the Lives of Eminent Scoundrels, from the earliest accounts to the present day." I mentioned hanging: I thought it a very awkward situation. Pozz. "No, Sir, hanging is not an awkward situation; it is proper, Sir, that a man whose actions tend towards flagitious obliquity should appear perpendicular at last." I told him that I had lately been in company with some gentlemen, every one of whom could recollect some friend or other who had been hanged. Pozz. "Yes, Sir, that is the easiest way. We know those who have been hanged; we can recollect that: but we cannot number those who deserve it; it would not be decorous, Sir, in a mixed company." No, Sir, that is one of the few things which we are compelled to think."

Our regard for literary property prevents our making a larger extract from the above important work. We have, however, we hope, given such passages as will tend to impress our readers with a high idea of this vast undertaking.—Note by Mr. Chalmers.

NO. VIII.

ON MR. LATROBE'S INTERCOURSE WITH DR. JOHNSON, IN REFERENCE TO NOTE 3 OF MR. CROKER, ON PAGE 805.

"If memories are sometimes treacherous, diaries are often defective, and commentaries anything but infallible. The late Rev. C. J. La Probe, writing nearly half a century after Dr. Johnson's death, forgets that his father's return from Yorkshire took place nearly four days previous to that event, and speaks, therefore, of only one visit paid by him to his dying friend. Mr. Hoole, who appears not to have been with the Doctor at the time of his decease, omits to mention in his diary, that Mr. LaTrobe not only called at the Doctor's residence, but that he actually saw him, a very few hours before he expired, on the evening of the 13th of December. The fact of such a visit having been paid, is proved by a letter of my grandfather's to an official correspondent in Germany, dated the 14th of December, which I have myself seen, and in which the circumstance is briefly but distinctly recorded. Nor can there be any doubt, that this visit was intermediate between that of Miss Morris,—to whom Dr. Johnson is said to have addressed the last audible words,—and the hour of 7 P.M., when he is stated to have ceased to breathe. (See p. 807.) As my grandfather's residence in Fetter Lane was hardly five minutes' walk from the Doctor's in Bolt Court, it is more than probable, that the call of the former on the 10th of December, mentioned by Mr. Hoole, and that on the 13th, referred to by himself, were not the only ones, during an interval of four days. At all events, it is sufficiently plain, that Mr. Croker's conclusion, founded on my father's mistake, and Mr. Hoole's omission, is hasty and incorrect."—Rev. P. LATROBE. 1859.

<sup>1</sup> This alludes to the jealousy about copyright, which Mr. Boswell carried so far that he actually printed separately, and entered at Stationers' Hall, Johnson's Letter to Lord Chesterfield and the account of Johnson's Conversation with George III. at Buckingham House, to prevent his rivals making use of them.—CROKER.

INDEX.

- Aberbrothick, 286.
 Abercrombie, Mr., of Philadelphia, 247, 259.
 Aberdeen, 200. Johnson's account of, 341.
 —, butter, duel fought for the honour of, 334.
 —, William, Earl of, 305.
 —, George, Earl of, note on Thucydides and Homer, 608.
 Aberdonians, 294.
 Abernethy, Rev. John, 285. Doctor, 754.
 Abingdon, Earl of, bon-mot of, 631.
 —, Mrs., the actress, 437, 438, 440, 447.
 Abjuration, oath of, 437.
 Abridgments of works, 286.
 Absenteeism, 553, 579.
 Absolute princes, 454.
 Abstain and refrain, distinction between, 159.
 Abstemiousness, Johnson's, 28, 159, 174, 187, 239, 270, 336, 354, 362, 448, 480, 502, 597, 678.
 Absurdities, use of delineating, 659.
 Abuse, 763. personal, 194, 304.
 —, Johnson's disregard of, 624, 663.
 Abyssinia, Lobo's voyage to, 21, 283, 496.
 Academy, Della Crusca send Johnson their vocabulary, 98.
 Accent, Scotch, overcome by perseverance, 292.
 Accounts, keeping, 716.
 Achilles, shield of, 664.
 Acis and Galatea, 577.
 Acquaintances, 98, 716, 791.
 —, Johnson's numerous, 501, 733. list of, 79, 81.
 Acting, 742. tragic, 275.
 Action, in public speaking, 249.
 Active sports in young people, not idleness, 9.
 Activity of body, Johnson's, 451. of mind, 610.
 Actor, qualities of a great, 522.
 Actors, 51, 62, 205, 257, 274, 467, 556, 742.
 —, Johnson's prejudice against, 51, 62, 656, 657, 742.
 Adair's account of America, 457.
 Adams, Rev. Dr. William, Master of Pembroke College, Oxford, 12, 13, 17, 38, 51, 57, 60, 86, 87, 93, 165, 388, 424, 482, 736, 763, 792.
 —, his account of the first representation of "Irene," 60.
 —, his answer to Hume's Essay on Miracles, 482.
 —, Johnson's Letter to, 782.
 —, Miss, afterwards Mrs. Hyett, 761.
 —, George, dedication of Treatise on the Clashes, 187.
 Addison, Joseph, 8, 55, 63, 71, 72, 145, 153, 170, 255, 263, 277, 290, 372, 446, 484, 504, 509, 546, 573, 591, 662, 679, 800.
 —, his "Notanda," 63. "Remarks on Italy," 372, 446.
 —, style, 71. conduct towards Steele, 671, 684. Johnson's opinion of, 71, 145, 611. Johnson's Life of, 671.
 Address of the Painters to George the Third, 119.
 Adey, Mrs., 193, 197, 623, 631. Miss, 6, 197, 490, 639.
 Admiration, 450.
 —, "Adventurer," Hawkesworth's, 64, 75, 77, 81, 82, 107.
 —, the papers marked T, written by Johnson, 64, 81.
 "Adventures of a Guinea," by whom written, 359.
 "Adversaria," specimen of Johnson's, 64.
 Adversaries, not to be treated with respect, 272.
 Advertisements, Johnson's, in the Gent. Mag. 25, 48. in the Universal Chronicle, 116. in the Edinburgh papers, 407.
 Adultery, 192.
 Ægri Ephemeris, Johnson's, 794.
 Æneid, story of the, 731.
 Æschylus, Potter's translation of, 582.
 Affectation, 402, 662. in writing, 346.
 —, of familiarity with the great, 674.
 Affection, natural, 269, 650, 728.
 —, Johnson's, for Miss Boothby, 20, 672.
 Agar, Welbore Ellis, Esq., 533.
 Age, old, 559, 581, 610, 613, 661, 718, 785, 832.
 —, "Actus," Home's Tragedy of, 332.
 —, "Aglaura," Suckling's play of, 603.
 Agutter, Rev. W., 759. sermon on Johnson's death, 808.
 Aikin, Miss (Barbauld) 469, 552. imitates Johnson, 552.
 Air-bath, Lord Monboddo's, 550.
 Akenside, Dr. Mark, 121, 234, 495, 504.
 Akerman, Mr., keeper of Newgate, anecdotes of, 648.
 Alberti Leandro, description of Italy, 372, 446.
 Alchemy, 456.
 Alcibiades, 585. his dog, 573.
 Aldrich, Rev. Mr., 138.
 Alfred, Johnson's wish to write his Life, 54, his will, 698.
 "Alias," Johnson's exemplification of the word, 730.
 Allen, Rev. Thomas, 396.
 Allen, Edmund, the printer, 108, 113, 160, 366, 541, 586, 601, 681, 783, 789. Johnson's letters to, 699, 734.
 —, Ralph, Esq., 289.
 "All for Love," Dryden's preface to, 691.
 Almack's, 501, 613.
 Alwick Castle, 587.
 Althorpe, Lord and Lady. See Spencer.
 "Amelia," Fielding's, 508.
 Ambition, 507.
 America and the Americans, 428, 429, 433, 562, 563, 598, 602, 651, 680, 681, 719, 758.
 Amusements, 837. Country, 370. A man known by his, 768.
 Amyot, Dr., 127.
 Anyot, Mr. Thomas, 839.
 "Ana," the French, 372, 605.
 Anacreon, Baxter's, 396, 712.
 —, dove of, translated by Johnson and Fawkes, 548.
 Anatis, temple of, 337, 338.
 Analogy between body and mind, 12.
 —, "Anatomy of Melancholy," Burton's, 12, 217, 482.
 Ancestry, 229.
 "Ancient Ballads," Dr. Percy's, 137.
 Ancient times, not better than modern, 730.
 Anderson, M. S. S., 57, 792, 799.
 Anderson, Professor, at Glasgow, 393, 531.
 —, Dr. Robert, his Life of Johnson, 8, 27, 35, 61, 72, 135, 188, 231, 277, 357, 425.
 —, Mr., his "Sketches of the Native Irish," 231.
 Andrews, Dr. Francis, Provost of Dublin College, 168.
 Androcles, 243.
 Anecdotes, Johnson's love of, 275.
 —, Piazzi's general accuracy of, 780.
 —, at second hand, little to be relied on, 805.
 "Anfractuosities" of the human mind, 655.
 Angel, Mr. John, his "Stenography," 254.
 —, fallen, 737.
 Angus More, 353.
 Anne, Queen, 74, 151, 187, 411, 489.
 —, wits of her reign, 203, 610.
 Annihilation, 545, 565.
 "Animus aquus," not inheritable, 397.
 Anonymous writings, 625.
 "Annus mirabilis," Tasker's, 714.
 Anson, Lord, 624. Johnson's epigram on, 624.
 —, "Anthologia," 794.
 Antics, 165.
 Antiquarian researches, 669.
 Apelles, the Venus of, 688.
 Apocrypha, 555.
 "Apology," Cibber's, 136, 206, 516.
 "Apology for the Quakers," Barclay's, 487.
 Apology, Johnson ready to make one, 770, 833.
 Apollonius Rhodius, 95.
 Apophthegms, or anecdotes of Johnson, Hawkins's, 771.
 Apostolic ordination, 299.
 "Apotheosis of Milton," not written by Johnson, 40.
 Apparitions, 116, 138, 175, 128, 234, 239, 241, 684, 685.
 Appetite, riders out in quest of, 299.
 Appus, Cicero's character of, applied to Johnson, 791.
 Applause, 664.
 April fool's day, 530.
 Aras, Belby's of, 304.
 Arbuthnot, Dr., 69, 145, 277, 455. The son of, 13.
 —, Robert, 272. William, 272.
 "Arcadia," Sydney's, 538.
 Archaeological Dictionary, 711.
 Arches, strength of semi-circular and elliptical, 119.
 Architecture, ornamental, 481.
 Arskine, Sir John, 366.
 Ardnamurchan, 383.
 Arguing, Johnson's, 150, 208, 496, 502, 690, 757, 768.
 Argument, Johnson's, on schoolmasters, 241, 814.
 —, on vicious intromission, 241, 811.
 —, in defence of lay patronage, 259, 815.
 —, against Dr. Meris's complaint, 454.
 —, in favour of the corporation of Stirling, 155.
 —, on entails, 473.
 —, on the liberty of the pulpit, 513, 816.
 —, on the registration of deeds, 674.
 —, in favour of a negro claiming his liberty, 562.
 —, against a prosecution for a libel, 696, 817.
 —, and testimony distinguished, 757.
 Argle, Archibald, fourth Duke of, 385, 457, 516, 527.

- Argyle, John, fifth duke of, 313. 387—390. Johnson's visit to, 388. Letter to, and his answer, 391.
 —, Elizabeth Gunning, duchess of, 387.
 —, Jane Warburton, dowager duchess of, 79. 385.
 Ariosto, 129. 427. 636.
 Aristotle, saying of, 506. 658. his "Poetics," 506.
 Arithmetic, Johnson's resort to, to calm his mind, 394
 Armistead, 312. 359.
 Armorial bearings, 239.
 Arms, piling of, why insisted upon, 617.
 Armstrong, Dr. John, 118. 533.
 Army, officers of the, 403. 497.
 Arnold, Anthony, 614.
 Arnold, Dr. Thomas, his "Observations on Insanity," 553.
 Arran, Lord, 92.
 "Art of Living in London," 28.
 "Art's corrective," 368.
 Articles, subscription to the xxxix., 210. 229. 284.
 Artificial ruins, 424.
 Aseham, Roger, Johnson's Life of, 158.
 "Ascanius," 324. 325. 331. 353. 401.
 Ash, Dr. John, 798.
 Ashbourne, 245. 458. 554. 564.
 Ashburne, Lord. See Dunning.
 Askew, Dr. 425.
 Assize, maiden one, 583.
 Association of ideas, 594.
 Astle, Thomas, Esq., 46. Letter to, 698. His notes on Alfred's will, 698.
 —, Rev. Mr. Johnson's advice to, 767.
 Aston, Sir Thomas, 20. 188.
 —, Mrs. Elizabeth, 20. 188. 214. 460. 492. 538.
 —, Johnson's letters to, 188. 198. 528. 529. 539. 565. 623. 623. 631. 640. 706. 749.
 —, Miss Mary, afterwards Mrs. Brodie, 20. 490. 492. 611. 612. 672. 673. Johnson's epigram to, 40. 611.
 —, Margaret, 28.
 Astley, Philip, the equestrian, 638.
 Atheism, 278.
 "Athol porridge," 60.
 "Atlas," the race-horse, 415.
 Atoneant, the great article of Christianity, 292. 557. 565. 694. 806. 841.
 Attacks, useful to authors, 358. 403. 442. 624. 837.
 Atterbury, Bishop, Sermons and style, 572. 578.
 Attorney-general, ludicrous title given to, 517.
 Attorneys, 219. 384. 769.
 Auchinleck estate, 396. 472. 554.
 —, Lord, Boswell's father, 208. 301. 387. 395. 397. 518. 554. 556. 573. Designates Johnson Ursa Major, 398.
 Augur, 220. 257.
 Author, rarely hurt by his critics, 645. See Attacks.
 —, "The Young," a poem by Johnson, 11.
 Authors, 82. 194. 257. 282. 358. 442. 445. 500. 555. 572. 604. 608. 609. 624. 625. 693. 769. See Attacks.
 —, modern, the moons of literature, 608.
 —, possessing the work of one for that of another, condemned, 82.
 —, Virgil's description of the entrance into hell, applied to, 372.
 Avarice, 374. 507. 516. 605.
- Bách y Graiz, 418.
 Bacon, Francis, Lord Verulam, 69. 343. History of Henry VII., 338. His Precept for Conversation, 738.
 —, Mallet's "Life" of, 539.
 Badcock, Rev. Samuel, 804.
 Badenoch, Lord of, 300.
 Bad habits, 718.
 —, Management, 603.
 Bagpipes, 374.
 Baughaw, Rev. Thomas, Johnson's letters to, 264. 782.
 Baillie, Dr., recommendation of card-playing, 405.
 Baker, Sir Richard, his Chronicles quoted, 267.
 —, Sir George, 784.
 —, Mrs., 183.
 Balance of Misery, 764. 819.
 Balcarras, Earl of, 404. 520.
 Ball without powder, 656.
 Ballantine, Mr. George, 122.
 Balloons, 784.
 Ballow, Mr. Thomas, 501.
 Balmuto, Lord, 518.
 Baltic, Johnson's proposed voyage to, 539.
 Bankes, Mr., of Dorsetshire, 42. 166.
 Banks, Sir Joseph, 226. 227. 228. 287. 379. 381. 496. 620. 621.
 Johnson's motto for his goat, 226.
 Baptism, 487. 760.
 Barhauld, Mr., 470. Mrs. See Aikin.
 Barber, Francis, Johnson's negro servant, 75. 76. 77. 78. 102. 117. 118. 183. 194. 215. 227. 415. 620. 790. 801. 802.
 —, Johnson's letters to, 194. 215. 739.
 Barclay, his "Ship of Fools," 91.
 —, Mr., his defence of Johnson's Shakspeare, 171. 358.
 —, Robert, of Ury, his "Apology for the Quakers," 487.
- Barclay, Robert, one of Mr. Thrall's successors, 692. Anecdotes of Johnson, 637.
 Baretti, Signor Giuseppe, 55. 91. 99. 112. 122. 125. 128. 129. 174. 192. 195. 206. 214. 247. 302. 427. 457. 464. 484. 500. 510. 512. 525. 552. 664. 780.
 —, Johnson's letters to, 122. 135. 128. His trial for murder, 207. 771. His "Travels," 214. The first who received copy money in Italy, 548. His strictures on Mrs. Piozzi's, 510. His "Frustra Letteraria," 552.
 Bark, Peruvian, 762.
 Barker, Dr. Edmund, 58. 107. 399.
 Barnard, Rev. Dr., Bishop of Killaloe, 27. 433. 520. 521. 576. 691. 722. Altercation with Johnson and, 691. Pleasant verses thereon, 76. 722. 833.
 —, Dr., provost of Eton, 644. 646.
 —, Francis, Esq., afterwards Sir Francis, King's librarian, 76. 184.
 —, Johnson's letter to, on the formation of the King's library, 196.
 Barnes, Joshua, 396. 591. 669.
 Barnston, Miss L., 639.
 Barnwall, Nicholas, Lord Trimblestown, 572.
 Baron Hill, the seat of Lord Bulkeley, 421.
 Barretier, Johnson's Life of, 45. 46. 128.
 Barret, Mr., the Surgeon, 510.
 Barrett, Dr., of Dublin, 259.
 Barrington, Hon. Daines, 690. 746. His "Essay on the Emigration of Birds," 260. His "Observations on the Statutes," 602.
 Barri, Madame du, 41.
 Barristers, 232.
 Barrow, Isaac, 69. Sermon against foolish talking, 688.
 Barrowby, Dr., anecdote of, 761.
 Barry, Sir Edward, his notion of pulsation, 505.
 —, Spranger, the actor, 60. 61.
 —, James, the painter, 724. 732. 735. 746.
 Barter, Mr., 234.
 "Bas Bleu," Hannah More's poem of, 689.
 Bashfulness, 767.
 "Bastard," the Savage's poem of, 50.
 Bat, formation of the, 612.
 Bateman, Edmund, of Pemb. Coll. His lectures, 18.
 Bate, the Rev. Henry, 763.
 Bath, Johnson's visit to, 508.
 Bath, William Pulteney, Earl of, 35. 382.
 Bath, medicated, 208. Cold, 835.
 Bathstone vase, Horace Walpole's account of, 442.
 Bathurst, Allen, First Earl, 614. 635. 636. 670.
 —, Captain, 1.
 —, Dr. Richard, 56. 58. 75. 77. 79. 81, 82. 83. 129. 165. 243. 251. 663. 664. a "good hater," 78.
 "Batraehomyomachia," first edition of, 425.
 "Baudii Epistola," quoted, 429.
 Baxter, Richard, quoted, 262. 292. 219. 733.
 —, "Reasons of the Christian Religion," commended, 738.
 —, William, his "Anaereon," 396. 712. 740. 750.
 "Bayes," character of, 235. 236.
 Bayle, 53. His Dictionary, 145. 363. 416.
 "Bear," the epithet applied to Johnson, 195. 446. 831.
 Bears, 446.
 Beatniffe, Richard, Esq., Johnson's letter to, 701.
 Beaton, Cardinal, his murder, 283.
 Beattie, Dr. James, 65. 224. 225. 226. 228. 244. 245. 264. 266. 268. 272. 293. 296. 358. 390. 519. 555. 687. 773.
 —, his letter to Boswell, 228. Johnson's letter to, 651.
 —, his "Essay on Truth," 245. his "Hermit," 720.
 Beauclerk, Topham, Esq., 25. 80. 121. 125. 126. 128. 147. 163. 166. 167. 183. 255. 290. 288. 298. 370. 379. 428. 430. 434. 436. 445. 450. 451. 456. 500. 529. 590. 615. 616. 630. 642. 646. 657. 662. 679. 688. 718. Altercation with Johnson, 628. His death, 642. His character, 642. 643. 646. His letter to Lord Charlemont, 643.
 —, Lady Diana, 260. 428. 643. 686.
 —, Lord Sydney, 864. Lady Sydney, 366.
 Beaufront, Duchess of, 646.
 Beaumaris Castle, 421.
 Beaumont, Sir George, 601.
 Beaumont and Fletcher, 18. 442.
 "Beauties of Johnson," 67. 706. 707.
 Beauty, 234. 696.
 Beckenham, 767.
 Becket, Thomas, the bookseller, 429.
 Beckford, Alderman, 517. 562.
 Bedford, John, fourth Duke of, 769.
 Bedlam, 455. 726.
 Bee, the, by Goldsmith, 140.
 Beech, Thomas, his "Eugenio," 259.
 Beggars, 127. 216. 635. 664.
 "Beggars' Opera," 361. 453. 561. 604. 685.
 Behaviour, Johnson a nice observer of, 511.
 Behmen, Jacob, 218.
 Belchier, Mr., the surgeon, 513.
 Beighton, Mr., 167.
 Bell, Dr. 644.
 —, John, of Antermomy, "Travels in Russia," 192.
 —, John, Esq., of Hertfordshire, 225. 246.
 —, Mr. John, his "British Poets," 530.

- Bellamy, Mrs. Anne, the actress, 113. Letter to J., 742.
 "Bellierophon" of Euripides quoted, 91.
 Bellière, H. du Plessis, 279.
 Belsham, Mr., his "Essay on Dramatic Poetry" quoted, 132.
 Benedictine monks, 727.
 Benevolence, Johnson's, 535, 536, 834. Human, 506.
 —, an excuse for drinking, 606.
 Bennet, Mr., the publisher, 158.
 Bensley, Mr., the actor, 189.
 Benson, Auditor, his monument to Milton, 72.
 Bentham, Dr., canon of Christchurch, 483.
 Bentley, Dr. Richard, 194, 321, 345, 359, 374, 483, 731. His —, verses, 661.
 —, Richard, Junior, 760.
 Berenger, Richard, Esq., 584, 684.
 Berestord, Rev. Mr., 501. Mrs., and Miss, 758.
 Berkeley, Dr. George, Bishop of Cloyne, 160, 221. His Theory, 549, 662.
 Berwick, Duke of, his "Memoirs," 592.
 Bethune, Rev. Mr., 334, 341.
 Betterton, Mr., the actor, 556.
 Bettesworth, Rev. Edmund, 158.
 Beverage, Johnson's favourite, 508.
 Bevil, Rev. Mr., his defence of Hammond, 675
 Bewley, Mr., his veneration for Johnson, 698.
 Bexley, Lord, concerning Dr. Vansittart, 117.
 Bible, early translations of, 197. Johnson's plan of reading the, 17. should be read with a commentary, 513.
 —, Johnson's death-bed recommendation to read, 842.
 "Bibliotheca Harleiana," Johnson's account of, 46.
 "Bibliotheca Literaria," 420.
 "Bibliothèque," Johnson's scheme for opening a, 53.
 Bickerstaff, Mr. Isaac, 142, 203.
 Bicknell, Mr., 106.
 Bidder, William, the calculating boy, 480.
 Biddy, 337.
 "Big man," a jocular Irish phrase, applied to J., 176, 469.
 Bindley, James, Esq., 48, 52, 605, 718, 730.
 Binning, Charles, Lord, 241, 608.
 Biographer, duties of a, 546. Of Johnson's, 235
 "Biographia Britannica," 552, 671.
 Biography, 235, 289, 346, 483, 516, 546, 588, 671.
 —, literary, recommended to J. by George Hill, 186.
 Birch, Rev. Dr. Thomas, 39, 45, 48, 57, 121, 351. J's. Greek epigram to, 40. Letters from Johnson to, 48, 72, 94, 101.
 His letter to Johnson, 94. Letter to Lord Royston, 121.
 Birds, migration of, 260, 261.
 Birkenhead, Sir John, 282.
 Birmingham, 486, 565.
 Biron, Marshal Duc de, 465.
 Birth-day, J. dislikes being noticed, 339, 547, 634, 739.
 —, verses to Mrs. Thrale, 471.
 Births, extraordinary, 812.
 Bisset's life of Burke, 453.
 "Bishop," a beverage so called, 81.
 Bishops, requisites in, 289, 448. Great decorum required from, 678, 683, 762. In the House of Lords, 236.
 —, the Seven, 759.
 Blackburn, Mr. Francis, 229.
 "Black Dog," 640.
 Blacket, Sir Thomas W., 312.
 Blackfriars Bridge, 119.
 Blackguards and red guards, 231, 262.
 Black-letter books, 217.
 Blacklock, Dr. Thomas, the Blind poet, 111, 157, 277, 278.
 402. Letter on a passage in Johnson's "Journey," 824.
 Black men, cause of their being so, 136.
 Blackmore, Sir Rich. 135, 211, 398. J's. Life of, 622, 672.
 Blackstone, Commentaries, 332, 376, 384, 610, 684.
 Blackwall, Mr. Anthony, 18, 20.
 Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine, 47, 367.
 Blagden, Dr., afterwards Sir Charles, 465, 663.
 Blainville, M., his "Travels," 446.
 Blair, Lord President, 369.
 —, Rev. Dr. Hugh, 55, 122, 134, 276, 285, 289, 350, 402, 403, 412, 413, 429, 509, 510, 525, 530.
 —, his sermons, 525, 528, 550, 566, 611, 656. Lectures, 552.
 Imitation of J's. style, 552. Letter concerning a conversation with J., 463. Letter on Pope's "Essay on Man," 635.
 —, Rev. Robert, and his poem of "The Grave," 569.
 Blake, Admiral Johnson's Life of, 43.
 Blakey, 43, 128, 169, 467.
 Blanchetti, Marquis and Marchioness of, 461
 Bland, Mr., 247.
 Blaney, Elizabeth, 5, 790.
 Blank verse, J. dislikes, 146, 218, 660. Inferior to rhyme, 668.
 Blasphemy, literary property in, 279.
 Bleeding, Johnson's objection to periodical, 515.
 Blenheim, 370, 425, 485.
 Blessing, Johnson's, to Barclay, 837. to Miss Morris, 846.
 to Windham, 841.
 Blind, whether they distinguish colours by the touch, 212.
 "Blockhead," Johnson's application of the word, 237, 485.
 Blount's Giossographia, 385.
 Bloomax, Rev. Matthew, 598.
 Blue-stocking Clubs, origin of, 689.
 Blundering criticism. See Macaulay, T. B.
- Boar's Head Club, 318.
 Boasting, Boswell's habit of, 721.
 Boeage, Madame du, 460, 465, 467. Her "Columbiade," 773.
 Boece, Hector, the historian, 750.
 Boerhaave, 455. Johnson's Life of, 40.
 Boetius, "De Consolatore Philosophia," 40, 219.
 Boileau, 2, 33, 120, 222, 614.
 Bolingbroke, Henry St. John, first Viscount, 88, 110, 158, 613, 614, 615, 670. Johnson's character of, 88, 110.
 —, his share in Pope's "Essay on Man," 635, 636.
 —, Lady, her description of Pope, 605.
 —, Frederick, second Viscount, 269.
 Bolt-court, 30, 588.
 Bonaventura, the "seraphic doctor," 172.
 Bones, uses applied to, 725.
 —, Johnson's horror at the sight of, 319, 378.
 Bon-mots, 605.
 Bonner, Bishop, 18.
 Book collecting, 756.
 Booker's "Hop Garden," 486.
 Books, 255, 452, 731, 756, 767; how to read, 756; practice of talking from, 296.
 Booksellers, J's. character and vindication of, 94, 109.
 Book-trade, 476.
 Boothby, Miss Hill, 20, 82, 251, 440. J's. admiration of, 672,
 673. Correspondence between her and J., 449, 672, 673.
 Boquet, Mr., 78.
 Borough-English, 376.
 Boroughs and corporations, 455.
 Boscawen, Admiral, 608. Hon. Mrs., 608, 646, 683, 687.
 Boscovitch, Père, 218, 468.
 Bossuet, bishop of Meaux, 372.
 Boswell, Godfrey, Esq., 618, 652. Mrs., 236.
 Boswell, James, Esq., the author of this work.
 —, alluded to with hypochondria, 15, 280, 475, 793.
 —, writes the "Hypochondriac," 15, 717.
 —, his nationality, 16. made notes at dinner, 837.
 —, Mr. Courtenay's verses on, 70, 409.
 —, contributed to the taste for biographical details, 84.
 —, introduction to Johnson, 133, 134.
 —, story told by Johnson of his early years, 148.
 —, "Account of Corsica," 189, 199.
 —, elected a member of the Literary Club, 257, 259.
 —, Journal of his Tour to the Hebrides, 267.
 —, dress at the jubilee, 128.
 —, propensity to see executions, 206, 648, 720, 772.
 —, his ancestry, 271, 395, 472.
 —, his character drawn by himself, 279.
 —, Johnson's character of him, 280, 459, 619.
 —, his account of the escape of the Pretender, 326.
 —, announces the "Life of J." during his lifetime, 373.
 —, Lord Stowell's character of him, 289.
 —, Johnson's character of his "Tour to the Hebrides," 458.
 —, attempt to imitate the style of Warburton, 609.
 —, a quarrel with Johnson, 519.
 —, "Letter to the People of Scotland," 747, 748.
 —, expectations from Mr. Pitt, 750.
 —, controversy with Miss Seward, 773.
 —, Johnson's letters to him, 162, 172, 179, 193, 199, 212, 221,
 226, 245, 246, 266, 268, 270, 469, 411, 412, 413, 414, 426, 427,
 428, 429, 433, 434, 457, 458, 459, 468, 470, 471, 472, 473, 474,
 475, 508, 522, 524, 528, 530, 531, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 593,
 567, 589, 619, 621, 624, 630, 633, 640, 641, 642, 651, 654, 677,
 700, 705, 707, 708, 709, 736, 714, 718, 719, 750, 782, 793.
 —, his letters to Johnson, 179, 193, 223, 224, 226, 245, 110,
 413, 414, 427, 428, 429, 433, 468, 469, 475, 522, 523, 526, 528,
 529, 533, 534, 536, 537, 538, 554, 566, 567, 569, 570, 589, 618,
 622, 630, 633, 639, 640, 650, 652.
 —, letter to Garrick, 385.
 —, Garrick's letter to, 585.
 —, letter to Rasay, 467.
 —, letter to Sir Joshua Reynolds, 747.
 —, letter to Lord Thurlow on Johnson's pension, 77.
 —, Lord Thurlow's answer, 775.
 —, letter to Wilkes, 732.
 —, letters to Malone about this work, 828.
 —, Mrs., the author's wife, 75, 224, 409, 410, 475, 521, 537, 518, 624, 651, 733.
 —, her letter to Johnson, 710.
 —, Johnson's letters to, 521, 537, 649, 769.
 —, Mrs., the author's mother, 365.
 —, Thomas, the founder of the author's family, 396, 472.
 —, T. David, the author's brother, 211, 555, 650, 652.
 —, Sir A., the author's eldest son, 212, 240, 270, 198, 855.
 —, David, the author's second son, 525, 529.
 —, James, the author's third son, 17, 20, 52, 57, 66, 79, 189, 203, 211, 220, 221, 239, 240, 420, 452, 460, 483, 506, 629, 634.
 —, Elizabeth, the author's step-mother, 518.
 —, Veronica, the author's daughter, 271, 537.
 —, Dr. the author's uncle, 278, 402, 456, 533.
 "Bottom," 687.
 Boucher, Governor, 683.
 Boucher, Père, his "First Truths," 161.
 Bouchiers, Madame de, 216, 467, 478.
 Bouchiers, Dominique, 305.
 Boucher, Dr. Hugh, his "Monument," a poem, 107, 830.
 Boulton, Matthew, Esq., 425, 488.

- Bouquet, Mr., 78.
 Bourbon, Due de, 462.
 Bourdaloue, Père, 259, 372.
 Bourdonne, Madame de, 259.
 Bourke, Archbishop, afterwards Earl of Mayo, 757.
 Bouts-rimés, 412.
 Bower, Mr., 794.
 Bowles, William, Esq., 737.
 Bow-wow way, Johnson's, 269, 439.
 Bowyer, William, the printer, 789.
 Boxing, Johnson's skill in, 342.
 Boyd, Hon. Charles, 253, 257.
 Boyd's inn, 270.
 Boydell, Mr. Alderman, 428.
 Boyle, the family of, 345.
 —, Hon. Robert, 103.
 Boys at school, 153.
 Boyse, Samuel, the poet, 721, 804.
 "Bozzy," Boswell so called by Johnson, 371, 635, 638, 677.
 Bradshaigh, Lady, 63.
 Bradshaw, John, the regicide, 738.
 —, William, 723.
 "Braganza," Jephson's tragedy of, 205.
 Braidwood, Mr., his academy for the deaf and dumb, 403.
 Branchall, Archbishop, on Liberty and Necessity, 210.
 Bramins, 658, 683.
 Bramston, 17.
 Brandy, 627, 680.
 Bravery, 606, 798.
 "Brave we!" an exclamation of Johnson's, 390.
 Breakfast well appointed, 456.
 — in splendour, 634.
 Brent, Miss, 143.
 Brentford, 393, 719.
 Brett, Colonel, 53.
 —, Mrs. and Miss, 53.
 Brewse, Major, 303.
 Bribery at elections, 443.
 Bridgen, Martha, Richardson's daughter, 125.
 Brightelmstone, 145, 524.
 Bristol, inns at, 511.
 Britton, Caroline, afterwards Mrs. Lytelton, 424.
 Britain, ancient state of little known, 609.
 "British Essayists," 67.
 "British Poets," Bell's edition of, 530.
 "British Princes," quoted, 211.
 "British Synonymy," Mrs. Piozzi's, 806.
 Broadley, Captain, 618.
 Brocklesby, Dr. Richard, 495, 716, 736, 776, 788, 801.
 —, his kindness and liberality to J., 735, 740, 776, 788.
 —, Johnson's letters to, 737, 783.
 Brodhurst, Mr., Johnson's play-fellow, 632.
 Brodie, Alexander, Esq., 79, 334.
 —, Mrs. See Aston.
 Brook, Lord, 416.
 —, Mr. of Townmaling, 188.
 Brooke, Mr., author of "Gustavus Vasa," 40.
 —, Mrs., author of "Emily Montague," 145.
 Brookes, Mrs., the actress, 315.
 — or rivulets, 580.
 Broome, William, the poet, 647. Johnson's Life of, 670.
 Brother and sister, relation of, 112.
 Brown, Tom, Johnson's instructor in English, 7.
 —, dedicates his Spelling-book "to the Universe," 7.
 —, Rev. Robert, 175, 593.
 — "Capability," 416, 635.
 Browne, Dr. John, and his "Estimate," 220.
 —, Sir Thomas, Johnson's Life of, 18, 69, 70, 103, 109.
 His style imitated by Johnson, 70, 103, 582. Fond of Anglo-Saxon diction, 70. His saying of devils, 594.
 —, Isaac Hawkins, Esq., 314, 443, 471. His poem "De Animi Immortalitate," 314. His son, 754.
 Bruce, Robert, 468.
 —, James, the Abyssinian traveller, 303, 441.
 —, Sir John, 205.
 —, families, 303.
 Brumoy's Greek Theatres, 83, 117.
 Brundisium, Horace's journey to, 580.
 Brunet, M., 462.
 Brutes, 191, 261, 511.
 Bryant, Jacob, Esq., 370, 794.
 Brydges, Sir Egerton, 183.
 Brydson, Patrick, his "Tour through Sicily," 446, 617. His anti-mosaic remark, 491, 617.
 Buchan, Earl, 275. Anecdote of, 238.
 Buchan's Buller, 295, 296.
 Buchanan, George, 156, 207, 282, 719.
 "Buck," nearly synonymous with "dandy," 374.
 Buckingham, Duke of, 203. His "Rehearsal," 720.
 —, Marquis of, 169, 222.
 Buckles, shoe, 269.
 —, Johnson's, 606.
 Budget, Eustace, 55, 255, 281, 509.
 Budworth, Rev. Mr., 20, 24.
 Buffon, Count de, 342, 520.
 Bulkeley, Lord, 491.
 Bulls by Johnson, 770.
 Bull-dogs, 558.
 Buller of Buchan, 295, 296.
 —, Mrs. 645.
 Bunbury, Sir Charles, 436.
 —, Mrs. 140, 649.
 Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," 258.
 Buonaparte, Napoleon, 264, 344, 349, 461, 493.
 Burbridge, Mr., 52.
 Burgess-ticket, Johnson's, at Aberdeen, 292.
 Burgovine, General, surrendered at Saratoga, 617.
 Burial Service, 729.
 Burke, Right Hon. Edmund. Anecdotes of, and remarks upon, 23, 37, 71, 116, 136, 140, 141, 151, 158, 161, 163, 173, 177, 207, 220, 229, 232, 240, 253, 259, 263, 265, 268, 273, 274, 288, 289, 298, 336, 357, 412, 425, 446, 453, 465, 485, 509, 513, 520, 521, 523, 540, 550, 571, 573, 578, 583, 590, 600, 604, 605, 625, 626, 630, 639, 647, 661, 662, 671, 673, 680, 681, 715, 732, 740, 748, 756, 757, 764, 771, 803.
 —, Observation on Johnson's ladies, 71. Counsel to "live pleasant," 116. "Vindication of Civil Society," 158. "Essay on the Sublime and Beautiful," 205. "Letter to the Sheriffs of Bristol," 557. Johnson's exclamation at Beaconsfield, 600. Classical pun on Wilkes, 605. Lively conceit on a line of Horace, 605. Conversation described by Johnson, 660, 713, 755. Playful sally on Dean Marlay, 678. Oratory characterised by Wilkes, 688. Uniform respect for Johnson, 769. Pun on Dr. Brocklesby's name, 776. Pious proemium to his will, 842.
 —, Mrs., 164.
 —, Richard, Edmund's son, 731, 788.
 Burlamaqui, 178.
 Burlington, Lord, 614.
 Burman, Peter, Johnson's Life of, 46.
 Burnaby, Mr. Edward, 167.
 Burnet, Bishop, his "Own Times," 250, 363, 446.
 —, James, 227, 299. See Montbodo.
 Burney, Dr. Charles, 7, 16, 61, 65, 71, 85, 91, 94, 97, 109, 135, 143, 146, 150, 164, 165, 192, 238, 266, 287, 439, 444, 452, 469, 489, 490, 582, 620, 621, 625, 644, 661, 686, 698, 736, 792.
 —, Account of "Irene," 61. Comparison of Addison and J., 71. "History of Music," 621. His "Travels," 720.
 —, Johnson's letters to, 94, 169, 172, 739, 785.
 —, Dr. Charles, the younger, 794.
 —, Mrs., 170.
 —, Miss Frances, afterwards Madame D'Arblay, 645, 649, 698, 732, 736, 747, 755. Imitation of Johnson's style, 796.
 Burns (the Poet), 15, 139.
 Burrows, Rev. Dr., 626. His Essay on the style of J. 69.
 Burton, his "Anatomy of Melancholy," 12, 217, 482. Direction against melancholy, 640.
 "Burton's Books," list of, 747.
 Busby, Mr., 68.
 Bust of Johnson, Nollekens's, 565, 568.
 Butcher, the trade of, 348.
 Bute, John, third Earl of, 126, 127, 131, 180, 300, 425, 437, 448, 449, 452, 492, 517, 641.
 —, Johnson's letter to, respecting his pension, 127, 128.
 Butler, Archdeacon, 469, 415.
 —, Bishop, his "Analogy," 278.
 —, Samuel, 259, 281, 340, 763.
 Butler's Hudibras, 454.
 Butter, Aberdeen, duel fought for the honour of, 384.
 —, Dr. William, 494, 546, 549, 690.
 Buxton, Jedediah, the extraordinary calculator, 480.
 Byng, Admiral, Johnson's epitaph and defence of, 105.
 Byron, Lord, 15, 27, 59, 217, 279, 439, 450.
 —, definition of hypochondriacism, 15.
 —, Moore's Life of, quoted, 439, 504.
 —, Commodore, 359.
 Cabbages, 486.
 Cadell, Mr., the bookseller, 213, 434, 435, 476.
 Cadogan, Dr. William, on the gout, 334, 335.
 Cain, Lord Byron's, 279.
 "Calamities of Authors," D'Israeli's, 32.
 Calcraft, Mr., 497.
 Calculators, ordinary intellect of, 480.
 Calder, Dr. John, 249.
 "Caliban of Literature," epithet applied to Johnson, 219.
 Caligula, his exclamation, 591.
 "Called," phenomenon of hearing oneself, 655.
 Callimachus, merits of, 655.
 Callumny, or ridicule, Johnson's indifference to, Cambridge, Richard Owen, Esq., 451, 452, 579, 722.
 —, University, 185. Johnson's visit to, 167.
 Camden, Charles Pratt, first Earl, 435, 600.
 Camden's "Remains," 598, 729.
 Cameron, Dr. Archibald, his execution, 42.
 Camerons, family of the, 367.
 Campbell, Hon. Archibald, 188, 213, 250. His "Doctrines of a Middle State," 389, 759. Some account of, 389.
 —, Lord Neil, 389.
 —, Colonel Sir Archibald, 513.
 —, Rev. Dr. Thomas, 167, 377, 443, 444, 447, and 448.
 "Philosophical Survey of Ireland," 531.

- Campbell, Dr. John, 122, 142, 182, 191, 213, 250, 435, 577.
 His "Political Survey," 377, 484, 794.
 —, Rev. John, minister of Kippen, 182.
 —, Mungo, who shot Lord Eglintoun, 195, 558.
 —, General, 353.
 —, Mr., a purser, 188.
 —, Mr., factor to the Duke of Argyle, 38, 373, 380, 383.
 —, Colonel Mure, 533.
 "Candide," of Voltaire, 115, 116, 617.
 Candour, Johnson's, 721, 739.
 Canning, Right Hon. George, on Public Education, 498.
 —, "Canons of Criticism," Edwards's, 86.
 Cant, the mind to be cleared of, 731.
 Canus, Melchior, a Spanish Dominican, 461.
 Capel, Edward, Preface to his Shakespeare, 656.
 Caracoli, Marquis, author of Ganganetti's Letters, 592.
 Caraculus, 442.
 Card-playing, 200, 405, 591, 592.
 Cardan, his mode of composing his mind, 553.
 Cardross, Lord, afterwards Earl of Buchan, 238.
 Careless, Mrs., Johnson's first love, 488, 703.
 "Careless Husband," Cibber's, 444.
 Carelessness, 651.
 Carhampton, Lord, 253.
 Carleton, Captain, his "Memoirs," 574.
 Carlisle, Frederick, fifth earl of, 505, 691.
 —, Johnson's opinion of his "Father's Revenge," 743.
 —, Mr., of Limekilns, 374.
 Carmarthen, Lord, 443.
 Carmichael, Miss, 570.
 Caroline, Queen, 461.
 Carr, Sir William, 295.
 Carre, Rev. Mr., his "Sermons," 271, 272.
 Carruthers' Highland Note Book, 308.
 Carstairs' "State Papers," 342.
 Carte, Thomas, his "Life of the Duke of Ormond," 367.
 Carter, Dr. Nicholas, 34.
 —, Mr., 434.
 —, Mrs. Elizabeth, 16, 34, 39, 40, 43, 48, 50, 52, 63, 65, 153, 181, 359, 685, 731, 755, contributes to the "Rambler," 69.
 —, Johnson's letter to, 101. Her character of Johnson, 798.
 Carteret, John, Lord, afterwards Earl Granville, 215, 362.
 Carthage, 722.
 Carthusians, order of, 480.
 Cartwright, Dr. Edmund, memoirs of, 504.
 Cascades, 424.
 Casimir, Ode to Pope Urban, 31.
 Cast of Johnson, Nollekens's, 565, 568.
 Castiglione, "Il Cortegiano," on good breeding, 359.
 Casts of men, 683.
 Cat, Johnson's, 722.
 Cateot, George, the pewterer of Bristol, 510.
 Cathcart, Charles, ninth Earl, 472, 613.
 Catherine Street, Tavern, 343.
 "Catholicon," 465.
 Cato, learnt Greek at an advanced age, 680.
 —, Addison's, 591. Soliloquy, 836.
 Cator, Mr. John, 732, 767.
 Caulfield, Miss, 526.
 Cave, Mr. Edward, character and anecdotes of, 23, 28, 32, 54, 39, 43, 44, 45, 47, 48, 49, 65, 66, 84, 101, 121, 239, 241, 604, 804.
 Johnson's letters to, 23, 29, 33, 34, 38, 39, 46, 47.
 Latin verses addressed to, 31. Letter to Richardson respecting the "Rambler," 65. "Life" by Johnson, 84.
 —, Joseph, brother of Edward, 101, 102, 103.
 Cawdor Castle, 301, 302.
 —, Lord, 392.
 Cawston, Mr. Windham's servant, 807.
 Cecil, Colonel, 54, 241.
 "Cecilia," Miss Burney's, 722.
 Certainties, small, the bane of men of talents, 438.
 Chalmers, George, Esq., 45.
 —, Alexander, Esq., 54, 63, 65, 66, 67, 68, 71, 82, 121, 184, 185, 208, 212, 222, 249, 253.
 —, his Lesson in Biography, 797, 838.
 Cham of Literature, 118.
 Chamberlain, Mrs. 439.
 Chamberlayne, Rev. Mr., 760.
 —, Edward, Esq., 656.
 Chambers, proposals for his Dictionary, 69, 582. Johnson's style founded partly upon that of, 69.
 —, Sir Robert, 90, 181, 189, 193, 205, 266, 268, 298, 411, 413, 610, 676, 677. Johnson's character of, 676. Letter to, 90.
 —, Lady and Miss, 411.
 —, Sir William, his "Chinese Architecture," 720. "Oriental Gardening," 325. "Heroick Epistle" to, quoted, 325, 587.
 —, Catherine, Johnson's maid-servant, 113, 115, 187.
 —, Mr. Robert, 295, 270, 276, 283, 289, 300, 305, 342, 383.
 Chamier, Anthony, Esq., 163, 298, 445, 521, 534, 567, 580, 634.
 "Champion," a periodical paper, 51.
 Chancellors, how chosen, 232.
 "Chances," the, a comedy, 257.
 Chandler, Dr. Samuel, 45.
 Chandler, Dr. Richard, 483. His "Travels," 457.
 Chantrey, 568.
 Chapel, Dr., 250.
 Chapman, Baster, Johnson's letter to, 743. See Mulso.
 Character, influence of, 615.
 Characters, first instance of delineation of, 664.
 —, how historians should draw, 636.
 —, showing only the bright side of, 671.
 —, extraordinary, generally exaggerated, 441.
 —, Johnson's delight in drawing, 834.
 Charade, Johnson's, on Dr. Barnard, 722.
 Charing Cross, 443.
 Charity, Christian, 757. Judicious distribution of, 394.
 —, Johnson's, 127, 183, 394, 579, 632, 677, 770, 831, 836.
 Charlemont, Earl of, 257, 298, 643, 689. Hatly's List of, 88.
 Charles the First, 72, 250, 583, 454.
 —, the Second, 151, 441, 418, 454, 481, 667.
 —, Edward, Prince. See Pretender.
 —, the Fifth, celebrates his own obsequies, 578.
 —, the Twelfth, of Sweden, 6, 585.
 Charlotte, Queen, 184.
 Charlton, Dr., 741.
 Charms, belief in, 317.
 Chastity, 192, 354. First female virtue, 636.
 Chatelet, 460.
 Chatham, William, Earl of, 37, 58, 181, 211, 254, 435, 617, 769.
 Chatsworth, 415, 564, 784.
 Chatterton, Thomas, his poems, 510, 701.
 Chancer, 385.
 Chemistry, Johnson's fondness for, 40, 631, 657, 738.
 Chester, 417.
 Chesterfield, Philip Dormer Stanhope, fourth Earl of, 9, 45, 56, 57, 61, 68, 81, 85, 86, 87, 88, 93, 148, 149, 152, 158, 184, 217, 223, 249, 282, 297, 395, 345, 362, 430, 440, 446, 511, 530, 541, 558, 615, 629, 641, 642, 680, 696, 715, 774. Alleged neglect of Johnson's, 245. His papers in "The World," 85. Johnson's celebrated letter to, 85. His "Letters to his Son," character of, 87, 410, 414, 416, 511.
 Chevalier, the, 309, 310, 318, 326.
 Chey Chase, 838.
 Cheyne, Dr. George, his "English Malady," 14, 522. His "Treatise on Health," 503. His rule of conduct, 313.
 Cheynel, Francis, Johnson's Life of, 278.
 Chiesley of Dalry, 342.
 Children, treatment and education of, 6, 8, 15, 154, 298, 295, 336, 409, 503, 537, 628, 661. Johnson's fondness for, 722.
 —, old men's, 6.
 China, wall of, 586. Chinese language, 611.
 "Choice of Difficulties," 311.
 Choisi, Abbé de, 699.
 Cholmondeley, G. J., Esq., 779.
 —, Hon. and Rev. George, 349. Mrs., 349, 603, 650, 740.
 Christian, Rev. Mr., 191.
 "Christian Hero," Steele's, 481.
 Christian charity, 757.
 —, religion, evidences of, 135, 157, 147, 182, 155, 810.
 —, faith, liable to be disturbed, 733.
 Christianity, the highest perfection of humanity, 181.
 —, the atonement, the great article of, 292, 557, 694, 841.
 Christians, the differences among, 557.
 Christ's satisfaction, 292, 811.
 Churchleigh, Miss, 58.
 Church, the satisfaction of meeting at, 683.
 —, England, ecclesiastical discipline of, 755.
 —, architecture, 481.
 —, patronage, 259.
 —, property, confiscated, 711.
 Churchill, Charles, the poet, 35, 133, 165, 171, 571. His satire on Johnson, 107, 138. Johnson's opinion of, 142.
 Churton, Rev. Ralph, 264, 729, 764, 819.
 Cibber, Colley, 43, 58, 96, 57, 58, 84, 136, 190, 206, 251, 365, 405, 386, 438, 443, 504, 506, 516, 555, 556, 584, 741.
 —, his Apology, 206, 516.
 —, Theophilus, his "Lives of the Poets," 57, 501, 533.
 —, Mrs., 304.
 Cicero, 461. His defence of Lawyers, 189.
 —, his character of Appian applied to Johnson, 791.
 "Citizen of the World," Goldsmith's, 140.
 Clanranald, Captain, ballad in honour of him, 364.
 Class, order of the Scottish, 410.
 Clapp, Mrs., 215.
 Clare, Robert Nugent, Lord, 222, 611.
 Clarendon, Lord, 292, 376, 616. His History, 97, 367. His style 325. Manuscripts, 176.
 Claret, characterised by Johnson, 609, 627, 680.
 "Clarissa Harlowe," 73, 508, 663, 836. "Index" to, 73.
 —, preface to, written by Dr. Warburton, 83.
 Clark, Alderman Richard, 610. Johnson's letter to, 747.
 —, Mr., his pamphlet on Ossian, 715.
 Clarke, Dr. Samuel, 135, 210. His works recommended, 135, 807. His "Sermons," 579, 806, 811.
 —, Godfrey, 229.
 Claxton, Mr., 260.
 Cleland, Nicholas, his Greek Grammar, 660.
 "Cleone," Dodsley's tragedy of, 113, 600.
 "Cleonicus," Hoole's play of, 427.
 Clephane, M. M., Marchioness of Northampton, 364.
 Clergy, 228, 237, 238, 302, 340, 398, 683.
 —, their preaching not sufficiently plain, 156, 248.

- Clergy, not sufficiently acquainted with their parishioners, 219. English, 350.
 —, Scottish, 228, 293, 350.
 —, Irish, 229.
 —, jollity of, offensive, 679.
 —, dress of, should be in character, 679.
- Clergyman, Addison's portrait of, 679.
 —, Johnson's model of, 679.
 —, his letter to a young, 651.
- Clerk, Sir Philip Jennings, 680.
- Clerke, Lady, of Pennycook, 329.
- Clermont, Lady, 646.
- Cleveland, Duchess of, 151.
- Climate, 244.
- Clive, Robert, first Lord, 609, 615, 635.
 —, Mrs., 123, 304, 656, 741.
- Clothes, fine, 494.
- Club, Ivy-lane, formed by Johnson, 58, 107, 745, 752.
 —, Literary, founded by Reynolds, 163, 177, 178, 257, 263, 298, 436, 445, 528, 529, 532, 537, 573, 590, 646, 663, 681, 771.
 —, Boar's Head, 348.
 —, Queen's Arms, 682.
 —, Old Street, 729, 752.
 —, Essex Head, 746.
 —, Eumelian, 798.
 —, Johnson's definition of a, 746.
 "Clubbable Man," 746.
- Coachmakers' Hall, 684.
- Coarse raillery, Johnson's powers of, 662.
- Cobb, Mrs., 5, 193, 197, 224, 415, 490, 632. Account of, 639.
- Cobham, Lord, 169, 614.
- Cock-lane ghost, 138, 585.
- Cocker's Arithmetic, 308.
- Cohausen, 477.
- Coin, exportation of, 688.
- Coke, Lord, 232.
- Col, Island of, 363, 364, 365, 369.
 —, Donald Maclean, the young Laird of, 294, 299, 350, 352, 353, 362, 365, 367, 371, 372, 373, 374, 380, 426, 429, 471.
 —, Montrose's letters to the Laird of, 368.
- Colburne, the calculating boy, 480.
- Colchester, 159.
- Colds, 191, 350.
- Cole, Mr., of Norton Street, 331.
- Colebrooke, Sir George, 465.
- Coliseum, Johnson's mind compared to the, 211.
- College Tutor, 838.
- Collier, Jeremy, 759.
 —, Dr. of the Commons, 619.
 —, Captain Sir George, 161.
- Collins, William, the poet, 40, 82, 90, 91, 102, 130, 457.
 "Collyer Joel," 106.
- Colman, George, Esq., sen., 65, 123, 247, 248, 251, 298, 436, 511, 521, 525, 604, 657, 660.
 —, his "Odes to Obscurity and Oblivion," 442.
 —, his imitation of Johnson's style, 796.
 —, George, Esq., jun., his "Random Records" quoted, 511.
- Colquhoun, Sir James and Lady Helen, 391.
- Colson, Rev. John, Mr. Walmesley's letter to, 27, 68.
- Colville, Lady, Dowager, 399, 401, 402.
- Combermere, 417.
- Commandment, the ninth, modes of reading, 51.
- Commentaries on the Bible, 513.
- Commerce, 449.
- Commerce and Literature to be united, 837.
- Common Prayer Book, 762.
- Commons, House of, 688.
- Communion of Saints, 761.
- Community of goods, doctrine of, 262.
- Company, 767. Cause of Johnson's fondness for, 42.
- Comparisons, 176, 721.
- Compassion, Johnson's, 758, 834.
- Complaints, 664, 715.
- Compliments, 202, 458, 548, 610, 619.
 —, Composition, 652, 657, 658. Happy moments for, 275.
 —, Johnson's advice respecting, 285.
 —, his extraordinary powers of, 16, 50, 59, 63, 115, 177, 285, 299, 445, 508, 513, 804.
 "Compositor," The, 770.
- Compton, Rev. James, a Benedictine his conversion, 727.
- Condamine's account of the savage girl, 299.
- Condé, Prince of, 462, 466.
- Condescension, 635.
- Conduct, gradations in, 679.
- Confession, 210, 489.
 "Confessions," Rousseau's, 175, 176.
- Confinement, 586.
 "Congé d'elire," 771.
- Congreve, W. the poet, 204, 207, 557. Johnson's "Life" of, 647, 672.
 —, Rev. Charles, Johnson's schoolfellow, 8, 204, 488, 494.
- Conjugal infidelity, 192, 636.
 "Connoisseur," The, 143.
- Constable, Lord High, of Scotland, 296.
- Conscience and shame contrasted, 883.
- Const. Francis, Esq., 459.
- Constitution, the British, 482.
- Constructive treason, 633.
- Contentment, 576.
- Contradiction, 629.
 —, Johnson's spirit of, 495, 502, 514, 546, 681.
- Conversation, 111, 451, 483, 493, 512, 378, 606, 663, 670, 681, 713, 719, 757.
 —, the happiest kind of, 450.
 —, and talk, distinction between, 719.
 —, Lord Bacon's precept for, 738.
 —, questioning, not the proper mode of, 493, 585.
 —, Johnson's great powers of, 591, 603, 629, 690, 692, 764.
- Conversions, 210, 572, 596.
- Convicts, 585, 767.
- Convocation of the clergy, 158.
- Convulsions, Johnson afflicted with, 24, 41, 269.
- Convents, 123, 175, 283, 480.
- Conway, Lady, 233.
 —, Walpole's letters to, 184, 363, 439.
 —, Castle, 421, 423.
- Cook, Captain James, 496. His "Voyages, 766.
- Cooke, Thomas, the translator of "Hesiod," 274.
 —, his speech on presenting Foote to a club, 274.
 —, anecdote respecting him, Johnson, and Garrick, 243.
- Cookery, 273.
 —, Johnson's opinion of French, 160. Affected in, 501.
 Books of, should be on philosophical principles, 592.
 —, Glass's, written by Dr. Hill, 592.
- Cooper, John Gilbert, author of the "Life of Socrates," disparaging mention of, 219, 544, 655.
 —, Sir Grey, 222.
- Cootie, Sir Eyre, 303, 304.
- Copy-money, in Italy, first paid to Baretta, 548.
- Copyright, 149, 286.
- Corbett, Mr. Andrew, 12.
- Corelli, the singer, 444.
- Coriat, Tom, 238.
 "Coriat, Junior," Paterson's, 238.
- Cork and Orrery, Hamilton, sixth Earl of, 219, 555.
 —, Edmund, seventh Earl of, 645, 659.
 —, Mary Monkton, Countess of, 645, 689.
 —, new letter to the editor, 646.
- Corn Laws, 220.
- Corney, Bolton, editor of Goldsmith, 174.
- Cornelle, Pierre, 372, 659.
- Cornish fishermen, 480.
- Corporations and boroughs, 455.
- Corpulency, 729.
- "Corricharachin," Mr. McKinnon of, 314, 315, 353.
- Corsica, 175, 179, 180, 193, 191, 199, 202, 367.
 "Cortegiano" of Castiglione, on good breeding, 359.
- Corvix Senex, 715.
- Cottages in Skie described, 352.
- Cottrel, Admiral, 79. Miss, 79, 125, 129, 385.
- Cotton, Sir Lynch Salusbury, 417. Sir Robert Salusbury, 417, 658.
 —, Sir and Mrs., afterwards Sir Robert and Lady, 417, 418, 419, 658.
 —, Robert, Esq., 418.
- Coulson, Rev. Mr. of University College, 27, 425, 457.
 "Council" of Trent, 29, 38.
 "Counsellor Van," a rock on the Wye, 117.
 Counting, the good of, 725.
- Country gentlemen, 243, 298, 299, 315, 656, 712.
 —, life, 387, 553, 579, 581, 598, 616, 776.
- Courage, 443, 585, 609, 637.
 —, Johnson's, 379.
- Court, attendants on a, described, 111.
 —, of Session in Scotland, 403, 428.
- Courtenay, John, Esq., 768, 828, 830.
 —, his "Poetical Review" quoted, 14, 70, 106, 116, 409, 453.
 —, his description of Sir Joshua's table, 519.
 Courting the acquaintance of the great, 37, 173.
- Courtown, Lord, 456.
- Courts of Germany, manners best learnt at, 359.
 —, martial, 658.
- Coverley, Sir Roger de, 454.
- Cox, Boswell's skill in imitating a, 402.
- Cowardice, 666.
- Cowdroy, popular superstition respecting, 711.
- Cowley, Benedictine prior, 460.
 —, the poet, 69, 81, 210, 381, 385, 503, 572. Life of, 666.
- Cowper, William, 15, 72, 450, 505; his Homer, 609.
 —, Earl, libel on, 499.
- Cox, 771.
- Coxcombs, 219.
- Coxeter, Thomas, 171, 547.
- Crabbe, Rev. George, 450. His "Village," 746.
- Craddock, Jos., anecdotes of Johnson, 203, 479, 506, 508, 589.
- Crags, secretary, 222. The two, 48.
- Craig, Mr., the architect, 285, 618.
- Cranburne, Lady, 647.
- Cranfills, 170.
- Cramer, Archbishop, 452.
- Cranston, Mr. David, 405.
- Crantor, the philosopher, exclamation of, 90.
- Crashaw, Richard, his "Epigrammata Sacra," 593.
- Craster, Mr., 79.

- Crauford, Mr., Johnson's answer to, 837.
 Craven, Lady, 501, 645, 647.
 "Creation," Blackmore's, 211.
 Credulity, 379, 399, 615. Johnson's, 608
 Creeds, 302.
 Crichton, Robert, Lord Sanquhar, 297.
 "Critical Review," 139, 165, 186, 504, 508, 551.
 —, a curious one of Johnson's, 190.
 —, examples of true, 205.
 Croft, Rev. Herbert, 650. "Life of Young," 673. "Love and Madness," 720.
 —, his style described by Burke, 673.
 —, singular advice to a pupil, 766.
 Croker, Rev. Temple Henry, translator of "Ariosto," 129.
 —, Alley, 580. Colonel, of Ballingard, 580.
 Crompton, Mr., 24.
 Cromwell, 41. Johnson designs to write his life, 737.
 —, Noble's "Memoirs" of, 738.
 Crosbie, Mr. Andrew, 270, 277, 456, 527.
 "Cross readings," Caleb Whiteoort's diverting, 770.
 Crouch, Mrs., 733.
 Crouzas's "Examen" of Pope's "Essay on Man," 39, 47.
 Crown, its power, 236. Influence of, in Parliament, 216.
 "Crudities," Coriat's, 238.
 Cruikshanks, Mr., the surgeon, 195, 731. Letters to, 739, 787.
 Crusoe, Robinson, 461.
 Crutchley, Jeremiah, Esq., 752.
 Cucullian's well, 351.
 Cucumbers, 364, 658.
 "Cui-bono" man, 690.
 Cullin, the mountains, 345.
 Cullen, Dr. William, 230, 277, 455, 551, 749.
 —, Mr., afterwards Lord Cullen, 230, 277, 536, 566.
 Culloeden, battle of, 328, 453.
 Calrossie, 384. Laird of, 584.
 Cumberland, William, Duke of, 420, 453.
 —, Duchess of, 253.
 —, Richard, 28, 230, 321, 567, 794. "Odes," 508. "Wal-loons," 706.
 —, character of Sir Fretful Plagiary intended for him, 218.
 —, his mode of study, 581.
 —, his conversation described, 794.
 —, his lines descriptive of Johnson's character,
 Cumming, Thomas, the Quaker, 295, 296, 343, 729.
 Cunningham, Sir John, 394.
 Cuning, 337.
 Cunningham, P., Esq., contributes notes to this edition, xxiv.
 9, 28, 32, 43, 44, 48, 50, 86, 108, 128, 136, 137, 142, 152, 174,
 184, 215, 218, 222, 248, 274, 319, 356, 363, 367, 385, 410, 430,
 439, 443, 448, 454, 462, 465, 504, 506, 510, 512, 554, 568, 573,
 605, 630, 699, 720, 723, 740.
 Cuper's Gardens, 366.
 Curates, salaries of, 540.
 "Curiosities of Literature," D'Israeli's, 669.
 Curiosity, 22.
 Curl, 41.
 Curran, John Philpot, 439.
 Currants, 725.
 Cust, Francis Cockayne, 51, 52.
 Cutts, Lady, Atterbury's Sermon on, 572.
 "Cyder," Philip's, 288.
 "Cypress Grove," Drummond of Hawthornden's, 322.
- Dacier, Madame, her "Homer," 609.
 "Daemonology," King James's, 627.
 Daile, "On the Fathers," 366.
 Dale, Mrs., 416.
 Dalen, Olaus von, "History of Sweden" recommended, 231.
 Dallas, Miss, 291.
 Dalrymple, Sir David. see Haines.
 —, Sir John, 249, 258, 403, 404.
 —, his discoveries respecting Russell and Sydney, 219.
 —, Johnson's burlesque of his style, 404.
 —, Lady Margaret, Countess of London, 394.
 Dalzel, Andrew, Greek professor at Edinburgh, 795.
 Damer, Hon. John, 628.
 Dance, Mr., the architect, 232.
 Dancing, advocated by Johnson, 200, 630.
 "Dandy," 324.
 Danes, the, 741. Danish colony, 236. Fort, 318.
 Danton, 249.
 D'Arbaly, Malame, see Burney, Frances.
 Darricpe, Captain, 307.
 Darius, shade of, 659.
 Darteneuf, Charles, 484.
 Dartmouth, Lord, 446.
 Darwin, Dr., dislike between Johnson and, 415
 Darwinod, Lady, 637.
 Dating letters, a laudable habit, 645.
 D'Avenant, Sir William, 236.
 David and Music, 838.
 Davies, Mr. Thomas, the actor and bookseller, character and anecdotes of, 133, 144, 158, 165, 168, 194, 195, 266, 247, 264, 410, 430, 443, 444, 445, 457, 570, 571, 579, 657, 658.
 —, "Life of Garrick," 7, 61, 651. Letters to, 735, 787.
 —, Churchill's sarcasm on his acting, 133.
 Davies, his "Pretty Wife," 133, 165, 735, 787.
 Dawkins, Henry, Esq., 695.
 Day-labourers, wages of, 716.
 Dead, legal redress for libels on the character of, 499.
 —, language, on writing verses in, 451.
 Deaf and dumb, Mr. Bro. dwood's academy for, 403.
 Deafness, Johnson's, 835.
 Deane, Rev. Richard, "On the future Life of Brutes," 191.
 Death, 55, 112, 116, 206, 211, 234, 322, 331, 374, 492, 545, 546, 547, 595, 601, 707, 708, 733, 742, 748, 752, 756, 763, 764, 798.
 —, reflections on a violent, 112.
 —, Southwell's stanzas upon, 420.
 —, preparation for, 374.
 Death-bed resentments, 346.
 —, repentance, J.'s opinion, and Dr. Wishart's book on, 350.
 Debates, Johnson's, 32, 41, 45, 804.
 Debt, misery of being in, 707.
 Debts, 117, 536.
 Deception, reproach of, 835.
 "Decline and Fall," Gibbon's, 484.
 Dedications, 234, 363, 531. Readiness to write, 172.
 —, and prefaces, by Johnson, and remarks on, 48, 56, 21,
 83, 99, 116, 119, 121, 124, 130, 158, 172, 179, 181, 187, 246,
 234, 313, 365, 531.
 Definitions, 5, 97, 273, 278, 399, 578, 6, 63, 612, 614.
 De Foe, Daniel, invents the story of Mrs. Veal's ghost, 234. His "Robinson Crusoe," 585.
 Degeneracy of mankind disputed, 291.
 Degrees, Johnson's, 37, 275. A. M. Oxon., 91. LL. D. Dublin, 168. D. C. L. Oxon., 441.
 De Groot, Isaac, Johnson's kindness for, 535.
 Deist, 88, 174.
 Delany, Dr., his "Observations on Swift," 245, 579, 657.
 Delap, Rev. Dr., 180.
 Delay, danger of, 112
 Delegacy, 834.
 Delightsense, 838.
 Demetrius, 60. Democritus, 688.
 "Demomach," character applied to Johnson, 665.
 Demosthenes, 45, 168, 249.
 Dempster, George, Esq., 139, 148, 151, 567. Miss, 449.
 —, his letter to Boswell on Johnson's "Journey," 405, 431.
 Denbigh, 418.
 Denina, "Discorso della Letteratura," 159.
 Denmark, Queen of, 260.
 Dennis, John, his critical works worth collecting, 507
 Departed spirits, appearance of, 116, 138, 685, 756.
 "Depredation," Foote's, 305.
 Depression of spirits, treatment of, 28.
 Derby, China manufactory at, 549.
 —, Rev. J., 483, 551.
 —, Countess of, 388, 390.
 Derriek, Samuel, Esq., 35, 131, 134, 155, 346, 622, 721, 735.
 —, his "Letters," 301.
 Descriptions contrast with realities, 303, 369, 723.
 "Deserted Village," 258. Johnson's share in, 174.
 Desmoulins, Mrs., 4, 12, 14, 29, 79, 228, 370, 507, 620, 621, 626,
 654, 684, 735, 746. John, 801, 841, 142, 843.
 Despotie governments, 591.
 Devaynes, John, Esq., 754.
 Devil, printer's, 686.
 Devonshire, William, Duke of, 167, 557. His dogged veracity, 625.
 —, Georgina Duchess of, 624.
 Devotion, 733.
 "Dialogues of the Dead," Lyttleton's, 481, 673.
 —, two by Reynolds, in imitation of Johnson, 601.
 Diamond, Mr., 78.
 Diary, Johnson's, 235, 280.
 —, the utility of keeping one, 118, 251, 572, 716.
 "Diary of a Lover of Literature," Mr. Guene's, 446.
 Dublin, Mr. Charles, 212.
 Dick, Sir Alexander, 278, 401, 403, 536, 725, 748.
 —, letter to Johnson on the effect of his "Journey," 527.
 —, the king's messenger, 331.
 "Dictionary," Johnson's, 51, 56, 57, 58, 81, 85, 89, 90, 91, 52,
 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 103, 119, 128, 151, 225, 230,
 246, 247, 264, 278, 283, 358, 479, 531, 532, 612, 636, 655.
 —, first published, 96. Wilkes's jeu d'esprit on, 98.
 Garrick's epigram on, 99. Johnson's profits by, 100. Epitome of, 103. Felicity with which the examples are selected, 757. Particulars as to the practical compilation of, 58, 827.
 Dido, 722.
 "Difficile est proprie," &c. of Horace explained, 516, 819.
 Diffidence, Johnson's, 665.
 Dilly, Edward, 260, 265, 441, 444, 476, 514, 591, &c. 615, 617, 631, 633, 687, 692, 693.
 —, his letter to Boswell on "The Lives of the Poets," 530.
 —, letter mis-addressed to, 536.
 —, Squire, 692.
 —, Charles, 692, 747.
 Dinely, Goodyere, Sir John, 275.
 Dining-tables, Macleod's, 345.
 Dinners, 160, 512.
 Diogenes Laertius, 563, 650.
 Diploma, J.'s as Burgess of Hardeven, 292. See Degrees.
 Dirleton's Doubts. Lord Hardwicke's opinion of, 563.

- Disease, its effect on the mind, 740.
 Diseases, acute and chronic, 707.
 Dislike, mutual, 645.
 D'Israeli, J. Esq., 32, 490, 624, 669.
 "Dissertation on the Prophecies," 759.
 Dissimulation, 189.
 Distinctions, 617.
 Distortions of Johnson's countenance, 24.
 Distrust, 539.
 "Divisions of Purlev," 616.
 "Divine Legation," Warburton's, 669.
 Divorces, 614.
 Dixie, Sir Wolstan, 21.
 "Dock" and Plymouth, dispute between, 128, 836.
 Doctor, title of, not used by Johnson, 168, 441.
 —, minor and major, 294.
 "Doctor of Physic," 429, 430, 454, 527.
 "Doctrine of Grace," Warburton's, 253.
 Dodd, Dr., 534, 536, 541, &c. 546, 550, 579, 586, 590, 726, 831.
 Johnson's assistance to, 534, 541, 550. Letters to J., 542, 543, J.'s letter to, 543, 831. "Thoughts in Prison," 586.
 —, his letter descriptive of Johnson's person and manner, 500. Horace Walpole's description of him, 541.
 Doddridge, Dr. Philip, 357.
 Dodington, G. B., (Lord Melcombe), 65, 68, 673.
 Dodsley, Robert, 28, 35, 56, 57, 59, 61, 62, 79, 87, 106, 113, 115, 484, 506, 586, 590, 636, 660.
 —, His "Public Virtue," 660. His tragedy of "Cleone," 660.
 —, James, 56, 61, 484.
 Dodwell, Rev. Dr., 418.
 Dogs, 207, 379, 430, 558. Eaten in China, 266.
 Doing penance in church, 334.
 Dollard, Mr., 82.
 Dominicetti, an Italian quack, his baths, 203.
 Donaldson, Alexander, the bookseller, 149, 150.
 Donatus, 180.
 Donne, Dr., his vision, 402, 483. His Satires, 837.
 Dorchester, Catherine Sedley, Countess of, 278.
 Dorothea, Electress of Hanover, 190.
 Dossie, Robert, 658.
 Dosa, George and Luke, 174.
 Dorset, Lord, 446. Rochester's allusion to, 280.
 Douglas, crowned heart in the arms of, 554.
 —, Home's tragedy of, 155, 390, 437, 581.
 —, Duchess of, 277.
 —, Rev. Dr. John, afterwards Bishop of Salisbury, 35, 72, 85, 110, 195, 218, 468, 602, 755.
 —, his "Milton no Plagiary," 72.
 —, Dr., a physician, his collection of editions of Horace, 756.
 —, Sir John, 549.
 —, Lady Lucy, 390.
 —, cause, 190, 255, 256, 272, 387, 391, 494, 569.
 Dovedale, 415.
 Dover, second Duke of, 453.
 Doxy, Miss, 641.
 Doyle, Sir F. H., 97.
 Drake, Sir Francis, Johnson's Life of, 43, 228.
 Draughts, tranquillising effects of the game of, 106.
 Dream, Johnson's, 656.
 Dreams, benignant influence of, 75.
 Dreghton, Lord, 159, 160, 279, 401, 451, 480, 522.
 "Drelicourt on Death," 234.
 —, Miss, afterwards Lady Primrose, 331.
 Dress, 61, 135, 200, 203, 209, 391, 448, 467, 479, 606.
 Dressing, time consumed in, 285.
 Drew, 79.
 Drinking, 243, 282, 297, 314, 236, 428, 480, 507, 513, 551, 577, 578, 579, 599, 606, 627, 629, 670, 678, 680, 684, 730.
 —, to excess, the practice greatly diminished, 282.
 —, Johnson's arguments against, 377, 551.
 —, its effect upon conversation and benevolence, 507.
 —, by deputy, 607.
 Dromorey Bishop of. See Percy.
 Drowning, suicide by, 281.
 Druids' temple, 298, 306.
 Drumgoold, Colonel, 465, 466.
 Drummond, of Hawthornden, 322, 404, 591.
 —, Mr. William, the bookseller, 181, 187, 393, 398, 402, 523. Johnson's letters to, 181, 182.
 —, Dr., 522, 523, 628.
 —, Mr. George, 276.
 —, Archbishop, 723.
 Drunkards, 282, 630, 750.
 Dryden, 68, 72, 173, 174, 203, 218, 219, 235, 236, 259, 274, 281, 282, 336, 346, 365, 372, 381, 438, 439, 440, 448, 489, 511, 516, 598, 614, 626, 633, 668, 691, 801. His "Hind and Panther" quoted, 668. His philosophical lines on Life, 764. His lines on Milton, 291. Johnson's Life of, 668.
 Dublin University, premiums in, 167.
 —, Mr. Flood bequeaths an estate to, 108.
 —, Diploma of L.L.D. to Johnson, 168.
 Dubos, Abbé, 205.
 Ducks, epitaph on, 6.
 Dudley, Rev. Henry Bate, 763.
 Dudley and Ward, John second Viscount, 424.
 Duel, ancient trial by, 271.
 Duelling, 239, 240, 254, 342, 728.
 Duff, Adam, 992.
 Du Halde, his "Description of China," 39, 192, 663.
 Dulness, 219, 767, 768.
 Dun, Rev. Mr., 397.
 Dunbar, Dr. "Essays on the History of Mankind," 651.
 Dunbury, 295.
 Duncan, Dr., 448.
 Dun Can, 319, 320.
 Duncan's monument, 301.
 Dunces, 203.
 "Dunciad," 203, 338, 442, 610.
 Duncombe, William, Esq., 601.
 Duncombes, the, 170.
 Dundas, Henry, (Viscount Melville), 87, 233, 566.
 Dundee, John, Viscount of, his fine epitaph, 282.
 Dundonald Castle, 394.
 "Dungeon of Wit," 354.
 Dunning, Mr. (Lord Ashburton), 232, 529, 537, 576.
 Dunsinane, William Nairne, Lord, 275, 280, 293, 402, 507.
 Dunton, John, the bookseller, his "Life and Errors," 723.
 Dunvegan, 333, 339, 340, 344.
 Duppa, R. editis Johnson's "Journey into Wales," 409, 415.
 "Durandi Rationale, 1459," 425. "Sententiarum," 464.
 Durham "On the Galatians," 398.
 Durishin, 344.
 Dury, Major-General A., 112.
 Dutch language, 575, 651. Johnson studies it at sixty-four, 265; at seventy-one, 661, 845.
 Duties, moral and religious, 261.
 Dyer, Sam., 18, 58, 107, 147, 163, 173, 177, 298, 399, 639, 657.
 —, John, his "Fleecy," 485.
 "Dying with a Grace," 750.
 Dyott, Mr. and Mrs., 416.
 Early habits, force of, 452.
 —, life, Johnson's, 4, 235, 812.
 —, rising, 335, 550.
 Earthquake, 540.
 Easter, 412, 502, 602, 603.
 East Indians, 611.
 —, Indies, going to, in quest of wealth, 635.
 —, delinquencies in, 729.
 Eating, 159, 557, 599.
 —, Johnson's mode of, 88, 159, 333, 515, 835, 837.
 Eccles, Rev. Mr., his literary fraud, 122.
 —, Isaac Ambrose, Esq., 144.
 Ecole Militaire, 460.
 Economy, 220, 584, 597, 733.
 Edinburgh, 270, 398. Castle, 399.
 —, Review. See Macaulay.
 Education, 64, 174, 242, 295, 469, 480, 511, 551, 628, 661, 684.
 —, of children, 26, 154, 295, 628.
 —, Johnson's plan of, 26, 628.
 —, great influence of, 480.
 —, by-roads in, 469.
 —, of the people, 242, 506.
 —, in public schools, 291, 469, 498.
 —, in England, 618.
 —, in Scotland, 451.
 —, Milton's "Tractate," and Locke's Essay on, 618.
 Edward the First, 80.
 Edwards, Thomas, his "Canons of Criticism," 86.
 —, Rev. Jonathan, "On Grace and Freewill," 593.
 —, Oliver, Johnson's fellow collegian, 517, 684.
 —, Dr. Edward, J.'s letter to 621. His Xenophon, 782.
 Fel, 627.
 Egalité, Duke of Orleans, 715.
 Eglington, Alexander, Earl of, 195, 212, 395, 598, 602.
 —, Susanna, Countess of, 394, 395, 403, 620.
 Egmont, John, first Earl of, "History of the House of Yvery," 723.
 —, second Earl of, his "Faction detected," 41.
 —, fifth Earl, 711.
 Egotism, 605.
 Egotists, the four classes of, 552.
 Egyptians, ancient, question as to their colour, 695.
 Eld, Mr., 606.
 Eldon, Earl of, 90, 279.
 Election committees, duty of members sitting upon, 678.
 "Elements of Criticism," Lord Kames's, 43, 134, 265, 578.
 Elephant, Johnson compared to, 223.
 "Elfrida," Mason's, 412.
 Elgin, 306.
 Eltham, Patrick Murray, fifth Lord, 294, 241, 268, 323, 374, 398, 399, 401, 412, 502, 512, 657, 692. His letters to Boswell and Johnson, 323. Johnson's letter to, 323.
 Eliot, Mr., afterwards Lord, 511, 642, 680, 748.
 Elizabeth, Queen, 119, 120, 205, 243, 658, 682.
 Elliot, Lady C. (Teresa Boswell), 301.
 —, Sir Gilbert, 233.
 Ellis, John, the money-scrivener, 501.
 —, Henry, of the British Museum, 420.
 —, Mr., 215.
 Elmsly, Mr., the bookseller, 425.

- Elphinston, Archbishop, 293.
 —, James, 4 65. 75. 182. 248. 254. 432. 626.
 —, his edition of the "Rambler," 63. 71.
 —, his translation of Martial, 65. 582.
 —, John on's character of, 237.
 —, John's letters to, 66.
 Elrington, Bishop, 69. 107. 149. 155. 186. 187. 202. 210. 725.
 760.
 "Elvira," Mallet's tragedy of, 139.
 Elwall, E., the heretic, 234. 262.
 Emigration, 271. 288. 333. 359. 368. 573.
 Emmet, Mrs., the actress, 490.
 Emphasis in reading the 9th commandment, 51.
 Employment, 554.
 — of wealth, 715.
 Emulation, 295.
 Enghien, Duke d', 462.
 "England's Parnassus," 538.
 English and Dutch languages radically the same, 575. 661.
 "English Malady," Cheyne's, 522.
 English bar, 766. clergy, 350. merchant, 160.
 —, drama 711. 743.
 Englishmen, their reserve towards strangers, 721.
 — and Frenchmen compared, 57. 218. 581. 659.
 —, and Scotchmen compared, 270. 658.
 Entails, 296. 472. 475. 477. 479.
 —, Johnson's Letters on, 472. 473. 474. 475.
 Envy, 51. 134. 137. 586. 600. 662.
 Epictetus, 83.
 Epigram, Johnson's, to Mrs. Carter, 40.
 — on George the Second, 43.
 — ad Lauram Paritiram, 47.
 —, ad Ricardum Savagum, 49.
 —, Garrick's, on Johnson's Dictionary, 90.
 — on the marriage of an Austrian Archduchess, 344.
 — on seeing Blenheim, 485.
 — on Miss Mary Astor, 40. 611.
 — on Lord Anson's temple of the winds, 624.
 — on a religious dispute at Bath, 760.
 — on the miracle at Cuna, 508.
 Epilogue to "Irene," by whom written, 61.
 — to the "Distressed Mother," by Johnson, 11.
 Epitaph, on Mrs. Bell, 225. 246.
 — on Dr. Birch, 40.
 — on Admiral Byng, 165.
 — on the Laird of Col, 368.
 — on Goldsmith, 519.
 — on Sir Thomas Hammer, 54.
 — on Mrs. Johnson, 77.
 — on Johnson, by Mr. Flood, 808.
 — on Johnson, by Dr. Parr, 808. 809.
 — on Johnson, by Soame Jenyns, and on Soame Jenyns, by Boswell, 106.
 — on Colm MacLaurin, 279.
 — on Dr. Parnell, 405.
 — on Philips, the musician, 43. 181.
 — on Mrs. Salusbury, 457.
 — on Dr. Smollet, 392.
 — on a celebrated Italian, 416.
 — on Walmesley postponed, 836.
 — on one killed by a fall from his horse, 729.
 Epitaphs, 313. 392. 469. 519. 521. 666. 672. 729.
 —, Johnson's Essay on, 43.
 Equality, natural, 152. 176. 252. 502.
 Erasmus, 416. 420. 838.
 —, an expression of, applied to Johnson, 762.
 Erol, James 14th Earl, 255. Like Sarpedon, 296.
 — Earls of, 297.
 —, Isabella Carr, Countess of, 295.
 "Errors of the Press," Whiteford's witty paper on, 770.
 Erse language, Scriptures to be translated into, 181.
 — manuscripts, 433. 434. 446.
 — and Irish dialects of the same language, 231.
 — songs, 301. 316. 316.
 Erskine, Sir Harry, 131.
 —, Hon. Andrew, 139. 544.
 —, Hon. Thomas, afterwards Lord, 237. 238. 275.
 —, Rev. Dr., 400.
 —, Hon. Archibald, 399.
 —, Hon. Henry, gives Boswell a shilling for the sight of his "bear," 275.
 —, Lady Anne, 399.
 "Esquire," the title of, 4.
 "Essay on Man," Pope's, 635. 636. 830.
 "Essay on Miracles," Hume's, 489.
 "Essay on Taste," Miss Reynolds's, 697.
 "Essay on Truth," Beattie's, 245.
 Essex, Earl of, his advice on travel, 148.
 —, song on him, 346.
 — Head Club, instituted, and its rules, 716.
 Estates, obligation in settling, 479.
 Eternal punishments, 562.
 Eternity, 313. 750.
 Etymologies, Johnson's, characterised, 97.
 Etymology, 338. 340.
 Eugene, Prince, 35.
 "Eugenio," a poem, lines from, 239.
 Emmellan Club, 798.
 "Euphens," in the Rambler, 68.
 Euripides quoted, 91. 239. 626.
 "European Magazine," 122.
 Evans, a book-seller, scuffle with Goldsmith, 248.
 —, Rev. Dr., 429. 455.
 —'s ballads, 346.
 —, John, 4.
 Evers, widow, (Lady Firebrace), 39.
 Evelin, John Raymond, 222.
 "Evelina," Miss Burney's, 732.
 Evil, origin of, 301. 392.
 — speaking, 626. Propensions, 431.
 — spirits, 277. 761.
 Exaggeration, general proneness to, 540. 629.
 "Excise," Johnson's offensive detraction of, 5. 97. 612.
 Executions, public, 296. 297. 720.
 Exercise, benefits of, 797.
 Exhibition at the Royal Academy, 123. 724. 753.
 Existence, 612.
 Expectation, to be compared with experience, 169.
 Expense, 655.
 Extraordinary characters not to be credited, 484.
 Fable, sketch of one, by Johnson, 256.
 Facetiousness, 688.
 Facility of composition, Johnson's, 665.
 Faction, 723.
 "Faction Detected," 41.
 Facts, mischief of mingling them with fiction, 720.
 Fairfax's "Tasso," 666.
 Fairies, 659.
 Fairley, Mr., 297.
 "Fairly Queen," 656.
 Faith, 292. 497.
 Falconer, Rev. Mr., a non-juring bishop, 622.
 —, Mr., husband of Lady Errol, 296.
 Falkland and Dryden, 464.
 "Falkland Islands," Johnson's pamphlet on, 221. 222. 227.
 Falmouth, Viscount, 608.
 "False Alarm," Johnson's, 213. 227. 664.
 "False Delicacy," Hugh Kelly's play of, 190.
 Falsehoods, 572. 765.
 Fame, 403. 450. 584.
 Family influence, 229. 265. 443.
 — residences, 339. 340.
 — men of, 297.
 Fancy, 412. 612.
 Farces, 656.
 Farmer, Rev. Dr., 125. 506. 647. 660.
 —, Johnson's letters to, 213. 647.
 Farmers, 616.
 Farquhar, George, his writings, 657.
 "Fashionable Lover," Cumberland's play, 321.
 "Fasting, 229. 362. 448. 480. 597.
 "Father's Revenge," Lord Carlisle's tragedy of, 743.
 Fatness, 729.
 Faulkner, George, 230. 305. 456.
 —, Johnson's conversation with, 277.
 Faulkner, Sir Edward, 85.
 Fear, 292. 436.
 Feeling for others, seldom very acute, 295.
 "Feeling People," 266.
 Fees, lawyers, 286.
 "Felixmarte of Hircania," Spanish romance, 9.
 Fencing, 284.
 Fencibles, "Telemachus," 372. 457.
 Fenton, Eliza, 57. Share in translating the Odyssey, 647.
 —, Johnson's Life of, 9.
 Ferguson, James, the astronomer, 298. 596.
 —, Sir Adam, 236.
 Fergusson, Dr. Adam, 276. 277.
 Fergusson, Captain, 325. 331. 353.
 Fermor, Mrs., niece of Pope's Helinda, 462.
 Ferri, Mr., 303.
 Ferns, Bishop of. See Elrington.
 — the demery of, 678.
 "Festivals and Fasts," Nelson's, 487.
 Feudal system, 239. 245. 257. 298. 640.
 Fez and Morocco, Emperor of, 429.
 Fiction, 738.
 Fiddle, dithuly of playing upon, 294.
 Fiddle-de-dre, 837.
 Fielding, Henry, 51. 81. 238. 567. Compared with Richardson, 190. 247. 288. His "Amelia," 568. Sir John, 618.
 Fife, barrenness of, 285.
 —, Countess Dowager of, 246.
 Fighting-cock, 442.
 Filby, Goldsmith's tailor, 203.
 Filial piety, extraordinary instance of, 791.
 Finery should be very fine, 717.
 "Fingal," 219. 291. 317. 346. 399. 400. 428. 429. 431. 715.
 Finnon Haddock, 299.
 Fir-brace, Lady, 39.
 Fisher, Rev. Dr., 27. 169. 454. 483.
 Fishmonger, insensibility of one, 627.

- Fitzgerald, house of, 376.
 Fitzherbert, William, Esq., 20, 69, 110, 123, 253, 255, 349, 443, 447, 515, 544, 6, 9. His Lady, 20, 544.
 Fitzjames, Duc de, 592.
 Fitzmaurice, Mr., 584, 645.
 Fitzosborne's "Letters," 645.
 Fitzroy, Lord Charles, 491.
 —, Lady, 872.
 Flatman, Thomas, his poems, 504.
 Flattery, 257, 282, 419, 452, 576, 635, 610, 647.
 "Flaves," Dr. J. poem, 485.
 Fleet Street, 157, 443, 574.
 Fleetwood, Everard, Esq., 605.
 — on the Sacrament, recommended by Johnson, 843.
 Fleming, Sir Michael le, 157.
 Flexman, Mr., 771.
 Flint, Bot, 688.
 Flogging in schools, 469.
 Flood, Right Hon. H., bequest to Dublin University, 108.
 — Opinion of J. as an orator, 223. Eulogium on J., 808.
 Floyd, Thomas, 155.
 Floyer, Sir J., on "Baths," 23. On "Asthma," 751, 782.
 Fludger, Rev. Mr., Johnson's college companion, 483.
 Folengo, Theophilo, 591.
 Fondness, 709.
 Fontainebleau, 462.
 Fontenelle, 498.
 Foote, Samuel, anecdotes and character of, 45, 120, 138, 143, 206, 207, 211, 230, 242, 243, 274, 275, 287, 305, 400, 430, 455, 467, 479, 515, 525, 555, 556, 717, 732, 753. Of a mad family, 274. His description of Johnson at Paris, 467. Extraordinary readiness of wit, 515.
 Forbes, Sir William, of Pittsigo, 271, 272, 276, 277, 278, 401, 408, 507, 508, 519, 520, 521, 564.
 —, Rev. Mr., 288, 350.
 Ford, Rev. Cornelius, 9, 224. Hogarth's riotous parson, 9.
 Ghost story respecting, 611.
 —, Sarah, Johnson's mother, 4.
 Fordyce, Rev. Dr. James, 134, 412, 453, 805.
 —, Dr. George, 573.
 Foreigners, 659.
 Fores, 301.
 Forgetfulness, 285, 695.
 Form of Prayer, arguments for, 391.
 Fornication, 237, 334, 500, 637.
 Forrester, Colonel, 501.
 Forster, George, his "Voyage to the South Seas," 554.
 Fort, Augustus, 621.
 —, George, 303.
 "Fortune," Derrick's poem of, quoted, 35.
 — hunters, 220.
 Foster, Dr. James, 657.
 —, Elizabeth, Milton's granddaughter, 72, 73.
 —, Mr. Thompson, 195.
 Fothergill, Dr. John, the physician, 450.
 —, Rev. Dr. Thomas, of Oxford, letters to, 441.
 Foulcs, Sir James, 312, 347.
 —, the Messrs., the Elizabeths of Glasgow, 393.
 "Fountains," the, a tale, by Johnson, 181.
 Fouquet, 279.
 Fowke, Joseph, Esq., 79, 500, 501. Letter to, 737.
 —, Francis, Esq., 522. General Thomas, 105, 500.
 Fox, Right Hon. Charles James, 229, 253, 412, 445, 446, 501, 529, 580, 583, 585, 590, 623, 748, 751, 756, 761.
 —, his conversation, 713.
 —, Lady Susan, 440.
 France, Johnson's visit to, 459. Journal of Tour, 460, 466.
 —, no middle rank in, 462, 466.
 —, state of literature in, 581.
 Francis, Rev. Dr. Philip, 45. His Horace, 26, 448, 617.
 Francklin, Rev. Dr. Thomas, 121, 273, 521, 578, 665, —, delectates his translation of Demoxan to Johnson, 665.
 Fraser, Mr., the engineer, 606.
 —, Simon, Lord Lovat, 314.
 —, General, 495.
 —, Mr., of Strichen, 298.
 Frasers, the clan of, 309.
 Fraternal intercourse, 112.
 Frederick, Prince of Wales, 60, 326, 461.
 — the Great, of Prussia, 148, 149, 192.
 — II, Johnson's Life of, 103.
 Free-will, 203, 237, 301, 504, 773.
 French, Johnson's notions of their manners and customs, 298, 467, 616, 659, 738.
 — Academy, send Johnson their Dictionary, 98.
 — language, 467. Literature, 342, 372, 738. Novels, 218.
 — writers, superficial, and why, 154.
 —, credulity of the, 379.
 —, Mrs., 669.
 Freron, Mr., Johnson's visit to, 461, 468.
 Frewen, Dr. Accepted, Archbishop of York, 259.
 Friend, Sir John, 241.
 Friends, Johnson's, a list of them, 79.
 Friends and friendship, 48, 66, 98, 112, 114, 173, 206, 233, 240, 292, 217, 450, 513, 563, 629, 631, 738, 751, 756.
 "Friendship," an Ode, by Johnson, 48.
 —, female, 820.
 Frisk language, 162.
 Frith of Forth, 280.
 Fruit, Johnson never had enough of but once, and why, 424.
 "Frustra Litteraria," Baretti's, 552.
 Fullarton, Colonel John, 617.
 Funeral, Johnson's, 807.
 Fust and Shæffer, 425.
 Future state, 233, 561.
 — knowledge of friends, 233, 546, 592, 593, 756, 798.
 Gabbling, 615, 656.
 Gaelic language, 231. Dictionary, 745.
 Gaity, 529.
 Gait, Johnson's, 677.
 Galatians, Durham on the, 398.
 Galen, 650.
 Gaming, 238, 501.
 "Ganganelli's Letters" not authentic, 592.
 "Garagantua," Johnson compared to, 581.
 Garden, 79, 696, 725.
 Gardener, Mr., the bookseller, 445.
 Gardening, 145, 201.
 Gardenstow, Lord, 288.
 Gardiner, Mrs., 78, 501, 525, 526, 743.
 Garrick, David, anecdotes of, 8, 19, 25, 26, 27, 43, 51, 51, 55, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 65, 68, 76, 79, 80, 81, 88, 99, 101, 113, 124, 134, 135, 137, 142, 165, 167, 173, 185, 190, 198, 201, 213, 207, 225, 243, 251, 257, 259, 304, 347, 358, 385, 400, 415, 438, 439, 447, 481, 489, 505, 507, 511, 515, 545, 555, 556, 582, 583, 584, 590, 594, 601, 622, 623, 629, 655, 657, 659, 662, 686, 687, 726, 732, 741.
 —, Johnson's envy of, 51, 134.
 —, his "Ode" on the death of Mr. Pelham, 88.
 —, his epigram on Johnson's Dictionary, 99.
 —, Johnson's opinion of, 135, 201, 205, 243, 257, 275, 304, 347, 400, 438, 456, 470, 481, 489, 505, 511, 515, 516, 555, 556, 584, 594, 601, 629, 655, 657, 741.
 —, J.'s letters to, and answer, 167, 225. B.'s letter to, and answer, 385. His Shakspeare-jubilee, 198. His liberality, 584, 629. His death, 622, 623. His funeral, 726. J.'s eulogium on, 629. Inscription under his portrait, 686, and bust, 836. Talent of mimicry, 439. J.'s opinion of his prologues, 438.
 —, Mr. George, 541.
 —, Mr. Peter, 27, 31, 415, 434, 489, 490, 632, 639.
 —, Mrs., 629, 685, 731.
 Garrigue, proper name of the Garrick family, 489.
 Gastrel, Rev. Mr., cuts Shakspeare's mulberry-tree, 492.
 —, Mrs., and letters to, 492, 529, 565, 566, 622, 623, 631, 639, 706, 749.
 Gastrell, Bishop, his Christian Institutes, 377.
 Gataker, Rev. Thomas, "On Lys," 369.
 Gausius, Professor, opinion on hypochondria and madness, 14.
 Gay, John, 72, 364, 453, 696. "Beggars' Opera," 364, 453.
 604. "The Opagans of Highwaymen," 453.
 "Geldius" character of, 27, 68, 425.
 Gell, Mr., father of Sir William, 416.
 General warrants, legality of, 199.
 Generosity, 403.
 Genius, 293, 621, 833.
 Genlis, Madame, 247.
 Gentility, 444, 511.
 Gentleman, Mr. Francis, 131.
 "Gentleman," the appellation of, 4.
 "Gentleman's Magazine," 11, 13, 23, 25, 31, 43, 45, 48, 50, 596, 604, 611, 658, 666.
 "Gentle Shepherd," Allan Ramsay's, 252, 395.
 George the First, 53, 151, 187. Johnson's character of, 414.
 — the Second, 105, 187, 236, 461, 689. J.'s invective against, 42, 104, 111, 444. J.'s epigram on, 43, 405. Not an Augustus to learning or genius, 65. His destruction of his father's will, 444. Compliment to Mrs. Thornton, 185.
 — the Third, 119, 123, 125, 184, 187, 195, 196, 199, 202, 325, 448, 463, 495. J.'s character of, 123, 213, 448. Grants J. a pension, 126. J.'s interview with, 184. Happy expression of, 69. His conduct during the riots in 1780, 648. His alleged refusal of an addition to J.'s pension disproved, 781, 788.
 —, his library is judiciously given to the Brit. Museum, 29.
 — the Fourth, 151, 623, 184, 187, 272, 297, 325, 329.
 "Georgics," The, 731.
 Gerard, Dr., 292, 305.
 German courts, 359.
 Gerves, John, 378.
 Gesticulation, 24, 770, 834. Gestures, 42, 269, 429.
 "Get Money," 560.
 Gherardi, Marchese, 606.
 Ghosts, 116, 138, 224, 234, 239, 241, 275, 378, 573, 585, 596, 614, 616, 631, 685.
 Giannone, 655.
 Giants' Causeway, 638.
 "Giants of Literature," 69.
 Giardini, 254.
 Gibbon, Edward, Esq., 15, 71, 93, 112, 186, 197, 202, 229, 272, 412, 445, 446, 452, 453, 484, 498, 511, 521, 573, 577, 579, 629. Sketch of his appearance and manners by Colman, Jun., 511. His character of Dr. Maty, 93. His panyric on public schools, 498. Imitation of Johnson's style, 706.

- Gibbon, Mrs. 15.
 —, Charles, his work worth reading, 175.
 —, Rev. Dr., 695, 756.
- Gibraltar, 461.
- Giffard, the manager, 51.
 —, a clergyman, verses by, 301.
- Gifford, William, Esq., 562, 794.
- Gilbert "On Evidence," 400.
- Gillespie, Dr., 749.
- Gilmour, Mr., 335.
- Gilpin, Mr., 416.
- Ginquet, King, 461.
- Gin-shops, 251.
- Glanville, William Evelyn, Esq., 608.
- Glasgow, 393, 719.
- Glassé's "Cookery," written by Dr. Hill, 592.
- Glaucus, 250.
- Glensheal, 369.
- Gloominess, folly and sinfulness of, 702
- Glover's "Leonidas," 301
- Gloves, 583.
- Glow-worm, 192, 256.
- Gluttony, 159.
- Glynn, Knight of, 377.
- Goat, motto for Banks's, 226.
- Gobelins, 469.
- Goldsmith, Dr. Oliver, 72, 135, 153, 161, 189, 222, 240, 258, 264, 349, 385, 430, 506, 571, 657, 831.
 —, Boswell and Hawkins's character of, 140, 141, 142, 241.
 —, anecdotes of, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 150, 176, 186, 195, 203, 248, 251, 253, 262, 263, 264, 294, 498, 527, 549.
 —, Johnson's opinion of, and of his writings, 139, 174, 235, 241, 244, 247, 250, 256, 257, 258, 263, 264, 308, 358, 379, 371, 384, 450, 506, 520, 550, 578, 580, 586, 600, 624, 625, 661, 663, 691, 716, 768, 831.
 —, his portrait by Reynolds, 831.
 —, beats Evans, the bookseller, 248, 249.
 —, Johnson's letter to, 255.
 —, his bon-mots on Johnson, 155, 256, 263, 264
 —, his death, 413, 414.
 —, Johnson's tetrastron on, 414, 521. Translated, 414.
 —, Johnson's Latin epitaph on, 519.
 —, Garrick's and Walspole's description of him, 140.
 —, his "Vicar of Wakefield," 141. His "Traveller," 174, 256, 384, 580, 604. His "Deserted Village," 174, 258.
 —, his comedies refused by Garrick and Colman, 604.
 —, Dr. Warton's opinion of, 173.
 —, J's prologue to his "Good-natured Man," 67, 189, 190.
 —, his "Life of Parnell," 235.
 —, his "She Stoops to Conquer," 248. Dedicated to J., 250.
 —, his "Animated Nature," 240, 449, 548.
 —, Prior's Life of, quoted, 74, 111, 171, 177, 203, 247.
 —, Doctor Minor, 294.
 —, Dr. Isaac, 141.
 —, Rev. Mr., 241.
 —, Mrs., 526.
- Good-breeding, 290.
 —, in what it consists, 203.
 —, the best book upon, 309.
- Gooddeere, Captain, 274.
 —, Sir John Dinely, 275.
- Good Friday, 449, 597, 724.
- Good-humour, 335, 451.
 —, "Good Man," 739.
 —, "Good-natured Man," Goldsmith's, 67, 189, 190.
- Goodness, imitate, 761. Natural, 335, 336.
- Gordon, Professor Thomas, 290, 291, 293.
 —, Mr., the translator of Tacitus, 45.
 —, Hon. Alex., afterwards Lord Rockville, 159, 401, 402.
 —, Sir Alexander, 291, 294.
 —, Lord George, 647, 648, 683.
 —, Rev. Dr., 618.
- Gough, Mr., 465.
- Gout, 334, 634, 740.
 —, Government, 236, 591, 731.
 —, influence, 216, 448, 449, 500, 680.
 —, of India, 729.
 —, "Government of the Tongue," 626.
- Governments, different kinds of, 591.
- Gower, Earl, letter for J., 37. J's aversion to, 37, 58.
 —, Mrs. Leveson, 646.
- "Grace," Edwards on, 593.
 —, t meals, 363. Latin one of Johnson's, 284.
- Grafton, Duke of, 565.
- Graham, author of "Telemachus, a Masque," 139, 294, 528.
 —, Lord, third Duke of Montrose, 627.
 —, Lady Lucy, 360.
 —, Miss, afterwards Lady Dashwood, 637.
 —, Colonel, 231.
- Granger, Dr. James, 191, 296, 471. His "Sugar Cane," 485, 834. His "Ode on Solitude," 561, 834. Letter to Percy, 171.
 —, Grammar-school, Johnson's scheme for the classes of a, 26.
- Grand Chartreux, 465.
- Grandison, Sir Charles, 83, 181.
- Grange, Lady, her extraordinary confinement, 311.
- Graeger, Rev. James, his "Biographical History," 352, 521.
 —, Johnson's letter to, 471.
- Grant, Sir Archibald, 527.
 —, Rev. Mr., 302.
- Grantham, Lord, 148.
- Grants, the, 309.
- Granville, John Carteret, Earl of, 658, 680.
- Gratitude, 343.
- Grattan, Right Hon. Henry, 439, 799.
 —, "Grave," Blair's, 509.
- Graves, Rev. Richard, 24, 443, 485.
 —, Mr. Morgan, 21.
- Gravina, 723.
- Gray, Sir James, 238.
 —, Thomas, and his poetry, 15, 136, 137, 149, 174, 234, 315, 365, 385, 439, 442, 594, 596, 599, 658, 675. His dulness, 439, 504. His "Odes," 442, 658. His "Letters," 456. His "Memoirs," 501. His life by Mason, a dull book, 504.
 —, Opinion of Boswell's "Corset," 189.
 —, Stephen, verses on the death of, 181.
 —, John, bookseller, 46.
 —, "Gray's Inn Journal," 110.
 —, "Great," how pronounced, 61, 233.
- Great, manners of the, 616.
 —, men, on paying court to, 775.
- Greatrakes, Valentine, 233.
- Greeces, the fountain of knowledge, 698.
- Greek language, Johnson's advice on studying, 637.
 —, compared by Johnson to lace, 651.
 —, Johnson's alleged deficiency in, 791, 795.
- Grammar, Ctenardus's, 609. Translations, 837.
- Green, Bishop of Lincoln, 8, 418.
 —, Matthew, his "Spleen," quoted, 636.
 —, Mr. Richard, of Lichfield, his museum, 214, 415, 490, 631, 639. His cast of Shakspeare, 438. Johnson's letter to, 797. His anecdotes of Johnson, 826.
- Green's "Diary of a Lover of Literature," 416.
- Greene, Edward Burnaby, 167.
- Green-room, Johnson's reasons for not frequenting, 62.
 —, "Green Sleeves," the song of, 353.
- Greenwich Hospital, 156, 157.
- Gregory, Dr., 79, 278.
- Granville, Right Hon. George, 222.
 —, Act, 400.
- Gresham College, 498.
- Greshams, the, 170.
- Gresham, Henry, his character of Johnson, 24.
- Greville, Mr., 611. His book, 764.
 —, a name assumed by Hawkesworth, 55.
- Grey, Dr. Richard, 603. Dr. Zachary, 603.
- Grief, 206, 540, 693.
- Grierson, Mr., king's printer in Ireland, 160, 215.
 —, Mrs., the learned, some account of, 215.
- Griffiths, Mr., letter respecting Cibber's Lives, 504.
 —, Mr., of Keilmawcilly, 423.
- Grimm, 115
- Grimston, Viscount, his "Love in a Hollow Tree," 680.
- Groot, Isaac de, a descendant of Grotius, J's kindness to, 535.
- Grose's "Olio," note on Charles Stuart, 827.
- Grotius, 155, 478, 565.
 —, on the Christian religion, recommended by J., 135.
 —, de Satisfactione Christi, 192.
- Grotto, Pope's, 657, 670.
- Grotto, 657, 658.
- Grove, Henry, his "Spectator," on Novelty, 505, 664.
 —, "Grub-street," Johnson's description of, 98.
- Gualtier, Philip, 718.
- Guardians, Johnson's advice on the appointment of, 634.
- Guarini quoted, 614.
- Guilleraques, 22.
- "Gulliver's Travels," 437.
- Gully, 79.
- Gunsbury Park, Johnson in, 834.
- Gunning, Elizabeth, Duchess of Argyll, 387.
- Gunpowder, 373, 618.
 —, "Gustavus Vasa," Brooke's, 40.
- Guthrie, Will., 32, 191, 663. "Apotheosis of Milton," 40.
- Gwyn, Mr., the architect, 181, 424, 481, 484.
 —, his proposals for the improvement of the metropolis, Johnson's dedication, 181.
 —, Mrs. (Miss Horneck), 140.
- Habeas Corpus, 500.
- Habits, early, 452.
- Hackman, Rev. Mr., his trial for shooting Miss Ray, 628.
- Haddington, Earl of, 241, 538.
- Haddock, Finner, 299.
- Hagley, 424.
- Hague, 8.
- Hales, David, Dalrymple, Lord, 87, 118, 153, 245, 275, 278, 279, 300, 351, 380, 401, 428, 429, 472, 474, 483, 569, 589, 730, 736, 740, 850, 860, 861, 862. His letter to Boswell on the "Journey to the Hebrides," 465. His "Annals of Scotland," 413, (14-44), 459, 468, 471, 513, 618, 624, 636.
- Hale, Lord Chief Justice, 252, 415. Anecdotes of, 448, 767.
- Halford, Sir H., 211.
- Half-pay officers, 422.

- Halifax, Lord, 168.
 Halket, Eliz., (Lady Wardlaw), author of "Hardyknute," 205.
 Hall, Rev. Dr., 13. 16. 18. 89. 93. 165. 213. 258. 448. 453. 476. 507. 511. 560. 597. 658.
 —, Mrs., 475. 684. 685. 752.
 —, Bishop, 175. 233.
 —, General, 619.
 Hallam, Mr., 249.
 Hallows, Mrs., 357.
 Halsey, Edmund, Esq., 169.
 Hamilton, of Bangour, his poems, 276. 545.
 —, Right Hon. William Gerard, 37. 168. 169. 223. 349. 436. 441. 577. 644. 690. 743. 807. J.'s compliments to his conversation, 169. His anecdote respecting J.'s pension, 436. J.'s letters to, 743. 787. His kindness to J., 742.
 —, the Rev. Dr., Johnson's letters to, 757.
 —, Gavin, the painter, 410.
 —, Mr., the printer, 254.
 —, Mr., of Sundrum, 275.
 —, Lady Betty, 388, 389.
 —, Duke and Duchess of, 387. 390. 396. 569.
 —, Miss, 731.
 "Hamlet," 248. 512. 678.
 Hammond, James, 69. His "Love Elegies," 357. 504. 659. Mr. Bevil's defence of, 675.
 —, Dr., "on the New Testament," 513.
 Handmaid to the "Arts," 658.
 Hanging criminals, on the new way of, 720.
 Hamner, Sir Thomas, his Shakspeare, 54. 181. 183. 201. Epitaph on, 64.
 Hanover succession, 276. 358. 389. 546. 712.
 Hanway, Jonas, his "Essay on Tea," 105. His "Travels" characterised by Johnson, 217.
 Happiness, 142. 150. 153. 175. 236. 289. 323. 365. 447. 511. 549. 561. 578. 593. 594. 695.
 —, equalised by Providence, 90.
 —, the only solid basis of, 619.
 Harcourt, Lord Chancellor, 18.
 Hardinge, Sir Henry, (now Lord,) 241.
 Hardwicke, Lord Chancellor, 505. 563.
 —, second Lord, 85.
 Hardy, Mr., his "Life of Lord Charlemont," 83. 643.
 "Hardyknute," ballad of, 205.
 Harrington, Dr. Henry, his "Nugæ Antiquæ," 717.
 "Harlequin Miscellany," 53.
 Harlow, the painter, 741.
 Harmless pleasure, 629.
 Harrington, Countess of, 511.
 Harriot, Mrs., 213.
 "Harriot Stuart," a novel, 83.
 Harris, James, Esq., 24. 396. 452. 532. 577. 582. 644.
 —, his character of Johnson's Dictionary, 532.
 —, his "Hermes," 396.
 —, the bookseller, 249.
 Harrison, Mr., Johnson's uncle, 813.
 —, Mrs., her "Miscellanies," 105.
 Harry, Miss Jane, the proselyte to Quakerism, 596.
 Hart, Rev. John, his Hymns, 165.
 Harte, Dr. Walter, his "Gustavus Adolphus," 217. 680. J.'s character of, 217. His excessive vanity, 680.
 Hartly, Dr., 65.
 Harwood, Dr., 4. 12. 25. 62. 78. 80. 125. 127. 163. 187. 198. 438. 505. 506. His "History of Lichfield," 25. 79.
 —, Dr. Edward, 506.
 Hasle, the schoolmaster, presented, 227. 231. 241. 245.
 —, Johnson's argument on behalf of, 241. 245.
 Hastings, Warren, Esq., Boswell's character of, 675. 729.
 —, letter to Boswell, 675. J.'s letters to, 676. 677. Wished to bring the Persian language into Europe, 676.
 —, Marquis of, 322.
 Hatchett, Charles, Esq., secretary of the "Club," 445. 446. Hatred, 544.
 "Hatyn foam foam eri," an Erse song, 316. Translated by Lady Northampton, 364.
 Hawkestone, 417.
 Hawkesworth, Dr., 54. 55. 58. 75. 79. 81. 181. 235. 361. 834. A pupil of J.'s. 25. Imitates his style, 81. 250. Anecdotes of J., 235. His "Collection of Voyages," 260. 496. His objections against a particular providence, 361.
 Hawkins, Mr., Johnson's instructor in Latin, 7.
 —, Rev. William, his "Siege of Aleppo," 583.
 —, Sir John, his "Life of Johnson" quoted, contradicted, or explained, passim.
 —, Sir John, Boswell habitually unjust to, 1. Johnson's letters to, 745. 789.
 —, Journal of Johnson's last days, 800. 840.
 —, his attempt to purloin Johnson's MSS., 803. 841.
 —, his miscellaneous anecdotes of Johnson, 771.
 —, Miss, 232. 597. 746. Her description of Mrs. Williams, 74. Of Bennet Langton, 79. Of Garrick's person and mode of living of, 584.
 Hawthornden, 322. 404.
 Hay, Lord Charles, 394. 497. 661.
 —, Lord, 297.
 —, John, 306. 308. 310.
 —, Sir George, 118. John of Kellour, 297.
 Hay's "Martial," 392.
 Hayes, Rev. Mr., 555.
 Hayley, William, Esq., 773. 837.
 Hayman, Mr., the painter, 86.
 Health, 227.
 —, Johnson's rules for travellers in quest of, 708.
 Healths, drinking of, 637.
 "Heard," Johnson's mode of pronouncing, 560.
 Heaven, happiness of, 233. 593. 594.
 Hearne, Thomas, 837.
 He-bear and she-bear, 691.
 Heberden, Dr., 632. 734. Letter to, 788.
 Hebrides, Johnson's wish to visit, 153. 157. 191. 221. 228. 245. 256. 266.
 —, Boswell's account of the journey to, from 267 to 409.
 —, Johnson's "Account of his Journey," 413. 414. 427. 431. 527. 540. 606. Errata in, 825.
 Hector, Mr. Edmund, Johnson's schoolfellow, 5. 8. 9. 11. 21. 23. 47. 486. 488. 665. 731. George, 813.
 —, Johnson's letters to, 703. 704. 792.
 Heely, Mr. and Mrs., 183. 790.
 Heits, 472. &c. 525.
 "Hell paved with good intentions," 450.
 "Heloise," Rousseau's, 175.
 Hénault's History of France, 459.
 Henderland, Lord, see Murray.
 Henderon, John, the actor, 741. Imitation of J., 439.
 —, John, student of Pembroke College, 759. 763.
 Henry, Dr., 79. His "History of Great Britain," 609.
 —, J., Lyttelton's History of, 185.
 —, VII., 300.
 —, VIII., 420. 638.
 —, Shakspeare's, 741. Harlowe's picture of, 741.
 —, Mr., 102.
 Herbert, George, his "Jacula Prudentum" quoted, 450.
 Hercules, 60.
 Hereditary occupations, 302. Dispositions, 336. Right, 546.
 Heritable jurisdictions, 322.
 "Hermes," Harris's, 396.
 "Hermippus Redivivus," Campbell's, 142. 477.
 Hermit, Life of, 285.
 "Hermite," Parnell's, 569. 631. Beattie's, 720.
 Herne, Elizabeth, a lunatic cousin of Johnson, 802.
 "Heroic Epistle to Sir William Chambers," 325. 602. 691. 768.
 Hertford, first Marquis of, 88.
 Hervey, Lord, 29. 59.
 —, Hon. Thomas, 29. 183. 201. 444. 507. 651.
 —, Hon. Henry, 28, and Miss Eliza, 651.
 —, Rev. James, his "Meditations," 387.
 Hesioid, 283. 637.
 Hesketh, Lady, 505.
 Hicles, Rev. Dr., 389. 759.
 Hickman, Geo., Johnson's letter to, 20. Miss, 23.
 Hicky, R., the painter, 443. 444.
 Hierarchy, Johnson's reverence for, 540. 678.
 Hierocles, 44. 371.
 Higgins, Dr., 616. 629.
 "High Life below Stairs," Garrick's farce of, 656
 Highland chief, 312. 314. 343.
 Highlander, 231. 403.
 Highwaymen, the question of shooting them discussed, 576.
 Hill, Dr. Sir John, Johnson's character of, 185. 212. 284. 592.
 —, Aaron, his account of "Irene," 61. Paraphrase of the epigram on the miracle at Cana, 598.
 —, Sir Rowland, 417.
 Hinchliffe, Dr. John, 645.
 "Historia Studiorum," Johnson's, 604.
 Historian, requisites for an, 145.
 Historians, 338. 636.
 History, 145. 202. 452. Little really authentic, 202. 452.
 "An old almanack," 452. Not supported by contemporary evidence, a romance, 404.
 —, of manners, the most valuable, 289.
 —, of the Council of Trent, J.'s projected translation of, 29.
 "History of Troye," first book printed in English, 425.
 Hitch, Mr., 101. 102.
 Hoady, Dr. Benjamin's "Suspicious Husband," 190.
 Hoare, Lady, 511.
 Hobbes, Thomas, on the state of the mind in old age, 581.
 Hodge, Johnson's cat, 722.
 Hogarth, 9. 455. 614. His first interview with J., 42. 614. J.'s lines on the death of, 43. 225. His character of J., 42. Hogg's "Jacobite Relics," 310.
 "Hoghead of Sense," Johnson said to be, 383.
 Holdbrook, Mr., Johnson's early instructor, 8.
 Holderness, Lord, 331.
 Holidays, 487. 601.
 Holland, the jurisprudence of, 159.
 —, Mr., the actor, 656.
 Hollis, Thomas, Esq., 9. 686.
 Hollyer, Mr., Johnson's letter to, 427.
 Holy orders, 107.
 Holyrood House, 276. 390.
 Holywell, 419.
 Home, Lord, 43. 134.
 —, Mr. John, 155. 332. 399. 441. 448. 452. 509. 518. 548.
 —, his tragedy of "Douglas," 390. 437. 518.

- Homer, 41, 220, 288, 289, 296, 317, 559, 582, 608, 664, 137.
 —, antiquity of, 608. Quoted by Thucydides, 608.
 —, J.'s veneration for, 220, 608. J.'s seal, a head of, 220.
 —, Johnson's early translations from, 10.
 —, Pope's translation of, 582. Dacier's, Macpherson's, and Cowper's translations of, 608.
 —, and Virgil, comparative excellence of, 559, 608.
 "Homo candidus," 459.
 Honesty, 574. Noble instance of, 298.
 Hook, Abbé, his translation of "Berwick's Memoirs," 592.
 Hoole, Dr., 464, 465.
 —, Nath., wrote the Duchess of Marlborough's Apology, 321.
 Hooper, 69.
 Hoole, John, Esq., 75, 130, 427, 610, 649. Educated in Grub-street, 720. J.'s dedication of his "Tasso," 130. Letter to Hastings in behalf of, 677. His "Cleonice," 427. J.'s letters to, 427, 785. Diary of J.'s last illness, 844.
 —, Rev. Mr., 804.
 —, Mrs., 76.
 Hooper, Bishop, 210.
 Hope, 125.
 —, Dr., 405, 749.
 —, Sir William, 284.
 Hopeton, John, Earl of, 668.
 Hopson, General, 457.
 Horace, 56, 61, 69, 70, 176, 224, 257, 280, 317, 323, 397, 408, 448, 450, 454, 482, 516, 559, 580, 604, 605, 617, 624, 691, 730.
 —, Johnson's translation from, 10.
 —, Francis's translation of, the best, 617.
 —, Dr. Douglas's collection of editions of, 756.
 Horace's villa, 580.
 Horne, Bishop, 413, 414, 483, 529, 810. Letter to Adam Smith about Hume, 272. His character of J., 810.
 —, Rev. John. See Tooke.
 Horneck, the Misses, 138, 140, 249, 649.
 Horrebow's history of Iceland, 589.
 Horses, old, what should be done with, 744.
 Horsley, Dr. Samuel, 155, 746.
 —, William, 184.
 Hospitality, 235, 253, 607, 660, 731. Decline of, 660.
 Hospitals, administration of, 511.
 Hottentot, respectable, Johnson so called, 87, 88.
 Houghton Collection, Johnson regrets the sale of, 775.
 House of Commons, 261, 574, 575, 714.
 —, influence of peers in, 281.
 —, power of expulsion by, 637.
 —, originally a check for the Crown, on the Lords, 637.
 —, best mode of speaking at the bar of, 571.
 —, its power over the national purse, 714.
 —, Lord Bolingbroke's description of, 574.
 —, course of investives used in, 763.
 House of Peers, 281, 296.
 Housebreakers, 695.
 Houses and residences, Johnson's, 30, 636.
 How, Mr. Richard, 718.
 Howard, John, Esq., the philanthropist, 119, 114, 571.
 —, Hon. Edward, 211.
 —, Sir George, 455.
 Howell's "Letters," 446.
 Huddersford, Dr., 32, 108.
 "Hudibras," 53, 340, 454, 506.
 Huet, Bishop of Avranches, 22, 23, 552.
 Huggins, W., the translator of Ariosto, 129. Dispute with Warton, 656.
 Hughes, John, the poet, 88, 601, 666.
 Hulks, punishment of the, 585.
 Human life, 218, 773. Miseries and happiness of, 447.
 —, will, liberty of, 773.
 Humanity, Johnson's, 770.
 Hume, David, 62, 88, 150, 151, 174, 199, 211, 272, 331, 358, 393, 436, 482, 534, 545, 557, 593, 629. Echo of Voltaire, 191. Secretary of Embassy at Paris, 84. Political principles, 722. Scepticism, 272, 534, 545, 760. His "Liber," 534.
 —, humour, good and bad, 335, 451, 619, 696.
 —, Johnson's talent for, 58.
 —, "Humours of Ballantrae," 251.
 Humphry, Ozias, Esq., Johnson's letters to, 751, 752.
 Hunter, Mr., Johnson's schoolmaster, 7, 89, 227, 836.
 —, Mrs., 193. Miss, 718.
 Hunter, Dr., 704, 731.
 Hunting, Johnson a fox-hunter, 351. Pleasure of, 838.
 Hurd, Bishop, 20, 448, 516, 572, 669. "Works of Cowley," 503. Johnson's character of, 720. Sermon on evil spirits, 761.
 "Hurlo Thrumbo," Sam. Johnson, author of, 366.
 Husbands, 637.
 —, John, 13.
 Hussey, Dr. Thomas, titular Bishop of Waterford, 805.
 —, Rev. John, letter to, 621.
 Hutchinson, William, a drover, honesty of, 298.
 —, John, his "Moral Philosophy," 511.
 —, Mrs., 15.
 Hutton, William, his "History of Derby," 549.
 —, Mr., the Moravian, 805.
 Hyde, Henry, Lord, 476.
 Hyett, Mrs., (Miss Adams), 761.
 Hypocast, a Roman one, 418.
 Hypochondria, the "English Malady," 14, 28, 617, 640.
 Byron's definition of, 15. Suffered by Mr. Windham, 617, 840.
 —, and madness, distinction between, 14.
 —, improper treatment of, 28.
 "Hypochondriac," Boswell's, 15, 717.
 Hypocrite, no man one in his pleasures, 768.
 —, play of the, 437.
 Iceland, chapter of the "Natural History" of, 549.
 Iceland, 381, 382.
 Ikeness, 110, 147, 158, 208, 657, 716.
 "Idler," Johnson's, 1, 110, 114, 116, 510.
 Ignorance, singular instance of, 392.
 —, guilt of continuing in voluntary, 181.
 —, among men of eminence, instances of, 205.
 Iham, Johnson's visit to, 415, 547.
 Ilchester, Earl, 340.
 Ili, sense of the word, 606.
 Imagination, 612, 833.
 Imlac, why so spelled, 664.
 Immortality, 450, 557.
 Impartiality, 479.
 Impressions, folly of trusting to, 694.
 —, should be described while fresh on the mind, 109.
 Impudence, difference between Scotch and Irish, 433.
 Ince, Richard, a writer in the "Spectator," 505.
 Inch Kerth, 281.
 Inckenneth, 372, 376, 379, 428, 429. Ode on, 378.
 "Incident in Scyllam," &c., whence taken, 718.
 Incivility, 663.
 Income, living within, 733.
 Incredulity, Johnson's, 573.
 Indecency and indelicacy. See Macaulay, T. B.
 Index rerum to "Clarissa," 73.
 India, government of, 7, 9.
 —, Johnson's thought of going there, 501.
 —, practice of going to, in quest of wealth, 635.
 Indians, why not weak or deformed, 728.
 Indigestion, Johnson's remedy for, 340.
 Indolence, Johnson's, 157, 165.
 Inequality, political, 252.
 Infidel writers, 358, 482, 481, 760.
 Infidelity, 174, 176, 202, 332, 450, 482, 512, 545, 760.
 —, conjugal, 502, 614, 636.
 Infidels, keeping company with, 638.
 Influence of the Crown, 216, 731.
 Ingratitude, 455.
 —, French saying about, 335.
 Inheritance, consequences of anticipating, 706.
 Inmates and pensioners, Johnson's, 570, 620.
 Innes, Rev. Mr., 122.
 Innovation, rage for, 720.
 Inns, Stonemason's lines on, 485, 830.
 Innys, Mr. William, 801.
 Inoculation, 762.
 Inquisition, 158.
 Insanity, 5, 14, 15, 106, 135, 336, 553, 664.
 —, hereditary, important observations on, 5.
 Inscriptions, Latin or English, 313, 322, 520.
 Insects, 260.
 Inspired, whether our copies of the Scriptures are to be considered, absolutely and literally, as, 176.
 Insults, 239, 240.
 Intentions, 175. Good, 785.
 Interest, 574. Of money, 611.
 Intoxication, 480.
 Intromission, vicious, 214, 217, 278, 814.
 Intuition and sagacity, distinction between, 775.
 Invasion, ridiculous fears of, 666.
 Invectives, 763.
 Inventory, 385.
 Inverness, 384.
 "Inverted understanding," 626.
 Invitations, 451.
 Invocation of saints, 263, 637, 761.
 Inward light, 219.
 Ireland, 217, 2, 0, 263, 277.
 —, injured by the union with England, 638.
 —, hospitality to strangers in, 660.
 —, its ancient state little known, 108.
 —, Johnson wishes its literature cultivated, 108.
 —, necessity of poor laws in, 220.
 —, William Henry, his Shakespeare forgeries, 510, 701.
 "Irene," Johnson's tragedy of, 27, 29, 30, 31, 45, 60, 61, 76, 656.
 Irish, the, "a fair people," 433. Mix better with the English than the Scotch do, 259. J.'s compassion for the distresses of, 217, 253. J.'s kindness for, 638. Union, 638. Gentlemen, good scholars among them, 220. Accent, 232. Impudence, 433. Language, 531, 575. And Welch languages, affinity between, 108. And Erse languages compared, 231, 446. Papists, 217, 263. Family pride, 355.
 Irreparably, or irreparable? 479.
 Irvine, Mr., 295, 340.

Irwin, Captain, 460.
 Isle of Man, 518.
 — of Muck, 341.
 Italy, Johnson's projected tour to, 342. 496. 500. 503. 505.
 772. 775. 781.
 Ivy-lane Club, 58. 107. 745. 752.

Johnson, Henry, Johnson's schoolfellow, 489. 538.
 —, Richard, Esq., M. P., the "Omniscient," 500. 540.
 —, Thomas, the servant, 6. 489.
 —, Mr., of Canterbury 32.
 Jacobites, 147. 438.
 Jacobitism, Johnson's ingenious defence of, 147.
 James I., 243. 420. His "Daemonology," 627.
 — 11., 278. 325. 444.
 — IV. of Scotland, Boswell's intended history of, 293.
 — Dr., 19. 43. 235. 501. 783. His "Medicinal Dictionary," 48. His character, 48. His death, 495.
 James, Mr., 312. 317.
 Japix, Gisbert, his "Rymelerie," 163.
 "Jealous Wife," a comedy, 123.
 Jealousy, 512.
 Jenkinson, Charles (Lord Liverpool), letter to, 543.
 Jennens, Charles, of Gopsal, 248.
 Jennings, Mr., 573.
 Jenyns, Soame, 68. 106. 509. 593. His "Origin of Evil," 106.
 392. His epitaph on Johnson, and Boswell's retaliation,
 106. Application of a passage in Horace to, 590. His "Evidence of the Christian Religion," 593.
 Jephson, Robert, Esq., 86. 265.
 Jersey, William, third Earl, 3.
 Jervis, Mr., of Birmingham, 21.
 —, Elizabeth, (Mrs. Johnson), 24. 78.
 Jesuits, destruction of the order of, 468.
 Jodrell, Richard Paul, Esq., 643. 754.
 Johnson, Michael, father of Samuel, 4. 5. 19. 214. 438. 812.
 —, Mrs., his mother, 5. 7. 19. 23. 114. 812. Her death, 113.
 —, Nathaniel, brother of Samuel, 4. 23.
 —, Mrs., wife of Samuel, 25. 26. 28. 29. 59. 58. 65. 74. 75. 76,
 77. 81. 85. 165. 502. 612. 615.
 —, Andrew, Samuel's uncle, 4. 198. 239. 342. 427.
 —, Thomas, Samuel's cousin, 427.

JOHNSON, SAMUEL. Leading events of his life.

1709. his birth, 4.
 inherits a vile melancholy, 4. 832.
 his account of his family, 812.
 traditional stories of his precocity, 6.
 afflicted with scrofula, 7.

1712. touched by Queen Anne for the evil, 7.
 1716. at school in Lichfield, 7. Boyish days, 8.
 1726. removed to the school of Stourbridge, 10.
 1727. leaves Stourbridge. J.'s two years at home, 12. 837.
 1728. enters at Pemb. Coll., 12. College life, 13. 837.
 translates Pope's "Messiah," 13.
 the "morbid melancholy" increases, 14.
 his reading, 16. Specimens of exercises, 17.
 1731. quits college, 18.
 1732. becomes usher of Bosworth school, 20.
 1733. at Birmingham, and translates Lobo, 21.
 1734. returns to Lichfield, 22.
 proposes to print Politian's poems, 22.
 offers to write for the "Gent. Mag.," 23.
 1736. marries Mrs. Porter, and opens a school at Edial, 25.
 1737. goes to London with Garrick, 27.
 retires to lodgings at Greenwich, 29.
 designs to translate Father Paul, 29.
 returns to Lichfield and finishes "Irene," 29.
 removes to London with his wife, 30.

1738. becomes a writer in the "Gent. Mag.," 31.
 writes the debates in parliament, 32.
 publishes "London," sells it for ten guineas, 33.
 fails to obtain the degree of A. M., 37.
 1739. publishes "Marmor Norfolcense," 40.
 1740. writes Lives of Blake, Drake, and Barrelier, 43.
 1741. translates the "Jests of Hercules," Guyon's "Dissertation on the Amazons," and Foutenelle's "Panegyric on Dr. Morin," 44.

1742. writes "Essay on the Account of the Conduct of the Duchess of Marlborough," Lives of Burnan and of Sydenham, and proposals for "Bibliotheca Harleiana," 46.

1743. writes "Considerations on the Dispute between Cron-suz and Warburton," &c., and dedication to Dr. Mead, of James's "Medicinal Dictionary," 47.
 1744. publishes the "Life of Savage," and writes "Preface to the Harl. Miscell.," 49. 53.
 1745. publishes "Miscellaneous Observations on Macbeth, with Remarks on Hamlet's Shakspeare," 53.
 no details of his life for the years 1745-6, 54.
 1747. publishes the prospectus of his Dictionary, 56.
 forms the King's Head Club, Ivy Lane, 58.
 1748. visits Tunbridge Wells, 58.
 writes "Life of Roscommon," "Preface to Dodsley's Preceptor," and "Vision of Theodore the Hermit," 59.

JOHNSON, SAMUEL. — continued.

1749. gets fifteen guineas for the "Vanity of Human Wishes," 59.
 his "Irene" acted at Drury Lane, 60.
 1750. begins to publish "The Rambler;" his prayer on commencing the undertaking, 62. Writes a prologue for the benefit of Milton's grand-daughter, 72.
 1751. writes "Life of Chenevix," Letter for Lauder, and dedication to Lenox's "Female Quixote," 72.
 1752. works at the Dictionary and Rambler, 74.
 death of his wife, and grief for her, 75.
 writes her funeral sermon and epitaph, 77.
 circle of his friends at this time, 79.
 1753. writes papers T in "Adventurer," 75. 81.
 1754. writes "Life of Cave," 84. Visits Oxford, 88.
 obtains the degree of A. M. from Oxford, 90.
 1755. publishes his Dictionary, 91.
 projects a "Bibliothèque," 93.
 his depressed state of mind, 98.
 the Academy della Crusca and the French Academy present him with their "Dictionaries," 98.
 his scheme of life for Sunday, 99.
 1756. publishes an abridgment of Dictionary, 103.
 writes in "The Universal Visitor," 103.
 edits the "Literary Magazine," 103.
 composes sermons for clergymen, 107.
 proposes an edition of Shakspeare, 107.
 offers a living, but declines taking orders, 107.
 1757. dictates a speech at a public meeting on the expedition to Rochfort, 107.
 1758. commences the "Idler," 110.
 he breaks up housekeeping, and removes to chambers in the Temple, 110.
 1759. death of his mother, 113.
 writes his "Kasselas," to pay for her funeral, 115.
 makes an excursion to Oxford, 117.
 writes a Dissertation on the Greek Comedy," the Introduction to "The Blackfriars' Bridge," and "Three Letters concerning Blackfriars' Bridge," 119.
 1760. writes "Address of the Painters to George III.," the dedication to Baret's Italian Dictionary, and a review of Tytler's "Vindication of Mary Queen of Scots," 119.
 forms resolutions for his conduct and studies, 119.
 1761. writes preface to "Roll's Dictionary," 121.
 1762. writes dedication of "Kennedy's Astronomical Chro-nology," and preface to the Catalogue of the Artists' exhibition, 124. E obtains a pension of 300*l.* a-year, 126.
 accompanies Sir Joshua Reynolds into Devon, 127.
 1763. writes character of Collins, "Life of Ascham," dedication to Hoole's "Tasso," and Detection of the Imposture of the Cock-lane Ghost, 130-8.
 Boswell becomes acquainted with him, 131.
 1764. the "Literary Club" founded, 163.
 afflicted with severe hypochondria, 165.
 writes review of Grainger's "Sugar Cane," and of Gold-smith's "Traveller," 164.
 visits Dr. Percy, 166.
 1765. visits Cambridge, 167.
 created L.L.D. by Dublin University, 168.
 is introduced to the Thrales, 169. 171.
 publishes his Shakspeare, 167.
 1766. writes the dedication of Gwynn's "London and West-mester Improved," and "The Fountains," a fairy tale, 181.
 1767. his interview with the King, 184.
 writes dedication to the King of "Adams' Treatise on the Globe," 187.
 1768. writes prologue to Goldsmith's play, 187.
 visits Oxford, 189.
 1769. appointed professor in ancient literature to the Royal Academy, 197.
 visits Oxford, Lichfield, and Brighton, 197.
 appears at the Old Bailey as a witness, 207.
 1770. publishes "The False Alarm," 213.
 1771. publishes "Thoughts on the late Transactions respecting Falkland's islands," 221.
 design of bringing him into parliament, 222.
 prepares a 4th edition of the Dictionary, 230.
 1772. writes law arguments for Boswell, 241.
 sketches of his state of mind, 243.
 1773. publishes new edition of Dictionary, 246.
 writes preface to "Macbean's Dictionary of Ancient Geography," 246. attempts to learn the Low Dutch languages, 265.
 journey with Boswell to the Hebrides, 267.
 presented with the freedom of Aberdeen, 292.
 1774. writing his "Journey to the Hebrides," 411.
 visits North Wales with the Thrales, 415. visits Mr. Burke at Beaconsfield, 425.
 writes "The Patriot," 425.
 1775. publishes his "Journey to the Hebrides," 426.
 publishes "Taxation no Tyranny," 434. receives degree of D.C.L. from Oxford, 446.
 visits France with the Thrales, 459.
 1776. writes proposals for an Analysis of the Celtic Language, 476.

- JOHNSON, SAMUEL. — continued.
 visits Oxford and Lichfield, 481., and Bath, 508.
 1777. engages to write "The Lives of the Poets," 530.
 writes dedication of the works of Bishop Pearce, 531.
 visits Oxford and Derbyshire, 538.
 exerts himself in behalf of Dr. Dodd, 541.
 1778. his visit to Warley Camp, 618.
 squabbles of his inmates, 620.
 1779. publishes the first four volumes of "The Lives of the Poets," 622.
 employed on "The Lives of the Poets," 612.
 1781. completes his "Lives of the Poets," 655.
 death of Mr. Thrake, 681. J. one of his executors, 682.
 loses his friend Mr. Strahan, 687.
 plans a life of greater diligence, 698.
 purposes to study Italian literature, 698.
 visits Oxford, Birmingham, and Lichfield, 698.
 1782. loses his old friend Robert Levett, 700.
 declining state of his health, 702.
 visits Oxford, 708.
 takes leave of Streatham, 710.
 1783. has a stroke of the palsy, 734.
 visits Lichfield and Oxford, 736.
 founds the Essex Head Club, 746.
 troubled with spasmodic asthma, 746.
 1784. visits Oxford, 758.
 his friends project a tour to Italy, 772, 775, 776.
 visits Lichfield, Birmingham, and Oxford, 783.
 expiatory visit to Uxeter, 791.
 details of his last illness and DEATH, 793—807, 839—846.
 WILL, 801.
 FUNERAL in Westminster Abbey, 807.
 Monument in St. Paul's, 808.
 Epitaphs by Mr. Flood and Dr. Parr, 809.
 Chronological Catalogue of his PUBLISHED WORKS, 821.
 List of various PORTRAITS of him, 811.
 List of various intended DESIGNS, 794, 820.
 RECOLLECTIONS of him by Miss Reynolds, 830.
 Miscellaneous Anecdotes of. By Mr. Wickins, 835. By the Rev. Mr. Parker, by Mrs. Rose, by Mr. Robert Barclay, by Mr. Green, 836.

Leading points of his habits, manners, and character.

- Johnson, his peculiarities of person and manner, 7, 8, 9, 16, 23, 24, 26, 41, 42, 87, 165, 166, 176, 195, 265, 269, 282, 371, 409, 420, 511.
 —, very imperfect sight, 406, 511, 835.
 —, inability to discriminate features, 556, 835.
 —, defective hearing, 835.
 —, gesticulations, 42, 209, 439, 677.
 —, peculiar march, 677. Loud tone of voice, 835.
 —, remarkable laugh, 457.
 —, heat and irritability of blood, 721.
 —, dress, 269, 606, 832.
 —, general traits of character and mode of living, 8, 9, 12, 18, 21, 25, 36, 41, 48, 51, 58, 63, 79, 81, 216, 268, 371.
 —, morbid melancholy, 14, 42, 91, 98, 116, 165, 188, 211, 269, 336, 482, 496, 526, 553, 640, 661, 737, 764, 831.
 —, envy, 51, 131, 600.
 —, unamiable habits, 409, 835.
 —, occasional rudeness, 393, 397, 420, 487, 510, 518, 593, 628, 658, 673, 685, 691, 832.
 —, readiness to take offence at a slight, 79, 85, 832.
 —, eating, 159, 160, 269, 599, 835., and drinking, 160, 508.
 —, respect for birth and family, 220.
 —, profound reverence for the hierarchy, 679, 723.
 —, bow to an archbishop, 723.
 —, insensibility to music and painting, 123, 373, 470, 770, 832.
 —, alleged superstition, 165, 228.
 —, personal courage, 430. Activity, 834, 836.
 —, great love of late hours, 563.
 —, disregard of public abuse, 621, 663, 672, 675.
 —, abhorrence of affectation, 662.
 —, love of chemistry, 40, 634.
 —, knowledge of trades, 318, 355.
 —, extensive knowledge of literary history.
 —, alleged deficiency in Greek, 754, 765.
 —, power and extent of his memory, 6, 9, 86.
 —, political prejudices, 41.
 —, prejudice against the Scotch, 209, 432, 433.
 —, unjust contempt for foreigners, 459.
 —, oratorical powers, 223.
 —, conversational powers, 58, 216, 267, 6, 6, 622, 738.
 —, dexterity at retort, 719.
 —, bow-wow way of speaking, 430.
 —, mode of reading, 561, and recitation, 834.
 —, rule to talk his best, 719, 831.
 —, great talent for humour, 58.
 —, powers of improvisation, 471.
 —, dislike to be teased with questions, 585.
 —, extraordinary fertility of his mind, 61.
 —, tenderness, benevolence, humanity, and affability, 19, 48, 77, 78, 113, 114, 118, 119, 127, 163, 166, 187, 217, 438, 535, 588, 599, 612, 779, 834.
 —, candour and amiableness, 433.

- Johnson, ceremony to ladies, 467, 832.
 —, gratitude, 168.
 —, kindness to servants, 722.
 —, constancy to those once employed, 729.
 —, fondness for animals, 722.
 —, charity, 559, 579, 632, 758, 834.
 —, love of the poor, 127, 112, 216, 697.
 —, kindness to authors, 621.
 —, rigid home-ty, 18.
 —, early and systematic piety, 5, 15, 21, 11, 100, 113, 792.
 —, inviolable regard to truth, 45, 119, 479, 572.
 —, would only write for pay, 41, 167, 171.
 —, kindness to children, 503, 722.
 —, confidence in the efficacy of prayer, 285, 296, 831—834.
 —, dread of death, 296, 211, 397, 439, 545, 895, 748, 755, 760, 835.
 —, objection to the use of parenthesis, 720.
 —, writing by fits and starts, 789.
 —, rapid composition, 59, 63, 285, 299, 115, 513, 665, 695.
 —, —, the "Rambler's" written hastily by 5, 5, 8, 100 lines of "The Vanity of Human Wishes," in a day, 177, "Rasselas," in a week, 115, "A False Alarm" in twenty-eight hours, 213. A sermon after dinner, 285. Forty-eight pages of the "Life of Savage" at a sitting, 285. Six sheets of translation from the French in a day, 286. "The Patriot" in one day, 426.
 —, at sixty-seven purposes to apply vigorously to the Greek and Italian languages, 523.
 —, style characterised, 69, 79, 71, 582, 666.
 —, various imitations of, 755.
 —, W. S., of Connecticut, J. Johnson's letter to, 218.
 —, Commodore, 241.
 —, of the lay monastery, 398.
 —, Charles, author of "Adventures of a Guinea," 359.
 —, Samuel, author of "Hudibras," 396.
 —, the equestrian, 136, 573.
 —, Thomas, 427., and Samuel, 652, 802.
 —, Miss (Mrs. Whitting), 801.
 —, Mrs. (widow of a clergyman), 119.
 —, "Johnsoniana," the collection so called, 479, 606.
 —, Johnstone, Arthur, his poems, 156, 157, 759.
 —, Sir James, 757.
 —, Jones, Sir William, 37, 218, 259, 298, 629, 646, 676.
 —, Philip, 483.
 —, Miss, 168.
 —, Jonson, Ben, 72, 404.
 —, Jordan, Rev. Mr., 12, 13, 18, 89, 837.
 —, Jortin, Dr., his sermons, 579. His epitaph, 711.
 —, "Joseph Andrews," Fielding's, 258.
 —, Journal, Johnson advises keeping one, 148, 251, 449, 568, 716.
 —, —, des Vaux.
 —, Journey. See Hebrides.
 —, Justice, 198.
 —, Judges, private life of, 402. Trading, 445. Why they should not hold their places for life, 448.
 —, —, an opinion of the Twelve, 613.
 —, Judgment, 450.
 —, Julian, Emperor, 71.
 —, Julien, M., 258.
 —, Junius, 58, 177, 222, 625, 765.
 —, Juries, 490.
 —, Justamond, J. O., 520.
 —, Juvenal, 33, 34, 59, 300, 581, 617.
 —, —, Holiday's notes on, praised, 841.

- Kaimes, Henry Home, Lord, 43, 151, 159, 191, 205, 241, 358, 392. His "Elements of Criticism," 134, 758. His "Sketches of Man," 578, 611, 616.
 —, —, Dr. Michael, notes and observations, 51, 52, 110, 160, 178, 204, 251, 285, 695, 696, 678.
 —, Kearsley, Mr., the bookseller, 67, 677.
 —, Kettle-ton, 416, 548.
 —, Keene, Mr., 165.
 —, Keith, Mr., of the Excise, 394, 395.
 —, —, Lady, 488.
 —, Kelly, Hugh, 190, 532, 804.
 —, —, Thomas, sixth Earl of, 395, 551.
 —, Kemble, John Philip, 569, 711, 712.
 —, —, Charles, 711.
 —, Kempis, Thomas à, 572, 661.
 —, Ken, Bishop, 152, 551, 759.
 —, Kendal, Duchess of, 151.
 —, Kennedy, Sir Alexander, 295.
 —, —, Dr., dedication of his "Astronomical Chronology," 124.
 —, —, Dr., his "Tragedy," 576.
 —, Kennicot, Dr. Benjamin, 219, 276. Mrs., 686, 731.
 —, Kenrick, Dr. William, attacks on J., 171, 188, 194, 358, 582.
 —, Kent, Duke of, 187.
 —, Keppel, Admiral, 161, 668.
 —, Kerr, Mr. James, 276.
 —, Kerry, Knight of, 377.
 —, Kettel, Hall, 88.
 —, Kildare, Earl of, 390.
 —, Kilmarnock, Lord, 257.
 —, Kilmorye, John, tenth Viscount, 177.

- Kimehi, Rabbi, 3.
 Kindersley, Mr., 740.
 Kindness, 555, 709.
 King, Dr. William, 92, 93, 117, 331, 452.
 —, Dr., on the happiness of a future state, 593.
 —, Archbishop, his "Essay on Evil," 635.
 —, Lord, his "Life of Locke," 155.
 King, Johnson's interview with the, 185.
 Kings, their situation, 144, 151, 185, 343, 670.
 Kingsborough, Earl, 377.
 "Kingsburgh," (Alex. Macdonald), 324, 325, 333, 352, 355.
 King's-Head Club, 58.
 Kippis, Dr., 117, 223, 292, 552, 553, 792. J.'s opinion of, 836.
 Kington, Miss, 56, 96.
 Kneller, Sir Godfrey, 575.
 Knight, Lady, 24, 74, 76, 181. Anecdotes of Johnson, 76. And of Mrs. Williams, 74, 181.
 —, Captain Sir Joseph, 480, 481.
 —, Joseph, the negro, 566.
 Knights Templars, College of, 340.
 Knitting, 577. Johnson attempts to learn, 449, 758.
 Knolies, 27.
 Knowledge, 142, 182, 252, 449, 484, 506, 608.
 Knowles, Mary, 517, 518, 591, 592, 593, 595. Dialogue with Johnson, 596.
 Knox, John, the reformer, 26, 283, 284.
 —, Rev. Vicar, imitates Johnson's style, 70, 773, 797.
 —, Mr. John, opinion of Johnson's "Journey," 431.
 Konigsmark, Count, 190.
 Kristrom, Mr., 231.
 Labefaction of all principles, 453.
 La Bletrie, 74.
 La Bruyère, 450.
 Lactantius, 538.
 Lade, Sir John, Johnson's verses on, 805.
 Ladies, Johnson's politeness to, 832.
 Lafontaine, 61.
 Lambesc, Prince, 462.
 Landed property, 473.
 Landlords, 209, 333, 343, 366, 370, 443, 579, 712.
 Langley, Rev. Mr., 416.
 —, Charles, Esq., husband of "Alley Croker," 580.
 Langton, Bennet, Esq., 8, 29, 59, 79, 80, 85, 108, 109, 112, 121, 128, 163, 177, 178, 188, 184, 197, 203, 222, 260, 263, 265, 266, 292, 298, 337, 378, 413, 428, 430, 445, 451, 457, 479, 486, 509, 510, 523, 524, 528, 537, 548, 556, 570, 579, 583, 589, 597, 602, 603, 616, 618, 646, 662, 680, 686, 703, 736, 740, 756, 803.
 —, Johnson's letters to, 95, 108, 112, 121, 177, 178, 188, 222, 225, 226, 413, 451, 457, 535, 620, 697, 703, 740, 751, 779, 786. Character of, 834.
 —, collection of Johnson's sayings, 655.
 —, letter to Boswell, 646.
 —, Miss, Johnson's letter to, 227.
 —, Miss Jane, 427, 565. Johnson's letter to, 755.
 —, Mr., Senior, 260, 509. Mr.'s, 363.
 —, Peregrine, Esq., his economy, 178.
 —, Bishop, 80.
 —, parish, 107.
 Language, 731. Origin of, 726.
 —, ancient, not to be modernised, 768.
 —, on writing verses in a dead, 454.
 Languages, 156, 182, 202, 231, 467, 506.
 —, the pedigree of nations, 340.
 —, poets the preservers of, 506.
 —, Irish and Gaelic the same, 231. Chinese, 611.
 Lansdown, Marquis of, 505.
 Lapidary inscriptions, inaccurate, 622.
 Lapouchin, Madame, 611.
 Lascaris' Grammar, first book printed in Greece, 425.
 Late hours, Johnson's fondness for, 563.
 Latimer, 210.
 Latin inscriptions, 313, 392.
 —, language, Johnson's proficiency in, 468, 837.
 La Trobe, Rev. Mr., 805, 846.
 Laud, Archbishop, his diary, 250.
 Lauder, William, his forgery, 35, 72, 73, 667.
 Lauderdale, Earl of, 297, 501.
 —, "Laughers," useful monitors, 718.
 Laughter, 833. Johnson's peculiar, 457.
 Laurel, the, 57.
 Law, 478, 554. Law reports, 292. Of entail, 473.
 —, Johnson's intention of studying, 168.
 —, his opinions on, 175, 179, 189, 250, 271, 278, 291, 454, 478, 501, 513, 527, 554, 613, 678, 688.
 Law, Edmund, Bishop of Carlisle, 635, 641.
 —, William, 15, 218, 448, 759, 762.
 —, his "Serious Call," 15. Commended, 217.
 Lawrence, Dr. Thomas, 79, 113, 416, 429, 501, 525, 642, 643, 644, 650, 702, 704, 734. J.'s letters to, 429, 642, 700, 702. J.'s letters to his daughter, 703. His death, 734.
 —, Sir Thomas, 113, 338.
 Laws, 473, 502.
 Lawyers, 175, 257, 271, 599, 678, 766.
 —, not to be censured for multiplying words, 678.
 —, on their soliciting practice, 478.
 —, Sunday consultations of, 456.
 Lawyers, Cicero's defence of, 189.
 Laxity of talk confessed, 387.
 Lay patronage, argument in defence of, 260, 815.
 Laziness, 343, 502.
 Lea, Rev. Samuel, 9, 10.
 Learned women, 201.
 Learning, 242, 282, 289, 396, 452.
 —, more general than formerly, 731.
 Leasowes, 424.
 Lectures, on the practice of teaching by, 174, 684.
 Lee, Alderman, 517.
 —, Arthur, Esq., 515, 517.
 —, John, Esq., the barrister, 571.
 —, Mrs., 52.
 Leechman, Dr. William, 393. On "Prayer," 285, 296.
 Leclerc, 93.
 Le Despenser, Lord, 35.
 Leeds, Francis, Duke of, lines on, 658.
 Legitimation by subsequent marriage, 487.
 Legrand, 21.
 Leibnitz, 231, 363.
 Leicester, Dudley, Earl of, 418.
 Leinster, Duke of, 198.
 Leisure for intellectual improvement, 252.
 Leith, 280.
 Leland, Rev. Dr. Thomas, 168, 263, 531, 600.
 —, Johnson's letter to, 168.
 —, Counsellor, 693.
 —, Leland's "Itinerary," 420.
 Leman, Sir William, 53.
 Lending money, means of influence, 235.
 Lenox, Mrs. Charlotte, 79, 83, 99, 117, 124, 427, 657, 755.
 —, "Leonidas," Glover's, 301.
 Le Roy, Mr., 460.
 Leslie, Charles, 755.
 —, John, 284.
 Letham, Prior, plane tree there, 286.
 Letter-writing, 687.
 Letters, the sanctity of private, 193.
 —, "none received in the grave," 806.
 Lettson, Dr., 515.
 Levellers, 152.
 Lever, Sir Ashton, 775.
 Levett, Mr., 19, 49, 62. Johnson's letter to, 48.
 —, Robert, 76, 78, 125, 149, 173, 250, 501, 569, 604, 620, 624, 684, 700, 735.
 —, Johnson's letters to, 421, 459, 463, 524.
 —, death, and verses on, 709.
 Lewis, David, and his lines on Pope, 765.
 —, Mr. F., 71.
 —, Dean and Mrs., 125.
 Lewson, (Leveson), Mrs., 646.
 "Lexiphanes," Campbell's, 188.
 Libels, 366, 479, 499, 527.
 —, from the pulpit, 513. On the dead, 499.
 Liberality, Johnson's, 571.
 Liberty, 194, 261, 628. Political, 194. Of conscience, 261. Of conscience and liberty of teaching, distinction between, 730. Of the press, 194, 499. Of the pulpit, 513, 523. And necessity, 677.
 Libraries, size of several great, 284.
 Library, Johnson's, 149, 803.
 Licensers of the stage, 40.
 Lichfield, its inhabitants, 489.
 —, Johnson's visits to, 30, 125, 187, 191, 214, 245, 283, 415, 458, 488, 489, 790.
 —, veneration of the corporation of, for Johnson, 790.
 —, Lord, Chancellor of Oxford, 600.
 Liddell, Sir Henry, 235.
 Lies, 120, 149, 765.
 Life, rules for the conduct of, 709.
 —, Johnson's extreme attachment to, 804.
 —, Dryden's philosophical lines on, 764.
 —, human, 773.
 —, reflections on, 124, 127, 179, 214, 511, 524, 537, 538, 709, 764.
 —, on living it over again, 764.
 —, "Lilliburtero," ballad of, its political effects, 446.
 Lilliput Parliament, 321.
 Lindsay, Lady, 404.
 Linen, advantages of wearing, 337.
 Linley, Miss, 453.
 Lintithgow, 297.
 Lintot, the bookseller, 28, 149.
 Liquors, Johnson's scale of, 627, 680.
 "Literary Anecdotes," Nichols's, 789.
 Literary fame, 169, 257, 450.
 —, frauds, 73, 82, 107, 122, 701.
 —, labours, Johnson's, 794.
 —, man, life of, 686.
 —, journals, 186.
 —, property, 149, 264, 279, 286, 411, 693.
 "Literary Magazine," J.'s contributions to, 103, 107, 109.
 Literature, French and English compared, 372.
 —, small quantity of, in the world, 598.
 —, dignity of, 600.
 Liturgy of our church commended, 762.

- Liverpool, second Earl, 568.
 "Lives of the Admirals," 142.
 "Lives of the English Poets," Johnson's, 187, 530, 540, 603, 612, 618, 622, 624, 626, 629, 630, 633, 612, 613, 646, 651, 665, 675, 677, 708, 759, 773.
 —, critique on, and account of, 665, 675.
 —, the most popular of his works, 185.
 —, Cibber's, 504, 506, 818.
 —, of Dryden and Shakspeare, by Johnson, 516.
 Llewellyn, 418.
 Lloyd, Dr., Bishop of St. Asaph, 79, 418, 759.
 —, Mr., the Quaker, of Birmingham, 487.
 —, Humphry, the antiquary, 418.
 —, Miss Olivia, the Quakeress, 13.
 Lobo's "Account of Abyssinia," 21, 22, 285, 496.
 Local attachment, 299.
 Locality, 737.
 Lochbuy, the Laird and Lady of, 383, 384.
 Loch Lomond, 391, 627.
 Lock, William, Esq., 668.
 Locke, John, 155, 293, 656.
 —, his verses, 293.
 —, plan of education imperfect, 618.
 Lockhart, Sir George, 342.
 Lockman, Mr., 656.
 Lodgings, list of Johnson's various, in London, 30, 58.
 Loff, Capel, Esq., 759.
 Logan's drawing of company at Tunbridge Wells, 26, 58.
 Lombe, Mr. John, his silk-mill, 549.
 "London," Johnson's poem of, 23, 33, 36, 37, 59.
 London, 27, 28, 443, 449, 501, 553, 565, 578, 581, 597, 619, 625, 635, 712, 724, 728, 791.
 —, field of genius and exertion, 27. Fountain of intelligence and pleasure, 412. Preeminence over every other place, 625. No place cures vanity so well as, 217.
 —, "Art of Living" in, 28.
 —, Johnson's love of, 107, 113, 200, 217, 221, 370, 554, 581, 625, 785, 791.
 —, state of the poor in, 635.
 —, too large, 419.
 —, no similarity to a head connected with a body, 449.
 —, mode of choosing its mayors, 617.
 —, shopkeeper, 289, 290.
 —, Pennant's account of, 588.
 "London Chronicle," 106, 164, 200, 218, 570, 679.
 "London Magazine," 45.
 Londoners, 269, 370.
 Long, (North) Dudley, Esq., 678, 681.
 Longitude, 99.
 Longlands, Mr., 241.
 Longley, John, Esq., Recorder of Rochester, 657.
 —, Bishop, 657.
 Longman, the Messrs., 56. Thomas, 96.
 Lonsdale, first Earl of, 300.
 Looking-glasses, 463.
 Lord's Prayer, 704.
 London, third and fourth Earls of, 394, 497.
 —, Lady Margaret Dalrymple, Countess of, 322, 394, 620.
 Loughborough, Lord (A. Wedderburn, Earl of Rosslyn), 37, 45, 126, 127, 131, 132, 425, 448, 459, 478, 494, 717.
 —, taught English pronunciation by Sheridan, 132.
 —, his talents and great good fortune, 132.
 Louis the Fourteenth, 186, 235, 279, 609.
 —, the Fifteenth, 236, 461.
 —, Philippe, 461.
 Lovat, Simon, twelfth Lord, 55, 342, 402.
 —, verses on his execution, 55.
 —, his inscription to the memory of his father, 344.
 Love, 129, 217, 450, 488, 561.
 Love, Mr., 232.
 "Love of Fame," Young's, 357.
 "Love in a Hollow Tree," 680.
 "Love and Madness," 720.
 Loveday, Dr. John, 264.
 Lovibond, Edward, Esq., 27.
 Low company, 767. Low life, 371.
 Lowe, Rev. Mr., 8, 9.
 —, Mauritius, 605, 626, 653, 705, 724. Letters to, 709, 735.
 Louth, Bishop, 48, 185, 289, 303, 420, 448, 506, 513, 727.
 Lowther, Sir James, 300. Family of, 300.
 Lucan, Rowe's, 837.
 Lucan, Lord and Lady, 610, 637, 644, 646.
 Lucas, Dr. Charles, 164. Dr. Richard, 366.
 Lucian, 497, 665. More's Translation of, 836.
 Lumsden, Andrew, Esq., 466.
 Lunardi, the aeronaut, 784.
 Lusk, Mickle's translation, 386, 744.
 —, Johnson's intention to translate the, 745.
 Luthier, 337.
 Luton Hoe, Johnson and Boswell's visit to, 695.
 Luttrell, Colonel, 213. Lady Anne, 253.
 Luxury, 236, 251, 282, 389.
 —, outcry against, 512, 571, 590, 694.
 Lydia, Thomas, 60.
 Lye, Edward, and his Saxon Dictionary, 177.
 Lyttelton, George Lord, 58, 81, 89, 205, 218, 221, 252, 253, 313, 362, 421, 465, 484, 504, 558, 618, 672, 673.
 Lyttelton, his Life of Henry II., 185, 504. His "Dialogues of the Deaf," 218, 773. His extreme anxiety as an author, 394.
 —, Johnson's life of, 672, 837.
 —, Thomas, the second Lord, 124, 650. His visions, 763.
 —, Lady, 142.
 —, Mr., 221.
 —, Mr. (Lord Westcote) and Miss, 511.
 Macallen, Fulham, the fanatic woman, 275.
 Macartney, George, Earl of, 124, 437, 591, 577, 646, 658, 673.
 Macaulay, Thomas Babington, his blundering criticisms on former edition; on the epigram at Laurum parvum, 47. On the omission of indecent expressions, 176. On the execution of Mordant, 257. On Prince Tati, 161. On Ὀἶζος ἰδία, 625. One of his suggestions adopted, 484.
 —, Rev. Kenneth, his account of St. Kilda, 191, 229, 391, 457.
 —, Mrs. Catharine, 78, 192, 167, 232, 112, 457, 509, 517, 556.
 M'Aulay, Rev. John, 3-8, 390.
 Macbean, Alexander, 39, 57, 216, 502, 654, 684, 774.
 Macbeth, 54, 205, 296, 310, 305, 627.
 —, "Maccaroni" 324.
 Maccaroni verses, etymology of, 591.
 Macchesfield, George, Earl of, 88.
 —, Anne, Macon, Countess of, the reputed mother of Savage, 50, 51, 52.
 Maccouchie, Mr., afterwards Lord Meadowbank, 506.
 Maccrusick, Sandie Macleod, 318, 322.
 Macdonald, Sir James, 153, 231, 312, 313, 321, 331, 352, 361, 681.
 —, inscription on his monument, and letters to his mother, 824.
 —, Sir Alexander, afterwards Lord, 231, 256, 311, 312, 313, 316, 321, 326, 334, 339, 360, 374, 395.
 —, Latin verses, addressed by him to Dr. Johnson in the Isle of Skie, 824.
 —, Lady Margaret, 326, 373, 374, 627.
 —, Miss Flora, some account of, 322, 324, 325, 326, 331, 353, 469.
 —, Alexander, of "Kingsburgh," 324, 333, 345, 352, 353.
 —, Major-general, 355.
 —, Colonel John, 324, 411.
 —, Mr. Donald, 312, 327.
 —, Sir Archibald, 232, 431.
 —, Mrs., 325.
 —, Colonel, son of Flora, 411.
 Macdonalds, the, 383, 410.
 Macfarlane, Mr., the antiquary, 214.
 McFarquhar, 383.
 Maeghie, Dr. William, 54, 107, 147, 399.
 Maegunnis, Johnson's guide, 382.
 McGregor, Clan, 304, 383.
 Mac Ian, 383.
 Mackenzie, Sir George, 335.
 —, Henry, Esq., 122. His novels, 359.
 —, John, 327, 328.
 —, clan of, 369.
 Mackinnon, Mr., of Corrichataich and his lady, 311, 315, 329, 353, 355.
 Mackinnon's Cave, 580.
 Mackintosh, Sir James, 290, 230, 253, 412, 434, 446, 505, 517, 519, 593, 768, 769.
 —, J., watchmaker, 398.
 Macklin, Charles, the actor, 131, 455.
 Macky, 450.
 MacLaurin, Colin, 498. His epitaph, 279.
 —, John, afterwards Lord Dreghorn, 150, 278, 279, 401, 451, 566.
 Maclean, Alex., Laird of Col, 299, 379. Alex., his son, 429.
 —, Donald. See Col.
 —, Sir Allan, 376, 384, 457, 527, 536.
 —, Rev. Hector, 363.
 —, Dr. Alexander, his description of Johnson, 372, 373, 383.
 —, Captain Laughlan, 392, 393, 396.
 —, Miss, 375.
 —, of Torloisk, 133.
 —, Laird of Lochbuy, 383.
 —, Mr., of Corneek, 366, 369.
 —, Mr., nephew to Laird of the Isle of Muck, 341.
 Macleod, General John, Laird of, 299, 312, 317, 321, 353, 336, 341.
 —, Johnson's letter to, 356.
 —, his "Memories" of his own life, 321.
 —, Lady, 341, 345, 349, 349, 341, 356.
 —, some account of, 331.
 —, Miss, of Rasay, 322, 335.
 —, Sir Roderick, 334, 335, 346.
 —, Rev. Neal, 382, 383.
 —, Malcolm, 316, 324, 327, 329, 331.
 —, Alexander, or Sandie, 317, 318, 322, 331, 331.
 —, Mr., of Uinish, 344, 345.
 —, Professor, 293, 294, 350.
 —, Captain, a Dutch officer, 310.
 —, Colonel, of Tadsick, 317, 318, 335, 350, 351.
 —, Doctor, 317, 321, 327, 328, 329.

- Macleod, Mr. Donald, 343. 354. 358.
 —, Mrs., daughter of Flora Macdonald, 324.
 Macleod's dining-tables, 345.
 — maidens, 345.
 Macdonish, 367.
 Maclure, Captain, 375.
 Macneil, of Barra, 342.
 Macneil, Dr. Donald, 5. 433.
 Macpherson, James, 134. 294. 346. 347. 369. 428. 429. 430. 431.
 —, 433. 434. Johnson's letter to, 430.
 —, Dr. John, his "Scottish Antiquities," 301. 315. 333.
 —, Latin Ode from Barra, 356.
 —, Rev. Martin, 315. 355. 356.
 —, William, of Cambridge, 300. 301. 302. 310. 314. 318. 341.
 Macquarrie, of Ulva, 375. 380. 383. 527. 536. 538.
 McQueen, Lachlan, 308.
 McQueen, Rev. Donald, 312. 316. 318. 324. 337. 338. 340. 341.
 —, 350. 352. 353. 459
 —, the innkeeper, 307, 308.
 Macra, Mr. John, 340.
 Macraes, clan of, 369. 310. 340.
 Macswyne, Mr. and Mrs., 364. 370.
 —, "Mac Swyne's gun," 364.
 Macswinner, Owen, 516.
 Madd'n, Dr. Samuel, 86. 107. 303. 437. His "Boulter's Monument," 107.
 Madness, 5. 135. 336. 533. 664.
 —, Johnson's mental disorder so called by himself, 14. 336. 832.
 Magicians, 627.
 Magistrates, interference between parents and children, 262.
 "Mahogany," a liquor so called, 680.
 Mahomet, 60.
 Maiden assize, 583.
 Maitland, Mr., 57.
 —, "Malagrida," 643. 716.
 Malet de Pan, 452.
 Mallet, David, 71. 88. 110. 139. 219. 232. 257. 321. 559. 628. 635. Alias "Malloch," 730.
 —, his tragedy of "Elvira," 139. "Life of Bacon," 559.
 —, his poem on repairing the University of Aberdeen, 730.
 —, Mrs., 88.
 Malmesbury, Earl of, 254.
 Malone, Edmund, 8. 9. 15. 16. 20. 27. 47. 49. 68. 75. 81. 82. 86. 121. 169. 240. 243. 272. 430. 492. 512. 536. 665. 631. 653. 670. 671. 778. 821. Johnson's letter to, 701.
 Malthe, Chevalier de, 298.
 Man, 447. Not a machine, 301.
 —, a cooking animal, 273. A tool-making animal, 578.
 —, picture of, by Shakspeare and Milton, 678.
 —, difference between a well and ill-bred, 769.
 —, of fashion, 714.
 "Man of Feeling," "Man of the World." See Mackenzie.
 Mandeville, doctrine of "private vices public benefits," 591.
 —, Sir John, "Travels in China," commended, 841.
 Manley, Mrs., 723.
 Manners, 511. 663. Of the great, 616. Change of, 282.
 Manning, Rev. Owen, 177.
 —, Mr., the compositor, 770.
 Manningham, Dr., 52. 344.
 Mansfield, Lord, 37. 17. 232. 241. 244. 254. 272. 284. 402. 437. 442. 494. 522. 555. 585. 648. 670. 717.
 Mant, Dr., 153.
 Mantuanus, Johannes Baptista, 718.
 Mannucci, Count, 460. 523.
 Manufactures, Johnson's knowledge of, 348.
 Mapletoft, Dr. John, 210.
 Mar, Earl of, 342.
 Marana, J. P., author of the "Turkish Spy," 723.
 Marchetti, an Italian physician, 841.
 Marchmont, Hugh, fourth Earl of, 233. 612. 613. 630. 642. 670.
 —, Johnson's interview with, 630.
 Marcus, Flaminius, 76.
 Marechal, Lord, 331.
 Maria (Aston), epigram on, 40. 611.
 —, Louisa, 341.
 Markham, Dr., 274. 723.
 Markland, Jeremiah, 711.
 —, J.H. Esq., notes communicated by, 596. 653. 709. 711. 717. 719. 720. 729. 755. 758. 762. 765. 767. 784. 789. 823. 841. 842.
 Marlay, Bishop of Waterford, 529. 678.
 Marlborough, John, Duke of, 35. 260. 321. 370. 420. 485. 513. 628.
 —, Sarah, Duchess of, 46. 321. 650.
 —, her "Apology" written by Hooke, 321.
 Marmor Norfolciense, 40.
 Marriage, 117. 129. 192. 301. 309. 212. 219. 234. 337. 341. 440. 487. 488. 493. 495. 657. 761. Boswell's song on, 212.
 —, legitimation by subsequent, 487. Disgraceful state of the law respecting, 487.
 —, with inferiors, 440. With a public singer, 453.
 —, service, 212.
 —, bill, royal, 229.
 —, ties, 502. 529.
 —, late, 219. Mercenary, 192. Second, 201.
 Marshall's "Minutes of Agriculture," 601.
 Marsigli, Dr., 126. 632.
 Martial, Johnson's fondness for, 16. 35.
 —, translation of, Elphinstone's, 65. 582. Hay's, 392.
 —, Martin's "Account of the Hebrides," 153. 267. 283. 577.
 —, "Reliquia Divi Andree," 283.
 Martinelli, V. 252. 253. 302. "Istoria d'Inghilterra," 252.
 Martyrdom, 261. 262.
 Mary Magdalene, 656.
 —, Queen of Scots, 119. 276. 410. 428.
 —, inscription for a print of, 410. 413. 414. 428.
 Mason, William, 2. 149. 234. 325. 504. His "Elfrida" and "Caractacus," 442. His prosecution of Mr. Murray, the bookseller, 595. His share in the "Heroic Epistle," 691. 768.
 Masquerades, 246.
 Mass, 210.
 Massillon, 292. 372.
 Massinger, his play of "The Picture," 637.
 Masters, Mary, 78. 743.
 Mathias, Mr., 214.
 Matrimonial infidelities, 502.
 —, "Thought!" a song, by Boswell, 212.
 Mattaire, Johnson's opinion of, 655. His account of the "Stephani's;" "Senilia;" "Book of the Dialects," 655.
 Maty, Dr. Matthew, 45. 93. 530. Gibbon's opinion of his "Bibliothèque Britannique," 93.
 Maupertuis, 192.
 Mawbey, Sir Joseph, 197.
 Maxwell, Dr. William, his anecdotes of Johnson, 215.
 Mayer, Dr., 260.
 Mayne, William, Esq., 637.
 Mayo, Rev. Dr., 260. 261. 262. 591.
 Mayors, selection of, 617.
 Mead, Dr., 48. 551. 617.
 —, dedication to, of "James's Medicinal Dictionary," 48.
 Meadowbank, Lord, 566.
 Meals, stated, 599.
 Medal given to Home by Sheridan, 437.
 Medicated baths, 298.
 Meditation on a pudding, 387.
 Mediterranean, the, 565.
 Med-terranee, Rev. Mr., 89. 90.
 Melancholy, 7. 15. 28. 91. 152. 188. 336. 482. 496. 522. 526. 553. 649. 643. 661. 737. 831.
 —, Johnson's remedy against, 152. 482. 496. 553. 621.
 —, Johnson projects a history of his, 189.
 Melancthon, Boswell's letter from the tomb of, 533. 534.
 Melcombe, George Bubb Doddington, Lord, 65. 68. 673.
 Melmoth, William, Esq., 645. His "Letters" quoted, 754.
 Member of Parliament, duty on election committee, 678.
 Memis, Dr., 428. 430. 454. 525. 527.
 Memory, 6. 221. 266. 285. 392. 559. 636. 658. 695. 833.
 —, "Menagiana," 259. 408. 605. 612. 718.
 Mental diseases, how to be treated, 152. 482.
 Menzies, Mr., of Culldares, 402.
 Merchants, 139. 170. 378. Enlarged views of our great, 655.
Mercheta Mulierum, 376.
 Mercier's Tableau de Paris, 452.
 Merit, intrinsic, 151. Men of, not neglected, 715.
 Metaphysical tailor, 720.
 Metaphysics, 16.
 Metcalf, Phillip, Esq., 521. 710. 752.
 Method, advantages of, 524.
 Methodism, 216.
 Methodists, 216. 218. 219. 401. 437. When so called, 156.
 —, Rev. Joseph Milner's defence of, 156.
 Meynell, Hugh, Esq., 20. His saying of London, 626.
 Mickle, William Julius, 241. 248. 346. 356. 387. 506.
 —, his "Lustid," 566. 744.
 Microscopes, 186.
 Micyllus, Jacobus, 416.
 Middle state, doctrine of, a. 77. 389.
 —, rank, in France, want of, 462. 466.
 Middlesex election, 213. 637.
 Middleton, Lady Diana, 295.
 Midgeley, Dr. Samuel, 723.
 "Midnight Conversation," Hogarth's, 614.
 Migration of birds, 260.
 Military character, respect paid to, 203. 497.
 Miller, Andrew, the bookseller, anecdotes of, 56. 94. 630.
 —, Lady, her vase at Bath-Easton, 442.
 —, Sir John, 443. 515.
 —, Professor John, 393.
 —, Captain and Mrs., 442.
 —, Phillip, his "Gardener's Dictionary," 288.
 Milman, Mr., 445.
 Milner, Rev. Joseph, his defence of the Methodists, 156.
 —, Dr. Isaac, 156.
 Milton, 2. 58. 69. 72. 258. 259. 269. 385. 420. 468. 618. 626. 636. 660. 667. 675. 678. 765. 771.
 —, his "Tractate on Education," 618.
 —, his picture of man, 678.
 —, Lander's forgery against, 72.
 —, "The Apotheosis of," not written by Johnson, 40.
 —, his granddaughter, Johnson's prologue for, 72.
 —, Johnson's Life of, 667.
 —, Johnson abhors his politics, but just to his poetical merit, 72. 258.

- Milton, Johnson's saying respecting, 765.
 —, Mr. John, thus indexed by Flexman, 771.
 —, Lord, 227.
 Mimry, 230.
 Mind, 511, 581. 609. Management of the, 482.
 —, Cardan's mode of composing his, 553.
 —, influence of the weather on the, 111.
 Minto, Lord, 233.
 Miracles, 182, 557.
 "Mirror," the, 797.
 Miseries of human life, 447.
 Misers, 300, 374, 605.
 Misery, balance of, 764, 819.
 Misfortunes, 664.
 Missionaries, 401.
 Mistresses, 128.
 Mitchell duns Johnson for 2*l.*, 77.
 Mitford's edition of Gray, 149.
 Mitre tavern meetings, 136, 142, 144, 146, 174, 175, 200, 207, 231, 259, 454, 547.
 "Modern Characters from Shakspeare," 581.
 Modesty, 616.
 Moira, Earl of, 322.
 Molière, 15, 120, 372, 438.
 Moltzer, or Micyllus, Jacobus, 416.
 Monarchy, 509.
 Monasteries, 123, 175, 283.
 Monbodo, James Burnet, Lord, and his writings, 200, 227, 242, 264, 277, 286, 287, 288, 290, 299, 379, 396, 402, 459, 527, 550, 552, 566, 645, 655, 754. Johnson's visit to, 288.
 —, his remarks on Johnson's style, 552.
 Money, 283, 584. A stimulus to exertion, 171. Advantages of, 299. Borrowers, 706, 707. Getting, 438, 627.
 —, lending, the sures way of acquiring influence, 235, 300.
 Monks, 460.
 Monkton, Hon. Mary, Countess of Cork, 645, 647.
 —, Boswell's verses to, 690. Her letter to the editor, 646.
 Monnoye, M. de la, 605.
 Monro, Dr., 749.
 Montagu, Lady Mary Wortley, Pope's lines on, 201.
 —, Mrs., anecdotes and mention of, 74, 90, 118, 164, 194, 204, 205, 206, 220, 347, 348, 410, 458, 470, 501, 509, 577, 619, 625, 644, 647, 651, 675, 678, 739, 740, 755, 834, 837.
 —, Johnson's letters to, 118, 410, 470, 569, 570, 739.
 —, Johnson's admiration of, 118, 754.
 —, "Letters," 118. "Essay on Shakspeare," 204, 347.
 —, resents J.'s "Life of Lord Lyttelton," 205, 675, 678.
 —, Mr. F.'s motion to repeat observance of 30th of Jan., 229.
 Montesquieu, 334. His "Lettres Persannes," 594.
 Montgomery, Colonel, 313.
 —, Chief Baron, 272.
 Monthly Review, 186, 504, 508.
 Montrose, 286, 287.
 —, second Duke of, shoots a highwayman, 576.
 —, James, third Duke of, 627, 689.
 —, first Marquis of, 367.
 Monuments, 258. Inaccuracy of inscriptions, 622.
 Moody, Mr., the actor, 443, 444.
 Moor, Dr., 566.
 Moore, Thomas, 132, 166, 251. His "Life of Lord Byron" quoted, 439, 504. His "Irish Melodies," 252.
 Morality, 444, 616.
 Morbid melancholy, 7, 91, 336, 821. See Melancholy.
 More, Sir Thomas, 416.
 —, Miss Hannah, 159, 434, 468, 480, 481, 510, 582, 594, 620, 646, 685, 686, 687, 706, 708, 731, 755, 765, 803, 806.
 —, her flattery of Johnson, 594.
 —, Dr. Henry, the Platonist, 233, 366.
 —, Rorie, or Roderick, 334, 340.
 Morell, Dr. Thomas, 386.
 Moreri's Dictionary, 372.
 Morgann, Maurice, his "Essay on Falstaff," 721.
 Morris, Corbyn, his "Essay on Wit," 688.
 —, Miss, 807, 846.
 Mortimer, Mr., 483.
 Mosaic account of the Creation, 124.
 Moss, Dr., 448, 678.
 Motto on Johnson's watch, 193. For Banks's goat, 226.
 Mounsey, Dr., extraordinary character and will, 194.
 Mount Edgecumbe, 296.
 Mountstuart, Lord, afterwards Marquis of Bute, 179, 180, 478, 494, 524, 639, 655, 726, 732.
 —, "Mourning Bride," Congreve's, 203, 204.
 Muck, Isle of, 341.
 Mudge, Rev. Zachariah, 127, 128. Johnson's character of, 679., and of his "Sermons," 686.
 —, Dr. John, 127. Johnson's letter to, 739.
 —, Thomas, the eminent watchmaker, 128.
 —, and Dutton, 192.
 Muidarth, or Muirdart, 364.
 Mulgrave, Constantine Phipps, Lord, 497.
 Mull, Isle of, 373, 375, 383.
 Muller, Mr., the engineer, 119.
 Mulso, Hester, afterwards Mrs. Chapone, 63, 644, 743.
 Mummies, 695.
 Munros, the, 309.
 Murchison, Mr., 311.
 Murder, prescription of, 270, 291.
 Murdoch, Dr., 333.
 Murillo, 50.
 Murison, Professor, 284.
 Murphy, Arthur, Esq., 9, 31, 35, 45, 59, 61, 68, 71, 79, 88, 100, 104, 109, 110, 113, 114, 120, 126, 168, 170, 191, 203, 218, 219, 314, 433, 436, 417, 468, 503, 507, 572, 590, 736, 746.
 —, his "Poetical Epistle" quoted, 120.
 —, unacknowledged use of Boileau, 120.
 —, acquaintance with Johnson, 120.
 Murray, Lord George, Chief of the Pretender's staff, 410, 455.
 —, the Regent, 300.
 —, William, Attorney-General, 97. His opinion respecting Johnson's definition of the word "excise," 97. See Mansfield, Lord.
 —, Mr., afterwards Lord Henderland, 279, 498.
 —, Mr. John, the bookseller, the grandfather of the publisher of his work, 415, 504, 529. Prosecution of, by Mason, 595. His letter to Mason, 595.
 —, Mr. John, jun., his account of the various portraits of Dr. Johnson, 808.
 "Muses' welcome to King James," 282.
 Musgrave, Sir Richard, 770.
 —, Dr. Samuel, 603.
 Music, 265, 561, 577.
 —, the only sensual pleasure without vice, 661.
 —, in heaven, 43, 234.
 —, Johnson's insensibility to, 123, 373, 470, 832.
 —, Johnson's wish to learn, 266.
 Musk, used medicinally by Johnson, 620.
 Micyllus. See Moltzer.
 Myddleton, Mr., erects an urn to Johnson, 423.
 Mylne, Robert, the architect, 119.
 Mystery, 571, 605.
 Mythology, 639.
 Nairne, William, Lord Dunsinane, 275, 280, 283, 402, 507.
 —, Colonel, 285, 286.
 Nash, Dr., his "History of Worcestershire," 587, 763.
 —, "Beau," 35, 48, 760.
 National Debt, Johnson's notion respecting it, 219.
 —, faith, 661.
 Native plant, love of, renewed in old age, 704.
 "Natural History," Goldsmith's, 240, 258, 520.
 Necessity, doctrine of, 773.
 Negro, Johnson's argument in favour of our claiming his liberty, 527, 562, 566.
 Nelson, Robert, his "Festivals and Fasts," 487.
 Neni, Count, 505.
 Nervous affection, Johnson's, 41.
 "Network," Johnson's definition of, 97.
 Newberry, Mr., bookseller, 74, 79, 102, 143.
 Newborough, Lord, 423.
 Newcastle, Duchess of, 83. Duke of, 99, 495.
 Newhaven, William Mayne, Lord, 637.
 Newmarsh, Captain, 307.
 Newspapers, 235, 663.
 New Testament, 393, 596.
 Newton, Sir Isaac, 155, 363, 661, 698, 731.
 —, Johnson's praise of, 218, 274.
 —, Lord King's "Life" of, 155.
 —, Dr. Thomas, Bishop of Bristol, 8, 72, 448.
 —, his character of Johnson, and Johnson's of him, 759.
 —, Mr., of Lichfield, visit to, 415.
 Nichols, Dr. Frank, 448. "De Animâ Medicâ," 549.
 —, Mr. John, 23, 665, 667, 674, 789.
 —, Johnson's notes and letters to, 666, 789, 794, 823.
 —, his anecdotes, 789. Johnson's character of them, 711.
 —, a storehouse of facts and dates, 789.
 Nicol, Mr. George, 745. Johnson's letter to, 787.
 —, Joannes, 292.
 Nicolai (Berlin bookseller), 229.
 Night-caps, 357, 371.
 "Night Thoughts," Young's, 207, 357, 673.
 Nisbet, of Dirleton, 335. His "Doubts," 563.
 "No, Sir," how used by Johnson, 768.
 Nobility, 139, 152, 219, 295, 616, 691.
 —, usurpation of the, 741.
 "Noble authors," Park's edition of, 117.
 Noble, the Rev. Mark, 352.
 Nollekens, his bust of Johnson, 565. Mrs., 568.
 "Nonjurus umbra" explained, 838.
 "Nonjuror," Cibber's play of the, 437.
 Nonjurors, 437, 759.
 Nores, Jason de, his comments on Horace, 483.
 Norris, Thomas, 367.
 North, Dudley, Esq. See Long.
 —, Frederick, Lord, 222, 223, 227, 229, 357, 406, 436, 441, 453, 505, 558, 705.
 —, his letter to Oxford for Johnson's degree, 441.
 Northampton, Lady, translation of Erse song, 364.
 Northcote, the painter, 73, 128, 203.
 Northumberland, Duke and Duchess of, 220, 443, 587.
 North Pole, Johnson's conjectures respecting, 314.
 Norton, Sir Fletcher, 205, 493.

"Nose of the Mind," sagacity the, 775.
 "Notanda," Addison's, 63.
 "Nourjahad," Mrs. Sheridan's, 121.
 Nourse, Mr., the bookseller, 498.
 Novels, 218.
 Novelty, the paper on, in the "Spectator," 505.
 — and truth seldom combined, 150, 625.
 Nowell, Rev. Dr., 229, 762.
 —, his sermon before the Commons, 229.
 "Nuge Antiqua," Harrington's, 717.
 Nugent, Robert, Earl, 222.
 —, Dr., 163, 164, 259.
 "Nullum nunc abest," &c., 717.
 Numbers, science of, 480.
 Nundomar, 500.
 Nuremberg Chronicle, 424.
 Νῦξ γὰρ ἐγγύρα, 192.

Oath of abjuration, boast of its framer, 437.
 —, impolicy and inefficacy of such tests, 437.
 Oaths, 252, 400, 507. Morality of taking, 437.
 "Oats," Johnson's definition of, 97, 399, 489, 588, 713.
 Obedience, 595.
 O'Brien, Lady Susan, 440.
 Observation of days and months, 487.
 "Observer," Cumberland's, 675.
 Occupation, 554.
 Occupations, hereditary, 302.
 O'Connell, the Queen versus, 613.
 O'Connor, Charles, Esq., account of, and Johnson's letters to, 108, 531.
 Ode, Latin, "Ad Ornatisissimam Puellam," 47.
 —, to Friendship, by Johnson, 48.
 —, Latin, "Ad Urbannam," 31.
 —, translation of, by Mr. Jackson, of Canterbury, 32.
 —, Latin, upon the Isle of Skie, 313.
 —, Latin, to Mrs. Thrale, 314.
 —, in Theatre, 222.
 —, Latin, on Inch Kenneth, 378.
 —, Dr. McPherson's Latin, 356.
 — on St. Cecilia's Day, 143.
 — on the peace, Miss H. M. Williams's, 757.
 Odes, Gray's, 442.
 Odyssey, 647, 670, 731, 837.
 Ofellus, on the "Art of Living in London," 29.
 Offly, Mr., a pupil of Johnson, 25.
 Officers, military, their ignorance, 403.
 —, respect paid to, 397, 585.
 Ogden, Dr. Samuel, 362, 694. His Sermons on Prayer, 272, 275, 285, 292, 377, 386, 579, 694.
 Ogilvie, Dr. John, his "Day of Judgment," 143, 144.
 Ogilthorpe, General, 35, 42, 239, 240, 241, 447, 512, 590, 714.
 "O'Hara, you are welcome," 355.
 Οἱ φίλοι, οἱ φίλοι, 64, 593, 629.
 O'Kane, the Irish harper, 374.
 O'Keefe's, "Highland Reel," 380.
 Old age, 559, 581, 610, 613, 661, 718, 755.
 —, one word to express, 613.
 Old Bailey dinners, 610.
 Oldfield, Dr., story of, 513.
 Oldham's imitation of Juvenal, 33.
 "Old Man's Wish," a song, 660.
 Old Men, folly of putting themselves to nurse, 494.
 Oldmixon, John, 97.
 Old Street Club, 720, 752.
 Oldys, William, 46. His part in Harleian Miscel., 53.
 Olver, Dame, Johnson's schoolmistress, 7.
 Omal, 497.
 O'Moore, Colonel, anecdote of Goldsmith, 141.
 Onslow, Speaker, 88.
 Opera girls, 714.
 Opte, John, his picture of Johnson, 777.
 Opium, Johnson's use of, 714.
 Opposition, the, 657.
 Orange peels, use of by Johnson, 440.
 Orator, Johnson's qualifications as an, 223, 348.
 Oratory, 249, 443, 688, 726, 732.
 Orchards, 220, 725.
 Ord, Mrs. (Anne Dillingham), 501, 644, 645, 649.
 Orde, Lord Chief Baron, 272, 277.
 Orford, Horace, Earl of, 559, 768. See Walpole.
 —, Robert, Earl of, his pictures, 775.
 Organ, 442.
 "Oriental Gardening," Sir W. Chambers's, 325.
 Origin of evil, 392.
 Original sin, 694.
 Orlando Furioso, 91.
 Orme, Mr., opinion of the "Journey," 406, 431. Of J., 591.
 —, Captain, 683.
 Ormond, Duke of, 309, 367.
 Orrery, Earls of, 345.
 —, John, fifth Earl of, 57, 78, 79, 93, 117, 345, 579, 602.
 — his letter on the specimen of the Dictionary, 57.
 Orton's "Life of Doddridge," 357.
 Osborne, Mr. Francis, his works, 243.
 —, Thomas, the bookseller, 41, 46, 48, 613.

Osbornes, the, 170, 243.
 Ossian's poems, their merits and authenticity discussed, 134, 219, 277, 317, 321, 334, 341, 346, 347, 359, 428, 429, 431, 433, 434, 437, 446, 510, 701, 718, 745.
 Otahete, inhabitants of, 510.
 "Othello," morality of the tragedy of, 507.
 O'Toole, Arthur, 471.
 Otway, Thomas, 72. His pathetic powers, 650.
 —, Master, 248.
 Oughton, Sir Adolphus, 277, 303, 401.
 Ouran-ouang, 277.
 Overbury, Sir Thomas, 201.
 "Overbury, Sir Thomas," a tragedy, by Savage, 532.
 Overell, Bishop, on a future state, 389.
 Ovid, 240, 258, 280. Fasti praised, 837, 838.
 Oxford, Earl of, his library, 46.
 —, University, advantages of, 191.
 —, Johnson's attachment to, 759.
 —, expulsion of students from, 241.

Pagan mythology, 659.
 Pains of human life, 447.
 Painters, reputation of, 508. Styles of different, 590.
 Painting, 481, 490, 770. Johnson's insensibility to, 123, 832.
 Palaces, 462.
 Palsey, Dr., on submission to government, 332.
 —, his defence of revelation, 332.
 Palmer, Rev. John, his "Answer" to Priestley, 594.
 —, Rev. Thomas Fysche, 695.
 —, Miss, 24.
 "Palmerino d'Inghilterra," 9, 494.
 Palmerston, Henry Temple, second Viscount, 443, 736.
 Palsy, Johnson's attack of, 734, 735.
 Pamphlet, 603.
 Pamphlets, Johnson's, 126, 213, 221, 425, 435.
 Panckoucke, 92.
 Panegyric, 546.
 Pantheon, in Oxford Street, 236.
 Panting, Dr. Matthew, 17.
 Paoli, General, 32, 185, 189, 199, 202, 203, 234, 242, 243, 253, 265, 422, 505, 546, 605, 621, 630, 638, 687.
 Papier maché, 425.
 Papiets, 209, 760.
 Paradise, John, Esq., 14, 441, 629, 649, 704, 732, 746, 787.
 Parental authority, 625.
 Parenthesis, Johnson's objection to, 720.
 Paris, state of society in, 581.
 —, Johnson's visit to, 459.
 Parish clerk, his necessary qualifications, 695.
 Park, 117, 354, 461.
 Parker, Chief Baron, 8.
 —, Rev. Mr., anecdotes of Johnson, 836. Possessor of his tea-pot, 105.
 —, Mr. Sackville, the Oxford bookseller, 766.
 —, John, Esq., of Brownsholme, 416.
 Parkhurst, Rev. Mr., curious letter from Dr. Dodd to, 590.
 Parliament, 281, 449, 563, 574, 591, 687, 683, 731.
 —, the use of, 449. Duration of, 200.
 —, speakers in, 732.
 —, duty of a member of, 678.
 —, corruption of, 216, 563.
 —, attempt to get Johnson into, 222, 223.
 Parliaments, triennial, advocated by Johnson, 197.
 Parliamentary debates, Johnson's, 32, 38, 44, 45, 804.
 — influence, 281.
 Parnell, Dr., 417, 671, 800. Johnson's life of, 671. Johnson's epitaph on, 672.
 —, a disputed passage in his "Hermit," 569, 631.
 —, his habit of drinking, 546.
 Parodies of Dr. Johnson, 795, 796.
 Parr, Rev. Dr. Samuel, 121, 669, 738, 808.
 —, Johnson's opinion of his conversation, 659.
 —, recommended by J. to Norwich grammar school, 659.
 —, His description of Mrs. Sheridan, 121.
 —, his epitaph on Johnson, 808, 809.
 Paris, the life of a, 598.
 Party, necessity of adhering to, 274.
 Pascal, Pensées de, 626.
 Passion Week, dining out in, 683, 833.
 Passions, the purging of the, 506.
 "Pastern," Johnson's definition of, 97, 123.
 Patence, Mr., 208.
 Paternity, 584.
 Pater Noster, 353.
 Paterson, Mr. Samuel, 238., and his son, 523, 751.
 "Paterson and others against Alexander," 455.
 Patrick, Bishop, 210, 513.
 "Patrot," a political pamphlet by Johnson, 126, 425, 426, 503.
 Patriotism, "the last refuge of a scoundrel," 446.
 Patriots, self-styled, 683.
 "Patron," the, 87.
 Patronage, 282, 715.
 — lay, Johnson's argument for, 259, 815.
 Patten, Rev. Dr. Thomas, 699, 711.
 Paul, Sir George Onesiphorus, 376.
 —, Father, 32, 39, 163.

- Paul, Mr. Lewis, Johnson's letters to, 43, 44, 100, 101, 102, 103.
 Payne, W., preface to his work on "Draughts," 106.
 —, Mr. John, 58, 63, 78, 79, 746.
 Pearce, Bishop, 97, 483, 531. Johnson's dedication of his posthumous works, 531. Curious anecdote of, 531. Supplied Johnson with etymologies, 97.
 Pearson, Rev. Mr., 492, 623, 736.
 —, Rev. of Lichfield, 62, 163, 492, 568.
 —, Rev. Dr., 135.
 Pecuniary embarrassment, evil of, 709.
 —, motive to writing, 41, 106.
 Peel, Right Honourable Robert, 487.
 Peers, House of, 296. Judicial powers of the, 613.
 —, influence of, in the House of Commons, 281.
 Peers of Scotland, interference in elections, 744.
 Pegler, Mary, 52.
 Peirase, lamented in foreign languages, 454.
 Pelham, Right Hon. Henry, Garrick's ode on, 83.
 Pellisson, 22.
 Pellé, Mrs., Johnson's charity to, 757.
 Pellet, Dr., 615.
 Pembroke, Lord, 306, 439. Johnson's "bow-wow way," 269.
 Penance in church, 334. Johnson's filial, 791.
 Penitence, gloomy, madness turned upside down, 503.
 Penmaen Mawr, 421.
 Penn, Governor Richard, 651.
 Pennant, Mr., 314, 339, 446, 536. His tour in Scotland, 303, 587, 588. His merit as a zoologist; his "London;" his character of Johnson, 583.
 Pennington, Colonel, 304.
 —, Rev. Mr.'s Life of Mrs. Carter, 34.
 Pension, Johnson's definition of, 97. Johnson's own, 126, 127, 147, 227, 436, 663, 691.
 —, application for an increase of, 772, 731.
 Pensioners, Johnson's, 569, 570, 620.
 Pepps, William Waller, Esq., 255, 644, 646, 647, 649, 681.
 —, Sir Lucas, 222.
 —, his diary, 376.
 Perceval, Lady Catherine, 422.
 Percy, Dr., afterwards Bishop, 9, 10, 17, 24, 26, 41, 58, 59, 164, 166, 171, 194, 195, 222, 249, 298, 351, 445, 456, 486, 547, 586, 589, 601, 603, 620, 641, 643, 632, 646.
 —, Boswell's letter to, 589. Squabble with J., 587. Their male of the ancient Percies, 587. J.'s character of, 589.
 —, Mrs., 166, 187.
 —, Reliques, 346, 446.
 Perelle's landscapes, 123.
 "Persegrinity," 305.
 Perfection, to be aimed at, 776.
 Perkins, Mr., and letters to, 426, 680, 681, 692, 708, 747, 786.
 Perreux, execution of the, 484, 544.
 Perseus and Andromeda, 320.
 Peruvian bark, 762.
 Peter the Great, 349.
 Peterborough, Earl of, 670, 774.
 Peters, Mr., 493.
 Petitions, facility of getting them up, 205
 Petrarch, 12, 32.
 Petty, Sir William, 655.
 Peyton, Mr., Johnson's amanuensis, 57, 58, 230, 231, 243, 457
 Pheasant, Mrs., 52.
 Philips, the musician, Johnson's epitaph on, 43.
 —, Ambrose, 55, 288. His "Cyder," a poem, 288.
 —, Lady, 74.
 —, Miss, afterwards Mrs. Crouch, 733.
 —, Sir John, 359.
 Philosophers, ancient, good humour in disputation, 497.
 Philosophical necessity, 394.
 "Philosophical Survey of Ireland," Campbell's, 443, 531.
 —, Transactions, 186.
 Philosophy, 454, 599.
 Phipps, Rev. J., leaves his fortune to Pemb. Coll., 599.
 —, Capt., his "Voyage to the North Pole," 344.
 Physic, irregular practitioners in, 630.
 —, Johnson's knowledge of, 501.
 Physician, Johnson's reply to a foppish, 769.
 —, anecdote of one, 486, 491.
 —, argument in the case of Dr. Memis, 454.
 Physicians, 491, 749. Duties of, towards patients, 765.
 "Physico-Theology," Derham's, 377.
 Piazzas, 300.
 Picture, superstitious reluctance to sit for, 655.
 —, Johnson's motto for Dr. Dodd's, 726.
 "Picture," Massinger's play of, 637.
 Pig, the learned, 791.
 "Pilgrim's Progress" commended, 838.
 Pillory, punishment of the, 602.
 Pindar, West's translation of, 663.
 —, Peter, 469.
 Pinkerton, 773.
 Piozzi, or Thrale, Mrs., 6, 7, 13, 16, 24, 42, 43, 59, 63, 65, 68, 73, 76, 78, 89, 129, 139, 141, 145, 146, 160, 163, 164, 170, 180, 194, 199, 200, 203, 204, 213, 225, 230, 235, 242, 250, 252, 254, 260, 272, 342, 343, 347, 348, 351, 361, 379, 415, 416, 419, 422, 425, 430, 440, 441, 447, 452, 462, 463, 465, 468, 471, 481, 485, 489, 494, 495, 503, 504, 510, 570, 573, 620, 653, 673, 777, 778, 779, 780, 799.
 —, Johnson's acquaintance with, 169.
 Piozzi, receives 500*l.* for her collection of J.'s letters, 187.
 —, Johnson's letters to, 198, 214, 224, 225, 245, 246, 248, 456, 457, 458, 492, 518, 525, 564, 565, 573, 610, 619, 623, 625, 632, 634, 637, 638, 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647, 649, 650, 682, 699, 706, 708, 734, 735, 736, 737, 740, 742, 746, 750, 752, 774, 777.
 —, her letters to Johnson, 645, 777.
 —, bequeaths her patrimonial estate to a foreigner, to the exclusion of her own children, 418.
 —, Boswell's strictures on her marriage with Piozzi, 510.
 —, substantial accuracy of her anecdotes of Johnson, 573.
 —, Johnson's verses on her birth-day, 471.
 —, her miserable mésalliance, 776, 777, 778.
 —, Boswell's proneness to disparage her, 573, 577, 778, 779, 780, 799.
 —, her beautiful handwriting, 666.
 —, Signor, 776, 777.
 Pitcairne, his Latin poetry, 282.
 Pitt, William, Earl of Chatham, 37, 45, 58, 92, 241, 254, 383, 769.
 —, William, the son, 495, 718, 750.
 —, Boswell's expectation from, 750.
 Pitt and Fox, 761.
 Pitts, Rev. John, 718.
 Pity, 149.
 Place-hunters, 574.
 Plagiarist, Sir Fretful, intended for Cumberland, 248.
 "Plain Dealer," 47, 53.
 Planting, 564. In Scotland, era of, 405. Spur given to, by Johnson's "Journey," 527.
 Plato, 511.
 Plaxton, 4.
 Players, 51, 62, 137, 205, 257, 275, 277, 304, 467, 489, 536, 584.
 Pleasure, 412, 578, 591, 629.
 Pleasures, no man a hypocrite in his, 769.
 "Pleasures of the Imagination," Akenside's, 121, 234.
 Plott's "History of Staffordshire," 557.
 Plunkett, Lord, 452.
 Plymouth and "Dock," dispute between, 128.
 Pocock, Mr. Lewis, 43, 57.
 Pooecke, Dr. Richard, 586.
 —, Rev. Edward, the orientalist, 586, 663, 719.
 Poetical scale, 667.
 Poetry, Reflections on, 448. Definition of, 506. Pathetic, — Johnson's fondness for, 720. Johnson's early, 19.
 — and lexicography compared, 278, 824.
 Poets, 258, 261. See Lives.
 —, the preservers of languages, 506.
 —, few of our great, have left issue, 72.
 "Polite Philosopher," 501.
 Politeness, 290, 548.
 —, Johnson's, 94, 185, 270, 290, 305, 391, 451, 610, 655.
 Politian's poems, Johnson's projected edition of, 22.
 "Political Survey of Great Britain," Campbell's, 377, 485.
 Politics, modern, 448, 453.
 "Polluted," use of the word, 802.
 Polygamy, 337.
 Pomiret, the poet, 135.
 "Pomposo," Johnson so called, 771.
 "Ponsonby, you may sit down," 355.
 Poor, a decent provision for, the test of civilisation, 220.
 —, methods of employing, 655.
 —, in France, 460. Of London, 635.
 Pope, Alexander, 13, 29, 35, 36, 37, 40, 41, 46, 47, 56, 60, 72, 76, 102, 145, 153, 164, 172, 175, 176, 185, 201, 203, 229, 233, 235, 240, 249, 251, 267, 289, 290, 365, 385, 410, 462, 484, 489, 511, 605, 613, 614, 630.
 —, praise of Johnson's "London," 36.
 —, recommends Johnson to Earl Gower, 37.
 —, note concerning Johnson, 41.
 —, peculiar mode of writing, and imperfect spelling, 41.
 —, his "Messiah" translated, 13.
 —, Johnson's observation against a monument to aim in St. Paul's, 76, 254.
 —, Johnson's dissertation on the epitaphs of, 103.
 —, his "Dunciad" written primarily for him, 412.
 —, Johnson's character of his "Homer," 582.
 —, his "Essay on Man," 635, 636.
 —, Dr. Blair's letter concerning his "Essay on Man," 635.
 —, his knowledge of Greek, 635.
 —, his "Grotto," 657.
 —, Johnson's Life of, 609. Character of his poetry, 684.
 —, his limited conversational powers, 670.
 —, his "Universal Prayer," 614.
 —, Lewis's verses to, 765.
 —, reply to Prince of Wales, 670.
 —, Dr. Walter, his "Old Man's Wish," 650.
 Popery, 76, 309, 210.
 Popular elections, Johnson's opinion of, 617.
 Population, 209, 271, 574.
 Port, Mr. Bernard, 557.
 Porter, Mrs. J.'s wife, 4, 6, 21, 24, 26. See Johnson, Mrs. —, Henry, 78.
 —, Miss Lucy, 4, 6, 23, 26, 62, 76, 113, 117, 118, 122, 127, 130, 141, 163, 169, 173, 187, 193, 197, 214, 214, 462, 488, 491, 492, 565, 568, 639, 641, 736.
 Porter, Miss Lucy, Johnson's letters to, 62, 113, 114, 115, 118.

122. 130. 144. 145. 163. 173. 193. 197. 214. 459. 469. 565. 568. 622. 623. 631. 643. 683. 702. 736. 742. 744. 748. 749. 753. 798.
- Porter, Captain, her brother, 130.
- , Mrs., the actress, 125. 741.
- , Sir James, 635.
- Porteus, Bishop, 159. 501. 555. 589. 639. 641. 653. 679. 683.
- Portland, Duchess Dowager of, 646.
- Portrait, Mr. Beauclerk's inscription for Johnson's, 718.
- Portrait-painting, an improper employment for a woman, 451.
- Portraits, 338.
- of Dr. Johnson, 133. 224. List of the various, 808.
- Portree, 323.
- Possibilities, 277.
- Post-chaise travelling, 485. 495. 549.
- Posterity, 473.
- Pott, Archdeacon, his sermons, 488.
- Potter, Rev. Dr., his translation of Æschylus, 582.
- Poverty, 18. 19. 99. 110. 150. 706. 707. 709. 710. 712. 752.
- Power, despotic, 591. Of the Crown, 236.
- Powerscourt, Lord, his wages, 351.
- Praise, 190. 571. 588. 661. 681. 754.
- , indiscriminate, 629. Exaggerated, 681.
- and flattery, difference between, 419.
- Prayer, 275. 285. 296. 302. 303. 733. 762.
- , the Book of Common, 762.
- , a form of, Johnson's arguments for, 391. 762.
- , Johnson's, on the death of his wife, 75.
- , unpublished, 1759, 823.
- Prayers, Johnson's classification of, 792.
- "Prayers and Meditations," J.'s., 17. 25. 62. 75. 81. 83. 99. 100. 110. 114. 118. 120. 165. 167. 168. 187. 188. 213. 225. 242. 243. 251. 252. 265. 295. 410. 425. 450. 502. 523. 526. 567. 602. 626. 650. 654. 665. 682. 698. 702. 704. 710. 789. 792. 799. 800. 803.
- , not intended by him for publication, 792. 803.
- Preachers, women, 157.
- Preaching above the capacity of the congregation, 719.
- "Preceptor," Dodsley's, 59.
- Precocity in children, 469.
- Predestination, 210.
- Prejudice, 713. Johnson's, 456. Against Scotland and Scotchmen, 54. 269. 302. 431. 432. 713.
- Premium scheme in Dublin University, 107.
- Pendergast, Sir Thomas, presentment of his death, 241.
- Presbyterians, 209. 397. 398. 805.
- Presence of the Deity, 594.
- Prescription of murder in Scotland, 270. 291.
- Presentment of death, 241.
- Press, superflation of, prejudicial to literature, 608.
- Prentender, the, 42. 54. 92. 147. 325. 331. 351. 401. 455. 466. 510.
- Boswell's account of the escape of, 320—331.
- , history of, proposed to Sir W. Scott, 401.
- Price, Archdeacon, 424.
- , Dr. Richard, 738.
- Priestley, Dr. Joseph, 593. 594. 738. 804. J.'s opinion of, 218.
- Primrose, Dorothy, Lady, 331.
- Prince of Wales, his situation, 718.
- , afterwards George IV., 187.
- "Prince Titi," history of, 461.
- Principle, 151. Principles, fundamental, 446.
- "Principles of Politeness," Trusler's, 511.
- Pringle, Sir John, 234. 294. 331. 395. 397. 497. 499. 513. 553. 578.
- Printers' devil, 686.
- Printing, 236. 425. 506.
- Printing-house, Virgil's description of the entrance into hell applied to, 372.
- Prior, Matthew, 201. 282. 559. 633. 646.
- , Johnson's extraordinary defence of, 559.
- , James, his "Life of Burke," 136. 253.
- , Life of Goldsmith, 140. 141. 203. 247. 249. 258.
- , adopts the editor's rejection of indelicate expressions, 176.
- Prisons on the Continent, 753.
- Pritchard, Mrs., the actress, 61. 123. 206. 304. 447.
- Private conversation, 730.
- Prize-fighting, 342.
- Procrastination, 63.
- Prosecutors of Edinburgh, prosecution by, 696.
- "Progress of Discontent," Warton's, 93.
- "Project," The, a poem by Tickell, 603.
- Prologues, 55. 183. 438. 532.
- Pronunciation, 232. 233. 290. 489. 560.
- Property, 262. Laws of, 472. 475.
- Propitiatory sacrifice, 292. 695.
- Prospect, fine, 399.
- Prosperity, 615.
- Prospero, 68.
- Prostitution, 500.
- Providence, a particular, 754.
- Prujean, Mr., 20. 622.
- Prussia, King of, 609. 689. His writings, 149. Anecdote of, 149. 151.
- Psalmazer, George, 213. 602. 720. 754. 794.
- Psalms, biblical version of, 420.
- Public amusements, 236. Schools, 498. Speaking, 249. 443. Worship, 142. Institutions, administration of, 511.
- "Public Virtue," Dodsley's, 660.
- Pudding, meditation on a, 387.
- Puffendorf, 231. 478.
- Pulpit, liberty of the, 513. 523.
- Pulsion, theory of, 505.
- Pulteney, William, Earl of Bath, 45. 382.
- Punctuation, 504.
- Punishment, eternity of, 562. 694. 764.
- Punishments, 469. 586. 592. 611. 694.
- Puns, 249. 259. 605. 768. 769.
- Purcell, 444.
- Purgatory, 77. 210. 234.
- Purposes, good, the benefit of, 799.
- Pym, John, 18.
- Quakers, 157. 487. 728. 730. Female preachers, 157. Quarrels, 556.
- "Quarterly Review," Byng's trial treated in, 105.
- of Horace Walpole's Memoirs, 768.
- Queen's Arms Club, not patriots, 682.
- Queensbury, Duke of, 433. Duchess of, 476.
- Queen's (Miss Thrale), 423.
- Questioning, not the mode of conversation, 493. 585.
- Quin, the actor, 453. 533. 584.
- "Quos Deus vult perdere," &c., whence taken, 718.
- Quotation, 687.
- "Quotidian expenses," 385.
- Rabutin, Bussy, 279.
- Racine, 55. 372.
- Rackstraw, Colony of the trained bands, 769.
- Raddiffe, Dr., 89.
- , small success of his travelling fellowships, 762.
- Rajapoots, 683.
- Raleigh, Sir Walter, 72. 228.
- Ralph, Mr. James, 51. 673.
- , secretary to Frederick Prince of Wales, 461.
- "Rambler," the, 62. 63. 65. 67. Reasons for that name, 62.
- Prayer on commencing, 62. Cave's letter, 65.
- , remarks on, 67. 71. 83. 508. 707. 727.
- , translations of the mottos to, 71.
- , translation into Italian, 638.
- , said to be translated into Russian, 755. A mistake, 755.
- "Ranct," the, 837.
- Ransay, Allan, 252. 394. 395. "Gentle Shepherd," 252. 355.
- , Allan, junior, 508. 579. 580. 608. 610. 627. 630. 787.
- , Colonel, 83.
- Ranby, John, "Doubts on Slave Trade Abolition," 563.
- "Random Records," (Colman's), 511.
- Ranelagh, 296. 561.
- Rank, its importance in society, 151. 176. 238. 265. 440.
- Rann, Mr., 632.
- Raphael, 50.
- Rasny, Isle of, 316. 317. 318. 319. 320. 407. 408. 457.
- , John Macleod, Laird of, 317. 324. 327. 406. 408. 459. 536.
- , his letter to Boswell on Johnson's "Journey," 406.
- , Johnson's and Boswell's letters to, 407.
- , Lady, 317. Miss Flora, 322. 533.
- "Rascal," Johnson's use of the word, 494.
- "Rasselas," 22. 114. 115. 116. 118. 148. 603. 617. 692. Written in one week, 115. Translated into four languages, 247.
- Ratcliffe, Dr., Master of Pembroke, neglect of Johnson, 89.
- "Rats, Muse let us sing of," 485. 834.
- Rattakin mountain, 310.
- Rawlinson, Dr. Richard, the antiquarian, 711.
- Ray, Miss, 628.
- Ray's Proverbs, 205.
- Reading, 452. 508. 559. 591. 664. 726. 731. 766. Advantages of, 450. Snatches of, 661. The small quantity of, in the world, 731. The manner and effect of, 12. 147. 539. 628.
- , Best mode of, 508. And writing, 242. 506. Quick, 830.
- Reay, George, third Lord, 376.
- Rebellions, sometimes justifiable, 401.
- Red ink, kind of, used by Johnson, 649. 716.
- Reed, Mr. Isaac, 61. 259. 666.
- Reeves, Sir Thomas, 90.
- Refinement in education, 551.
- Reformers, 262.
- "Refrain" and "Abstain," distinction between, 159.
- Registration of deeds, Johnson's note on, 678.
- "Rehearsal," the Duke of Buckingham's, 235. 770.
- Reid, Dr., of Glasgow, 393.
- Rein-deer, introduction of, into England, 235.
- Relations, 297. Relationship, 238. 297.
- Relics, 692.
- Religion, 15. 100. 135. 137. 165. 167. 172. 175. 199. 207. 209. 210. 212. 213. 218. 229. 237. 250. 285. 374. 377. 433. 596. 611. 683. 693. 730.
- , revealed, evidence for, 840.
- , Roman Catholic, 760.
- Religious discourse, 730. Houses, 319. Orders, 480. Discipline, 694. Impressions, 694.
- "Remembrance" and "Recollection," distinguished, 695.
- Renegado, definition of, 98.
- Rents, 209. 333. 366.
- Repentance, 695. 729. 800.
- Resentment, 507. 788.
- Residences, a list of Johnson's, 30. 636.
- Resolutions, difficulty of keeping, 213. Of amendment, 450.

- Respect not to be paid to an adversary, 272.
 "Respublicæ," the little volumes entitled, 511.
 Resurrection, 122, 684, 729.
 "Resurrection," The, a poem, 122.
 Retired tradesmen, 443.
 Retirement from the world, 283.
 Retort, Johnson's dexterity in, 719.
 Reviewers, meanness of returning thanks to, 673.
 Reviews, 729. Monthly and Critical, 504, 508.
 Revolution of 1688, 253, 332, 714.
 Reynolds, Sir Joshua, 41, 42, 50, 63, 73, 79, 96, 113, 123, 125, 126, 127, 128, 141, 161, 163, 164, 171, 177, 186, 203, 205, 212, 226, 253, 257, 269, 273, 296, 298, 305, 338, 363, 428, 432, 445, 452, 479, 480, 496, 502, 507, 508, 519, 521, 523, 573, 583, 597, 600, 601, 603, 607, 608, 610, 612, 620, 622, 624, 629, 642, 656, 678, 683, 685, 733, 743, 746, 747, 756, 757, 758, 757, 788, 806.
 —, Johnson's "Advice decess," 79. His prices for portraits, 113. His visit to Devonshire with Johnson, 127.
 —, Johnson's letters to, 166, 224, 226, 519, 523, 697, 711, 716, 724, 731, 733, 746, 747.
 —, Boswell's letter to, 747.
 —, style and economy of his table, 519.
 —, two dialogues by, in imitation of Johnson's, 601.
 —, his "Discourses to the Royal Academy," 621, 770.
 —, Miss, 42, 113, 129, 161, 166, 385, 451, 465, 467, 480, 509, 519, 567, 577, 594, 612, 644, 649, 691, 697.
 —, her character, by J., 129. Her letter to J., 519.
 —, Johnson's letters to, 129, 161, 224, 226, 505, 519, 623, 632, 639, 649, 697, 706, 741, 744, 753, 757.
 —, her "Essay on Taste," 697. Her poem, 649, 834.
 —, her "Recollections" of Dr. Johnson, 530, 691, 830.
 Rhetorical gesture, Johnson's ridicule of, 111.
 Rheumatism, Johnson's recipe for, 451.
 Rhubarb, 749.
 Rhudlan Castle, 419.
 Rhyme, its excellence over blank verse, 146, 664.
 Rich, Miss, 442.
 Richardson, Samuel, 36, 42, 63, 65, 73, 79, 83, 95, 100, 113, 125, 129, 140, 141, 181, 190, 218, 238, 402, 536, 602, 644, 655, 663, 839.
 —, Johnson's resource in pecuniary distress, 100.
 —, writes a paper in the "Kambler," 63. Johnson's character of, 63, 73, 238, 402. Letters to, 73, 83, 95, 100.
 —, compared with Fielding, 190.
 —, limited conversational powers, 663.
 —, Martha, (Mrs. Brigden), 125.
 —, Jonathan the elder and the younger, 36.
 —, Mr., an attorney, 68.
 Riches, 150, 230, 235, 299, 714, 782. Influence of, 299.
 Riddoch, Mr., 291, 293, 294.
 Ridicule, the great use of, 626, 659.
 Ridley, Bishop, 210.
 Riggs, Mrs., 442.
 Right, natural, 473.
 Ring, Johnson's wedding, 76, 163.
 Riot, Johnson leads one, 771.
 Riots of 1780, 647, 651. Johnson's account of, 647.
 Ritson's songs, 552.
 Ritter, Joseph, 209, 280, 470.
 Rivers, Earl of, 50, 82.
 Rizzo, David, 276.
 Roberts, Miss, 111.
 —, J., printer, 50.
 Robertson, Dr. James, 276.
 —, Dr. William, the historian, 103, 182, 191, 194, 230, 244, 258, 267, 273, 275, 276, 302, 394, 399, 401, 402, 412, 552, 608, 609, 611, 636, 680, 770. Note to Boswell, 273.
 —, his style imitated from Johnson, 552, 796.
 —, his History of Scotland, 191, 609.
 —, Mr., 299.
 Robin Hood Society, 684.
 Robinson, Mr., sen., 79.
 —, Crusoe, 585.
 —, Archbishop, 220.
 —, Sir Thomas, 148, 220.
 Rochester, Lord, 286. His poems, 280, 325, 530.
 Rockingham, Lady, 83. Marquis of, 177.
 Rockville, Alexander Gordon, Lord, 159, 160, 401, 402.
 Rod, punishment of the, 8, 275.
 Rodney, Admiral Lord, 465.
 Roffette, Abbe, 468.
 Rogers, Captain Francis, 127.
 —, Rev. Mr., 801.
 Rokeby, Mathew, second Lord, 118, 148, 220.
 Holt, Richard, "Dictionary of Trade and Commerce," 121.
 Roman Catholics, Johnson's charitable opinion of, 76, 209, 210, 229, 637.
 —, Catholic religion, 286, 499, 760.
 Romances, 659. Johnson's love of, 9. Reasons for reading, 659.
 Romans, character of the ancient, 104.
 Rome, the fountain of elegance, 608.
 Romney, the painter, 508.
 Rorie, or Roderick More, 334.
 Roscommon, Johnson's Life of, 59.
 Rose, Dr., 79, 737. Repartee on Johnson's pension, 713.
 Rose, Mrs., her anecdotes of Johnson, 836.
 —, Sir George, 83.
 Roslin Castle, 404.
 Ross, Bishop of, 754. Thane of, 657.
 Rosses, the, 369.
 Rosslyn, Earl, Professor, 292. See Loughborough.
 Roths, Lady, Langton's wife, 222, 225, 227, 241, 528, 597.
 —, Ladies, 222.
 —, family, 284.
 Round-rob on Goldsmith's epitaph, 520, 521.
 Rous, Francis, Speaker, 18.
 Rousseau, 150, 175, 176, 760. Johnson's opinion of, 175. His "Profession of Foi," and "Confessions," 176.
 Rowe, (the poet), 72. Mrs., 105.
 Rowley, Thomas, 510.
 Royal Academy instituted, 197.
 —, family, 358, 546.
 Rowton, Lord, 121.
 Rudd, Margaret Caroline, 494, 518, 607.
 Ruddiman, Thomas, 66, 179, 231, 257, 335, 613.
 Rudeness, J.'s occasional, 253, 628, 638, 663, 670, 685, 691.
 Ruffhead's Life of Pope, 235.
 Ruins, artificial, 424.
 "Rumble," Hayley's character of Johnson, 774.
 Runic inscription, 47.
 Runts, 610.
 Russell, Lord, 219, 588.
 —, Dr., his "Aleppo," 714.
 Russia, Catherine Empress of, 622. Orders a translation of the "Kambler," 755. A mistake, 755.
 Ruddy, Dr. John, extracts from his "Spiritual Diary," 551.
 Ryland, Mr., 58, 78, 79, 785, 812, 814.
 Sabbath, the, Johnson's opinions concerning, 99, 199, 250, 285, 377, 436, 601.
 Sacheverel, Dr., 6. "History of the Isle of Man," 382.
 Sacrament, 301. Impropriety of sitting at, 627.
 Sagacity and intuition, difference between, 775.
 Sailor's life, J.'s aversion, 117, 308, 349, 480, 585.
 —, English, 43, 585.
 St. Alban's, Duke, 80.
 —, Andrew's, city of, 253. Its library, 284. Ruins of its cathedral, 540. Its university, 510.
 —, Asaph, Bishop of. See Shipley.
 —, Bruno, 465.
 —, Columba, 381, 382.
 —, Helens, Alleyne Fitzherbert, Lord, 20.
 —, Hyacinthe, 461.
 —, Julien, M. de, 461.
 —, Kilda, 191, 228, 301, 342, 360.
 —, Louis, 465.
 —, Quintin, Catherine, Countess of Eglintoun, 395.
 —, Rule's Chapel, 283.
 —, Vitus's dance, described by Sydenham, 42, 269.
 Saints, worship of, 210.
 Salamanca, University of, 155.
 Sale, Mr., his share in the Universal History, 794.
 Salisbury, Bishop of. See Douglas.
 —, Cathedral, 741.
 Sallust, 429. Spanish translation of, 722.
 Salter, Rev. Dr., 58, 68.
 Salisbury, Mrs., 251, 266, 457, 458, 610.
 —, Miss, afterwards Mrs. Thrale, 170.
 Sanderson, Bishop, 69, 210, 803, 812.
 —, Professor, 242.
 "Sandford, your mother's son is welcome," 355.
 Sandhills, 371.
 Sandwich, John, sixth Earl of, 628.
 Sandys, Mr., 45, 362. Lord, 423, 424.
 Sanguhar, Lord, 297.
 Sauterer, the Parisian brewer, 64.
 Saratoga, surrender of the British army at, 617.
 Sardina, 202.
 Sarpedon, Lord Errol like, 296.
 Sarpi, Father Paul, his "History of the Council of Trent," 29, 38, 39. His Life by Johnson, 40. See Paul.
 Sastres, Mr., the Italian master, 501, 802.
 Saunderson, Nicholas, 242.
 Savage, Richard, 35, 49, 50, 52, 53, 81, 798.
 —, Johnson's Life of, 47, 49, 50, 51, 285.
 —, inquiry as to his birth, 51. His tragedy of "Sir Thomas Overbury," 532. His "Wanderer" quoted, 760.
 Savage girl, 259. Life, 290, 255.
 Savages, 200, 234, 255, 261, 289, 290, 510, 511, 728, 766.
 Savings, trifling, 597.
 Sawbridge, Catherine, afterwards Mrs. Macaulay, 78.
 Scalger, 468.
 Scalpa, island of, 316.
 Scarsdale, Lord, and Keddlestone, 416.
 Scepticism, 278. Eleven causes of, 792.
 Schomberg, Dr. Ralph, the Jew physician, 490.
 Schoolmasters, 8, 23, 226, 227, 237, 241. Right to punish, 231.
 Schools, public, 291, 409, 498, 596.
 Science, books of, 308.
 Scolding, a specimen of Johnson's, 662.
 Score, in music, meaning of, 439.
 Scorpions, inquiry concerning, 191.

- Scotch, Johnson's feelings towards, 145. 191. 201. 217. 232. 244. 259. 276. 285. 291. 349. 383. 432. 434. 451. 478. 579. 629. 650. 658. 687. 696. 713. 719.
- , account overcome by perseverance, 232.
- , clergy, 350. Highlander, 403. Impudence, 433.
- , conjectures as to the origin of Johnson's antipathy to, 54. 431. 713. 827.
- , learning of the, 452.
- , cause of their success in London, 719.
- , Lairds, Johnson's notion of the dignity of, 139.
- , jealousy of the, 432.
- , nationality of the, 259. 432. 433. 439. 493. 720.
- Scotland, episcopal church of, 623.
- , peers of, their interference in elections, 744.
- Scotts, Mary, Queen of, 119. 276.
- Scott, Sir Walter, notes on "Tour in the Hebrides," by, 227. 231. 264. 270. 272. 275. 279. 280. 281. 282. 283. 284. 285. 286. 296. 299. 301. 302. 303. 307. 309. 313. 314. 316. 317. 318. 319. 324. 326. 340. 341. 342. 345. 346. 347. 351. 359. 362. 364. 371. 409. 410.
- , adopts editor's rejection of indelicate expressions, 176.
- , a history of the Pretender suggested to him, 491.
- , George Lewis, sub-preceptor to George III., 60.
- , John, of Amwell, 443. His "Elegies," 448.
- , Dr., afterwards Sir William and Lord Stowell, 73. 90. 117. 157. 210. 223. 268. 270. 271. 277. 280. 319. 425. 458. 483. 583. 585. 600. 646. 648. 684.
- , his character of Boswell, 280. His account of Mr. Coulson, 425.
- Scoundrel, a favourite word of Johnson's, 494.
- , and blockhead, applied to women, 486.
- Scoundrelism, "a good word," 298.
- Scrimshaw, a relation of Johnson's, 311.
- Scripture phrases, 249.
- Scriptures, inspiration of our copies questioned, 176. Proposal for an Erse translation of, 181, 182.
- Scrofula, Johnson afflicted with, 7.
- , frequently attended by morbid melancholy, 7.
- Scruples, prayer against, 799. Unnecessary, 283.
- Scuderi, Mademoiselle, 442.
- Seaforth, Lord, 309.
- Sea life, Johnson's aversion to, 64. 349. 430.
- Seal, Johnson's, 220.
- Seasons, influence of, 265.
- Secker, Archbishop, 3. 219. Johnson's prejudice against, 663. Porteus's Life of, 663.
- Second sight, 35. 175. 228. 315. 317. 341. 376. 400. 405. 437.
- Sedley, Sir C., and daughter, Countess of Dorchester, 278.
- Seduction, 615.
- Seed, Rev. Jeremiah, his "Sermons," 579.
- Self-importance, 552. Prate, 635.
- Selden's "Table Talk" quoted, 372. 719.
- Séjour*, queries on the, 461.
- Selwyn, George, 629.
- "Seneca insanus omnes," &c., whence taken, 718.
- Seneca, 336. 367. 468.
- "Senectus," use of the word, 613.
- Sensibility, Johnson's, 720.
- Sensual intercourse, 578. 612.
- "Sentimental Journey," Sterne's, 664.
- "Serious Call," Law's, 15. 218.
- Sermons, the best English, for style, 578.
- , collections of, 688.
- , Johnson's, 107. 285. 555. 603.
- , Johnson's advice on the composition of, 652.
- , "Serotinus," 68.
- Servants, male and female, 251.
- Services, 180.
- Settle, Elkannah, the city poet, 517.
- Sive* China, 549.
- Severity, 480.
- Sévigné, Madame de, 22. 186. 511.
- Seward, Rev. Mr., 19. 491. 545.
- , Anna, 4. 5. 6. 7. 20. 23. 24. 76. 188. 239. 374. 415. 491. 577. 591. 593. 596. 774. Ode on death of Cook, 773.
- , William, 200. 201. 424. 425. 535. 536. 639. 643. 734.
- , anecdotes of distinguished persons, 767.
- Sexes, inequality of the, 592.
- , sensual intercourse between, 612.
- Sforza, Ludovico, 359.
- Shakespeare, 54. 55. 72. 83. 86. 111. 112. 125. 137. 144. 168. 171. 172. 173. 177. 204. 205. 206. 207. 297. 303. 309. 353. 375. 512. 627. 662. 836. 838.
- , orthography of his name, 303.
- , J.'s edition of, 54. 107. 110. 125. 164. 171. 172. 246.
- , his witches, 627.
- , Johnson's opinion of his learning, 658. 660.
- , Johnson's lines on, 662.
- , compared with Congreve, 203. 207.
- , his picture of man, 678.
- , "Modern Characters" from, 581.
- Shame and conscience contrasted, 833.
- Sharp, Archbishop, his murder and monument, 284.
- , Samuel, 74. 121. His "Letters on Italy," 512.
- , Dr. John, 65. 167. Account of Johnson's visit to Cambridge, 167.
- , Mr. William, jun., Johnson's letter to, 536.
- Sharpe, Rev. Dr. Gregory, 220.
- Shaving, varieties in, 549.
- Shaw, Cuthbert, his poem of "The Race," 183.
- , William, works on the Erse Language, 528, 529, 567. His pamphlet on Ossian, 745.
- , Professor, 285, 286.
- Shawe, Colonel Meyrick, on the Irish and Erse, 231.
- Shebbeare, Dr., 68. 195. 602. 630. 729. His letters under the name of "Battista Angeloni," 691.
- Sheep's head, 384.
- Shelfield, Lord, 229.
- Shelburne, Earl of, (Lord Lansdowne,) 232. 500. 505. 584. 645. 715. 721. Goldsmith's blundering speech to, 716.
- Shelvoek, Mr., 794.
- Shenstone, William, 356. 385. 424. 425. 485. His essays, 733. Favourite stanza of, 763.
- Sheridan, Richard Brinsley, 121. 131. 132. 166. 217. 447. 453. 501. 529. 532. 573.
- , prologue to "Sir Thomas Overbury;" compliment to J. on his Dictionary; proposed by J. for the club; meditated answer to J.'s "Taxation no Tyranny," 532.
- , Thomas, 51. 62. 121. 126. 127. 131. 132. 134. 154. 166. 204. 207. 219. 233. 247. 261. 437. 447. 494. 532. 625. 726. 730.
- , Johnson's description of his conversation, 154.
- , irreconcilable difference between Johnson and, 131.
- , Johnson's character of, 713. 732.
- , his "Lectures on Oratory," 732.
- , his medal to the author of "Douglas," 390. 437.
- , Mrs. (Frances Chamberlaine), some account of, and of her novels, "Sydney Biddulph" and "Nourjahad," 121. 132.
- , Mrs. H. B. (Miss Linley), 453. 707.
- , Charles, his "Revolution in Sweden," 591.
- Sherlock's Sermons, 579.
- , the Rev. Martin, his travels, 770.
- , "She Steeps to Conquer," Goldsmith's, 247. 248. 250. 251. 253. 257.
- Shields, Mr. Robert, 57. 504. 506. 533.
- "Ship of Fools," 91.
- ShIPLEY, Bishop, 418. 420. 443. 480. 501. 519. 579. 644. 645. 647. 679. 683. 743.
- , Dean, 141.
- Shoe-buckles, 269.
- Shopkeepers of London, 289. 290.
- Shore, Jane, 279.
- Short-hand, 253. 586. 713.
- Siam, the King of, 609.
- Sibbald, Sir Robert, 572.
- Sick, duty of telling truth to the, 765.
- , chamber, 737.
- Siddons, Mrs., her visit to Johnson, 741.
- Sidney, Sir Phillip, 215. Arcadia quoted, 538.
- , Algernon, 249.
- Siege of Aleppo, 583.
- Sight, Johnson's defective, 100. 835.
- Silence, Johnson's occasional, 287.
- Simpson, Joseph, 117. 168. 503.
- , Thomas, the engineer, 113.
- , Rev. Mr., 79. 618.
- Sin, original, 292. 694.
- Sinclair, Sir John, 700.
- , Mr., stabbed by Savage, 35.
- Singularity, 200.
- Sins, 237.
- "Sisters," The, a comedy, 657.
- "Sixteen-string Jack," 506.
- Skeggs, Mr., plays on a broomstick, 143.
- Skeue, Sir John, 640.
- Skie, Isle of, 312.
- , Johnson's ode on, 313.
- Slain's Castle, 295.
- Slater, Mr., the druggist, 545.
- Slave-trade, Johnson's abhorrence of, 562. 663.
- Sleep, 530.
- Smalbroke, Dr., his "Sermons," 38.
- Small debts, 117.
- Smalridge, Dr., his sermons, 579.
- Smart, Christopher, 15. 65. 103. 135. 143. 664. Mrs., 785.
- Smelt, Leonard, Esq., 645.
- Smith, Rev. Edward, his verses on Pococke, 587.
- , Dr. Adam, 16. 146. 269. 272. 333. 498. 534. 608.
- , his "Wealth of Nations," 478. His meetings with Johnson, 333. 608. 661. 662. His letter about Hume, 272. Garrick's opinion of, 662.
- , Lady, 632.
- , Captain, 619.
- , Mr., 568.
- Smithson, Sir Hugh, 220.
- Smoking, 106. 282.
- Smollett, Dr., 118. 153. 212. 392. 504. Letter to Wilkes, 118. Epitaph corrected, 392.
- , Commissary, 392.
- Sociability, Johnson's, 758.
- Society, 594. Our duties to, 175. 283.
- , civilised, customs of, 150. 151. 152. 175.
- Socrates, 585. Learned to date, 680.
- "Socrum miseris socios," &c., author of, unknown, 718.
- Solander, Dr., 220, 227, 228. 378. 379. 496.

- Soldiers, 111, 307, 497, 585.
 "Soldier's letter," 47, 111.
 Solitude, 188, 735.
 —, reasons against, 735.
 Solon, 468.
 Somerset, Duchess of, 154. Duke of, 220.
 Somerville, James, thirteenth Lord, 670.
 Sombambulism, Dr. Blacklocke's, 277.
 Sophron, in the "Rambler," 68.
 Sorbonne, 464.
 Sorrow, 206, 284.
 Souls, notion of the middle state of, 77.
 Sounds, 243.
 South, Dr., his sermons, 210, 579.
 Southwark, people of, 654.
 Southwell, Robert, stanzas "Upon the Image of Death," 420.
 —, Thomas, second Lord, 78, 123, 243, 246, 653, 715.
 —, Lady, Johnson's letter to, 653.
 —, Thomas George, third Lord and first Viscount, 653.
 —, Thomas Arthur, second Viscount, 123, 246.
 —, Edmund, younger brother of second Lord, 653.
 —, Edmund, third son of the first Lord, 246.
 —, the Hon. Misses Frances and Lucy, 246, 615.
 —, Robert, 420.
 Spades, 344.
 Spain, no country less known than, 124, 139, 155.
 Spanish plays, 659.
 Speaking, public, 443. Johnson's qualifications for, 223.
 —, of one's self, 605.
 "Spectator," the, 65, 249, 454, 504, 573, 662, 664, 679, 684.
 "Speculum Humane Salvationis," 464.
 Spells, 317.
 Spelman, Sir Henry, on the fatality attending the inheritance of confiscated church property, 711.
 Spence, Rev. Joseph, 374, 675. His "Anecdotes," 145, 643, 657, 675.
 Spence, John George, Earl, 590, 646. Countess, 480.
 —, Edmund, 88, 90, 92.
 Spirits, appearance of, 116, 138, 228, 231, 239, 241, 685.
 —, evil, 277.
 "Spleen," the, 506.
 Sporus, 29.
 Spottiswoode, Mr. John, 438. "Of that ilk," 606.
 Sprat, his style characterised by Johnson, 62.
 Spurs, Johnson's, 317, 804. Kelly's, 804.
 Squires, the Rev. Mr., 65.
 Stage, the, 304.
 Stage coaches, 758, 838.
 Stair, the Earl of, 394.
 Stanhope, Mr., Lord Chesterfield's son, 88, 217, 680, 774.
 —, Earl, 48.
 Stanley, Hans, 229.
 —, Honourable Mrs., 461.
 Stanton, Mr., the player, 489, 490.
 Stanyan, Temple, his account of Switzerland, 617.
 Statham, the Rev. Mr., 18, 427.
 Statuary, 481.
 Stanbury, Sir George, letter to, and account of, 124.
 Steele, Sir Richard, 53, 439, 484, 684. His "Christian Hero," 484. Addison's conduct towards, 671.
 —, Mr. Joshua, his "Proserpina Rationalis," 439.
 Steevens, George, Esq., 141, 192, 211, 213, 214, 246, 248, 411, 412, 445, 456, 526, 559, 590, 616, 629, 666, 717, 754, 771, 803.
 —, Johnson's letter to, 411, 526.
 Stella, Swift's, 471.
Stellus inter luna minores, 784.
 Stephens, account of the, 655.
 Sterne, 238, 253, 664, 689. His "Tristram Shandy," 484.
 Stews, licensed, 569.
 Stick, Johnson's, joke on the loss of, 375.
 Stillingfleet, Benjamin, Esq., 689.
 Stinton, Dr., 589, 663.
 Stirling, corporation of, J.'s argument in favour of, 455.
 Stockdale, the bookseller, 111.
 —, Rev. Peregrin, 213, 228, 769. His "Remonstrance," 213.
 Stonehenge, 741.
 Stordford, General, the Hon. Edward, 456.
 Stories, truth essential to, 479.
 Stourbridge School, Johnson's connexion with, 10.
 Stowell, Lord. See Scott, Dr.
 Strahan, Rev. Dr. George, 75, 147, 168, 185, 289, 651, 753, 792, 806.
 —, Johnson's letters to, 129, 130, 146, 161, 168, 651.
 —, publishes Johnson's "Prayers and Meditations," 75, 792.
 —, Observations on his doing so, 792, 803.
 —, William, Esq., 79, 83, 222, 254, 293, 393, 437, 438, 524, 525, 582, 619, 687, 719.
 —, recommending J. to be brought into Parliament, 222.
 —, difference between Johnson and, 619, 625.
 —, Johnson's letters to, 687, 701.
 —, Mrs., 65.
 —, William, Esq., junior, 687.
 Stratagem, 588.
 Strathaver, Lord, 391.
 Streatham, 201, 615. Johnson's valediction to, 710.
 Strichen, Lord, 298.
 Strickland, Mrs., 465, 467, 533.
 Stuart family, 119, 147, 252, 352, 546.
 —, Mr., of Dumearn, kills Sir W. Boswell in a duel, 249.
 —, Hon. William, Archbishop of Armagh, 723.
 —, Hon. Colonel James, 634, 639, 641.
 —, Andrew, "Letters to Lord Mansfield," 255, 494.
 —, Francis and Mrs., sister, 54, 57, 641, 643, 748, 750, 827.
 —, Rev. James, translator of the Scriptures into Erse, 182.
 —, Harriot, Life of, by Mrs. Lewis, 53.
 —, Lady Mary, slaughter of Lord Rute, 360.
 Study, plan of, 139, 147, 155, 169, 157, 162, 168, 177, 296, 591, 616, 628, 637, 657, 660, 767.
 —, Cumberland's mode of, 541.
 Style, 68, 69, 70, 71, 243, 582, 590, 695, 673, 811.
 —, Burrows's Essay on Johnson's, 69.
 —, Addison's and Johnson's compared, 71.
 —, Johnson's character of Addison's, 71.
 —, various kinds of, 243, 837.
 —, metaphorical expression, a great excellence in, 552.
 —, of writers and painters, how far distinguishable, 599.
 Subordination, 583, 628. Necessary to human happiness, 138, 151, 152, 176, 252, 265.
 —, impaired in England, by the increase of money, 584.
 —, in society, duty of maintaining, 169.
 Subscription to the Thirty-nine Articles, 210, 229, 284.
 Succession, 472, 473.
 Suckling, Sir John, his "Aglaura," a play, 6, 3.
 Suetonius, 591.
 "Sugar Cane," a poem, 485, 486, 834.
 Suicide, 255, 281, 707, 733.
 Sully, 99.
 Sunday. See Sabbath.
 Sunderland, Lord, Johnson inquires for a life of, 48.
 Superfétation of the press, prejudicial to literature, 6, 8.
 Superiors, deference to, 257.
 Superstitions, 166, 228.
 Supper, a turnpike to bed, 559.
 Suspicion, 539.
 Sutherland, Duke of, 221.
 Swallows, 192.
 Swan, Dr., 40.
 Swearing in conversation, 235, 307.
 Swene's stone, 301.
 Swift, 15, 28, 37, 57, 71, 72, 132, 154, 204, 259, 345, 347, 469, 484, 512. Johnson's prejudice against, 277.
 —, his "Take of a Tub," 151, 233, 277, 437. His "Conduct of the Allies," 195. His "Gulliver's Travels," 437. His "Journal," 716.
 —, Lord Gower's application to, 37.
 —, Johnson's opinion of, 132, 154, 195, 220, 243, 277, 437.
 —, Lord Hailes's opinion of, 148.
 —, Johnson's Life of, 674.
 —, his verses on his own death, quoted by Johnson on his death-bed, 841.
 Swimming, Johnson's skill at, 524, 836.
 Swinfen, Dr., 4, 7, 12, 14, 570, 654. Mrs., 101.
 Swinton, Rev. Mr., authorship of the Universal History, 89.
 Sydenham, Dr., 293. Description of St. Vitus's dance, 42, 269. Johnson's Life of, 6, 46.
 Sydney, Lady, 366.
 Sympathy, 491. With others in distress, 206.
 "Système de la Nature," 278.
 Table, sinking, invented by Louis XV., 461.
 "Table Talk," Selden's, 372, 719.
 Tacitus, style of, 242, 428.
 Tait, Rev. Mr., 305.
 Talbot, Mrs. Catherine, 63.
 "Tale of a Tub." See Swift.
 Talisker, (Col. Macleod), 317, 318, 336, 350, 352, 363.
 "Talk" and "Conversation," J.'s distinction between, 719.
 Talkers, exuberant public, ridiculed, 269.
 Tallow-chandler, story of one, 113.
 Tanning, Johnson's knowledge of, 318.
 Tareton, 58.
 Tasker, Rev. William, a crazy poet, 621, 714.
 Tasso, his Jerusalem, 427, 698.
 —, Johnson's dedication of Hoole's translation of, 130.
 Taste, 243. Refinement of, 776.
 Tavern, the chair of a, 488.
 Taverners, 485, 678.
 "Taxation no Tyranny," 435, 442, 569, 591. Suppressed passages in, 435.
 Taylor, Jeremy, 69, 175, 760, 762, 806.
 —, Rev. Dr. John, 12, 13, 14, 51, 56, 60, 77, 79, 214, 215, 235, 285, 417, 471, 491, 493, 568, 511, 518, 539, 540, 541, 544, 546, 547, 551, 555, 558, 564, 603, 632, 731, 752, 807, 808.
 —, his sermons, 558. Johnson's letters to, 77, 731, 752.
 —, Chevalier, 630.
 —, John, Esq., 23, 61.
 —, "Demosthenes," a silent man, 603.
 Tea, J.'s defence of and fondness for, 105, 260, 563, 584.
Te uicente die, &c., 105.
 Tea-pot, Johnson's, 165.
 Tedious gentleman, Johnson's remark to, 243.
 "Telemachus," Graham's, 139, 291, 528.
 "Telemachus," (Fénelon's), 372, 457.

- Temple, Sir William. His style, 69, 582.
 —, Rev. Mr., 149, 175, 260, 436. Character of Gray, 708.
 Temptation, 575.
 Tenants, 366, 370, 443.
 Terence, 490, 660.
 Testimony, 757.
 Thales, 35.
 Thatching, 355.
 Theft allowed in Sparta, 504.
 Theobald, Lewis, 110, 345.
 Theocritus, his character as a writer, 655.
 "Theophilus Iosulanus," 341.
 Thickness, Philip, Esq., his "Travels," 575.
 Things, attention to small, 721.
 Thirlby, Dr. Styan, 711.
 Thomas, Mr. Nathaniel, 524.
 —, Colonel, 728.
 —, the two bishops of that name, 448.
 Thompson, W., author of "The Man in the Moon," 409.
 Thomson, J., 154, 194, 453, 506, 530, 533, 538, 618, 670.
 —, Rev. James, his case, 513, 816.
 Thornton, Mrs., George II.'s compliment to, 185.
 —, Bonnell, Esq., 65, 68, 89.
 —, his burlesque "Ode on St. Cecilia's Day," 143.
 —, Henry, Esq., 654.
 Thoughts, perplexing, Johnson's prayer against, 789.
 "Thoughts in Prison," Dodd's, 586.
 "Thoughts, &c. on the Falkland Islands." See Falkland Islands.
 Thrale, Henry, Esq., 60, 76, 164, 165, 169, 170, 197, 203, 222, 223, 224, 305, 359, 424, 425, 447, 465, 491, 496, 500, 501, 502, 503, 529, 530, 537, 632, 654, 677, 681, 687.
 —, Johnson's introduction into the family of, 169, 170, 654.
 —, his design of bringing Johnson into Parliament, 223.
 —, Johnson's letters to, 632.
 —, address to Southwark electors, by Johnson, 653.
 —, his reported death, 529.
 —, his death, 682, 703, 710.
 —, sale of his brewery, 682, 697.
 —, Mrs. See Piozzi. Johnson's opinion of, 834.
 —, Letters to, anecdotes by, passim.
 —, Johnson's Latin Ode to, 314.
 —, verses on her thirty-fifth birthday, 471.
 —, Henry, jun., death of, 491, 495.
 —, Mr. John and Margaret, his wife, 169.
 —, Miss, (Lady Keith), 415, 417, 423, 425.
 Threshing, 355.
 Thuanus, 468. Johnson's proposed translation of, 804.
 Thucydides, 608.
 Thurlow, Lord, 37, 717.
 —, Boswell's letter to, on J.'s proposed tour to Italy, 772.
 —, Johnson's letter to, 781. His to Johnson, 654. To Reynolds, 782. To Boswell, 775.
 —, opinion on the liberty of the pulpit, 513, 817.
 Thynne, Mr., his murder, 191.
 Tillotson, Archbishop, 69. Style of his sermons, 578.
 Time and space, 662.
 Timidity, 767.
 Tindal, Dr., forgery of his will, 255.
 Titi, history of Prince, 461.
 Toasts, 663.
 Tobemorie, 371.
 Todd's edition of Johnson's dictionary, 96, 97.
 Tocher, Alderman of Plymouth, 129.
 Toleration, 261, 262. Universal, 626, 658.
 "Tom Jones," Fielding's, 238.
 Tomkeson, Mr., Johnson's letter to, 823.
 Tonson, 72, 79.
 Tooke, Rev. John Horne, 562, 602, 613, 616.
 —, his "Letter to Mr. Dunning on the English Particle," and "Diversions of Purley," 616.
 Topham, the King versus, for a libel, 499.
 Toplady, Rev. Mr., 260, 263.
 Tories, 252, 358, 606, 612, 687, 722.
 Torloisk, Maclean of, 433.
 Torre, M., 506.
 Tory, Johnson's definition of, 97.
 — and Whig, Johnson's description of, 761.
 Torture in Holland, 159.
 Towers, Dr., his "Letter" to J., 436. "Essay on J.," 667.
 Town-life, 553, 581.
 Townley, Charles, Esq., 465, 533.
 Town-malling, 188.
 Townshend, Right Hon. Charles, 252, 465.
 —, Lord, 389.
 Townson, Rev. Dr., 264.
 Trade, 207, 238, 343, 378, 478. The rage of, 343.
 Trades, Johnson's knowledge of, 348, 355.
 Tradesmen, opulence of, 378.
 —, retired, 216. Unhappiness of, 443.
 Tradeswomen, 616.
 Tradition, 286.
 Tragedy, 506. A strange one, 576.
 Trade acting, Johnson's contempt of, 275, 556.
 Translation, 181, 506, 582.
 "Transpire," definition of the word, 612.
 Transubstantiation, 286, 292.
 Traupad, Mr., 307.
 Travel, Lord Essex's advice on, 148.
 "Traveller," Goldsmith's, 141, 165, 174, 258, 384, 580, 604.
 Travelling, 139, 148, 158, 214, 217, 485, 495, 496, 505, 510, 548, 575, 586, 597, 616, 617. Use of and rules for, 708.
 —, writers of, 456, 575, 597.
 Treason, constructive, 683.
 Trecothick, Mr. Alderman, 517, 562.
 Trees, paucity of, in Scotland, 285, 287.
 Trial by duel, 271.
 Trianon, 463.
 Triennial parliaments advocated by Johnson, 197.
 Trilles, 106, 634. Duty of attending to, 106, 148, 617.
 Trimlestown, Lord, 572.
 Trinity, 263, 292.
 Tripasse, Queen, 461.
 —, "Tristram Shandy," 484.
 Troughton, Lieut., the wanderer, 422.
 "Troye, Histories of," 425.
 Truster, Rev. Dr. John, his "Principles of Politeness," 511.
 Truth, 252. The bond of society, 594.
 —, great importance of a regard to, 149, 151, 479, 498, 499, 572, 636, 765, 786, 799.
 —, difference between physical and moral, 656.
 —, essential to stories, 479.
 Tuam, Archbishop of, afterwards Earl of Mayo, 737.
 Tull's Hushandry, 377.
 Tunbridge Wells, Johnson at, 26, 58.
 "Turkish Spy," 383. The authors of, 723.
 Turks, 475.
 Turpike roads, effect of, 838.
 Turton, Dr. and Mrs., 23. Miss, 224.
 Twalmley, the inventor of the ironing-box, 721.
 Tweedale, Marquis of, 497.
 Twining, Rev. T., translation of Aristotle's "Poetics," 506.
 Twiss, Richard, "Travels in Spain," 445, 446, 456, 457.
 Tyers, Mr. Thomas, 59, 79, 86, 105, 211, 287, 345, 436.
 —, account of, 599. Description of Johnson, 287.
 Tyrrel, Lord, 249.
 Tyreconel, Lord, 63.
 Tyrwhitt, Thomas, Esq., his "Vindication," 701.
 Tyler, William, Esq., 119, 358, 399, 402, 432.
 —, his character of Johnson's "Journey," 432.
 —, Alexander Fraser, Lord Woodhouselee, 399, 404.
 Ulinish, 344, 345.
 Ulya, 376, 538.
 Ulysses, 176, 839.
 Union, Scotch, 276.
 —, with Ireland, Johnson's prophecy as to the effects, 638.
 "Unius lacerte," meaning of the expression of Juvnal, 581.
 "Universal History," list of the authors of, 767.
 —, Warburton's and Gibbon's character of, 794.
 "Universal Visitor," Johnson's essays in, 103, 445.
 University, advantages of a, 838.
 Universities, English, not sufficiently rich, 498.
 Upcot, Mr., 15, 58, 167, 267.
 Upper-Ossory, Lord, 529, 573.
 Urban, Sylvanus, 32, 34, 48. Johnson's Latin ode to, 31.
 —, letter to, proposing "Life of Savage," 50.
 Urie, Captain, 307.
 Urns, Johnson's dislike to, 423, 835.
 "Ursa Major," 423, 808, 839. Johnson so designated by Lord Achurchile, 398.
 Usher, Archbishop, 60. Luminary of Irish church, 221.
 Usury laws, 502.
 Uttoxeter, Johnson's expiatory visit to, 791.
 Vachell, William, Esq., 521.
 "Vagabondo," Italian translation of "The Rambler," 638.
 Valetudinarian, 494, 545.
 Valière, Mademoiselle de la, 278, 279.
 Vails to servants, 201.
 Vanbrugh's "Provoked Husband," 190.
 Vandyke, 338.
 Vane, Anne, 60, 278.
 Van Helmont, 233.
 Vanity, 804.
 —, Goldsmith's extraordinary, 203.
 "Vanity of Human Wishes," 59, 177, 278.
 —, Byron's opinion of, 50.
 Vanstrat, Dr. Robert, 117, 243, 244, 425.
 —, Mr., 425.
 —, Mr. Henry, 117.
 Vasa, Gustavus, 40.
 Vauxhall Gardens, 569, 600.
 Veal, Mrs., ghost story of, invented by Defoe, 234.
 Venus of Apelles, 688. Of Medici, 835.
 Verses, alleged pleasure in writing, 731.
 —, on Ireland, by a lady, 604.
 —, favonrite, 830, 837.
 Vertot, M., 258.
 Vesey, Right Hon. Agmondesham, 298, 436, 663.
 —, Mrs., 164, 442, 501, 625, 637.
 "Vicar of Wakefield," 141, 624. Johnson sells it, 604.
 Vice, 594, 612, 615.

- "Victorious Intromission," argument on, 244. 247. 278. 814.
 Victoria, Queen, former practice with regard to sentences of death abrogated on her accession, 534.
 "Vidit et crebuit," &c., by whom written, 598.
 Vigneul-Marvilliana, 461.
 Viletti, Rev. Mr., 773.
 "Village," a poem, 716.
 Villiers, Sir George, ghost story respecting, 616.
 Vincent, Dr., 59.
 "Vindication of Natural Society," Burke's, 157, 158.
 Virgil, 15, 219, 245, 279, 381, 428, 550, 604, 837-4.
 —, Johnson's juvenile translations from, 10.
 —, comparative excellence of Homer, 559, 838.
 —, superior to Theocritus, 655.
 —, his description of the entrance into hell applied to a printing-house, 372.
 Virtue, 148, 594, 612, 625, 616.
 —, happiness dependent upon, 594.
 "Vision of Theodore the Hermit," considered by Johnson his best writing, 59.
 Vivacity, 489.
 Voltaire, 149, 171, 172, 174, 176, 204, 207, 372, 401, 461, 608.
 —, his "Candide" resembles "Rasselas," 115, 617. A good narrator, 218. His attack on Johnson, 171. His distinction of Pope and Dryden, 173.
 Voting, right of, 433.
 Vows, 179, 180, 617.
 Vyse, Rev. Dr., 113, 415, 469, 535, 790, 801.
 —, his letter to Boswell, 535.
 —, Johnson's letters to, 535, 654, 801.
 —, Miss, 632.
- Wake, Archbishop of Canterbury, 441.
 Waldegrave, the ladies, portrait of, 113.
 Wages of labourers, 355, 716.
 Wales, Johnson's tour to, 415.
 —, the Prince of, his situation, 718.
 —, Frederick Prince of, 60, 65, 185.
 —, George (afterwards George IV.), 187.
 Walker, the actor, the original Macheath, 453.
 —, Mr. Joseph Cooper, 108, 531.
 —, John, the master of elocution, 725.
 —, Rev. Robert, 400.
 Wall, Dr., the physician, 762.
 Waller, Edmund, the poet, 291, 450, 606, 665.
 —, his "Divine Poem," 761.
 —, Johnson's Life of, 696.
 —, Sir William, his "Divine Meditations," 704.
 "Walloons," Cumberland's, 706.
 Walmsley, Mrs., 490.
 Walmsley, Gilbert, Esq., 19, 24, 27, 28, 54, 61, 147, 299.
 —, his character by Johnson, 19, 27, 147, 399.
 —, his letter recommending Johnson and Garrick, 27.
 Walpole, Horace, sen., 45.
 —, Horace, afterwards Earl of Orford, 90, 113, 184, 189, 190, 202, 204, 233, 243, 253, 325, 345, 352, 362, 363, 439, 442, 444, 508, 524, 629, 691, 720, 768.
 —, his share in the "Heroic Epistle," 325, 768.
 —, his description of Bath-Easton, 442.
 —, his account of Dodd's preaching, 511.
 —, his "Reminiscences" quoted, 53, 444, 553.
 —, his character of Johnson, 768.
 —, Sir Robert, 36, 40, 41, 61, 104, 202, 233, 244, 362, 383, 417, 512, 523, 553, 681.
 —, Johnson's opposition to his government, 41.
 Walshe, Lieutenant-Colonel, 198.
 Walton, Isaac, his "Life of Bishop Sanderson," quoted, 842.
 —, His "Angler," 415. His "Lives," 413, 414, 452, 483, 529.
 War, 254, 585, 661, 728.
 Warburton, Dr., 2, 47, 54, 58, 83, 86, 110, 158, 185, 219, 289, 293, 303, 448, 559, 600, 663, 794.
 —, his "Doctrine of Grace," 263.
 —, Johnson's high opinion of, 86.
 —, made a bishop by Pope, 185. Denied, 185, 269.
 —, opinion of Johnson's "Observations on Macbeth," 54.
 —, writes the preface to "Clarissa," 83.
 —, J.'s character of, 669, 670, 760. J.'s conduct towards, 669.
 —, his contest with Lowth, 363.
 Ward, the noted quack doctor, 630.
 Wardlaw, Sir II. and Lady (Elizabeth Halket), 265.
 Wardley Camp, Johnson at, 618.
 Warner, K., his "Tour through the Northern Counties," 791.
 Warrants, general, 159. Death, 534.
 Warren, Dr., 800.
 —, Mr., the first bookseller at Birmingham, 21, 43.
 Warton, Joseph, mention of and letters to, 32, 75, 81, 82, 83, 91, 102, 125, 153, 172, 173, 186, 215, 235, 387, 520, 521, 635, 647.
 —, Thomas, mention of and letters to, 13, 15, 19, 50, 62, 65, 83, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 95, 96, 102, 108, 110, 111, 112, 157, 198, 214, 230, 387, 483, 547, 572, 573, 591, 647, 656.
 —, his account of Johnson's conversations at Oxford, 88.
 —, his opinions on Johnson's Dictionary, 33.
 —, Johnson's parodies on his bad style of poetry, 547.
 Wasse, his Greek Trochaics to Bentley, 420.
 Waste, 585.
 Watch, Johnson's, 192. His father's, 814.
- Watson, Bishop, his "Chemical Essays," 692, 736. Would equalise bishops, and why, 692.
 —, Mr., 315.
 —, Dr., the historian of Philip II., 282, 285, 286, 528.
 Watts, Dr., 165, 135, 526, 638, 622. Johnson's Life of, 536.
 Way, Daniel, Esq., 706. Mrs., 710.
 Wealth, 251, 478, 584, 695. Right employment of, 715.
 Weather, influence on the mind, 111, 116, 134, 788.
 Webster, Rev. Dr. Alexander, 279, 400, 402, 411.
 Wedderburne, Alexander, & Loughborough.
 Wedding ring, Johnson's, 76.
 Welch, Saunders, Esq., 138, 501, 567, 568, 635, 719.
 —, Misses Mary (Mrs. Sullivans) and Anne, 568.
 Wellesley, Marquis, 253, 591, 610.
 Welsh language, 421; and parson, 423.
 Wentworth, Mr., Johnson's schoolmaster, 9, 10.
 Wesley, Rev. John, mention of and letters to, 274, 436, 475, 573, 595, 631, 684. His ghost story, 595, 631.
 —, Charles, 596.
 West, his translation of "Pindar," 663.
 —, James, Esq., M.P., 222.
 Westcote, Lord, afterwards third Lord Lyttelton, 421, 650.
 Western Islands. See Hebrides.
 Westmoreland, Earl of, 117.
 Weston, Sir William, 31, 79.
 Wetherell, Rev. Dr., 419, 476, 483, 489.
 Wharton, Lord, 416.
 Wheeler, Rev. Dr. Benjamin, 425, 621, 692, 737.
 "Whig," Johnson's definition of, 57, 606.
 —, a Staffordshire, 405. The Devil, the first, 606.
 —, and Tory, 692, 761.
 "Whiggism," Johnson's definition of, 148, 216, 382, 483, 606.
 Whigs, 45, 252, 352, 358, 435, 588, 624, 732.
 —, alter the fireplace, 89.
 Whiston, 127.
 Whitaker, Rev. James, his "History of Manchester," 609.
 Whitbread, Samuel, M.P., epigram quoted by, 344.
 Whitby's "Commentary," 359.
 White Knight, 377.
 White, Rev. Dr. Joseph, 247.
 —, Rev. Henry, 791.
 —, Mr., factor in the Calder estate, 303.
 —, Mrs., Johnson's servant, 801.
 Whitefield, Rev. George, 18, 202, 274, 638.
 Whitefoord, Caleb, 770.
 Whitehead, Paul, 35, 56, 86, 137, 301.
 —, William, 3, 35, 56, 137.
 Whiting, Mrs., 427.
 Whittig, I. Walton's eulogy on, 682.
 "Whole Duty of Man," the author of, 259.
 Whyte, Mr. S., 131. Anecdotes of Johnson, 166, 437, 439.
 Wickedness, 337.
 Wickens, Mr., anecdotes of Johnson by, 835.
 Wife, Johnson's advice on the choice of, a, 192, 341.
 Wight, Mr., the lawyer, 279.
 Wightman, General, 309.
 Wigs, 316, 606, 837.
 Wilcox, Mr., the bookseller, 28.
 Wilkes, John, Esq., 35, 98, 117, 134, 175, 200, 205, 213, 273, 325, 383, 425, 444, 478, 513, 516, 517, 555, 562, 571, 605, 648, 661, 670, 687, 688, 689, 732.
 —, his conduct during the riots in 1780, 648.
 —, his jeu d'esprit on Johnson's Dictionary, 98.
 —, Johnson's opinion of, 134, 383, 555.
 —, meetings between him and Johnson, 513, 515, 687.
 —, Smollett's letter to, respecting Barber, 118.
 —, Israel, Esq., 832.
 Wilkinson, the Misses, 74.
 Wilks, the actor, 671.
 Will, Johnson's, 801. Burke's, 842.
 Will-making, 265.
 Willes, Chief Justice, 8, 688.
 William the Third, Johnson's character of, 352, 444.
 —, the Fourth, Prince William Henry, 187.
 Williams, Mr. Zachariah, 99.
 —, Mrs. Anna, 43, 74, 82, 101, 110, 118, 143, 158, 166, 181, 194, 198, 208, 458, 470, 503, 509, 510, 514, 524, 535, 537, 538, 569, 620, 737, 738, 739, 740.
 —, her letter to Mrs. Montagu, 459. Her death, 737, 738.
 —, Miss Helen Maria, 757.
 —, Sir Charles Hanbury, 98, 181, 357.
 Willis, Dr. Thomas, 373.
 Wilmot, Chief Justice, 8.
 Wilson, Rev. T., his "Archaeological Dictionary," 711.
 —, Mr., 79.
 —, Father, 460.
 Windham, Right Hon. William, 13, 332, 432, 534, 616, 719, 723, 724, 733, 755, 784, 786, 800.
 —, his hypocriticalism, 617, 840.
 —, his journal of conversation with Johnson, 837., and of his last moments, 838.
 Winulus's "Journey to Mequinne," 420.
 Wine, 220, 242, 243, 282, 336, 430, 567, 568, 551, 576, 578, 579, 599, 606, 607, 609, 627.
 —, reason and times of J.'s abstinence from, 28, 174, 569.
 Wingfield, Edward, second Viscount Powerscourt, 351.
 Winifred's Well, 419.

- Winton, Earl of, 289.
 Wirgman's toy-shop, 605.
 Wirtemberg, Prince of, 240.
 Wise, Dr. Francis, 89, 90.
 Wisdome, Robert, his prayer, 420.
 Wishart, Dr. William, on death-bed repentance, 350.
 —, Mr. George, 284.
 Wit, 507, 688.
 Witchcraft, 277, 317.
 Witches, 239, 277, 627.
 — in Macbeth, 300, 627.
 Witnesses in courts of justice, 347.
 Wives, 341, 637, 664.
 Woodhouslee, Lord. See Tytler.
 Woffington, Miss, 349. Pegg, 584.
 Wolfe, General, 311.
 Wollaston, 8.
 Women, 341, 451, 592, 664, 760, 761.
 — of quality, 616.
 — preachers, 157.
 Wood, Anthony, 12.
 —, R., on Homer, 837.
 Woodcocks, 192, 260.
 Woodhouse, the poetical shoemaker, 170, 219.
 Woolf, Rev. John, his "Life of Warton," 83, 647.
 Worcester, 424.
 "Word to the Wise." Johnson's prologue to, 532.
 Works designed by Johnson, 794, 820.
 —, list of Johnson's, 821.
 World, injustice of the complaints against the, 714.
 "World," the, 84, 143, 499.
 "World Displayed," J. writes the introduction to, 117.
 Worldly-mindedness, singular instance of, 601.
 Worthington, Dr. William, 420, 424.
 Wortley, Col. James Stuart. See Stuart.
 Wotton, Sir H., commended, 837.
 Wraxall, Sir Nathaniel William, 457, 644, 646.
 Wrexham, 423.
 Wright, Mr. Richard, of Lichfield, 20, 812.
 Writers, modern, the moons of literature, 608.
 — to the Signet, 384.
 Writing, alleged pleasure in, 731.
 Wyatt, Mr., the architect, 236.
 Wynne, Sir Thomas, and Lady Catherine, 422.
 Xenophon, his "Treatise on Economy," 524.
 —, his "Retreat of the Ten Thousand," 664.
 —, "Memorabilia," by Edwards, 621.
 Xerxes, 561.
 Yalden, the poet, 135, 622.
 Yates, Mrs., the actress, 643.
 Yonge, Sir William, 61, 233.
 "Yorick's Sermons," 253.
 York, Edward, Duke of, dedication to, 172
 —, Duke and Duchess of, 156.
 —, Cardinal, 325.
 Yorke, Sir Joseph's Dragoons, 168.
 Young, Dr., 65, 67, 357, 580, 673, 692, 693, 763.
 — his "Night Thoughts," 207, 357, 673. "Conjectures on Original Compositions;" "Love of Fame," 357.
 "Universal Passion," 673.
 —, Life of, by the Rev. Herbert Croft, 673.
 —, his writings described by Johnson, 673.
 —, Mr., his criticism on Gray's Elegy, 797.
 Young people, Johnson's fondness for, 152.
 Yvery, Lord Egmont's history of the house of, 723.
 Zenobia, a tragedy, by Murphy, 191.
 Zobeide, a tragedy, by Cradock, 506.
 Zouch, Rev. Dr., 483, 529.

LIST OF STANDARD HISTORICAL WORKS.

- HISTORY of the ANCIENT WORLD; from the Earliest Records to the Fall of the Western Empire, A.D. 476. By PHILLIP SMITH. Plans. 3 vols. 8vo. 31s. 6d.
- HISTORY of ANCIENT EGYPT. Derived from Monuments and Inscriptions. By Professor BRUGSCH. Translated by H. DANBY SEYMOUR. 8vo.
- HERODOTUS: a new English Version. With Notes and Essays, Historical and Ethnographical. By Canon RAWLINSON, Sir HENRY RAWLINSON, and Sir J. G. WILKINSON. Illustrations. 4 vols. 8vo. 48s.
- The FIVE GREAT MONARCHIES of the ANCIENT EASTERN WORLD; or the History, Geography, and Antiquities of Chaldea, Assyria, Babylonia, Media, and Persia. By Canon RAWLINSON. Illustrations. 3 vols. 8vo. 42s.
- HISTORY of the JEWS, from the Earliest Period to Modern Times. By Dean MILMAN. 3 vols. post 8vo. 18s.
- DICTIONARY of GREEK and ROMAN ANTIQUITIES. By WM. SMITH, D.C.L. Illustrations. Royal 8vo. 28s.
- DICTIONARY of GREEK and ROMAN BIOGRAPHY and MYTHOLOGY. By WM. SMITH, D.C.L. Illustrations. 3 vols. royal 8vo. 84s.
- DICTIONARY of GREEK and ROMAN GEOGRAPHY. By WM. SMITH, D.C.L. Illustrations. 2 vols. royal 8vo. 56s.
- POPULAR ACCOUNT of the ANCIENT EGYPTIANS. By Sir J. G. WILKINSON. Illustrations. 2 vols. post 8vo. 12s.
- HISTORY of GREECE, from the Earliest Period to the close of the Generation Contemporary with Alexander the Great. By GEORGE GROTH. Library Edition. Portrait and Maps. 10 vols. 8vo. 120s.; or, Cabinet Edition, Portrait and Plans, 12 vols. post 8vo. 6s. each.
- HISTORY of the DECLINE and FALL of the ROMAN EMPIRE. By EDWARD GIBBON, with Notes by MILMAN and GUIZOT. Edited by Dr. WM. SMITH. Maps. 8 vols. 8vo. 60s.
- HISTORY of SICILY to the ATHENIAN WAR, with Elucidations of the Sicilian Odes of Pindar. By WATKISS LLOYD. Map. 8vo. 11s.

Continued.

STANDARD HISTORICAL WORKS—continued.

---

DICTIONARY of CHRISTIAN ANTIQUITIES, comprising the History, Institutions, and Antiquities of the Christian Church. Edited by Dr. WM. SMITH and Professor CHEETHAM. Illustrations. (To be completed in 2 vols.) Vol. I. Medium 8vo. 31s. 6d.

DICTIONARY of CHRISTIAN BIOGRAPHY, from the Times of the Apostles to the Age of Charlemagne. Edited by Dr. WM. SMITH and Rev. H. WACE. Illustrations. (To be completed in 3 vols.) Vol. I. Medium 8vo.

HISTORY of CHRISTIANITY, from the Birth of Christ to the Extinction of Paganism in the Roman Empire. By Dean MILMAN. 3 vols. post 8vo. 18s.

HISTORY of LATIN CHRISTIANITY, including that of the Popes to the Pontificate of Nicholas V. By Dean MILMAN. 9 vols. post 8vo. 54s.

HISTORY of the CHRISTIAN CHURCH from the Apostolic Age to the Reformation, A.D. 64–1517. By Canon ROBERTSON. 8 vols. post 8vo. 6s. each.

HISTORY of the GALLICAN CHURCH from the Concordat at Bologna, 1516, to the Revolution. By Rev. W. H. JERVIS. Portraits. 2 vols. 8vo. 28s.

HISTORY of EUROPE during the MIDDLE AGES. By HENRY HALLAM. Library Edition. 3 vols. post 8vo. 12s.

HISTORICAL MEMORIALS of CANTERBURY. 1. Landing of Augustine.—2 Murder of Becket.—3. Edward the Black Prince.—4. Becket's Shrine. By Dean STANLEY. Woodcuts. Post 8vo. 7s. 6d.

HISTORY of CHARLES the BOLD, Duke of Burgundy. By J. FOSTER KIRK. Portraits. 3 vols. 8vo. 45s.

HISTORY of the UNITED NETHERLANDS, from the Death of William the Silent to the Twelve Years' Truce, 1609. By J. L. MOTLEY. Portraits. 4 vols. post 8vo. 6s. each.

LIFE and DEATH of JOHN of BARNEVELD, Advocate of Holland. With a view of the Primary Causes and Movements of the Thirty Years' War. By J. L. MOTLEY. Illustrations. 2 vols. crown 8vo. 12s.

HISTORY of ENGLAND, from the Accession of Henry VII. to the Death of George II. By HENRY HALLAM. 3 vols. post 8vo. 18s.

HISTORY of ENGLAND, from the Reign of Queen Anne to the Peace of Versailles (1701–1783). By Earl STANHOPE. 9 vols. post 8vo. 5s. each.

HISTORY of MODERN EUROPE; from the taking of Constantinople by the Turks to the Close of the War in the Crimea (1453–1857). By T. H. DYER. 4 vols. 8vo.

---

JOHN MURRAY, ALBEMARLE STREET.

RETURN CIRCULATION DEPARTMENT
TO → 202 Main Library

|                 |   |   |
|-----------------|---|---|
| LOAN PERIOD 1   | 2 | 3 |
| HOME USE |   |   |
| 4               | 5 | 6 |

ALL BOOKS MAY BE RECALLED AFTER 7 DAYS

1-month loans may be renewed by calling 642-3405

6-month loans may be recharged by bringing books to Circulation Desk

Renewals and recharges may be made 4 days prior to due date

DUE AS STAMPED BELOW

|                                 |            |  |
|---------------------------------|------------|--|
|                                 |            |  |
| MAY 8 1986                      |            |  |
| REC CIR APR 22 1986             |            |  |
| AUTO DUE MAY 17 1989 |            |  |
|                                 |            |  |
|                                 |            |  |
|                                 | JUN 2 1989 |  |
|                                 |            |  |
|                                 |            |  |
|                                 |            |  |
|                                 |            |  |

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA, BERKELEY
 FORM NO. DD6, 60m, 3/80 BERKELEY, CA 94720

GENERAL LIBRARY - U.C. BERKELEY

8000730146

